At Middlesex Quarter Sessions sitting at the Guildhall, Westminster, on July 29, 1952, the respondents appealed against the dismissal of all objections made by them under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, s. 7 (d), in respect of private street works to be done in Seafield Road in the borough of Southgate, which was heard and determined by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Tottenham on May 2, 1952. It was proved or admitted that on July 31, 1951, the present appellants resolved to execute certain private street works in Seafield Road pursuant to s. 6 of the Act. On Nov. 27, 1951, the appellants resolved to approve the specification of the works, together with the plans, sections, estimate of probable expenses and the provisional apportionment. They complied with s. 6 (3) of the Act. The respondents were the owners (as defined in s. 5 of the Act) of premises shown in the provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with part of the expenses of executing the works. They were also the owners of vacant land on the same site, on which they desired to build houses. This vacant land had been zoned in the draft development plan for the county of Middlesex as a permanent open space, subject to compulsory purchase within ten years. If the respondents' objection to this draft plan were not successful, the appellants would, in due course, purchase the vacant land at its existing value. Seafield Road had been a private street since 1934, the approximate date when the respondents completed building some of the houses. The approximate cost of making up the road, which the appellants proposed to do by putting three inches of tar macadam on a basis of hard core, the existing surface of the road being retained insofar as it provided this basis, would have been £6,000, of which the respondents would have been liable to pay about £3,000. On Jan. 22, 1952, the respondents objected to the appellants' proposals to execute the proposed works on the grounds that they were insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses were excessive. On May 21, 1952, the respondents applied to the appellants, pursuant to the provisions of Part III of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, for permission to develop the vacant land by building houses on it. On June 24, 1952, the appellants, acting as agents for the local planning authority, the county council of the administrative county of Middlesex, refused permission to develop the vacant land in accordance with the application. The respondents intended to appeal against this decision to the Minister of Housing and Local Government. The building operations, which the respondents proposed to carry out if the appeal was allowed, would have necessitated the cutting into the road to lay on the gas, electricity and water services, and the heavy traffic, which would have been necessitated for a substantial period of time by those building operations, would have inevitably churned up the proposed new surface of the road, with the result that the £6,000 spent on the making up of the street would have been wholly, or to a large extent, wasted.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, in considering an objection under s. 7 (d) of the Act of 1892 that the works were unreasonable, the justices were not entitled to consider whether it was reasonable that the works should be executed at all, and the possibility of damage to the road as a result of the development proposed by the respondents was not a matter to be taken into consideration by the justices in determining such an objection. Whether or not private street works should be carried out in the road was a matter solely within the discretion of the appellants, and the justices had no power to adjudicate on the exercise of that discretion in considering an objection under s. 7 (d) of the Act. There was no evidence before the justices on which they could find that the appellants had exercised their discretion in respect of the making up of the road on any wrong principle. The works were not unreasonable within s. 7 (d) of the Act. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the appellants' proposal to make up the road was premature, in that, in the event of the Minister allowing the respondents' appeal against the appellants' refusal to grant them permission to develop the vacant land, then the road, as made up, would have to be cut into to provide some or all of the various public utility services for the new houses on the land, and, further, having regard to the very light form of surface construction proposed, the road would be churned up by heavy vehicles used in the construction of the houses which the respondents proposed to build. The work was "insufficient" within the meaning of s. 7 (d) of the Act, in that the appellants proposed to adopt a very light form of surface construction for the road, which would suffer very serious damage from the continuous heavy traffic to which it would be subjected for a substantial period in the event of the Minister granting the respondents permission to develop the land. The appellants were not making a bona fide exercise of their powers under the Act of 1892 in requiring the respondents to pay approximately £3,000 towards making up the road on land now belonging to the respondents, which land they refused to allow the respondents to develop and which they would, in due course, compulsorily purchase if the Minister approved its zoning as a permanent open space, which zoning the appellants had originally recommended.

Quarter sessions allowed the respondents' appeal and ordered that the resolution, specifications, estimates and provisional apportionments, the subject of the appeal, be quashed, and the appellants now appealed.

J. R. Willis and C. C. P. Hodson for the appellants, the corporation.
Ackner for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by Middlesex Quarter Sessions, and raises a rather difficult point under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, an Act which frequently does raise difficulties and has been the subject of a good many decisions in this court. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The case came before this court originally in April, 1953, and the position was this. Quarter sessions had allowed the appeal, so the work was stopped. By that time the respondents had heard that the Minister of Housing and Local Government had allowed their appeal, and, therefore, it was open to them to build, and they were proposing to build. It seemed to the court then that it would be rather absurd to hear this appeal and give a decision which might be completely academic because, if the building was going on, it was obvious that this work might easily be entirely thrown away, and work which would have to be done if the street became a street with houses on both sides would be very different from what was required when it contained only a few houses. We adjourned the case in the hope that there would be some settlement between the parties, but by a series of misfortunes the respondents' building work has not yet been started.

Section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, provides that the persons liable to contribute may object to the proposals "on any of the following grounds", and among them are: "(d) That the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses are excessive". There are three disjunctive terms: "insufficient", "unreasonable", and "the expenses are excessive". Section 8 provides for a determination of the objections, which are to be heard by a court of summary jurisdiction, and by sub-s. (1):

" . . . The court may quash in whole or in part or may amend the resolution, plans, sections, estimates, and provisional apportionments, or any of them, on the application either of any objector or of the urban authority . . .”

If the statute allows an objection on the ground that works are unreasonable, and if a court has to decide on the validity of that objection, that is to say, whether the objection is well founded, it seems to me that it follows from that that the court must consider whether the works are reasonable or not. The word “unreasonable” is a very wide word and is intended, I think, to give a very wide power to a court that has to decide whether an objection to the works is well founded or not.

Counsel for the appellants has contended that the statute, on its true construction, does not enable the justices, or, ex hypothesi, quarter sessions on appeal from the justices, to consider whether or not the works are, if I may put it so, desirable, or whether they should be done at one particular time or another. So far as the last objection is concerned, I do not think quarter sessions would have power to say: “We think these works are desirable, but they must be put off. We think they ought to start, not this week, but next week”, or anything of that sort. But, in considering whether the works are reasonable or not, the real question is: Can the justices or quarter sessions say: “We have come to the conclusion on a review of all the circumstances that, at any rate for the present, there is no need to make up this road”? The contention of counsel for the appellants is that the cases have established that the justices have no power to upset what I call the original resolution, that is to say, the resolution of a council resolving that it is desirable that the work should be done. It has been held in Sheffield Corpn. v. Anderson (1), that it is only the second resolution, that is to say, the resolution approving the specification and apportionment, which can be attacked, but it seems to me that, however that may be, if the justices give effect to the objection, the statute enables them to quash the second resolution, and that would, at any rate, put a stop to the proceedings for the time being. Whether there can be another resolution and another apportionment, and so forth, we have not to consider; we have to consider whether the justices had power to give the decision they have given because, in their opinion, these works were premature.

In my opinion, this case has really been decided for us by Mansfield Corpn. v. Butterworth (2), and more especially by the judgment of WILLS, J. The court there had to take into account what was the meaning of s. 7, and he said this, dealing first with the word “insufficient” ([1898] 2 Q.B. 281):

“I think ‘insufficient’ means that the specified works are insufficient to carry out the purpose which is proposed to be effected by them; it does not mean that they are insufficient having regard to something which, if done, might make a better scheme for the neighbourhood in general; it does not enable the justices to take into consideration other things which are altogether outside the character of the works in respect of their sufficiency to produce the effect desired. The word ‘insufficient’, in my opinion, points exclusively to a comparison between that which is proposed to be done and the means of effecting it. The word ‘unreasonable’ has undoubtedly a wider meaning, and I think that it does give the justices jurisdiction to say whether, having regard to the scheme as a whole, it is reasonable or not that the proposed works should be done at all. That seems to follow from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Sheffield Corpn. v. Anderson (1), where the court held that a resolution approving plans for draining a street, the drainage of which the justices thought was already sufficiently provided for, might be quashed on the ground that it was unreasonable.”

KENNEDY, J., who was the other member of the court, said (ibid., 283):

“Now, the insufficiency meant by the Act must, in my view, mean the insufficiency of the proposed works to carry out the object for which they are proposed. The justices have held that the proposed works were unreasonable, not in respect of the street as a street which wanted paving, sewerage, and lighting, but because the scheme did not go further and say that the street should also be widened."

That case has stood for fifty-five years, and counsel has not been able to draw our attention to any case in which it has ever been questioned. Accordingly, we must take it that that case is binding on this court. It surely must follow that, if the court was right in saying that the justices could hold that the proposed work should not be done at all, they can say at any particular time: "This work is not required and is not to be done". That does not mean that the justices are saying that the work is never to be done, but that they consider that it is unreasonable to do the work at the present time, and when I say "at the present time", what the justices are saying is that the street, as a street (to use KENNEDY, J.'s words), does not require paving, sewerage, and lighting. It may in the future, one cannot say. It seems to me that, on the plain words used by both the learned judges in the Mansfield case (2), it follows that the justices have power to say: "You are asking us to decide on an objection that this work is unreasonable. We have come to the conclusion that it is unreasonable because we do not think it should be done now. We are not saying it should never be done, but not now".

The only two other cases to which our attention has been drawn are, first, Chester Corpn. v. Briggs (3), in which SALTER, J., at the end of his judgment said ([1924] 1 K.B. 247):

"In considering an objection under s. 7 (d) that the proposed works are unreasonable, the justices are entitled to consider, among other things, whether the proposed works are reasonable in the sense that it is reasonable that such work should be done at the frontagers' expense."

In the subsequent case of Hornchurch Urban District Council v. Allen (4), the court said that that was a dictum of one judge which was not supported by the other two judges, and so the court did not follow it and it must be regarded as overruled. But it was because of that dictum that the justices who decided Hornchurch Urban District Council v. Allen (4) came to the decision that the particular work would cast an unreasonable burden on the frontagers and, I suppose, it ought, therefore, to have been contributed to by the local authority, as they can, under s. 15. But that case does not, it seems to me, throw any doubt on the decision in the Mansfield case (2) because it really deals with a different point. It simply says that Parliament puts on the frontagers, the burden of paying for these improvements, and, therefore, it is not an objection to the carrying out of the improvement that the court may think it rather hard on the frontagers that they have to pay for some particular form of road. If the justices had found in the Hornchurch case (4) that the road was unreasonable—that it was unreasonable to put down a road of that sort or that the expense would be excessive—that would have given them ground within the Mansfield case (2) for quashing the resolution and setting aside the subsequent apportionment.

For these reasons, I think this court must consider itself bound by Mansfield Corpn. v. Butterworth (2). Therefore, quarter sessions were entitled to come to the decision they did, and this appeal fails.

SELLERS, J.: I agree. The power of the justices is derived from s. 7 (d) of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and it depends, in this case, on the proper interpretation to be given to the word "unreasonable". My Lord has pointed out that that part of the Act, including, particularly, the word "unreasonable", was construed as far back as 1898, and, as my Lord has said,

I do not think this court can place a different interpretation on it. If the interpretation given by WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ., in the Mansfield case (2) is right, then, on the facts before quarter sessions, they were amply justified in coming to the conclusion which they did.

- HAVERS, J.: I agree with both the judgments which have been delivered. Quarter sessions held, on the facts of the particular case which was before them, which have been adequately stated by my Lord, that the proposals of the appellants were premature and on that ground were unreasonable. Few people, I think, having heard the facts which were before the justices, would doubt that the conclusion at which they arrived was a very practical and common-sense conclusion, but counsel for the appellants has contended before us that quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to come to the conclusion at which they arrived, and that the word "unreasonable" has to be construed in a somewhat narrow and restricted sense. Obviously, the word "unreasonable" is a word of very wide import, and I agree with my Lord that we are bound by the decision of this court in Mansfield Corpn. v. Butterworth (2). If that is so, accepting the interpretation that WILLS, J., put on the word "unreasonable" in this section, it seems to me to follow that quarter sessions had jurisdiction to take the course they did.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: G. H. Taylor, town clerk, Southgate (for the appellants); Vincent & Vincent & Rawlinson & Son (for the respondents).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

D W. v. W.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), July 6, 7, 8, 1953.]

Legitimacy—Presumption of legitimacy—Rebuttal—Birth in lawful wedlock—Access by husband—Use of contraceptives.

- The husband filed a petition for divorce alleging that the wife had committed adultery with the co-respondent on occasions on and after Apr. 21, 1947. He further alleged: "That on Dec. 11, 1946, the [wife] gave birth to a child [A], the paternity of which is not admitted". The wife entered an appearance, but filed no answer. The co-respondent defended the suit and called the wife as a witness, but she was asked no questions as to the paternity of the child. On May 10, 1950, the husband was granted a decree nisi. By a summons dated June 15, 1950, the wife applied for an award of maintenance for herself and the child A. The husband, by affidavit, denied that he was the father, and on Oct. 31, 1950, an order was made for the trial of the issue as to paternity with leave to the husband to raise a plea of res judicata. In evidence, the husband stated that he had had sexual intercourse with the wife on and after Mar. 5, 1946, but had used contraceptives, that he had accepted the child as his own and had registered her in his name, and that in June, 1948, he had been told for the first time by the wife that he was not the father.

- HELD: (i) the only issue between the husband and wife in the divorce suit was adultery, no order for custody of the child had been made, and, therefore, the issue of legitimacy had not previously been in issue and could not be res judicata.

Lindsay v. Lindsay ([1934] P. 162), distinguished.

(ii) nothing except evidence that the husband did not have sexual intercourse with the wife at the period of conception could render illegitimate a child born in wedlock, and the mere use of contraceptives did not alter that proposition; the husband had failed to rebut the presumption of legitimacy and the issue must be decided in favour of the wife.

Observations of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in Gordon v. Gordon ([1903] P. 142), applied.

AS TO RES JUDICATA, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 410-414, paras. 465-469; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 21, pp. 159-161, Nos. 213-218.

AS TO PRESUMPTION OF LEGITIMACY, see HALSBURY, Simonds Edn., Vol. 3, pp. 87-92, paras. 139-145; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 3, pp. 358-368, Nos. 1-97. A

Cases referred to:

- (1) Lindsay v. Lindsay, [1934] P. 162; 103 L.J.P. 100; 151 L.T. 283; 27 Digest, Replacement, 614, 5746.
- (2) Green v. Green, [1929] P. 101; 98 L.J.P. 58; 140 L.T. 93; 27 Digest, Replacement, 664, 6286.
- (3) Gordon v. Gordon, [1903] P. 141; 72 L.J.P. 33; 89 L.T. 73; 27 Digest, Replacement, 677, 6459. B

ISSUE.

By a petition dated Mar. 30, 1949, the husband prayed for a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent, which was alleged to have taken place on divers dates on and after Apr. 21, 1947, and he alleged, inter alia: C

"3. That save as hereinafter appears there is issue of the said marriage now living one child [B] born on July 10, 1939 . . . 10. That on Dec. 11, 1946, the [wife] gave birth to a child [A], the paternity of which is not admitted."

The husband also prayed for the exercise of the court's discretion in his favour and for custody of the child, B. The wife entered an appearance, but did not file an answer to the petition. The co-respondent entered an appearance and, by his answer, pleaded condonation, connivance and collusion. At the hearing before BARNARD, J., the co-respondent called the wife as a witness, but she was asked no question as to the paternity of the child, A. On May 10, 1950, BARNARD, J., granted a decree nisi in favour of the husband, awarded him the custody of B, and, in the course of his judgment, said: D

"There is one child of the marriage, a boy born in July, 1939. There was a further child, the [husband] does not admit the paternity of this, born in December, 1946." E

By a summons dated June 15, 1950, the wife applied for an award of maintenance for herself and for A. On July 6, 1950, the decree was made absolute. By an affidavit, dated July 19, 1950, the husband denied that A was a child of the marriage. On Oct. 31, 1950, WALLINGTON, J., ordered that an issue be tried as to the paternity of A, and that in the issue the husband be at liberty to raise as an answer the submission that the question of paternity was res judicata. F

Marston Garsia for the wife.

Van Oss for the husband. G

BARNARD, J., stated the facts and continued: I fail to see how one could possibly say that this issue of paternity is res judicata. There has never been any issue before the court as to the legitimacy or illegitimacy of this child. The only issue as between the husband and the wife in the divorce suit was whether or not the wife had committed adultery. There is no allegation in the petition that the co-respondent is the father of the child. There is not even a definite allegation that the husband is not the father of the child himself. The husband merely said in his petition with reference to the child "the paternity . . . is not admitted", and the wife made no answer. In support of the husband's argument, I was referred to Lindsay v. Lindsay (1). H

In that case the child was born in 1927, seven years after the marriage. The wife alleged in her petition that the child was a child of the marriage and asked for its custody. The husband answered that petition and never denied that the child was a child of the marriage, and, in due course, the wife was granted a decree and given the custody of the child; it was only at a later stage that the husband denied paternity. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in the course of his judgment, said that it was not open to the husband at that stage to say that the child was not a child of the marriage, and he allowed the order as to custody to go in favour of the wife. I think the crux of the matter is a quotation by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., from Green v. Green (2), in which LORD MERRIVALE, P., said ([1929] P. 104):

“An order for custody in a divorce suit—for reasons which I will presently point out—implies a finding of legitimacy.”

There is no order yet for custody of this child and the question is in issue. I am satisfied that this case does not in any way come within that decision and the matter is not res judicata.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence and said that the husband had said that he was almost certain he had had sexual intercourse with his wife on and after Mar. 5, 1946, but had used a rubber sheath; that the child A was born on Dec. 11, 1946; that the husband had accepted her as his child and had registered her as such, and that in June, 1948, the husband was told by the wife for the first time not only that she had been committing adultery with the co-respondent, but also, and he believed what he was told, that he was not the father of A. On three occasions the wife had told an inspector of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and his wife that the co-respondent was the father of A. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] I am dealing here with the legitimacy or illegitimacy of a child, and the law on the subject is strict. Counsel for the husband agreed that the burden of proof lay on him. Gordon v. Gordon (3) was decided in 1903, and, I think, the principles are the same today as they were then. The facts were different from the facts in this case, but SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., lays down the law on this subject as follows ([1903] P. 142):

“The law says that what has to be proved is that the husband did not have intercourse which might have led to the birth of the child. It does not allow the fact that another person had intercourse with the wife to be a material consideration . . . In the well-known text-book on bastardy, by SIR HARRIS NICOLAS [A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF ADULTERINE BASTARDY (1836), p. 186] the learned author, after commenting on certain cases, says this, and it appears to me to represent accurately the law on the subject: ‘ . . . Sexual intercourse between man and wife must be presumed, and nothing, except evidence that the husband did not have such intercourse at the period of conception, can illegitimise a child born in wedlock. If the husband could, from circumstances of time, place, and health, have had nuptial intercourse with his wife, and there be no evidence to prove that he did not have such intercourse, he must be considered the father of her child, even if she had committed adultery with one, two, or twenty other men ’.”

It is true that since 1903 the use and knowledge of contraceptives has become more common and, although I am satisfied that the husband has told me the truth and that he was using them, I do not feel that the mere use of contraceptives in any way alters that proposition of law. The husband himself, knowing he was using contraceptives, did not at the time doubt that he was the father of the child, but thought that the contraceptives might have let him down—and it is part of his case that contraceptives of another nature let him down when B, whose paternity is not disputed, was conceived. Although I am satisfied that the wife made statements against her own interests that the co-respondent was the father of her child, I do not think that such statements, coming from a woman utterly regardless of the truth, who would say anything to suit her own purpose, whatever that might be at the moment, are sufficient to rebut the presumption of law in favour of legitimacy. It is to be noted that although the wife wrote letters to the co-respondent's wife, letters bitter against the co-respondent and obviously intended to harm him with his wife, there is no reference in those letters, written in December, 1948, to the co-respondent being the father of A born in December, 1946. Although I am satisfied that the wife had been committing adultery with the co-respondent from about June, 1944, I have come to the conclusion that at the critical time when this child might have been conceived the husband was having sexual intercourse with his wife, and, although that sexual intercourse took place with rubber sheaths, I think the presumption of law must nevertheless prevail.

If I had to decide this issue merely on a balance of probability I would decide in the husband's favour, but the presumption of law—which means that he must satisfy me beyond all reasonable doubt—has not been displaced, and, therefore, I decide the issue in favour of the wife.

Solicitors: F. N. W. Lockyer (for the wife); Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co., agents for Wood, McLellan & Williams, Chatham (for the husband).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re HEILBRONNER (deceased). NATHAN AND ANOTHER v. KENNY AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), October 2, 1953.]

Will—Gift of “my bank deposit at M. bank”—Current account, but no deposit account at bank—Certificates of title to investments deposited at bank—Current account closed shortly before testator's death, as testator too ill to sign cheques—Balance of account transferred to relative to pay testator's expenses—Sum in hand at testator's death.

By a home-made will, dated Oct. 23, 1947, the testator, after appointing executors and directing the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, gave and bequeathed to A.K. “my bank deposit at the M. bank”. He then gave some pecuniary and specific legacies. At the date of the will he had over £1,700 standing to the credit of his current account at the M. bank, and both at the date of the will and at the date of his death the certificates of title to a number of investments in his name were deposited with the bank. He never had a deposit account at any bank. On Apr. 20, 1951, as he was very ill, he gave to N., his cousin and one of the executors named in the will, a cheque for £100, drawn on his current account, to pay his household accounts. On May 3, 1951, being too ill to go out or to sign cheques, the testator instructed the bank to pay to N. the balance of his current account, which amounted to £176 ls. 5d. On May 10, 1951, the testator died. At the date of his death N. held on his behalf the sum of £235 16s. 7d., i.e., the balance from the sums received on Apr. 20 and May 3, 1951.

HELD: (i) the words “my bank deposit at the M. bank” meant, not everything that the testator had deposited at that bank, but the money which he had there on current or deposit account, and, therefore, the gift to A.K. did not include the investments, the certificates of title to which were deposited with the bank.

(ii) the sum of £235 16s. 7d., which N. held as trustee at the date of the testator's death, was money drawn from the testator's current account at the bank for a temporary purpose, viz., the payment of the household expenses during the testator's illness, and, therefore, it should be deemed to have been on current account at the bank at the date of the death, and it passed under the bequest to A.K.

Rawlinson v. Rawlinson (1876) (3 Ch.D. 302), applied.

AS TO BEQUEST OF GIFT IN A PARTICULAR LOCALITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, p. 241, para. 294; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 675-677, Nos. 5157-5175.

A Case referred to:

(1) Rawlinson v. Rawlinson, (1876), 3 Ch.D. 302; 34 L.T. 848; 44 Digest 676, 5170.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether, on the true construction of the will of the testator, Alfred Salamon Heilbronner, a gift to Nurse Ada Kenny of "my bank deposit at the Midland Bank" comprised (a) certain investments to which the testator was entitled at his death and the certificates of title to which were deposited by him at the Gracechurch Street branch of the Midland Bank; (b) the sum of £235 16s. 7d. cash held at the death of the testator by the plaintiff, Lionel Nathan, on his behalf.

For some time before his death, which took place on May 10, 1951, the testator was very ill, and on Apr. 20, 1951, he gave to the plaintiff a cheque for £100, drawn on his current account, to pay his household expenses. On May 3, 1951, being too ill to go out or sign cheques, he instructed the bank to pay to the plaintiff the balance of his current account, which amounted to £176 1s. 5d. The sum of £235 16s. 7d. held by the plaintiff on the testator's behalf was the balance of the sums received by him on Apr. 20 and May 3, 1951. It was contended by the personal representative of Nurse Kenny (who died on Sept. 26, 1951) that the gift to her included the testator's investments and the sum held by Mr. Nathan as trustee.

Parbury for the plaintiffs, the executors.

N. S. S. Warren for the first defendant, the personal representative of Nurse Kenny.

A. P. McNabb for the second and third defendants, interested under an intestacy.

ROXBURGH, J.: The testator, who was of German birth but who acquired considerable facility in the English language, unfortunately considered himself able to make his own will. I am quite certain that nothing that I could decide would really accord with his intention, because it is my duty to give due weight to the meaning of the English language and the propositions of law which have been established in England, and, as regards the latter, I am sure that the testator was wholly ignorant. The will was made on Oct. 23, 1947, and the testator died on May 10, 1951. The will, so far as material, is as follows:

"I appoint my cousin Lionel Nathan . . . and Mr. George F. Patrick . . . to be my executors and direct that all my debts and funeral expenses shall be paid as soon as conveniently may be after my decease. I give and bequeath unto Nurse Ada Kenny in recognition for her sacrificing work and unselfish behaviour during my various illnesses my bank deposit at the Midland Bank. I further bequeath £50 each to both my executors as well as £50 to Mr. Jai Haas, my late ledger clerk of Embassy House, also £50 to the Misses Lottie and Susan Vogel and Mrs. Lottie Langley née Adelsberger of Lymington Road. I also bequeath to Nurse Kenny all my furniture and linen. The diamond bracelet and the two diamond rings (in my safe keeping) to be left to the owner Mrs. Helma Maria Salerno née Nenburger, at Venice. I wish that Nurse Kenny should hand over any small remembrance my relations should like to have in memory of me. My sealing ring and wedding ring to go to Nurse Kenny, the family memory ring to Helma Maria Salerno."

Nurse Ada Kenny died on Sept. 26, 1951, and the first defendant is her personal representative.

Counsel for the first defendant reminded me that the courts act on the presumption that, if a testator has attempted to make a will, he did not intend to die intestate in regard to the greater part of his estate, and I feel the great force of that contention. Moreover, there is, in my view, plain indication in this will of an intention to confer a pecuniary benefit on Ada Kenny, and I am certain that the testator did not intend her to have no money at all. But for this view, I might have felt it necessary to decide wholly against the first defendant. On the other hand, I have to face up to the meaning of English words, which, to my mind, are reasonably clear, and to the extraordinary consequences which would follow on the construction of the will if I accepted the major contention of counsel for the first defendant. I can well believe that what the testator intended to do was to give his property to Ada Kenny charged with the payment of his debts and funeral expenses and the legacies which he has bequeathed. But I can see no possible way in which I could so construe the will, and that is why I said at the outset that I do not feel that I can, consistently with legal principles, achieve what I suspect the testator intended.

Before discussing the meaning of the will, I must refer to some of the evidence. In an affidavit, sworn on Nov. 13, 1952, the plaintiff, Mr. Nathan, said:

"The testator had no deposit account at the Midland Bank either at the date of his said will or the date of his death and so far as can be ascertained never at any time had any deposit account at the Midland Bank or any other bank. He had a current account at the Midland Bank, 60, Gracechurch Street branch . . ."

but the whole of the balance standing to the credit of that account was drawn out shortly before his death "because he was unable to go out or to sign cheques." I stress the words "unable to sign cheques" because I am sure that, at the date when the testator authorised the bank to transfer any cash balance in hand to the account of Mr. Nathan, which was done to enable Mr. Nathan to pay housekeeping and similar expenses, he (the testator) was not in a state of health to consider how such an action would affect the testamentary dispositions which he had made in 1947. The result, therefore, was that at his death, strictly speaking, he had nothing on any account, whether current or deposit, at any bank, and, therefore, if I put a strict meaning on the language of the will, Ada Kenny would get no money at all.

In regard to the money transferred to him, Mr. Nathan said, in a further affidavit, sworn on Mar. 19, 1953:

"On May 3, 1951, there was standing to the credit of the testator's current account at the said branch of the Midland Bank the sum of £176 ls. 5d. On this date the balance of the said account was paid to me . . . The testator gave written instructions to the bank for this purpose . . . The testator had previously, namely on Apr. 20, 1951, given me a cheque for £100 drawn on his said account. These sums were paid to me by the testator in order that I could pay his household accounts for him. At the date of the death of the testator I held on his behalf the sum of £235 ls. 7d. . . . being the balance of the said sum of £100 after payment of accounts amounting to £40 4s. 10d. and the said sum of £176 ls. 5d."

In his affidavit of Nov. 13, 1952, Mr. Nathan said:

"At the date of his said will there were deposited at the Midland Bank, 60, Gracechurch Street branch, in the name of the testator the documents of title relating to the following investments: two hundred and fifty national savings certificates £1 issue, five hundred national savings certificates 7th issue, £1,500 three per cent. savings bonds 1960/70, £250 three per cent. savings bonds 1965/75. The documents of title relating to these investments remained so deposited at the date of his death, and in addition thereto there was also so deposited at such date the document of title relating to a further sum of £750 three per cent. savings bonds 1965/75 " which were purchased a few days after the date of the will. At the date of the will there was £1,734 1s. 5d. standing to the credit of the testator in his current account, though that sum was reduced a few days afterwards by £750, more or less, for the purchase of the £750 three per cent. savings bonds. But even after that transaction, as the current account then stood, there would have been £1,000 for Ada Kenny and there would have been plenty of assets, viz., the bonds and certificates, to discharge all the pecuniary legacies and all the debts and expenses. Therefore, it would not be unreasonable to hold that the disposition at that date in favour of Ada Kenny was intended to be, in effect, about £1,000. I stress that because I do not think I am going to put an unreasonable construction on the will.

Counsel for the first defendant, however, contended that the will gave everything to Ada Kenny. I must enter one caveat. In his affidavit, Mr. Nathan said that, in addition to the assets which I have mentioned, the testator had some furniture and jewellery, most of which is specifically bequeathed by the will. Mr. Nathan then said:

"In addition to the above assets it is possible that the testator had a sum of three thousand three hundred marks or thereabouts at Mainz in Germany. Inquiries are being made but so far they have been without result."

I cannot possibly act on that piece of evidence as proof that the testator had in 1947 a sum of three thousand three hundred marks or thereabouts. It is much too vague. Moreover, I do not know whether the marks referred to are Reichmarks or Deutschmarks. If they are Reichmarks they are practically valueless, and if they are Deutschmarks they would have a very considerable value. This point is, in my judgment, a very important feature in this case. But counsel for the executors told counsel for the first defendant at the Bar all that he knew about these marks, which was not very much, and counsel for the first defendant, probably very wisely in the circumstances, elected not to take the risk of incurring the costs of pursuing the question of the marks, although I offered him the opportunity, because I do think it is of importance. If I disregard the marks, then it is quite plain, if I accept the major contention of counsel for the first defendant, that there was nothing out of which to pay either the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, or the legacies. By the will the testator appointed executors and directed them to pay his debts and funeral expenses. I am quite certain that he meant the executors to pay the debts and funeral expenses and that he meant them to have funds out of which to pay them. Moreover, he bequeathed a number of pecuniary legacies, and I am quite certain that he intended the executors, and not Ada Kenny, to pay them. I am certain, therefore, that he must have contemplated that there would be assets out of which to pay them. Therefore, I do not approach this will with any conviction that the testator meant to give everything to Ada Kenny. It may well be that he did intend to give everything to her charged with these other outgoings, but I cannot possibly hold that he has, in fact, done so.

I do not find the words "my bank deposit at the Midland Bank" difficult to construe. I would stress that the phrase is not "my deposit at the Midland Bank", nor is it "my bank deposit". I think that that is important. "My bank deposit" might mean "my deposit at the Midland Bank", but "my bank deposit at the Midland Bank" cannot, in my judgment, mean merely all that is deposited at the Midland Bank. That would give no meaning whatever to the word "bank", which qualifies the word "deposit" and which cannot in this context be an indication of local situation. I wish to stress that. I might well have reached a different conclusion if the phrase had been "my deposit at the Midland Bank" or "my bank deposit". It is "my bank deposit at the Midland Bank", which is reasonably clear. It means the money deposited at the Midland Bank whether on current or deposit account. It is asked why, in that case, the testator did not say "current account". I do not know why he did not, but a possible explanation is that he thought he might have some money deposited at the bank at the date of his death and that he wished to include that as well as the current account.

In my judgment, it is going too far to say that "my bank deposit at the Midland Bank" has not got a reasonably clear meaning. It is true, in one sense, that no money is really deposited at a bank because the relation between the banker and customer is that of debtor and creditor. The actual money which is deposited is, of course, free for the bank to spend as it thinks fit. But that is a legal notion. It is common to speak of "deposit account" and "current account", but there is no difference between a deposit account and a current account except that, in one case, interest is usually paid and, in the other case, it is usually not paid, though that is not invariable. In the case of a deposit account notice is required, though it is very often waived, and in the case of a current account it is never required. Those are differences in the terms of the loan and nothing else. The relationship between the banker and the customer is that of debtor and creditor. Therefore, there is no great art in the words "deposit account", and, in my judgment, when a man says "my bank deposit" at a particular bank, primarily he means "the money which I have on current or deposit account". I can only repeat that, if the words had been different, I might have reached a different conclusion. It seems to me that I must hold that these words mean the money which is at the Midland Bank on deposit or current account.

If I were to adhere strictly to that conclusion, Ada Kenny's estate would get nothing. There is, however, a line of cases which establishes that, where there is a bequest of, e.g., furniture in a house and the furniture is removed to a warehouse, or some other place, for a purely temporary purpose, the bequest operates on the furniture in its temporary habitation: see Rawlinson v. Rawlinson (1), and THEOBALD ON WILLS, 10th ed., p. 128. Whether this doctrine has ever been applied to a subject-matter such as that in the present case, I do not know, and I do not very much care, because I am quite willing to be the first person to apply it, feeling as strongly as I do that the testator intended to give Ada Kenny some money. There is no doubt that this money, both the £100 which was drawn in favour of Mr. Nathan on Apr. 20, 1951, and the balance of £176 which was drawn on May 3, 1951, on authority, was drawn for a temporary purpose, namely, so that Mr. Nathan should pay household expenses when the testator was too ill to go out or sign cheques. It was, of course, hoped that he would get better, or, at any rate, get sufficiently well to re-arrange his affairs and, perhaps, make a new will, but, unfortunately, that opportunity never occurred. I think that I can, by analogy, apply the doctrine which I have mentioned, so that the sum of £235 16s. 7d., though actually in the hands of Mr. Nathan as trustee at the date of the death of the testator, must be deemed to have been on current account at the bank and, therefore, to pass under the bequest to Ada Kenny. This will not achieve, I am sure, the intention of the testator in full, but it is the best thing that I can do for Ada Kenny on the language which he has used and by which I am bound. The result will be that there will be residue which will be available for the funeral and testamentary expenses and payment of the legacies, and any balance will go to the persons entitled, under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 46 (1), on an intestacy.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Gasquet, Metcalfe & Walton (for the plaintiffs and the third defendant); Charles Russell & Co. (for the first defendant); Hunters (for the second defendant). [Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WHITE v. JOHN WARRICK & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Morris, L.J.J.), June 23, 24, 1953.]

Negligence—Exclusion of liability—Primary object of clause in agreement to relieve defendant from liability for breach of contract—Hire of tricycle—Exclusion of liability for personal injuries to riders—Owners' liability for negligence.

A A contract of hire of a carrier tricycle provided that: "Nothing in this agreement shall render the owners liable for any personal injuries to the riders of the machine hired." The machine was defective and the hirer was thrown off and was injured.

HELD: the clause in the contract relieved the owners of the carrier tricycle only from liability under the contract, but not from liability in tort, and they would be liable for negligence if it were established.

B Dicta of LORD MACMILLAN in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson ([1932] A.C. 609) and of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd. ([1945] 1 All E.R. 245), applied.

Hall v. Brooklands Auto-Racing Club ([1933] 1 K.B. 205), distinguished.

C AS TO CONDITIONS LIMITING LIABILITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, p. 670, para. 952; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 3, pp. 73-75, Nos. 134-144.

Cases referred to:

- (1) M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562; 101 L.J.P.C. 119; 147 L.T. 281; Digest Supp.
- D (2) Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield & Lincolnshire Ry. Co., [1895] 1 Q.B. 134; 64 L.J.Q.B. 6; 71 L.T. 596; 59 J.P. 100; 42 Digest 970, 21.
- (3) Kelly v. Metropolitan Ry. Co., [1895] 1 Q.B. 944; 64 L.J.Q.B. 568; 72 L.T. 551; 59 J.P. 437; 42 Digest 970, 22.
- (4) Olley v. Marlborough Court, Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 127; [1949] 1 K.B. 532; [1949] L.J.R. 360; 2nd Digest Supp.
- E (5) Rutter v. Palmer, [1922] 2 K.B. 87; 91 L.J.K.B. 657; 127 L.T. 419; Digest Supp.
- (6) Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 244; [1945] K.B. 189; 114 L.J.K.B. 196; 172 L.T. 153; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Hyman v. Nye, (1881), 6 Q.B.D. 685; 44 L.T. 919; 45 J.P. 554; 3 Digest 87, 211.
- F (8) Elder, Dempster & Co. v. Paterson, Zochonis & Co., Griffiths Lewis Steam Navigation Co. v. Paterson, Zochonis & Co., [1924] A.C. 522; 93 L.J.K.B. 625; 131 L.T. 449; 41 Digest 478, 3118.
- (9) Smith v. River Douglas Catchment Board, [1949] 2 All E.R. 179; 113 J.P. 388; sub nom. Smith & Snipes Hall Farm, Ltd. v. River Douglas Catchment Board, [1949] 2 K.B. 500; 2nd Digest Supp.
- G (10) Hall v. Brooklands Auto-Racing Club, [1933] 1 K.B. 205; 101 L.J.K.B. 679; 147 L.T. 404; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PARKER, J., dated Jan. 26, 1953, dismissing an action for damages for breach of a contract of hire and for negligence on the ground that liability was excluded under a clause in the contract.

H Donald Macintyre for the plaintiff (the hirer).

E. B. Gibbens for the defendants (the owners).

SINGLETON, L.J.: The plaintiff, a newsagent and tobacconist carrying on business at Canonbury, entered into an arrangement with the defendants that they should supply him with a tradesman's tricycle, a tricycle with a large carrier in front, for use in the delivery of newspapers. The arrangement was embraced in a written contract dated Apr. 13, 1948. The contract was on a printed form used by the defendants, on which their name appears in print, and the agreement is stated to be made between them (described as the owners) and the plaintiff, who is described as the hirer. By cl. 1:

"The owners agree to let, and the hirer agrees to hire, Carrier Cycles Nos. 13409 for the term of three years from the date hereof (and thereafter from year to year) at the weekly rent of 5s. each payable quarterly in advance at the owners' above address, the first payment being due on delivery of the machines."

By cl. 2:

"In consideration of such sum the owners agree to maintain the machines in working order and condition (punctures excepted) and to supply spare carriers as soon as possible when the hirer's machines are being repaired without any charge beyond the agreed amount as above . . ."

The owners also agree to supply lamps and accessories and the like, and to repair damage in certain cases.

On that the owners supplied a machine which was used by the plaintiff for a considerable period, and which, so far as we know, was kept in order until towards the end of May, 1950, when the machine, which was in the plaintiff's possession under the contract, was in need of repair, and the owners were so informed. On Saturday, June 3, a representative of the owners went to the plaintiff's shop and left a spare tricycle instead of that which was out of order, which he took away. In so doing, the owners were purporting to perform their obligation under cl. 2 of the contract. The plaintiff did not examine the tricycle, but very soon mounted it to go about his work. When he had gone about a quarter of a mile the saddle went forward in such a manner that he was thrown off the tricycle on to the ground, and was injured. He said he got up and pushed the tricycle back to his shop, the saddle then sloping down on to the cross-bar, and when he examined the tricycle he found that the saddle was loose. He was not thought at first to be badly hurt, but unfortunately he had suffered an injury to his knee. He was in hospital some considerable time suffering from synovitis. PARKER, J., who heard the plaintiff's claim, said that, if he had found the plaintiff entitled to damages, he would have awarded £505. That was a provisional assessment and no more.

The evidence given by the plaintiff and by his wife, and by a young man named Anthony employed by the plaintiff, seemed to show that the tricycle was out of order in that some nuts under the seat were rusty and could not be moved. Anthony, the chief witness, whose evidence impressed the judge on that point, was not employed by the plaintiff at the time of the trial, but was engaged on delivering newspapers and the like for the plaintiff in June, 1950. He told the judge that, after hearing of the accident, he saw the tricycle, and the saddle had been tilted back. He said that on several occasions thereafter he used the tricycle, and the saddle used to slip backwards and cause him to lose control. He tried to tighten the nut, but it was too rusty to move. There was other evidence on that on both sides.

The plaintiff set up two causes of action against the owners. The first was that the owners were responsible to him in damages for breach of warranty. It was said that they were under a duty under the contract to supply a tricycle which was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was required, that they did not do so, and that the plaintiff was entitled to damages. The alternative claim in para. 6 of the statement of claim reads:

"The said accident was due to the negligence and/or breach of contract of the [owners] their servants or agents whereby the plaintiff has sustained personal injury and suffered damage. Particulars of negligence and/or breach of contract. The [owners] their servants or agents failed to take any or any proper care to ensure that the said spare carrier tricycle was in proper working condition or in a proper state of repair or equipped or prepared for use by the plaintiff and handed over the same and permitted the plaintiff to mount and ride such spare tricycle without warning when they knew or ought to have known that by reason of its defective condition as aforesaid the saddle thereof was not properly fastened and was dangerous whereby an accident and injury such as occurred was to be apprehended."

- A The second claim of the plaintiff thus was: You, the persons from whom I had this tricycle, owed a duty to take reasonable care, i.e., to take that care which a reasonably careful tricycle owner would take on the hiring to another of a tricycle for his use, and you failed in that duty. If you had examined the tricycle, you would have found that the nuts were rusty and that the saddle was loose.
- B I used the tricycle in the way in which it was intended that I should use it, and I sustained an accident because you had not fulfilled your duty. You had not taken reasonable care, you were negligent, and I am entitled to damages.

In reply to both those claims the owners denied negligence and breach of duty and breach of contract. They added a plea in para. 4 of the defence:

- C "By cl. 11 of the written agreement between the parties the [owners] are not liable for any personal injuries to the plaintiff when riding a machine provided for him."

Clause 11 of the agreement is:

- D "Nothing in this agreement shall render the owners liable for any personal injuries to the riders of the machines hired nor for any third-party claims, nor loss of any goods, belonging to the hirer, in the machines."

It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiff that that clause would prevent the plaintiff from succeeding on a claim based on breach of contract, but his submission is that, in the circumstances proved, there was negligence on the part of the defendants, and that that clause is no bar to an action for damages

E for negligence.

- PARKER, J., gave judgment for the owners and against that judgment the plaintiff appeals. PARKER, J., appears to have accepted the evidence of the plaintiff as to the condition of the tricycle in preference to the evidence given on behalf of the owners, but he did not say in so many words that he found there was negligence on the part of the owners or of their servants. [HIS LORDSHIP
- F referred to a contention of the plaintiff that the contract applied only to the hired machine and not to a spare machine provided to replace it, held on construction of the contract that the exception clause applied to the spare machine, and continued:] The plaintiff submitted that, though cl. 11 relieves the owners in respect of a claim for breach of contract arising from the agreement, it does not absolve them if there is a cause of action established on the ground of
- G negligence. Counsel for the owners submits that, if there was negligence, it was negligence in connection with the performance of the contract, that the machine which was supplied was supplied in performance of the obligation arising under the contract, and that that which was done was under the agreement. He contended that the cause of action, if there was one, arose out of the agreement, and that, whether there was negligence or not, cl. 11 prevents
- H the plaintiff from succeeding in an action of this nature.

That gives rise to a question of some nicety. I am inclined to think for this purpose most help is given by reference to the speech of LORD MACMILLAN in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (1) ([1932] A.C. 609):

"On the one hand, there is the well established principle that no one other than a party to a contract can complain of a breach of that contract. On the other hand, there is the equally well established doctrine that negligence apart from contract gives a right of action to the party injured by that negligence—and here I use the term negligence, of course, in its technical legal sense, implying a duty owed and neglected. The fact that there is a contractual relationship between the parties which may give rise to an action for breach of contract, does not exclude the co-existence of a right of action founded on negligence as between the same parties, independently of the contract, though arising out of the relationship in fact brought about by the contract. Of this the best illustration is the right of the injured railway passenger to sue the railway company either for breach of the contract of safe carriage or for negligence in carrying him. And there is no reason why the same set of facts should not give one person a right of action in contract and another person a right of action in tort. I may be permitted to adopt as my own the language of a very distinguished English writer on this subject. 'It appears', says SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, LAW OF TORTS, 13th ed., p. 570, 'that there has been (though perhaps there is no longer) a certain tendency to hold that facts which constitute a contract cannot have any other legal effect'."

It is clear from those words of LORD MACMILLAN that an action for damages for breach of contract and an action for a tort may arise from the same set of facts. It is said that that position arises in this case, and that, though an action for damages for breach of contract may be said to be barred by cl. 11 of the contract, it cannot be said that the words of that clause shut out the hirer from what he would normally have, an action for damages for the tort of negligence.

In Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield & Lincolnshire Ry. Co. (2), A. L. SMITH, L.J., said ([1895] 1 Q.B. 140):

"It is clear that a person lawfully upon railway premises may maintain an action against a railway company for injuries sustained whilst there by reason of the active negligence of the company's servants, whether he has a contract with the company or not."

We were also referred to Kelly v. Metropolitan Ry. Co. (3) and Olley v. Marlborough Court, Ltd. (4). In the latter case ([1949] 1 All E.R. 132) there is a reference in the judgment which I delivered to words of SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1922] 2 K.B. 92) in Rutter v. Palmer (5):

"'First the defendant is not exempted from liability for the negligence of his servants unless adequate words are used . . .'"

DENNING, L.J., said (ibid., 134):

"In cases where the establishment is clearly a common inn or, indeed, where it is uncertain whether it is a common inn or a private hotel, I am of opinion that a notice in these terms would not exempt the defendants from liability for negligence but only from any liability as insurers."

In Olley's case (4) the words of the notice were:

"The proprietors will not hold themselves responsible for articles lost or stolen unless handed to the manageress for safe custody. Valuables should be deposited for safe custody in a sealed package and a receipt obtained."

Counsel for the plaintiff referred the court to Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd. (6), and, in particular, to the words of LORD GREENE, M.R., summarising the effect of the authorities in this way ([1945] 1 All E.R. 245):

"The effect of those authorities can I think be stated as follows: where the head of damage in respect of which limitation of liability is sought to be imposed by such a clause is one which rests on negligence and nothing else, the clause must be construed as extending to that head of damage, because if it were not so construed it would lack subject-matter. Where, on the other hand, the head of damage may be based on some ground other than that of negligence, the general principle is that the clause must be confined to loss occurring through that other cause to the exclusion of loss arising through negligence."

A In the circumstances of the present case the primary object of the clause, one would think, is to relieve the owners from liability for breach of contract or for breach of warranty. Unless, then, there be clear words which would also exempt from liability for negligence, the clause ought not to be construed as giving absolution to the owners if negligence is proved against them. The result is that cl. 11 ought not, I think, to be read as absolving the owners from liability for negligence if it is proved that the injury which the plaintiff sustained was due to lack of that care which one in the owners' position ought to take when supplying a tricycle for the use of a hirer. If that is proved, then the owners do not escape liability by reason of cl. 11.

B The difficulty in this case arises from the fact that there is no finding on negligence. It may well be said that the learned judge, in accepting the plaintiff's evidence in preference to that of the owners, was inclined to the view that there was negligence on the part of the owners, but he did not so say. He placed an interpretation on cl. 11 which would cover negligence on the part of the owners. He assumed that it would. In those circumstances, we are not in a position to deal with this case finally, and it appears to be necessary that there should be a new trial on the subject of negligence, with the expression of opinion of this court that, if negligence is proved against the owners, they do not escape liability by reason of the terms of cl. 11. In that sense, I think this appeal ought to be allowed, and there ought to be a direction for a new trial between the parties.

D DENNING, L.J.: In this case the owners supplied a tricycle on hire to the plaintiff, who was a newsvendor, intending that he and his servants should ride it. The tricycle was defective, and, in consequence of the defect, the plaintiff was thrown off and injured. He now claims damages for breach of contract or negligence. The owners claim to be protected by the printed clause which my Lord has read. In this type of case, two principles are well settled. The first is that, if a person desires to exempt himself from a liability which the common law imposes on him, he can only do so by a contract freely and deliberately entered into by the injured party in words that are clear beyond the possibility of misunderstanding. The second is that, if there are two possible heads of liability on the defendant, one for negligence, and the other a strict liability, an exemption clause will be construed, so far as possible, as exempting the defendant only from his strict liability and not as relieving him from his liability for negligence.

E In the present case, there are two possible heads of liability on the owners, one for negligence, the other for breach of contract. The liability for breach of contract is more strict than the liability for negligence. The owners may be liable in contract for supplying a defective machine, even though they were not negligent: see Hyman v. Nye (7). In these circumstances, the exemption clause must, I think, be construed as exempting the owners only from their liability in contract, and not from their liability for negligence. Counsel for the owners admitted that, if the negligence was a completely independent tort, the exemption clause would not avail, but he said that the negligence here H alleged was a breach of contract, not an independent tort. The facts which give rise to the tort are, he said, the same as those which give rise to the breach of contract, and the plaintiff should not be allowed to recover merely by framing his action in tort instead of contract. That was the view which appealed to PARKER, J., but I cannot agree with it.

In my opinion, the claim for negligence in this case is founded in tort and not on contract. That can be seen by considering what would be the position if, instead of the plaintiff himself, it was his servant who had been riding the tricycle and had been injured. If the servant could show that the owners had negligently sent out a defective machine for immediate use, he would have had a cause of action in negligence on the principle stated in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (1), and, as against the servant, the exemption clause would be no defence. That shows that the owners owed a duty of care to the servant. A fortiori they owed a like duty to the hirer himself. In either case, a breach of that duty is a tort which can be established without relying on any contract at all. It is true that the hirer could also rely on a contract, if he had wished, but he is not bound to do so, and if he can avoid the exemption clause by framing his claim in tort he is, in my judgment, entitled to do so.

Counsel for the owners relied on a passage in the speech of VISCOUNT FINLAY in Elder, Dempster & Co. v. Paterson, Zochonis & Co. (8). In that case, a clause in a bill of lading exempted the charterers and the owners from liability for bad stowage, and the question was whether the owners (who were not parties to the contract) could take advantage of the exemption. It was held that they could. The decision, as I read it, was that, when a party to a contract has deliberately in plain words agreed to exempt a third party from liability for negligence, intending that the third party should have the benefit of the exemption, he cannot go back on his plighted word and disregard the exemption. It is one of the cases where a third party can take advantage of a contract made for his benefit, of which I gave some illustrations in Smith v. River Douglas Catchment Board (9) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 188). It has, however, no application to this case.

Counsel for the owners also relied on the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Hall v. Brooklands Auto-Racing Club (10), when he said ([1933] 1 K.B. 213):

" . . . where the defendant has protection under a contract, it is not permissible to disregard the contract and allege a wider liability in tort."

This passage only refers to cases where there is a contract by the plaintiff which plainly gives an exemption to the defendant from liability for the tort. For instance, if a transport company expressly stipulates with the plaintiff for exemption from liability for damage, howsoever caused, the plaintiff cannot overcome that exemption by suing in negligence instead of contract. But the contract in such a case must be by and with the plaintiff. In a case such as M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (1), a manufacturer cannot exempt himself from liability to the consumer simply by putting an exemption clause in his contract with the wholesaler, even though the clause is brought to the consumer's notice and says that the consumer is to have no claim for negligence. It is not a clause for the benefit of a third party, but to his prejudice and is not binding on him.

Neither of those cases affect the present case, which turns on the construction of the exemption clause. In my judgment, it exempts the owners from liability in contract, but not from liability in tort. If the plaintiff can make out his cause of action in negligence, he is, in my opinion, entitled to do so, although the same facts also give a cause of action in contract from which the owners are exempt. I agree, therefore, with my Lord that this appeal should be allowed, but, as there is no definite finding of negligence or no negligence, and we have no transcript of the evidence with which to decide it ourselves, there must be a new trial to decide that point.

MORRIS, L.J.: The determination of the matters raised in this appeal depends on construing cl. 11 of the agreement. [HIS LORDSHIP held that "machines hired" in cl. 11 of the contract applied to spare machines provided during the repair of the originally hired machine and continued:] The far more difficult part of the case concerns the interpretation of cl. 11, so as to decide whether it does, or does not, provide an exemption from liability in all circumstances. During the argument I entertained some doubt in regard to this matter, but on consideration I have reached the clear conclusion that cl. 11 does not provide an exemption if negligence is alleged and proved, and I am in agreement with the judgments which my Lords have delivered.

A Although the wording of this clause differs from the wording of other clauses, and, perhaps, by its special language raises certain difficulties, there is no doubt in regard to the general approach in a case of this kind. That approach was clearly laid down by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Rutter v. Palmer (5), when he set out three considerations ([1922] 2 K.B. 92):

B "In construing an exemption clause certain general rules may be applied: First the defendant is not exempted from liability for the negligence of his servants unless adequate words are used; secondly, the liability of the defendant apart from the exempting words must be ascertained; then the particular clause in question must be considered; and if the only liability of the party pleading the exemption is a liability for negligence, the clause will more readily operate to exempt him."

C To the same effect were the words of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd. (6), in the passage quoted by SINGLETON, L.J. ([1945] 1 All E.R. 245).

D Applying those principles to the words in cl. 11, it seems to me that counsel for the plaintiff is right when he says that the words in the clause may refer to matters other than matters based on an allegation of negligence. The opening words of cl. 2 are as follows:

E "In consideration of such sum the owners agree to maintain the machines in working order and condition."

Clause 11 as an exempting clause might operate on such a provision as those opening words of cl. 2, and, doubtless, other provisions also. The clause can apply to some injury occurring without negligence. Applying the principles of construction laid down by SCRUTTON, L.J., and by LORD GREENE, M.R., I have reached the conclusion that cl. 11 is not clear so as to exempt from liability if negligence is proved. I, therefore, concur in the course which has been proposed for the reasons which my Lords have given.

Appeal allowed. New trial on issue of negligence.

Solicitors: A. H. Silvertown & Co., agents for Arnold K. Maplesden (for the hirer); Doyle, Devonshire & Co., agents for Dennis Berry & Co., Reading (for the owners).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

D'ANDREA v. WOODS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.), October 9, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Receiving stolen property—"Property"—Money known by receiver to be proceeds of theft and conversion—Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 46 (1).

By s. 46 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916: "The expression 'property' . . . includes not only such property as has been originally in the possession or under the control of any person, but also any property into or for which the same has been converted or exchanged, and anything acquired by such conversion or exchange, whether immediately or otherwise."

A number of savings stamps were stolen and converted for their cash value. Some of the Bank of England notes received for them were handed to the appellant who knew that the money was part of the proceeds of the theft and conversion of the stamps.

HELD: the money received by the appellant fell within the definition of property into which other property has been converted or for which it has been exchanged in s. 46 (1), and the appellant was rightly convicted of receiving the money, contrary to the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 33 (1).

FOR THE LARCENY ACT, 1916, s. 46 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 5, p. 1041.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at North London on Apr. 4 and May 4 and 27, 1953, the respondent, Leonard Woods, a detective inspector, preferred an information against the appellant, Dominic D'Andrea, charging that, on Mar. 19, 1953, he received £4 10s., moneys of one Sheila Cox, knowing the same to be stolen, contrary to s. 33 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916. It was proved or admitted that in March, 1953, three girls, Jeanne Boorer, Doreen Stone and Sheila Cox, lived in a hostel at 15, Highbury New Park, London, N.5. Between Mar. 18 and 19, 1953, Jeanne Boorer and Doreen Stone together stole a quantity of savings stamps to the value of £17 5s. belonging to Sheila Cox at the hostel. Jeanne Boorer converted the stamps for their full cash value and gave half the proceeds to Doreen Stone. On Mar. 19, 1953, Jeanne Boorer handed the appellant four £1 Bank of England notes and one 10s. Bank of England note, being part of the proceeds of the conversion of the stolen stamps, and at the same time told him how she had obtained the money. At the time, therefore, he received the £4 10s. from Jeanne Boorer, the appellant knew they were the part proceeds of the conversion of the stolen savings stamps, and on Mar. 20, 1953, when the respondent found him in possession of the £4 10s., he admitted he knew how the notes had been obtained.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, as the Bank of England notes were only the proceeds of stolen property and not themselves stolen, the charge of receiving could not be sustained since they could not be identified with the stolen property. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the word "property" in s. 33 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916, included any property into, or for which, the same had been converted or exchanged, by virtue of s. 46 (1) of the Act.

The magistrate convicted the appellant who appealed.

C. L. Collymore for the appellant.

Paul Wrightson for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by one of the metropolitan stipendiary magistrates, before whom the appellant was convicted of the offence of "receiving the sum of £4 10s., moneys of Miss Sheila Cox, knowing the same to have been stolen, contrary to s. 33 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916". [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] What were stolen were stamps, and they were the property of Miss Cox. Those stamps were converted into money, and under s. 46 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916, it is provided:

A “The expression ‘property’ includes any description of real and personal property . . . and also includes not only such property as has been originally in the possession or under the control of any person, but also any property into or for which the same has been converted or exchanged, and anything acquired by such conversion or exchange, whether immediately or otherwise.”

Obviously the Act was contemplating the theft of property which was then changed into some other property or into money, and that money being used to buy something else, because s. 46 (1) says:

B “. . . not only such property as has been originally in the possession or under the control of any person, but also any property into or for which the same has been converted or exchanged, and anything acquired by such conversion or exchange, whether immediately or otherwise.”

C It is quite sufficient to say here, without going further, that this £4 10s. falls exactly into the definition of property converted or exchanged. Therefore, as the appellant knew that these notes had been acquired by theft, he was properly convicted and this appeal fails and is dismissed.

SELLERS, J.: I agree.

HAVERS, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

D Solicitors: A. P. B. Gould (for the appellant); Solicitor, Metropolitan Police (for the respondent).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

KING v. KING.

E [COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Morris, L.JJ.), July 30, October 12, 1953.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Application to High Court—Decree of judicial separation already obtained by the wife—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 23 (1).

F The power of the court to make an order for maintenance against a husband under s. 23 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, “if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation”, applies whenever jurisdiction is conferred by domicile or residence, “jurisdiction” having this special connotation in relation to suits for judicial separation in the Divorce Court. A wife who has already obtained a decree of judicial separation, and could not on that account obtain another, is not debarred, therefore, from applying for an order for maintenance under the section.

G Decision of DAVIES, J. (ante, p. 595), affirmed.

H FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 23 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 410.

Cases referred to:

(1) Woodward v. Woodward, [1952] 2 All E.R. 226; [1952] P. 299; 3rd Digest Supp.

(2) Cooper v. Cooper, [1952] 2 All E.R. 857; [1953] P. 26; 116 J.P. 593; 3rd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the husband against an order of DAVIES, J., dated July 6, 1953, and reported ante, p. 595, on a summons by the wife for a maintenance order under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1). DAVIES, J., held that the wife was entitled to apply for an order for maintenance against her husband under the Act of 1950, notwithstanding that the court could make such an order only if it had jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for judicial separation and that the wife had already obtained a decree of judicial separation against her husband and so could not be granted a further such decree.

Colin Duncan for the husband.

Fairweather for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 12. SINGLETON, L.J.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J., read the following judgment. On Jan. 28, 1953, the wife obtained a decree of judicial separation. On May 7, 1953, she took out a summons against her husband in the High Court under s. 23 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. In this summons she alleged that he had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her, and she asked for an order on him to make periodical payments for her maintenance, and for an order to secure such payments. The question is whether a wife who has obtained a decree of judicial separation can avail herself of s. 23 (1). The husband contends that she has no right to apply under s. 23 (1), and that her only right is to apply for alimony under s. 20 (2) of the Act. This would look at first sight to be a somewhat barren dispute. It would not seem to matter under which section she applies, so long as an order is made for payments to her. But the difference is this. Under s. 23 the court can order the husband to secure the payments by a deed of covenant, depositing some of his property as security and covering her, not only during their joint lives, but also during widowhood, whereas under s. 20 (2) the court has no power to order any such security to be provided for her.

The origin of s. 23 (1) is well known. Before 1949 the only way in which a wife (who did not seek a divorce or separation) could get maintenance from her husband in the High Court was to bring a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. If he disobeyed the order, the court would order him to make periodical payments for her support. This procedure was expensive and cumbersome, and, moreover, the wife had to assert on oath that she wanted her husband back, which was often the last thing she wanted. There was, however, a remedy to be had from the magistrates. Ever since 1895 a wife has been able to apply to the magistrates for maintenance, but this was only suited to people of small means because the magistrates could award her at most £2 a week. In 1949, therefore, a new procedure was introduced, whereby a wife could apply direct to the High Court for maintenance instead of having to bring a suit for restitution. This procedure was originally enacted in 1949 by s. 5 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, which has now been replaced by s. 23 of the Act of 1950.

In introducing this new procedure, the legislature put the wife into as good a position as if she had brought a restitution suit. The High Court was given jurisdiction, not only to order periodical payments, but also to order the husband to give security for them. It must be remembered that, before 1884, the court had no power in a restitution suit to order a husband to make payments or to give security. It had power to commit him to prison if he did not obey the decree, but that was all. In 1884, however, the power to commit to prison was taken away, and instead of it the court was given jurisdiction to order the husband to make periodical payments and also to give security. In 1949 this jurisdiction was extended to the new maintenance suit.

Alongside all these developments, however, there has always been available to a wife, who did not want a divorce, the procedure for judicial separation.

If she could prove one of the recognised grounds, such as cruelty or adultery, she could obtain a decree of judicial separation, and thereupon the court could order the husband to pay her permanent alimony, but it could not order him to give security for the payments. This has been the law from 1857 onwards, and it finds its place now in s. 20 (2) of the Act of 1950.

A The question in this case is: What is the position of a wife who has obtained a decree of judicial separation and seeks payments for her support? Is she confined to the old procedure set forth in s. 20 (2), or can she apply under the new procedure laid down in s. 23? On this question, the critical words are those in s. 23 (1), which says that the powers under that section are only available to the court on this one condition:

B “ . . . if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation . . . ”

C At first sight it would appear from these words that s. 23 (1) is dealing with cases where the wife has not proceeded for judicial separation, but could have done so had she wished. I must say that I think the words are most unhappily chosen. Take a case where a wife is deserted by her husband and left penniless. She cannot bring proceedings for divorce or judicial separation until the desertion has lasted for three years. The court has in one sense no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by her for judicial separation until three years have elapsed. But surely she is entitled meanwhile to bring proceedings for maintenance under s. 23 (1). If she could not do so, one of the main objects of the legislature would be defeated.

D This leads me to the conclusion that the word “ jurisdiction ” in s. 23 (1) is not used in its ordinary sense. It is used in a special sense peculiar to the Divorce Court. The practitioners in that court use the word “ jurisdiction ” to denote the personal qualifications of domicile or residence which are required of the parties before the court will adjudicate between them. Thus, it is said that, in suits for divorce, jurisdiction depends on domicile. In suits for judicial separation, it depends on domicile or on residence. In restitution suits, it depends on domicile or residence or the matrimonial home. In nullity suits, it is not easy to say on what it does depend. When this terminology is borne in mind, it becomes fairly plain what was the object of the legislature in inserting this condition in s. 23 (1). It was introducing into the Divorce Court a suit, of a kind unknown before, in the shape of a maintenance suit, and it was felt desirable to specify the qualifications of domicile or residence which should be fulfilled to enable the court to entertain the suit. Out of the mixed bag available, the new maintenance suit was put on the same basis as a suit for judicial separation.

F In these circumstances I feel that we ought to give the word “ jurisdiction ” in s. 23 (1) the special connotation of the Divorce Court. The condition “ if it would have jurisdiction ”, etc., only means that the parties must have such qualification of domicile or residence as would enable the court to entertain a suit by the wife for judicial separation. It has nothing to do with the validity or merits of a claim for judicial separation. The liability of the husband does not depend on desertion or cruelty or adultery (as it would in a suit for judicial separation), but simply on his wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife. WILLMER, J., has so held in Woodward v. Woodward (1), and I find myself in entire agreement with him.

H Applying this test, it is clear that the parties in this case have all the personal qualifications necessary to enable the court to consider a claim for judicial separation. They are both domiciled in this country and also resident here. That is sufficient to satisfy the condition in s. 23 (1). It is true that, if a claim for judicial separation were made, it would be bound to fail, because the wife has already obtained a decree for judicial separation and the court would not permit a second decree for the same cause, there being no change of circumstances since the first decree. But that does not defeat the claim under s. 23 (1), because the test is not whether the court would grant a decree for judicial separation, but whether the parties have the requisite domiciliary or residential qualifications, which they clearly have.

Once this point is decided in favour of the wife, there seems no reason why she should not have the right to proceed under s. 20 (2) or s. 23 (1) at her choice. If there are advantages under s. 23 (1) which are not available under s. 20 (2), she is entitled to seek them. LORD MERRIMAN, P., has so said in Cooper v. Cooper (2), and I think we should follow his guidance on it. I find myself in agreement with DAVIES, J., and I would dismiss this appeal. A

MORRIS, L.J.: I have had the opportunity of considering the judgment which has just been delivered, and I am in agreement with it.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree that the appeal should be dismissed. The wording of s. 23 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, gives rise to some difficulty, but after full consideration I feel that the judgment of DAVIES, J., is right. It is in accordance with common sense and with justice. B

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Bird & Bird (for the husband); Scadding & Bodkin (for the wife).

[Reported by F. A. AMES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.] C

Re NORTH DEVON AND WEST SOMERSET RELIEF FUND TRUSTS. HYLTON (BARON) AND ANOTHER v. WRIGHT AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), June 11, 1953.]

Charity—Benefit to community—Public and charitable purpose—Appeal for contributions for relief of flood victims in certain area—Application of surplus assets—General charitable intention—Cy-près doctrine. D

On Aug. 15, 1952, as the result of torrential rain, floods were caused over a wide area in north Devon and west Somerset. On Aug. 18, 1952, an appeal relating to the damage caused was issued in these terms: "We invite not only the people of the west country, but everyone who has known and loved Lynmouth and the quiet villages of north Devon and west Somerset, which have suffered so grievously in this disaster, to contribute to a fund for the relief of all who have suffered . . . But those who have suffered are not only the local people. Many holiday-makers . . . have suffered grievously. These need help every bit as much as our own people, and for that reason we do ask the whole country to support this fund . . ." The response was very great and it was contemplated that there would be a large surplus after providing for all requirements. The questions arose whether the trusts of the fund were charitable and whether the surplus should be applied cy-près or be repayable to the donors to the fund in proportion to their donations. E

HELD: (i) on the wording of the appeal taken as a whole, there was an intention to apply the money subscribed to relieve hardship and suffering experienced both by "the local people" and others who were within the affected area, and that purpose was both public and charitable. F

(ii) the true inference from the nature of the appeal was that subscribers intended to part with their contributions out and out, and, notwithstanding that the primary object was to alleviate distress caused directly by the floods to the people of the relevant district, the intention of the donors must be taken to be generally charitable, and surplus funds must be applied cy-près. G

Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund ([1921] 1 Ch. 655), applied. H

AS TO APPLICATION OF SURPLUS FUNDS CY-PRÈS, see HALSBURY, Simonds Edn., Vol. 4, pp. 323, 324, paras. 661, 662; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 8, p. 349, Nos. 1436-1444.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1947] 1 All E.R. 513; [1947] A.C. 447; [1948] L.J.R. 644; 176 L.T. 462; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Re Foveaux, [1895] 2 Ch. 501; 64 L.J.Ch. 856; 73 L.T. 202; 8 Digest 259, 206.
- (3) Re Hobourn Aero Components, Ltd.'s Air Raid Distress Fund, [1946] 1 All E.R. 501; [1946] Ch. 194; 115 L.J.Ch. 158; 174 L.T. 428; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Re Wilson, [1913] 1 Ch. 314; 82 L.J.Ch. 161; 108 L.T. 321; 8 Digest 313, 948.
- (5) Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund, [1921] 1 Ch. 655; 90 L.J.Ch. 276; 124 L.T. 787; 8 Digest 349, 1444.

A

B

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (i) whether the trusts affecting the North Devon and West Somerset Relief Fund arising under an appeal dated Aug. 18, 1952, issued by the lords lieutenant of the counties of Devon and Somerset were valid and charitable trusts; and (ii) whether any surplus of the fund beyond what was required for the purposes of the trusts was (a) applicable cy-près for some other charitable purpose or (b) was repayable to the donors who contributed to the fund in the proportions of their gifts or how otherwise the same ought to be applied.

C

On Aug. 15, 1952, torrential rain fell over a wide area in north Devonshire and west Somersetshire, causing disastrous floods and great damage and devastation. On Aug. 18, 1952, an appeal by the lords lieutenant of Devon and Somerset was issued in the following terms:

D

"We invite not only the people of the west country, but everyone who has known and loved Lynmouth and the quiet villages of north Devon and west Somerset, which have suffered so grievously in this disaster, to contribute to a fund for the relief of all who have suffered. These villages have been overwhelmed by a tragedy terrible in its suddenness and completeness. Homes have been swept away with whole families. Others are bereaved, or homeless, or have nothing left. In the darkness of a single night part of the town of Lynmouth itself has disappeared for ever. The material damage will run into a figure far beyond the resources of the inhabitants of these stricken valleys. In human suffering it can perhaps never be computed. At Lynmouth alone twenty houses and two hotels have disappeared and at least forty houses are damaged; at least thirty people, including six from one family, are missing. We hope and believe that this fund will meet a generous response far beyond the confines of the west country, for in its romantic beauty and appeal Lynmouth in particular was a possession not of one county, but of the nation. But those who have suffered are not only the local people. Many holiday-makers, notably the boy scouts who were camping at Filleigh, have suffered grievously.

E

F

G

These need help every bit as much as our own people, and for that reason we do ask the whole country to support this fund. This countryside, that has given pleasure to so many, will, we feel sure, be generously remembered in its hour of need by all those who have known it in happier days. We hope that lord mayors, mayors, chairmen of urban and rural district councils, and philanthropic bodies will, where they think fit, inaugurate their own fund and send the proceeds to [the treasurer]."

H

The response to the appeal was very great. In addition to donations sent direct to the treasurer, large sums were collected in streets from passers-by, from collecting boxes placed in hotels and boarding houses, and at stations and other public places, and by means of collections in churches. Local authorities made collections, and organisations such as the Red Cross contributed. The fund so collected was in excess of the amount necessary to meet claims in respect of direct personal loss by persons mentioned in the appeal.

Cross, Q.C., and J. V. Nesbitt for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the fund.
Gray, Q.C., and Winterbotham for the first defendant, representing donors to the fund.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.) and Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: The first question which I have to decide on this summons is whether the trusts affecting the funds mentioned in the evidence are valid charitable trusts. I accept, as, indeed, I am bound to do, that in the case such as this where the trust is clearly of a public nature, for the trusts to be good charitable trusts they must be shown not only to be beneficial to the community, or a defined section of the community, but beneficial in the way which the law regards as charitable. For that I need refer to no other authority than the opinion of LORD SIMONDS in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). A B

The method by which such a question as this should be approached is, I conceive, laid down authoritatively by CHITTY, J., in Re Foveaux (2), where he says ([1895] 2 Ch. 504):

"Cases arise, such as the present, in which it is not easy to ascertain whether a particular institution is or is not a charity. Charity in law is a highly technical term. The method employed by the court is to consider the enumeration of charities in the statute of Elizabeth, bearing in mind that the enumeration is not exhaustive. Institutions whose objects are analogous to those mentioned in the statute are admitted to be charities; and, again, institutions which are analogous to those already admitted by reported decisions are held to be charities. The pursuit of these analogies obviously requires caution and circumspection. After all, the best that can be done is to consider each case as it arises, upon its own special circumstances." C D

Before turning to the vital document in this case, I would observe in passing, that in the recent case of Re Hobourn Aero Components, Ltd.'s Air Raid Distress Fund (3), LORD GREENE, M.R., said in the course of his judgment ([1946] 1 All E.R. 506): E

"I am not concerned for one moment to dispute the proposition that a fund put up for air-raid distress in Coventry generally would be a good charitable gift. I have very little doubt that it would be. But there is all the difference in the world between such a fund and a fund put up by, it may be, a dozen inhabitants of a street, or, it may be, a thousand employees of a firm, to provide for themselves out of moneys subscribed by themselves some kind of immediate relief in case they suffer from an air raid. The Attorney-General and Mr. Upjohn wish to attribute to the fact that these people were putting up money for their own benefit a very slight importance. To my mind, it is of the greatest importance and is quite conclusive in stamping the character of a private and personal trust upon this fund." F G

Again, at the end of his judgment MORTON, L.J., said (ibid., 511):

"No doubt the provision of relief for air-raid distress is a most excellent object, and I should not myself doubt that a fund for the relief of air-raid distress in Coventry was a fund held upon charitable trusts." H

With those considerations in view, I turn to the appeal for contributions which was launched in this case, because, in my judgment, the question is solely one of construction of this comparatively short document. In the first place, it is, I think, legitimate, and, indeed, necessary, to remember that this appeal was issued only three days after the disaster of Aug. 15, 1952, and it bears the stamp of having as its authors people who had not had time, if, indeed, the desirability ever crossed their minds, of consulting their legal advisers. I say that because in the case of such a document issued in such circumstances it does not appear to me proper that the court should be astute to fix on any particular word and give to it too wide or, in some circumstances, too narrow a meaning.

The appeal is headed: "Appeal by the Lords Lieutenant of Devon and Somerset", and it opens with these words:

- A "We invite not only the people of the west country, but everyone who has known and loved Lynmouth and the quiet villages of north Devon and west Somerset, which have suffered so grievously in this disaster, to contribute to a fund for the relief of all who have suffered."

In my view, too much emphasis can very easily be put on that word "all", and, indeed, reliance was sought to be placed on the use of that word by counsel B for the first defendant in their respective arguments. I think that that sentence, applying the elementary rule of construction, must be read together with the whole of the rest of the document. The document proceeds:

- C "These villages have been overwhelmed by a tragedy terrible in its suddenness and completeness. Homes have been swept away with whole families. Others are bereaved, or homeless, or have nothing left. In the darkness of a single night part of the town of Lynmouth itself has disappeared for ever."

That, if I may say so, with all respect, is a most dramatic and, for the purposes of the appeal, well-framed paragraph, and the whole emphasis there is on the results of the disaster so far as concerns distress, either through pecuniary suffering or through bodily suffering. The document goes on:

- D "The material damage will run into a figure far beyond the resources of the inhabitants of these stricken valleys."

That is a sentence which, in my judgment, it is most material to bear in mind, because it places great emphasis on the circumstances taken into consideration by the authors of the document and put by them before those to whom they E appeal, and shows that the intention is to help financially those who, by reason of the magnitude of the disaster, are, whatever otherwise would have been their means, unable adequately to help themselves.

The document then condescends to a number of details as regards material damage, and mentions the serious loss of human life and human suffering, and proceeds:

- F "We hope and believe that this fund will meet a generous response far beyond the confines of the west country, for in its romantic beauty and appeal Lynmouth in particular was a possession not of one county, but of the nation."

- G In my view, in so far as that sentence could, on a strict view, be regarded as an intimation that the funds are required merely to restore amenities, it should not be given that construction in so far as that construction might tend to defeat what might otherwise have been said to be capable of being extracted from the document, viz., an intention to help relieve hardship and suffering by the charity of the community. It is merely a paragraph, to my mind, put in to emphasise that this distress and suffering which the appeal is designed H to relieve has fallen on a district which was particularly beautiful. The document goes on:

"But those who have suffered are not only the local people. Many holiday-makers, notably the boy scouts who were camping at Filleigh, have suffered grievously. These need help every bit as much as our own people, and for that reason we do ask the whole country to support this fund."

The reasoning there is that it is desirable to put forward some ground which will help to justify an appeal to the whole country, and the ground put forward is that persons who could not be regarded as local people, but who, being in the area at the time of the disaster, themselves have suffered grievously, need help; and the help that is appealed for is, of course, financial help, because that is of the essence of the appeal. Then comes a general statement:

"This countryside, that has given pleasure to so many, will, we feel sure, be generously remembered in its hour of need by all those who have known it in happier days."

The last paragraph is one which deals merely with machinery and which, for this purpose, I need not read.

Looking at that document as a whole, I extract from it an intention on the part of the authors to apply the money which may be subscribed at their invitation to relieve hardship and suffering which has been experienced both by what are called "the local people" and others who were within the area at the time of the disaster and to achieve that by the charity of the community. I am unable to dissect this document in such a way as to discover in it, either by looseness of phrasing, and, therefore, by inference, or by express words, any intention to benefit this part of the community in a way which the law would not regard as charitable.

For those reasons, I propose in answer to question (i) of the summons to declare that the trusts affecting the fund are valid charitable trusts.

[HIS LORDSHIP heard argument on the second question.]

WYNN-PARRY, J.: I confess that I do not find this question altogether easy to answer. I take as the statement of the principles on which the court should proceed the opening passage from the judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (4), where he says ([1913] 1 Ch. 320):

"For the purposes of this case I think the authorities must be divided into two classes. First of all, we have a class of cases where, in form, the gift is given for a particular charitable purpose, but it is possible, taking the will as a whole, to say that, notwithstanding the form of the gift, the paramount intention, according to the true construction of the will, is to give the property in the first instance for a general charitable purpose rather than a particular charitable purpose, and to graft on to the general gift a direction as to the desires or intentions of the testator as to the manner in which the general gift is to be carried into effect. In that case, though it is impossible to carry out the precise directions, on ordinary principles the gift for the general charitable purpose will remain and be perfectly good, and the court, by virtue of its administrative jurisdiction, can direct a scheme as to how it is to be carried out. In fact the will will be read as though the particular direction had not been in the will at all, but there had been simply a general direction as to the application of the fund for the general charitable purpose in question. Then there is the second class of cases, where, on the true construction of the will, no such paramount general intention can be inferred, and where the gift, being in form a particular gift—a gift for a particular purpose—and it being impossible to carry out that particular purpose, the whole gift is held to fail. In my opinion, the question whether a particular case falls within one of those classes of cases or within the other is simply a question of the construction of a particular instrument."

It is to be observed that in that case the court had to construe a will, the instrument by which a single donor had made the disposition which gave rise to the question. A number of authorities were cited to me, and most of them, I think it is true to say, arose substantially in that way. I have to deal with a very different type of case, a case in which I have to discover the intention of many hundreds—it may be thousands—of donors, and the only document that I have to assist me is not a document brought into existence by any one of those donors, but by those who invited them to become donors.

A The nearest case to be found in the reports to the present case is Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (5). That was a decision of P.O. LAWRENCE, J. The facts were that on the outbreak of the war in 1914 a hospital was erected at Netley, and equipped and run during the war, for the benefit of sick and wounded Welsh soldiers by means of large voluntary subscriptions raised in Wales. In 1919 the hospital was closed, the staff disbanded, and the property sold to the War Office, and, after winding-up the affairs of the hospital, there was a surplus of some £9,000. It was held, on the evidence, that there was not a resulting trust of the surplus for the subscribers to the hospital, but a general charitable intention for sick and wounded Welshmen which enabled the court to apply the fund cy-près. In the judgment of P.O. LAWRENCE, J., reference is made to the terms of the appeal by which the subscriptions were invited. He says ([1921] 1 Ch. 659):

C “The appeal shows that the first idea was that the hospital should be one serving with the expeditionary force at the front in France. It also shows that six months’ service in France was estimated to cost £15,000, and it continues: ‘But the sum subscribed is not limited to this amount, as further subscriptions can be used for prolonging the service or increasing the accommodation of the hospital’, and it winds up with this expression: ‘We believe that Wales will rise to the full height of its responsibilities in this great national crisis, and by subscribing the necessary sum within a few days prove that it is foremost in seeking to relieve and comfort by the hands of their own fellow countrymen our sick and wounded across the seas.’”

D The appeal, as the learned judge points out, was an appeal to the inhabitants of Wales for subscriptions to a Welsh hospital. In the course of his judgment, P.O. LAWRENCE, J., says (ibid., 660):

E “The first question to be determined is whether there is a resulting trust in favour of the subscribers to the fund. Mr. Greene has argued on behalf of the subscribers that there is a resulting trust for them, and that the surplus ought to be paid back to the various subscribers. All the other parties to the summons have argued that in the circumstances it must be inferred that there was a general charitable intent and that the court is at liberty to apply the surplus cy-près. In my judgment this latter contention is well founded. The fund was created by contributions from various sources and in varying amounts, partly by donations from private individuals of more or less substantial amounts, and partly by the proceeds resulting from concerts and other entertainments given and from collections in streets and at churches made in most of the towns and villages of Wales.

F So far as regards the contributors to entertainments, street collections, etc., I have no hesitation in holding that they must be taken to have parted with their money out and out. It is inconceivable that any person paying for a concert ticket or placing a coin in a collecting box presented to him in the street should have intended that any part of the money so contributed should be returned to him when the immediate object for which the concert was given or the collection made had come to an end. To draw such an inference would be absurd on the face of it. So far as regards individual subscribers of substantial amounts, the proper inference to be drawn is not quite so plain. In my opinion, however, these subscribers must be taken to have known that they were contributing to a general fund which was being raised in the manner I have described, and that their contributions would be aggregated with the proceeds of entertainments, street collections, etc., and would not in any way be ear-marked.

H

They must, I think, also be taken to have known that the total funds collected from every source would be applied for the purpose of the charity without discriminating between the moneys derived from any particular source. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the true inference to be drawn is that these subscribers intended to part with their contributions out and out, and that they did not intend that the surplus, if any, of their contributions should be returned to them when the immediate object of the charity should have come to an end. In the result I hold that although all the contributions were in the first instance made for the particular purpose of building, equipping and maintaining the Welsh Hospital at Netley, the main underlying object of the contributors was to provide money for the comfort of sick and wounded Welshmen, and that all the subscribers intended to devote their contributions not only to the particular object, but generally to the benefit of their sick and wounded countrymen."

It appears to me, on careful consideration, that it is impossible to draw a distinction of any substance between the facts of that case and the facts of the present case. It appears to me not in the least decisive that there is a reference in the appeal to persons other than local residents who suffered distress by the disaster. The main underlying object of that appeal was to benefit the people of the district in question. The appeal proceeds in this case, as it did in the case of the Welsh hospital, by emphasising what in the Welsh case was called the immediate object, but which might quite easily in either case have been treated, on a strict construction of the appeal, as the only object. In Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (5), P.O. LAWRENCE, J., found no difficulty in drawing the conclusion, for the reasons which he gives, that there was a more extended object than might be said at first sight to appear on the face of the appeal; and when I apply his reasoning to the appeal in question in this case, I feel driven to exactly the same conclusion, namely, that there was a general charitable intent. All the reasons which militated in the mind of P.O. LAWRENCE, J., to the conclusion to which he came are present in this case. I, therefore, find it impossible to distinguish that case from this case. In those circumstances, it appears to me to be unnecessary to travel through the rest of the authorities. I need only say that I find nothing in the judgment of P.O. LAWRENCE, J., which is in any way inconsistent with the passage from the judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (4) which I have read. It is true that the latter case was not apparently cited to P.O. LAWRENCE, J., but, no doubt, that learned judge was well aware of its existence. Indeed, the judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (4) did no more than state the effect of the authorities as it then existed; nor do I find anything in the later cases which carries the matter further. So far as I am aware, no adverse comment has ever been passed on the decision or judgment of P.O. LAWRENCE, J., in Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (5). I regard it as authority binding on me and as covering this case.

For those reasons, I propose, in answer to question (ii) of the summons, to make a declaration in the sense of para. (a).

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for H. G. Godsall, clerk of the county council, Exeter (for the plaintiffs); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co. (for the first defendant); Treasury Solicitor.

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

CHRISTOPHER BROWN, LTD. v.
GENOSSENSCHAFT OESTERREICHISCHER WALDBESITZER
HOLZWIRTSCHAFTSBERTRIEBE REGISTRIERTE GENOS-SENSCHAFT MIT BESCHRANKTER HAFTUNG.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), October 5, 7, 1953.]

A Arbitration—Evidence—Presumption of validity of submission—Ambiguity in award raising doubt as to jurisdiction—Admissibility of extrinsic evidence as to dispute—Right of arbitrators to consider questions as to their jurisdiction.

In an action to enforce an arbitration award, the defendants filed a defence and conducted interlocutory proceedings, but did not appear at the trial. The defence was substantially that the agreement in which the submission to arbitration was contained was not a binding contract between the parties. The award stated: "A dispute having arisen between [the parties] regarding the execution of the contract . . ." the arbitrators awarded the plaintiffs £1,650.

B
C
D HELD: (i) the word "execution" in the award was ambiguous in that it could mean either the making of the contract or its performance, and evidence of the dispute entertained by the arbitrators was admissible (i) to resolve the ambiguity in the award and (ii) to prove the nature of the dispute independently of the award; the evidence showed that the word was used in the sense of performance, but, even if the arbitrators had inquired into the facts relating to their jurisdiction, not to determine their jurisdiction, but to ascertain whether they should proceed with the arbitration or whether they clearly lacked jurisdiction, that would not vitiate the award.

(ii) the plaintiffs, in proving the contract between the parties, that it contained a submission, and that the document was duly signed, had tendered prima facie proof that a valid submission, binding on the parties, had been made, and they were not obliged to go into matters which might have been raised by the defence if it had been heard and might have rebutted the prima facie presumption to be drawn from the execution of the document that the document was binding on the parties.

E R. v. Fulham, Hammersmith & Kensington Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Zerek ([1951] 1 All E.R. 482), applied.

F Cases referred to:

(1) R. v. Fulham, Hammersmith & Kensington Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Zerek, [1951] 1 All E.R. 482; [1951] 2 K.B. 1; 115 J.P. 132; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Falkingham v. Victorian Railways Comr., [1900] A.C. 452; 69 L.J.P.C. 89; 82 L.T. 506; 2 Digest 451, 984.

G (3) R. v. All Saints, Southampton (Inhabitants), (1828), 7 B. & C. 785; 6 L.J.O.S.M.C. 53; 108 E.R. 916; 37 Digest 334, 1377.

(4) London Corpn. v. Cox, (1867), L.R. 2 H.L. 239; 36 L.J.Ex. 225; 16 Digest 101, 23.

ACTION to enforce an arbitration award.

H The plaintiffs were timber importers carrying on business in West Hartlepool and the defendants were timber exporters carrying on business in Austria. A written contract between the parties for the import of timber dated Dec. 22, 1950, contained, inter alia, an agreement to submit disputes to arbitration. A dispute under the contract having arisen because of non-delivery of timber, the plaintiffs appointed an arbitrator in accordance with the agreement, and, as the defendants failed to appoint an arbitrator, a second was appointed (as the agreement provided) by the president of the Timber Trades Federation.

The arbitrator awarded the plaintiffs £1,650. The award was in the following terms:

"A dispute having arisen between [the parties] regarding the execution of the contract dated Dec. 22, 1950 . . . we, the undersigned, hereby determine and award that the sellers [defendants] shall pay to the buyers [plaintiffs] the sum of £1,650."

The defendants having failed to pay, the plaintiffs issued a specially indorsed writ to enforce the award. By their defence the defendants alleged that the document of December, 1950, was not a binding contract between the parties in that the plaintiffs and defendants were not "ad idem" and that consequently there was no submission to arbitration. At the trial, the defendants, after delivering their defence and conducting interlocutory proceedings, did not appear.

I. H. Jacob for the plaintiffs.

The defendants did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 7. DEVLIN, J., stated the facts and continued: The plaintiffs are entitled, on proof of their case, to obtain the judgment for which they ask. The matters that are set out in the defence—and it is not, of course, any part of the duty of the plaintiffs to disprove them—show that the defence consists substantially of an allegation that the contract alleged in the statement of claim was not a binding contract inasmuch as the parties were never ad idem. If that is so, of course, the submission which is contained in the contract would also not be binding on the defendants and the award would, therefore, be valueless.

To succeed, therefore, the plaintiffs, first, must prove the making of the contract which contains the submission; secondly, they must prove that the dispute which arose was within the terms of the submission; thirdly, that arbitrators were appointed in accordance with the clause that contains the submission; fourthly, they must prove the making of the award; and, lastly, they must prove the amount awarded has not been paid. They do not in this task get any substantial assistance from any admissions in the defence. The defence alleges, as I have said, that there was no contract at all and what admissions the defendants make are implied rather than expressed and are guarded by the general denial clause which provides that they must be taken as denying anything that they do not expressly admit. At any rate, the plaintiffs have undertaken to prove all these matters, and as to four of them they have offered clear proof. The only one which gives rise to any doubt is the second that I have mentioned, whether the dispute that arose was within the submission.

That doubt arises in this way. In the course of proving their case, the plaintiffs naturally produce the award on which they are suing and the award reads:

"A dispute having arisen between [the parties] regarding the execution of the contract dated Dec. 22, 1950 [the matter has been referred to the arbitrators]. Having carefully examined the documents and correspondence relating to the dispute we, the undersigned, hereby determine and award that the sellers shall pay to the buyers the sum of £1,650."

They direct that the costs of the arbitration shall be paid as to half by the buyers, that is the plaintiffs, and as to half by the sellers. The award, therefore, recites the dispute as being a dispute regarding the "execution" of the contract, and, of course, if that means execution in the sense of the making of the contract, then it would be a dispute which the arbitrators would have no power to determine or award on at all. The contract contains the submission, and, if the contract was never validly made, then there is no submission, and the arbitrators are stripped of any authority, or, indeed, put more accurately, no authority was ever conferred on them to deal with the dispute. This, of course, naturally directs attention to the fact that the defendants in their defence are denying that the contract was validly made and was binding on them. The word "execution" is, I think, an ambiguous word. It has been argued by counsel for the plaintiffs that it should be taken to mean in its place in the award, not the execution in the sense of the making of the contract, but execution in the sense of the performance or carrying out of the contract. In law, as well as in the ordinary use of terminology, one talks of an executed contract or an executory contract as meaning a contract that has been fully performed or has not been fully performed. In that sense I think the word is ambiguous and there is no doubt that the principle to apply is that the court should endeavour in its construction of the document to uphold the validity of the award rather than to destroy it. It might be, therefore—and I say no more than it might be—that the word in its place in the award should be given the interpretation for which the plaintiffs contend.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, I think rightly, did not elect to rely on that, but preferred to tender evidence to show what, in fact, the dispute which came before the arbitrators was. I think that such evidence was clearly admissible. It would be admissible, I think, to resolve the ambiguity in the award itself, but a better ground for admitting it is, I think, that the nature of the dispute is something which has to be determined outside the award and outside whatever may be said about it in the award. What is said or implied about it in the award is not conclusive one way or the other; it is a fact which has to be proved by evidence extrinsic to the award. In those circumstances, one of the arbitrators, the arbitrator who was appointed by the plaintiffs, Mr. Gain, was called in order to give evidence about what the dispute was and what was referred to them. In the first place, Mr. Gain was never formally appointed and there was no formal reference as far as he was concerned. He was appointed by being called up on the telephone and asked whether he would act. That telephone call was followed on the same day by a letter of Dec. 5, 1951, from the plaintiffs in which they set out what their points were in relation to the dispute. They enclosed the contract and the correspondence relating to it, and they said: "We should be obliged if you would proceed to arbitration on our behalf". They then set out the points which they wanted him to consider, and their arguments. The letter cannot, I think, be regarded in any way as defining the area of dispute, but it indicates the nature of some, at any rate, of the matters which were in dispute from the plaintiffs' point of view. It makes it plain that the plaintiffs' cause of action, as it would have been formulated in legal proceedings, was for damages for non-delivery of the timber which they had contracted to buy and non-delivery by the dates specified in the contract, and they anticipated that this claim would be met by various defences. The main defence which they anticipated appears to have been that the sellers could not get an export licence or could not get their export licence renewed, and, consequently, they would or might rely, on the force majeure clause. There was also the possibility that they might contend that certain terms as to the furnishing of a letter of credit which were part of the obligation of the buyers had not been fulfilled, and the letter deals with these points.

Mr. Gain having been appointed by the plaintiffs, the defendants did not appoint an arbitrator and, accordingly, under the terms of the submission, the president of the Timber Trades Federation was called on to appoint one for the defendants, and he appointed Mr. James. The two arbitrators met and considered the matter several times and they looked at the whole of the correspondence with which they had been furnished. The correspondence indicated the points which I have mentioned and also that the defendants were contending that the contract was not valid and was not binding on them. I am satisfied that the arbitrators gave consideration to that point among others.

I am satisfied that they went into the question, so far as they could, whether the contract was valid or binding, and they decided that it was, and, having decided that it was, they went on to determine the other matters likewise in favour of the plaintiffs. I am satisfied, however, that when the word "execution" was put into the draft award it was not put in with the intention of referring merely to the making of the contract, but was also intended to refer to the performance or carrying out of the contract. Whether the intention of the arbitrators had any materiality on that point, I do not know, but, at any rate, so far as it is a question of fact, I find that this part of the award, at any rate, was drafted by Mr. Gain and that when he used the word "execution" he intended to use it in the sense of performance.

That is how the matter stands on the facts. If the facts had shown that the only dispute which the arbitrators had considered was the dispute whether the contract was validly made or not, then, of course, the award would have been valueless. The arbitrators cannot determine their own jurisdiction. The question which has arisen is: What is the position if the dispute embraced not merely the question whether the contract was validly made or not, which would be in excess of the jurisdiction of the arbitrators to determine, but also other questions which they could properly determine? I think that the answer to that question becomes clear if one bears in mind the fundamental principles which govern the acts of arbitrators in these matters. It is clear that at the beginning of any arbitration one side or the other may challenge the jurisdiction of the arbitrator. It is not the law that arbitrators, if their jurisdiction is challenged or questioned, are bound immediately to cease to act, and to refuse to act, until their jurisdiction has been determined by some court which has power to determine it finally. Nor is it the law that they are bound to go on without investigating the merits of the challenge and determine the matter in dispute leaving the question of their jurisdiction to be held over until it is determined by some court which had power to determine it. They might then be merely wasting their time and everybody else's. They are not obliged to take either of those courses. They are entitled to inquire into the merits of the issue whether they have jurisdiction or not, not for the purpose of reaching any conclusion which will be binding on the parties, because that they cannot do, but for the purpose of satisfying themselves, as a preliminary matter, whether they ought to go on with the arbitration or not. If it became abundantly clear to them that they had no jurisdiction as, for example, it would be if the submission which was produced was not signed, or not properly executed, or something of that sort, then they might well decide not to proceed with the hearing. They are entitled, in short, to make their own inquiries in order to determine their own course of action, but the result of that inquiry has no effect whatsoever on the rights of the parties. That is plain, I think, from the burden that is put on a plaintiff who is suing on an award. He is obliged to prove not only the making of the award but that the arbitrators had jurisdiction to make the award. The principle omnia praesumuntur does not apply to proceedings of arbitration tribunals or, indeed, to the proceedings of inferior tribunals of any sort. There is no presumption that merely because an award has been made that, therefore, it is a valid award. It has to be proved by the party who sues on it that it was made by the arbitrators within the terms of their authority, that is, with jurisdiction. Jurisdiction has to be proved affirmatively.

If the plaintiff takes on himself the burden of proving the award and fails to prove that the arbitrators had jurisdiction, of course, his action fails and it is irrelevant whether the arbitrators thought or did not think that they had jurisdiction. Their finding is of no value to him. But if he proves that the arbitrators did have jurisdiction then he succeeds and his success is not destroyed because the arbitrators themselves went into the matter and came to the same conclusion which, ex hypothesi, was the right one. In short, any view that is expressed by the arbitrators expressly or impliedly in the award, any finding, if it can be called a finding, that they had jurisdiction, does not make the award any better and likewise does not make it any worse. This approach to the matter and the principles to which I have referred are, I think, substantially those which were laid down in the judgments in R. v. Fulham, Hammersmith & Kensington Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Zerek (1), which was a decision of the Divisional Court. The court there was dealing with a similar question in relation to a rent tribunal and the circumstances in which a rent tribunal could properly inquire into matters affecting its own jurisdiction. I think the same principles apply to an arbitration tribunal. That is shown by a short passage to which counsel for the plaintiffs referred me in Falkingham v. Victorian Railways Comr. (2). The Privy Council was there considering a contention that the award was bad because the arbitrators had considered claims which they were not authorised to consider as well as claims which they were authorised to consider. LORD DAVEY, delivering the advice of the Judicial Committee, said ([1900] A.C. 463):

“ Their Lordships are not aware of any authority for this position, and they think it would be contrary to principle to hold an award bad because the possibility that matters not within the jurisdiction of the arbitrators may have been taken into account is not in terms excluded on the face of the award. It is true that in inferior courts the maxim ‘Omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta’ does not apply to give jurisdiction, as was laid down by the Court of Queen’s Bench in R. v. All Saints, Southampton (Inhabitants) (3), and by WILLES, J., in London Corpn. v. Cox (4). That rule is applicable to the award of an arbitrator where no jurisdiction is shown to make the award, but where, as in the present case, there is jurisdiction to make an award, and the question is only of a possible excess of jurisdiction, it has no application. In such a case the award can only be impeached by showing that the arbitrator did in fact exceed his jurisdiction.”

London Corpn. v. Cox (4) was one of the authorities relied on in R. v. Fulham, Hammersmith & Kensington Rent Tribunal (1), and I am satisfied that the principle which applies to inferior tribunals generally, as laid down in that case, ought to be applied to arbitration tribunals as well.

Thus, the question becomes simply this: Have the plaintiffs discharged the burden of proving that the arbitrators had jurisdiction? If they have, then what the arbitrators may have thought about it, or may have inquired into about it, is, as I have said, irrelevant. In my judgment, the plaintiffs have discharged that burden. It is, indeed, the very issue of the case and would have been the very issue of the case if it had been fought. They have proved the contract, they have proved that the contract contained a submission, and they have proved that the submission was duly signed. They have thus discharged all that they are required to do by tendering prima facie proof that a valid submission was made, and, accordingly, that, the contract being validly executed, the arbitrators were entitled to act on the submission. That prima facie proof is sufficient for their purpose. They are not obliged to go into matters which might have been raised by the defence if that had been heard, and which might have rebutted the prima facie presumption to be drawn from the execution of the document that the document was binding on the parties. On these grounds, therefore, I think that the plaintiffs have proved their case and that they are entitled to judgment for which they ask.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors: Franks, Charlesly & Leighton (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

MOHAHIR ALI v. ELLMORE AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), October 2, 1953.]

Court of Appeal—Extension of time for appeal—Fresh evidence—Evidence discrediting witnesses—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15, Ord. 64, r. 7.

The plaintiff brought an action for damages for wrongful imprisonment and malicious prosecution, and for conspiracy in agreeing to give false evidence in order to secure the plaintiff's conviction on a criminal charge, against a police superintendent and three other police officers. All four defendants gave evidence and were presented as men of high character by the prosecution to the jury, the issue of their integrity being left clearly to the jury, on whose answers judgment was entered for the defendants. Three months afterwards the chief constable of the city police force announced in the Press an investigation into the conduct of certain of his police officers and two months later the police superintendent and one of the other defendants were found guilty of breaches of the police disciplinary code in wrongfully receiving moneys from bookmakers, the second officer also being found to have divulged police secrets. After the time for appealing had expired the plaintiff applied for leave to appeal against the judgment given against him on the ground that fresh evidence had come to light which was not available at the trial, but was now available for him to use in cross-examination of the defendants on a re-trial.

HELD: as the new evidence went only to the credit of two defendants who were witnesses in the case, and did not go directly to any issue in the case, and as an appeal or new trial was unlikely to serve any public good or to be of great advantage to the plaintiff, in the interests of finality leave to appeal out of time must be refused.

Braddock v. Tillotson's Newspapers, Ltd. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 306), applied.

Case referred to:

(1) Braddock v. Tillotson's Newspapers, Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 306; [1950] 1 K.B. 47; 2nd Digest Supp.

MOTION for leave to appeal out of time, on the ground that new evidence had become available since the trial of the action.

Elwes, Q.C., and A. W. Stephenson for the plaintiff.

G. D. Roberts, Q.C., and Merriton for the first and second defendants.

R. Lyons, Q.C., and A. G. Sharp for the third and fourth defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is a motion by the plaintiff that he may have leave to appeal notwithstanding the time limited by the rules of the court for appealing has expired. In my opinion, the motion must be dismissed, but as this is an important and a somewhat unusual case it is right that I should state the reasons which lead me to that opinion. The plaintiff in the action is an Indian by name Mohahir Ali, and the four defendants are Albert Ellmore, who was a superintendent in the Leeds city police force, and three others who were members of that police force. In August, 1950, two other Indians were in the custody of the Leeds police on charges in relation to drugs. The plaintiff lived in Hull, and, according to his case, he went to Leeds to arrange that those two Indians should be granted bail. According to the affidavit of his solicitor, Mr. Rosen, he was unable to see the officer in charge of the case on his first visit—that officer was the first defendant, Superintendent Ellmore—but on some later date he received a telephone communication and went to Leeds and saw the first defendant. He was invited into the police station, and, according to the affidavit, was told to pay off his taxicab as the police would arrange for his journey back to the station. He was welcomed by the first defendant, who shook him by the hand. Thereafter he had an interview with the first defendant.

A According to the case for the defendants, there had been installed a two-way microphone set, one end of which was in an adjoining room where the other three police officers were stationed so that they could listen to that which was said. Before the interview ended the first defendant arrested the plaintiff on a charge of seeking to corrupt him by offering him money to induce him to show favour towards the other two Indians. The plaintiff was imprisoned until the following day, when he was brought before the magistrate. The first defendant then opposed bail, whereupon the plaintiff was remanded in custody until Sept. 6. There were two further remands. On each occasion the first defendant objected to bail, and the plaintiff was kept in custody until Sept. 19.

B It is said that the opposition to bail was unreasonable. It is for the magistrate on such an occasion to consider whether bail should be granted or not, and the magistrate is not always guided by the view of a police officer on such matters. The plaintiff was committed for trial at the Leeds Assizes. His trial commenced on Nov. 29, 1950, and after a long hearing, in spite of the evidence of the four police officers against him, the jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty, and he was discharged.

C At some date thereafter the plaintiff commenced proceedings in this action, in which he claimed damages for wrongful imprisonment and for malicious prosecution, and also damages for conspiracy against all four police officers, in that, as he alleged, they had agreed together to give false evidence in order to secure his conviction. That action was heard by DONOVAN, J., at the assizes at Leeds in November and December, 1952, and on the jury's answers the learned judge entered judgment for the defendants. The answers to the various questions put to them by DONOVAN, J., were in favour of the defendants, and thus the plaintiff's action failed. That was on Dec. 2, 1952. This motion, asking for leave to appeal though time for so doing has elapsed, is dated Sept. 16, 1953.

D In the meantime certain matters had come to light in regard to some members of the Leeds city police force. So far as I can see from the affidavit, these matters have nothing whatever to do with the plaintiff or with the plaintiff's action, or with the plaintiff's arrest. The affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor states in para. 16:

E "On Mar. 13, 1953, the chief constable of Leeds announced through the Press that information had been received concerning alleged payments made to officers of the Leeds city police force by bookmakers, and that he, the chief constable, proposed to hold an investigation . . ."

F Paragraph 18 of the affidavit states:

G "On May 14, 1953, I am informed, the [defendants], Ellmore and Simpson, were found guilty, after a full investigation by the Leeds Corporation watch committee, of breaches of the police disciplinary code, in that they had wrongfully received moneys and also that the [defendant], Simpson, had wrongfully divulged secrets. I understand that the [defendant] Mann was acquitted by the said watch committee on similar charges and subsequently withdrew his resignation."

Paragraph 19 of the affidavit states:

H "I respectfully submit that the above facts constitute evidence of corrupt practices by the [defendants] and particularly by the [defendants] Ellmore and Simpson, and that the same constitute fresh evidence which has come to light since the trial in 1952, and which was not, and could not have been available to the [plaintiff] at the said trial."

Paragraph 20 is in these terms:

"Such evidence would have been highly relevant for the purpose of the 1952 trial, in that :—(a) If the same had then been available, the jury would have formed, and been compelled to have formed, an entirely different view of the character and integrity of the [defendants]. (b) The [defendants], Ellmore and Simpson, could not have truthfully denied in cross-examination that they had not previously been guilty of corrupt practices. (c) The facts that the [defendants] or some of them are corrupt men would have been invaluable on the issue of motive, in that it is and always has been the case for the [plaintiff] that the motive of the [defendants] in arresting and prosecuting the [plaintiff], and giving evidence against him, was to show that they were themselves above the suspicion of bribery."

The plaintiff denied throughout that he had sought to corrupt Superintendent Ellmore, and he was found Not Guilty on his trial on the criminal charge. Moreover, on the hearing of the civil action, which also was before a jury, not only were the four police officers called, but also the chief constable of Leeds. Counsel for the plaintiff told us that he was called to give evidence to the fact that the four police officers were of good standing and that they were officers on whom he could place reliance. It appears to me that that evidence was irrelevant and unnecessary. The fact that a witness who is also a defendant, is a superintendent of Leeds city police force shows that he is of good standing and that he has the confidence of his superior officers. Counsel for the third and fourth defendants told the court that the chief constable was in fact called on other matters, and that this evidence to which I have referred was given by him as he was in the witness box. I quite accept this.

I repeat that this is solely an application for leave to appeal though the time for appealing has expired. If the court thought it right to give leave to appeal, the same court or another Division of it would have to consider the merits of the appeal itself. When one looks at the affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor, it seems clear to me that the plaintiff and the plaintiff's advisers desire to have new evidence before the Court of Appeal, or before a jury if the Court of Appeal should direct a new trial, and there is no doubt that, if the plaintiff secured a re-trial and was able to launch a fresh case before a jury supported by evidence that two of the police officers who were defendants had subsequently been convicted of offences against the police disciplinary code (offences involving the receiving of money from bookmakers), the plaintiff would be in a different position from that in which he was on the original trial. It is that end which is sought on behalf of the plaintiff. Counsel for the plaintiff has impressed on the court that, so far as anyone could tell on the original hearing, there was no motive for the four police officers giving false evidence to bring about the conviction of the plaintiff, and he submitted that it was much more likely that they would enter into such a conspiracy if they were people, or if some of them were people, who were ready and willing to commit offences against the disciplinary code such as taking money from bookmakers. I am not sure that that follows. It may depend to some extent on the date or dates. The conspiracy in regard to the plaintiff is said to have been in September, 1950. On the other hand, it is not until March or May, 1953, that a word of criticism is made against the police officers by their superiors, and the complaints are not in relation to a conspiracy to pervert the ends of justice. They are complaints, so far as one gathers from this affidavit and from what has been said in court, in regard to the acceptance of money from bookmakers. Moreover, those complaints or criticisms affect two of the defendants only, and the other two, Mann and Harriman, are not affected.

In Braddock v. Tillotson's Newspapers, Ltd. (1) this court had to consider whether an unsuccessful plaintiff in an action ought to be allowed to recall for cross-examination a witness as to whom it had been found, subsequently to the trial, that he had not a very good character in that he had been convicted of some criminal offences at some earlier dates. The court declined to allow that evidence and held that ([1949] 2 All E.R. 307):

"It had been the invariable practice of the Court of Appeal to confine the admission of further evidence on questions of fact under R.S.C., Ord. 58,

r. 4, to evidence on questions of fact material to an issue in the action; assuming that the court had power to order the recall of a witness for the purpose of his being cross-examined as to credit, that power should be exercised sparingly and only where the evidence was of such a nature, and the circumstances of the case were such, that no reasonable jury could be expected to act on the evidence of the witness whose character had been called in question."

- A In the present case, if it be right to say that the desire of the plaintiff is that fresh evidence should be heard (and that appears from the affidavit), that evidence might be highly prejudicial to all the defendants, and it might be hardly fair to two of them. In any event, it does not go directly to an issue in the case. It is really something which goes to the credit of the two defendants
- B who were witnesses in the case. I agree in part with the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that the present appeal is not on all fours with the appeal in Braddock's case (1). There is a further suggestion as to motive. On the other hand, there is no distinction in law between the position of a police officer and any other witness. In Braddock's case (1) no question of time arose, in the present case it does. I do not say that there has been any undue delay since
- C the discovery made apparent by the police inquiry between March and May, 1953, but I cannot bring myself to think that this is a case in which the court ought to grant leave to appeal which, if it was granted, would only result in a further application, either for fresh evidence to be heard by the Court of Appeal or for a new trial, the result of which, it is said, would, or might be, affected by fresh evidence. There must be, or there ought to be, finality in these matters
- D both in regard to a plaintiff and in regard to defendants who in this case are not all in the same position.

- I think it right to add that this matter has been pretty well thrashed out. There have been two trials. Though in one sense it might appear that the result is not wholly satisfactory, I do not think that an appeal would serve any public good, nor do I think it would succeed if the ordinary rules as to
- E evidence were followed. Everyone is desirous that a plaintiff placed as this plaintiff was should have his rights, and that nothing should be hushed up. I do not think that anything has been. The plaintiff failed in his litigation, and, so far as I can see, there is no reason why this court should grant his application. In my judgment, the motion should be dismissed.

- BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment which my Lord has just
- F delivered. I have been very much impressed by the serious nature and of the immenso importance of the issues which have been raised by counsel for the plaintiff, and it would be idle to say that I have not certain grave suspicion. But, as my Lord has reminded us, this is an application merely for leave to appeal out of time, and the ordinary considerations which govern such an
- G application must, therefore, apply to it. From the summing-up of DONOVAN, J., in this case, of which selected passages only were read in court, it is plain that the gravity of the issue raised was appreciated and stated with great lucidity to the jury. I will quote one passage:

- "But the facts on which the claim is based make it of the highest importance, because the integrity of the defendants as police officers is called into question by means of a charge as serious as can possibly be imagined. It is that they invented a wholly false charge against the plaintiff, on which he was deprived of his liberty for some three weeks . . ."; and there are other passages throughout the summing-up which indicate that the learned judge appreciated the gravity of the issue and made it plain to the jury. This precise matter of the conspiracy to give false evidence was one of the specific questions left to the jury, and the issue was debated in the evidence given before the jury. The solicitor to the plaintiff gave evidence on three distinct matters in respect of which the first defendant was guilty of inaccuracy at least, and telling lies at the most, and, therefore, the real issue was heard and was determined. But counsel for the plaintiff says with great force: "But we were labouring under a terrible handicap. The case was conducted on the footing that the defendants were all men of high character, and that they were police officers of standing in the service", and it was suggested that, in those circumstances, the case made by the plaintiff that they conspired together to give false evidence was inconceivable, they being men of honour and men of integrity, whereas in 1953 two of the four lost their high character and were convicted of accepting bribes from bookmakers. A
- H

The conspiracy alleged was in 1950, but the trial was in 1952, and judgment was delivered in December of that year. In March or thereabouts in the following year the chief constable instituted the proceedings which resulted in the conviction of two of the four. Counsel for the plaintiff says, therefore, with great force: "I first want leave to appeal, and if I get it I want a new trial which can be conducted, not on the footing that the four men are men of high character, but that two of them have already been convicted." B

Whilst having every sympathy with that argument, I must agree with what my Lord has said on that matter. It may be (one has to speculate on these matters) that the real truth, if ever it could be discovered, was that there had been a conspiracy and that the design of it was to screen men who were at that time engaged in accepting bribes and to give the outward appearance that they were incapable of so doing, and that they had taken extreme care in bringing the offender to justice. But that must remain a matter of speculation. It may, on the other hand, be that there was no conspiracy, because I think the point raised by my Lord is of very great significance and importance. Assuming that two of the four were so convicted in 1953, two were blameless, and the question then would arise: Would those two lend themselves in 1950 to a terrible conspiracy of this kind? All those kinds of questions must remain in the realm of speculation. I agree with my Lord, because I think it is very important that in litigation there should come a moment when there is an end. I said to counsel for the plaintiff this morning: "Had these facts arisen fifteen years later would you have applied?" He said with great frankness: "No, of course I would not." It was because May, 1953, came so near to December, 1952, that the application was made. But it is important that there should be an end to litigation; and—and this is an important consideration in my own mind—even if we were to grant this application, and even if there were to be a new trial, I cannot conceive that that would result in any great advantage. I, therefore, agree with my Lord. C D E F

HODSON, L.J.: I also agree. This is an application by the plaintiff for leave to appeal, notwithstanding the time for so doing has expired, from a judgment of DONOVAN, J., after a trial with a jury which was concluded on Dec. 2, 1952. The action was for damages for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution, and it was clear that everything depended on the jury's view of the credibility of the witnesses. The plaintiff's case was throughout that there had been a conspiracy on behalf of the four defendants, who were police officers in the city of Leeds, to make a false case against him, and this application is made because, since Dec. 2, 1952, namely, in May, 1953, according to the solicitor for the plaintiff, two of the defendants, including the principal defendant, a superintendent of police, were found guilty after a full investigation by the Leeds Corporation watch committee of breaches of the police disciplinary code in that they had wrongfully received money, and also the defendant Simpson had wrongfully divulged police secrets, the nature of the wrongful receipt of moneys being in plain language taking bribes from bookmakers. G H

Although this is an application for extension of time, the object of it is, as counsel for the plaintiff stated, to get a new trial, not on the ground of any misdirection on the part of the learned judge, and not, I think, in order that he might be able to call fresh evidence, but in order that a new trial might be had in the light of the now (as he says) known fact that the police officers whose evidence was believed were, as to two of them, men who ought not to have been believed. And he says his client is confident that, if he could go to the court with that situation, he would have a reasonable chance of obtaining a verdict after these officers had been cross-examined.

A I think this matter has to be considered in the light of the decision of this court in Braddock's case (1), in which TUCKER, L.J., delivered the leading judgment of the court. He set out the well-known principles on which fresh evidence is admitted, and continued ([1949] 2 All E.R. 310):

B "These varying expressions have, so far as the decisions of the courts in this country are concerned, always been directed to evidence directly relative to the main issue in the action, or to some issue which could, or would, have been raised at the trial if the evidence had been discovered. It is not necessary in this case to express any opinion as to which is the better view with regard to the quality of the evidence in such a case. If, however, this court is to depart from its invariable practice of confining
C such evidence to the relative issues and is to admit fresh evidence directed solely to credit, I am of opinion that such a course would, if ever, only be justified where the evidence is of such a nature and the circumstances of the case are such that no reasonable jury could be expected to act on the evidence of the witness whose character has been called in question. It would, in my view, be wrong for this court to admit fresh evidence
D directed solely to credit, merely because there is a possibility, or merely a reasonable probability, that such evidence would result in a different verdict."

Whether this is put before the court as an application to call fresh evidence (as the solicitor for the plaintiff put it) or as an application for a new trial in circumstances in which the defendants' characters would appear in a less
E favourable light than before, the position seems to me to be the same. No evidence here is sought to be tendered which is directly relevant to an issue in the case. The only question is as to the credibility of the witnesses, or some of them. Without questioning the power of the court to protect the public against an injustice being done, I am bound to say that, in this case, I see no ground on which the time ought to be extended in order that this question
F of credit should be re-examined in the case of these two men. It is said with force by the solicitor for the plaintiff in his affidavit, and by counsel for the plaintiff, that now it is fairly clear that these men, or two of them, gave evidence against the plaintiff in order to give the idea that they themselves were above the suspicion of bribery, and, if only he could say that to a jury, how different might the result be. But the result seems to me a matter of pure speculation.
G What has happened here makes no difference, to my mind, whether the evidence of the chief constable as to the credibility of these people, which, I think, was wrongly admitted, is considered or not. Counsel for the plaintiff said that he could cross-examine these men as to their character, and take his chance of the answers they gave, after the inquiry which the watch committee has held. Nevertheless, the position is, I think, that the court ought not to extend the H time in order to enable matters to be investigated which have happened since the hearing. Counsel for the plaintiff says one cannot expect anyone to believe that, if these men went wrong in 1952 or 1951, they were not bad men in 1950, but I do not think that will do. The mere fact that counsel for the plaintiff and his client are anxious to establish that two of the four defendants have fallen from honesty into dishonesty since the trial is not sufficient to allow this matter to be re-opened, and I would add I see no possible validity in the distinction which counsel seeks to draw between a police officer and any other citizen in this country. Every one in the witness box stands on the same footing, and no one is entitled to take advantage of his cloth, whether it be the uniform of one part of the service in this country or any other uniform. In those circumstances I agree that the application must be dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors: Devonshire & Co., agents for Pearlman & Rosen, Hull (for the plaintiff); Sidney Torrance & Co., agents for J. Levi & Co., Leeds (for the first and second defendants); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for R. Crute, town clerk, Leeds (for the third and fourth defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

ALMY v. THOMAS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, J.J.), October 13, 1953.]

Dentist—Practice of dentistry by unregistered person—"Treatment . . . or attendance . . . in connection with the fitting . . . of artificial teeth"—Repair of denture—Impression of mouth taken—Dentists Act, 1921 (c. 21), s. 1 (1), s. 14 (2).

The respondent, who was not a registered dentist, undertook to repair the denture of a customer. This necessitated re-lining the denture, and to effect this he coated the denture with paste and asked the customer to replace it in her mouth, bite hard on it, and retain it for some minutes to allow the paste to set in conformity with the shape of her mouth. The customer did so and returned the plate to the respondent who later re-lined the plate.

HELD: the respondent had given to the customer "treatment . . . or attendance . . . in connection with the fitting . . . of artificial teeth" within s. 14 (2) of the Dentists Act, 1921, and, therefore, he had practised dentistry within s. 1 (1) of the Act, and, not being registered in the dentists register, had been guilty of an offence under that sub-section.

Per HAVERS, J.: If the respondent could have re-lined the denture without asking the customer to replace it in her mouth and allow it to remain there to produce an impression, there would have been no offence.

Twyford v. Puntschart ([1947] 1 All E.R. 773), distinguished.

FOR THE DENTISTS ACT, 1921, s. 14 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 172.

Cases referred to:

(1) Twyford v. Puntschart, [1947] 1 All E.R. 773; 177 L.T. 30; 111 J.P. 315; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Hennan & Co., Ltd. v. Duckworth, (1904), 90 L.T. 546; 34 Digest 564, 222.

CASE STATED by Devon justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Torquay on May 4, 1953, the appellant, Percival William Henry Almy, preferred an information against the respondent, Frederick Douglas Thomas, charging that he, on a date between Dec. 18, 1952, and Jan. 18, 1953, not being registered under the Dentists Act, 1878, did unlawfully practise dentistry, contrary to the Dentists Act, 1921, s. 1 (1).

It was proved or admitted that the respondent had never been registered in the dentists register under the Dentists Act, 1878; that at all material times he held himself out to practise as a dental technician and repairer of dentures, and that outside the door of his premises was a notice reading: "F. D. Thomas, Dental Technician. Dental Repairs Received Here"; that in May, 1952, the respondent repaired the upper dental plate of a customer; that on Nov. 17, 1952, the same customer took the upper plate (to which were attached fourteen artificial teeth) to the respondent at his premises, since the plate was split and required repairing; that the respondent told the customer that the plate would have to be re-lined, which entailed the strengthening by thickening of the plate where the split had occurred, and the price of £2 was agreed; that the customer handed the plate to the respondent who took it to his laboratory and coated it with paste; that the respondent returned, handed the plate to the customer and asked her to replace it in her mouth and to bite as hard as she could, which she did; that the respondent left the customer for five minutes with the plate in her mouth to allow the paste to set in conformity with the shape of her mouth; that he then asked her to return the plate, which she did, after which she left the premises; that the respondent later replaced the hardened paste with permanent plaster; that the customer called at the premises, took possession of her plate and paid £2; that at no time did the respondent touch the customer nor touch the plate while it was in the customer's mouth; that the work done to the plate was a chemical binding, by which additional material was fixed to the top of the damaged plate.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the respondent had practised dentistry, contrary to the Dentists Act, 1921, s. 1 (1), since his conduct came within the definition of practising dentistry contained in s. 14 (2) of the Act. The respondent denied that he had practised dentistry within the meaning of that sub-section. The justices were of the opinion that (i) on the authority of Twyford v. Puntschart (1) and Hennan & Co., Ltd. v. Duckworth (2) work on an existing denture or the mere alteration of an existing denture did not amount to the practice of dentistry within the meaning of s. 14 (2); (ii) there had been no operation, treatment, advice, or attendance within the meaning of that sub-section; and (iii), accordingly, the respondent had not practised dentistry and the information would be dismissed.

John Hobson for the appellant.

Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The Dentists Act, 1921, s. 14 (2), provides:

"For the purposes of this Act, the practice of dentistry shall be deemed to include the performance of any such operation and the giving of any such treatment, advice, or attendance as is usually performed or given by dentists, and any person who performs any operation or gives any treatment, advice, or attendance on or to any person as preparatory to or for the purpose of or in connection with the fitting, insertion, or fixing of artificial teeth shall be deemed to have practised dentistry within the meaning of this Act."

It is to be observed, as counsel for the respondent has stressed, that the word "denture" does not appear in that sub-section, but, as everybody knows, except in the operation known as crowning, artificial teeth are fitted to a person's mouth by means of a denture, and I do not think that it has ever been doubted that dealing with a denture can come within s. 14 (2). If it did not, there would be in the Act a very great gap which was never intended. It is conceded by counsel for the appellant that a mere work of repair can be done by a person who is not a registered dentist without contravening the Act. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] Once you have a finding that the respondent left the customer for five minutes with the plate in her mouth to allow the paste to set in conformity with the shape of her mouth, it seems to me difficult to say that he was not taking an impression of her mouth. Why do dentists take impressions unless it is to fit the mouth with artificial teeth? In view of that finding, I find it impossible to say that the respondent did not give "treatment . . . or attendance . . . in connection with the fitting . . . of artificial teeth", and, therefore, I take a different view from that taken by the justices and hold that the offence was committed. The Case must be returned to the justices with an intimation to that effect.

SELLERS, J.: I agree. The distinction between this case and Twyford v. Puntchart (1) is fine, but, I think, definite. The facts show that there was evidence which required the justices to come to a different conclusion from that to which they did.

HAVERS, J.: I agree. If this work could have been done by the respondent simply by his taking the plate out and re-lining it without asking the customer to put it in her mouth and bite on it and allowing it to remain in her mouth for five minutes, and that was all that was done, in my opinion, there would have been no offence against the provisions of the Act, but it is plain from the finding of the justices that the re-lining was required to be performed in a number of stages, and I find it impossible to say that there was not "treatment . . . or attendance" within the meaning of the sub-section.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Waterhouse & Co. (for the appellant); Church, Adams, Tatham & Co., agents for Lee-Barber, Goodrich & Co., Torquay (for the respondent).
[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

SPIERS v. WARRINGTON CORPORATION.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.),
October 14, 1953.]

Education—School attendance—Duty of parent to secure regular attendance of pupil—Relevance of reasonableness of parent's conduct—Attendance of female pupil in trousers—Refusal of head mistress to admit pupil without medical certificate—Failure of parent to provide certificate—Education Act, 1944 (c. 31), s. 39 (1), (2).

A parent was charged on information with an offence under the Education Act, 1944, s. 39 (1), in that his daughter, who was of compulsory school age, failed to attend school. The child had suffered two attacks of rheumatic fever and, on being advised medically to keep the child warmly clothed, the parent sent her to school wearing long trousers. The head mistress informed the girl that she would not be admitted to school in trousers unless she could produce a medical certificate that they were necessary for her good health. The parent was informed that alternatively he could send the girl for examination to the school medical officer. The parent refused to take either of these courses, with the result that on each occasion when she attended school wearing trousers the girl was sent home, and she thus failed to attend school for considerable periods.

HELD: the head mistress, in refusing the girl admission, was enforcing a measure of discipline which was within her competence, and, in those circumstances, the sending of the girl to school in trousers, knowing that she would not be admitted, constituted failure by the child to attend school: Saunders v. Richardson (1881) (7 Q.B.D. 388), applied; the reasonableness or otherwise of the parent's conduct was irrelevant, for the defences open to the parent were exhaustively defined by s. 39 (2) of the Act of 1944; and, since no one of those defences was applicable, he was guilty of an offence under s. 39 (1).

London County Council v. Maher ([1929] 2 K.B. 97), no longer law.

FOR THE EDUCATION ACT, 1944, s. 39, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 8, p. 183.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Saunders v. Richardson, (1881), 7 Q.B.D. 388; 50 L.J.M.C. 137; 45 L.T. 319; 45 J.P. 782; 19 Digest 566, 80.
- (2) Fox v. Burgess, [1922] 1 K.B. 623; 91 L.J.K.B. 465; 126 L.T. 525; 86 J.P. 66; 19 Digest 570, 104.
- (3) London County Council v. Maher, [1929] 2 K.B. 97; 98 L.J.K.B. 492; 142 L.T. 69; 93 J.P. 178; Digest Supp.
- (4) Jenkins v. Howells, [1949] 1 All E.R. 942; [1949] 2 K.B. 218; [1949] L.J.R. 1468; 113 J.P. 292; 2nd Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by West Derby Quarter Sessions.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Warrington on Dec. 18, 1952, the respondent, Ernest Spiers, being the parent of Eva Spiers, a child of compulsory school age, was convicted and fined 10s. for an offence under the Education Act, 1944, s. 39, in that between Oct. 13, 1952, and Dec. 3, 1952, the said child, who was a registered pupil at the Richard Fairclough Girls' Secondary Modern School, failed to attend regularly thereat. On appeal by the respondent, the appeal committee allowed the appeal, and quashed the conviction. From that decision the appellants, Warrington Corporation, appealed.

At the hearing before quarter sessions the following facts were proved or admitted. Eva Spiers was born on July 13, 1939. In 1948 she contracted rheumatic fever. In August, 1950, she was registered as a pupil at the Richard Fairclough Girls' Secondary Modern School and attended there normally attired till October, 1950, when she again contracted rheumatic fever and was away from school under medical certificates till Oct. 1, 1951. After Oct. 19, 1951, the child's parents took her away for the rest of the term as they were anxious about her health. When they took medical advice, the doctor said she ought to be kept warm. Accordingly, on Jan. 7, 1952, the girl was sent to school by her parents wearing trousers. On that day the girl was seen by the head mistress, given certain advice about her dress, and sent home. She did not return to school till Feb. 12, 1952.

On Jan. 22 the respondent and his wife were informed that their daughter could not be admitted to school dressed in trousers unless a medical note was produced stating that they were necessary. Alternatively, the girl could be sent for examination by the school medical officer. No medical note was forthcoming, and the girl was not sent to the school clinic.

Article 9 (b) of the articles of government of the school stated:

"The head mistress shall control the internal organisation, management and discipline of the school . . ."

A rule made by the head mistress regulated the dress to be worn by all pupils, and it was proved that the head mistress considered trousers to be both unseemly and unhygienic dress for schoolgirls, but was ready to waive her objections if a medical note was produced.

On Jan. 31, 1952, the respondent's wife appeared before the school attendance committee. She refused to obtain a medical note as to the necessity of her daughter's wearing trousers or to send her to the school clinic for examination and maintained that she was the best judge of what her daughter should wear.

It was contended for the respondent that the school authorities had no power to exclude his daughter because of her dress; that, even if they had such power, no offence had been committed by the respondent under s. 39 because the procedure (regarding the reporting of a suspension to the school governors) under the articles of government of the school had not been followed; that the respondent was at all times willing to send his daughter to school when her health allowed; and that, in view of the child's attacks of rheumatic fever, the action of the respondent was reasonable.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that the rule made by the school authorities that girls could only attend school in trousers if such dress was recommended by a doctor was a reasonable rule and that the respondent's failure to obtain a medical certificate and his refusal to allow his daughter to be examined by the school medical officer resulted in his daughter being sent to school in a condition in which the respondent knew she would not be admitted.

As stated above, quarter sessions allowed the respondent's appeal, and the appellants now appealed.

G. J. Bean for the appellants, Warrington Corporation.

A. A. Edmondson for the respondent, the parent, Ernest Spiers.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. (having stated the facts): In the first place, if I may refer to the old authorities, which are firmly established, Saunders v. Richardson (1) and Fox v. Burgess (2) decide that, if a parent sends a child to school in circumstances in which he knows that the child will not be admitted, he is then committing an offence because he is not causing the child to attend school regularly. Saunders v. Richardson (1) was decided before education was entirely free. In that case a parent who objected to paying for education insisted on sending the child to school without paying the necessary pence for the week's education. He knew quite well that the child would not be admitted unless he or she brought the money. It was held that that conduct amounted to a failure to cause the child to attend regularly, and LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in giving the leading judgment, said (7 Q.B.D. 393):

"It is idle to shut our eyes to the fact that the more limited construction would enable many unwilling parents to keep their children uneducated, by doing nothing but sending them to the door of the school under conditions which it is well known would prevent their being taken in."

In this case, there is no question but that the head mistress had told the parents that she would not admit this child to the school dressed in this manner unless the child brought with her a note from a doctor to say that it was necessary that she should be dressed in that manner. The parents have never supplied such a certificate, and it is hardly to be supposed that any doctor could be found to say that it was essential to the child's health that she should wear trousers. The parents, therefore, continued to send the child to school in circumstances in which they knew she would not be admitted.

The school in question is a county secondary school, and the Education Act, 1944, s. 17, is relevant. It provides:

"(1) For every county school and for every voluntary school there shall be an instrument providing for the constitution of the body of managers or governors of the school in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and the instrument providing for the constitution of the body of managers of a primary school is in this Act referred to as an instrument of management, and the instrument providing for the constitution of the body of governors of a secondary school is in this Act referred to as an instrument of government . . . (3) Subject to the provisions of this Act and of any trust deed relating to the school:—(a) every county primary school and every voluntary primary school shall be conducted in accordance with rules of management made by an order of the local education authority; and (b) every county secondary school and every voluntary secondary school shall be conducted in accordance with articles of government made in the case of a county school by an order of the local education authority, and approved by the Minister, and in the case of a voluntary school by an order of the Minister; and such articles shall in particular determine the functions to be exercised in relation to the school by the local education authority, the body of governors, and the head teacher respectively."

Obviously a head teacher must be responsible for the discipline of the school, and, indeed, in this particular case the articles provide (by art. 9 (b)) that the head mistress

A "shall control the internal organisation, management and discipline of the school . . . shall exercise supervision over the teaching and non-teaching staff, and shall have the power of suspending pupils from attendance for any cause which she considers adequate, but on suspending any pupil she shall forthwith report the case to the governors, who shall consult the local education authority."

I quote the last part about the time of suspension simply because quarter sessions seem to have thought that the head mistress in this case was suspending the girl and ought to have reported it to the governors, who should then consult the local education authority. In point of fact, I think that is a false point. The head mistress did not suspend this child. She was always willing to accept her, but she required that she should be properly dressed.

The Education Act, 1944, s. 39, which is now the governing provision, provides:

C " (1) If any child of compulsory school age who is a registered pupil at a school fails to attend regularly thereat, the parent of the child shall be guilty of an offence against this section. (2) In any proceedings for an offence against this section in respect of a child who is not a boarder at the school at which he is a registered pupil, the child shall not be deemed to have failed to attend regularly at the school by reason of his absence therefrom with leave or—(a) at any time when he was prevented from attending by reason of sickness or any unavoidable cause; (b) on any day exclusively set apart for religious observance by the religious body to which his parent belongs; (c) if the parent proves that the school at which the child is a registered pupil is not within walking distance of the child's home, and that no suitable arrangements have been made by the local education authority either for his transport to and from the school or for boarding accommodation for him at or near the school or for enabling him to become a registered pupil at a school nearer to his home."

In 1929 there was heard London County Council v. Maher (3), a case under the Education Act, 1921. Section 49 of that Act provided:

F "Any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse for the purposes of this Act and the bye-laws made thereunder, namely:—(a) That the child has been prevented from attending school by sickness or any unavoidable cause; (b) That there is no public elementary school open which the child can attend within such distance, not exceeding three miles, measured according to the nearest road from the residence of the child, as the bye-laws may prescribe. (c) In the case of non-compliance with a bye-law requiring a parent to cause his child to attend school, that the child is under efficient instruction in some other manner."

In London County Council v. Maher (3) the parents set up as an excuse for not sending their child to school a matter which was not covered by either para. (a), or para. (b) or para. (c), and the justices who heard the summons found that the excuse which the father had set up was a reasonable excuse.

H When the case came up on Case Stated, the court pointed out that s. 49 did not appear to be, if I may put it compendiously, exhaustive; it gave three excuses which the court must accept as defences, but it left it open to a parent to show other causes which the court might consider reasonable or not, and this court said that if the justices below had found that the excuse was reasonable, they could not go behind that finding. That is in accordance with the well-known rule of law on which this court always proceeds, that the facts are not for us. We are bound by the facts found by the justices, and they held that under the then law it was open to the justices to find any matter as a reasonable excuse if they liked.

I think quarter sessions approached this case bearing in mind *Mahe*r's case (3), but the law has been altered, and the Education Act, 1944, be it noted, is not a consolidating Act. The title to the Act is:

"An Act to reform the law relating to education in England and Wales", and one of the changes that has been made is that s. 39 of the Act of 1944 has been substituted for s. 49 of the Act of 1921. It appears to the court highly probable that the reason for that was that it was considered desirable to get rid of the decision in *Mahe*r's case (3) and to substitute a new section for it, which would not leave it open to justices to find reasonable any excuse parents might set up, but would confine the excuses for not sending a child to school to the reasons set out in sub-s. (2) (a), (b) and (c). That is the only construction which this court feels able to put on s. 39 (2).

We were reminded of Jenkins v. Howells (4), which was heard in 1949 and is a case in which I was sitting with OLIVER and CASSELS, JJ. I do not hesitate to say that, in that case, if it had been open to us to find that there was a reasonable excuse for not sending the child to school, we would so have found. It was a very hard case, but we felt that the statute was too strong, and that we could not go into the question of reasonableness. In the present case quarter sessions came to the conclusion "That the appellant and his wife were acting reasonably in that they were acting in the interest of their child whose health and life they were seeking to safeguard, and that the Case was not made out."

They have attached to the Case a note of their judgment, from which it is obvious that they think that the head mistress was acting reasonably in insisting on uniformity of dress among the girl pupils of the school, but we are not here to balance which is the more reasonable or which is the more desirable. The head mistress obviously has the right and the power to prescribe the discipline for the school, and in saying that a girl must come to school not wearing a particular costume unless there is a compelling reason of health, surely she is only acting in a matter of discipline and a matter which must be within the competence of the head master or head mistress of any school, whether it is one of the great public schools or a county secondary or county primary school. If the question were whether parents reasonably believed that it was in the interests of the child to wear some particular dress, as I pointed out in the course of the argument, not in the least wanting to treat this matter as anything but serious, there are people in this country who believe, and honestly believe, that in the summer it is desirable in the interests of their children that they should wear no clothes at all except what the barest necessities of decency require. One sees in London squares, and certainly in the country, little children running about with no clothes except bathing slips, and one cannot suppose that a head mistress or head master would be obliged to admit children to school wearing no clothes at all. Yet, if the view put forward to quarter sessions were right, provided the parents honestly held that belief, and one could not say that it was unreasonable for the health of the child to be exposed to sunlight or wear no clothes in the summer, the head master or head mistress would be obliged to take any little boy or girl who came to school with no clothes. It would be an absurd position.

In my opinion, we must reverse the decision of quarter sessions and restore the decision of the justices in the court of summary jurisdiction because quarter sessions approached this matter from the wrong angle. They thought, perhaps following, as they thought they were entitled to follow, *Mahe*r's case (3), that the question was whether the parents had a reasonable ground to do what they did. That is not the question. The question is: Was the head mistress, in communicating her refusal to allow the girl to attend school in this way, acting within her rights? If we hold that she was not only within her rights, but that it was her duty, the respondent, knowing that the child would not be admitted, and insisting on the girl being dressed in this way, brought himself within the reasoning in Saunders v. Richardson (1) and, accordingly, committed an offence. For these reasons we allow the appeal.

- SELLERS, J.: I agree. It would appear that the appeal committee of West Derby Quarter Sessions approached their consideration of this matter on the authority of London County Council v. Maher (3), and that they considered the whole of the circumstances and came to the conclusion that the parent before them, Mr. Spiers, was acting reasonably. That case, as my Lord has pointed out, is an authority under a different Act, the Education Act, 1921, whereas this matter falls to be considered under s. 39 of the Education Act, 1944, which is quite different and which does not, as I see it, leave it open to the tribunal to consider matters other than those that are there set down. This daughter of Mr. Spiers did, on the facts, fail to attend regularly at the school, and s. 39 (1) provides that in those circumstances the parent of the child shall be guilty of an offence against the section. But there is a further provision, as my Lord has pointed out, by s. 39 (2), that in proceedings for an offence under that section in respect of a child who is not a boarder at the school at which he is a registered pupil, the child shall not be deemed to have failed to attend regularly at the school by reason of his absence therefrom with leave, or in the three particular cases set out. Those three cases cover a wide field of exemption from liability for non-attendance. The only one applicable for consideration by the appeal committee in this case was s. 39 (2) (a), i.e., the question was: Did the facts establish that at any time this daughter of Mr. Spiers was prevented from attending by reason of sickness or any unavoidable cause? On the facts, that excuse could not be established and the appeal committee came on the facts before them to an erroneous conclusion.

HAVERS, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for J. P. Aspden, town clerk, Warrington (for the appellants); Piesse & Sons, agents for Browne, Sturges & Wheeler, Warrington (for the respondent).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

DANSEREAU v. BERGET. COLIN v. BERGET.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), July 8, 9, 13, 14, October 5, 1953.]

Privy Council—Canada—Supreme Court of Canada—Appeal from “final judgment”—Judgment granting probate of will—Supreme Court Act (Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, c. 35), s. 2 (b), s. 36.

By s. 2 of the Supreme Court [of Canada] Act: “In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . (b) ‘final judgment’ means any judgment, rule, order or decision which determines in whole or in part any substantive right of any of the parties in controversy in any judicial proceeding . . .”, and by s. 36: “. . . an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment of the highest court of final resort now or hereafter established in any province of Canada pronounced in a judicial proceeding, whether such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction . . . where such judgment is, (a) a final judgment . . .”

In September, 1946, probate of a will dated Mar. 14, 1935, of a testator who died on Aug. 31, 1946, was granted to the appellant, D., by the Superior Court of Quebec. In March, 1948, that court dismissed a petition by the first respondent that a letter dated Aug. 21, 1946, be admitted to probate as the last will and testament of the testator, and that the judgment of September, 1946, admitting to probate the will of Mar. 14, 1935, be set aside. In April, 1950, the Court of King’s Bench of Quebec reversed this decision and granted probate of the will dated Aug. 21, 1946. In October, 1951, the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed an appeal from the judgment of the Court of King’s Bench.

HELD: (i) according to the law of the province of Quebec, a grant of probate of a will was not, as in England, conclusive and did not create res judicata, even between parties who had contested its validity, and, therefore, probate could be cancelled on proof of a later will.

Migneault v. Malo (1872) (L.R. 4 P.C. 123), applied.

(ii) since the grant of probate was not conclusive, it could not be said to have determined a substantive right in a judicial proceeding; accordingly, the judgment of the Court of King’s Bench of Quebec of April, 1950, was not a final judgment within the meaning of s. 2 (b) of the Supreme Court Act; and, therefore, the Supreme Court of Canada had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal from that judgment.

Case referred to:

(1) Migneault v. Malo, (1872), L.R. 4 P.C. 123; 41 L.J.P.C. 11; 26 L.T. 329; 44 Digest 620, 4499.

CONSOLIDATED APPEALS by special leave from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, dated Oct. 2, 1951.

Edouard Masson, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the appellant, a trustee under the will of 1935.

J. P. Charbonneau, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the appellant, Colin, interested under a will of 1937 and on an intestacy.

Andre Forget, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and R. O. Wilberforce for the respondent, Berget, interested under the will of 1946.

Oct. 5. LORD OAKSEY: This is an appeal by special leave from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada dismissing an appeal from a judgment of the Court of King’s Bench of Quebec which had set aside a judgment, dated Mar. 5, 1948, of the Superior Court of Quebec. No petition for special leave to appeal from the Court of King’s Bench of Quebec was presented. The primary question, therefore, which arises for their Lordships’ consideration is whether the judgment of the Court of King’s Bench was a final judgment within the meaning of the Supreme Court Act (Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, c. 35), s. 2 and s. 36, and, therefore, appealable to the Supreme Court. The material sections of the Supreme Court Act are as follows:

"2. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . (b) 'final judgment' means any judgment, rule, order or decision which determines in whole or in part any substantive right of any of the parties in controversy in any judicial proceeding . . . (e) 'judicial proceeding' means and includes any action, suit, cause, matter or other proceeding in disposing of which the court appealed from has not exercised merely a regulative, administrative, or executive jurisdiction . . . 36. Subject to s. 38 and s. 39 hereof, an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment of the highest court of final resort now or hereafter established in any province of Canada pronounced in a judicial proceeding, whether such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction . . . where such judgment is, (a) a final judgment . . ."

On this question the Supreme Court does not appear to have come to a definite conclusion though RAND and ESTEY, JJ., were of opinion that the court had not jurisdiction.

The judgments of the Court of King's Bench and of the Superior Court of Quebec were delivered on a petition by the respondent Berget praying that a document dated Aug. 21, 1946, be admitted to probate as the last will and testament of the late Eugene Berthiaume, who died on Aug. 31, 1946, and that the probate of a will of the same testator dated Mar. 14, 1935, granted by a judgment of the Superior Court of Quebec on Sept. 4, 1946, in favour of the appellant Dansereau be annulled and set aside. COUSINEAU, J., in the Superior Court dismissed this petition and upheld the probate of the will of Mar. 14, 1935. The Court of King's Bench reversed this decision and granted probate of the will of Aug. 21, 1946.

It has been contended on behalf of the appellants, Dansereau and Colin, that the petition was incompetent in that it combined in one petition a prayer for the probate of the will of Aug. 21, 1946, with a prayer for the cancellation of the probate of the will of Mar. 14, 1935, already granted on Sept. 4, 1946, and that probate of a will once granted can only be contested by an action and not by petition. It was admitted in the present case that the will of Mar. 14, 1935, could have been contested in an action, but it was argued that it could not be contested in a petition. It is, however, to be observed that on the granting of probate of a later will, namely, the will of Aug. 21, 1946, as the last will and testament of the deceased, it necessarily followed that the earlier will was not the last will of the deceased.

Their Lordships do not find it necessary to decide the complicated questions of procedure which have been argued before them as to whether an action or a petition is the more appropriate form of procedure. They think it clear on the authority of Migneault v. Malo (1), that, according to the law of the province of Quebec, the grant of probate is not, as in England, conclusive even between parties who have contested the grant, and they think, therefore, that probate can be cancelled on proof of a later will. It is true that in Migneault v. Malo (1) their Lordships were not dealing with a case in which two wills had been produced, but their Lordships said (L.R. 4 P.C. 136):

"At first sight it certainly appeared to their Lordships that this language [viz. the language of a Quebec statute, 41 Geo. 3, c. 4, s. 2] availed to introduce the law of England with respect to the conclusiveness of a probate duly granted into the law of Canada; and that where, as in the present case, a suit as to the validity of the will had been contested in open court, both parties appearing, pleading, and one examining, the other cross-examining, witnesses, and probate had then been granted, the same question could not be raised again, at all events between the same parties, before another tribunal; but that the production of the probate would operate as an estoppel to any such action. This, moreover, appears to their Lordships to be the true construction of the words, 'such proof shall have the same force and effect as if made and taken before a Court of Probate.' Their Lordships, however, think that they cannot consider this matter now as res integra. They cannot disregard the practice of the Canadian courts with respect to it for the last seventy years, and they have, therefore, made as careful an investigation into this practice as the circumstances permit. It appears, in the first place, that no appeal has ever been instituted from a decree or grant of probate made by the court—that it is very doubtful, whether any allegation or plea as to the merits, for instance, a plea or allegation setting up insanity or undue influence, could be propounded, or would be admitted on an application for probate . . . Upon the whole, it appears to their Lordships that, by the uninterrupted practice and usage of the Canadian Courts of Justice since 1801, the law has received an interpretation which does not affix to the grant of probate, even in the circumstances of this case, that binding and conclusive character which it has in England, and that according to that interpretation it was competent to the respondent to impugn the validity of this will by way of defence to the action brought by the appellant for the payment of the annuity."

It appears, therefore, that in that case, although the validity of the will in question had been contested in open court, both parties appearing and probate having then been granted, the validity of the probated will was allowed to be contested again by the same party who had appeared and contested its validity before. In their Lordships' opinion this was a decision that probate of a will is not conclusive and does not create res judicata even between parties who have contested its validity, and it is a decision which has been followed ever since.

In these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench was not a final judgment within the meaning of the Supreme Court Act since the grant of probate is not conclusive and can be contested in appropriate proceedings, and, if that is so, it cannot, in their Lordships' view, be said that a grant of probate determines a substantive right in a judicial proceeding within the meaning of the Supreme Court Act. Their Lordships, therefore, agree with RAND and ESTEY, JJ., that the Supreme Court of Canada had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada having been made without jurisdiction, the order of that court should be varied so as to confine it to an order dismissing the appeal for want of jurisdiction and omitting that part of the order which affirms the probate of the will of Aug. 21, 1946. In view of the course the proceedings have taken in the courts below their Lordships think that each party should bear his or her own costs, both in the Supreme Court of Canada and before their Lordships' Board.

Order varied accordingly.

Solicitors: Blake & Redden (for the appellant, Dansereau); Laurence Jones & Co. (for the appellant, Colin); Charles Russell & Co. (for the respondents).
[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BILLING v. PILL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.),
October 15, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Larceny—Property capable of being stolen—Property attached to or forming part of realty—Wooden hut bolted to concrete base—Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 1 (3) (a).

A The appellant was convicted of stealing a wooden army hut from a war-time gun emplacement. It was comprised of seven sections and rested on a concrete foundation, the floor being secured to the base by bolts let into the concrete. The appellant did not abandon possession of the hut after he had demolished it in order to remove it.

B HELD: the hut had been built for a temporary purpose, and while there was no question that the concrete base had become part of the realty, the hut itself was not, merely by reason of the bolts securing the floor to the concrete, "attached to or forming part of the realty" within the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 1 (3), proviso (a), and, therefore, it was a chattel capable of being stolen, and the appellant was rightly convicted.

C AS TO FIXTURES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 96-107, paras. 106-113; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 31, pp. 201-212, Nos. 3320-3448.

Cases referred to:

(1) Elwes v. Maw, (1802), 3 East, 38; 102 E.R. 510; 31 Digest, Replacement, 213, 3454.

D (2) Holland v. Hodgson, (1872), L.R. 7 C.P. 328; 41 L.J.C.P. 146; 26 L.T. 709; 31 Digest, Replacement, 206, 3376.

CASE STATED by Cornwall justices.

E At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Torpoint on Feb. 27, 1953, the respondent, James Arthur Henry Pill, a police officer, preferred an information against the appellant, Cecil Lloyd Billing, under s. 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916, charging that, between Jan. 1, 1951, and Oct. 31, 1952, at the parish of Antony, he stole an army hut, value £50, the property of the War Department. It was proved or admitted that the War Department possessed a site at Tregantle, near Torpoint, which was used during the war as a gun emplacement, when between forty and sixty huts were erected on the site. The hut the subject of the charge was comprised of seven sections without doors or windows. It rested on a concrete foundation and the floor was secured to the concrete base by bolts let into the concrete. In 1946 the huts were vacated, but remained under the control of the War Department. Squatters, who moved into certain huts, were cleared from the site between 1947 and the end of 1952 by the St. Germans Rural District Council, acting on behalf of, and at the request of, the Ministry of Health. The method used was to take away the doors and windows of the unoccupied huts so as to deter further squatters, and to demolish those occupied by the squatters as they became vacant. In May or June, 1951, the appellant, without any lawful authority, by two of his servants demolished one hut which was without doors or windows, and, without abandoning possession thereof, took seven sections away and subsequently re-erected the hut on his own land. It took three days to dismantle the hut and remove the sections.

H It was contended on behalf of the appellant that under s. 3 (1) (a) of the Larceny Act, 1916, the hut was not capable of being stolen as it was attached to or formed part of the realty, and, although he had severed it from the realty, he had not abandoned possession of it prior to removing it from the site. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the hut was not attached to or forming part of the realty so as to prevent its forming the subject of a charge under s. 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916.

The justices convicted the appellant, and he now appealed.

Huntley for the appellant.

P. M. Wright for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The finding of the justices is:

"We were of opinion that the hutted camp was a temporary camp and that the huts were movable buildings which did not form part of the realty. We were of opinion that the hut in question was a purely temporary structure which was capable of being stolen within the provisions of s. 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916, and it is on this point that the appellant has required this Case to be stated."

The Larceny Act, 1916, it must be remembered, was intended to be a consolidating Act and was not intended to alter the law in any way. There are dicta in some cases in the Court of Criminal Appeal of AVORY, J. (who, it is well-known, was the draftsman of the Act), that it was not intended to alter the law of larceny. Under the old common law of larceny, there were many difficulties in the way of preferring a charge of theft in respect of anything which, if I may use a convenient expression, savoured of the land. A great many additions were made to the law from time to time by statute, and most of them will be found in s. 8 of the Act of 1916. We are concerned with s. 1 (3), defining the offence of larceny:

"Everything which has value and is the property of any person, and if adhering to the realty then after severance therefrom, shall be capable of being stolen . . ."

If one stops there, it is clear that anything adhering to the land that can be severed is capable of being stolen. Then there is a proviso, which has given rise to the difficulty in this case:

"Provided that—(a) save as hereinafter expressly provided with respect to fixtures, growing things, and ore from mines, anything attached to or forming part of the realty shall not be capable of being stolen by the person who severs the same from the realty, unless after severance he has abandoned possession thereof . . ."

The construction I put on that sub-section is that things which adhere to the realty can be stolen after they have been severed, but a person who actually severs them (subject to the provisions of s. 8 and one or two other sections with which we are not concerned) cannot be convicted of larceny unless, after the severance, he has left them on the land and then gone back, on what I may call a separate excursion, and taken them. When he left them, they reverted to the possession of the person on whose land they were. Therefore, I think the whole of this case comes down to the meaning of the words "anything attached to or forming part of the realty". Those words might be read as meaning "attached so as to form part". It seems odd that a thing can be attached to the land and yet not form part of it. If it is attached to the realty and may form part thereof, we have to consider whether it is attached to the realty in the sense in which those words are used in this sub-section.

In my opinion, the proviso is aimed at preserving the old common law position that one cannot be charged with stealing real property. What is real property? Land, we all know, is real property and if objects are so attached to the land that they become part of the land, then those objects become, for instance, as between a landlord and tenant, landlord's fixtures, as they are sometimes called. I do not need to go into the elaborate distinctions that were dealt with by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Elwes v. Maw (1), as to how fixtures pass between mortgagor and mortgagee and landlord and tenant. The point is: Is the object a fixture? What is a fixture? First, the commonest fixture is a house. A house is built into the land, so the house, in law, is regarded as part of the land; the house and the land are one thing. Anything which is an integral part of the house, such as, for instance, lead pipes, will also be a fixture and will be attached to or form part of the land. A thing which, in its nature, is a chattel may or may not be a fixture. If it is affixed in some way, the true test, it seems to me, is: Was it meant to be a temporary fixture, and not part of the house or the land? In a house it may be for decoration. Many questions have arisen as regards such things as tapestries, fireplaces, and ornamental chimney-pieces. I think the matter is summed up admirably in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 20, p. 97, para. 107, by DU PARCQ, J.:

- A "Whether a chattel has been so affixed to the land or buildings as to become a fixture depends on the object and purpose of the annexation, and if the chattel can be removed without doing irreparable damage to the premises, neither the method nor the degree of annexation, nor the quantum of damage that would be done to the chattel or to the premises by the removal, affect the question save in so far as they throw a light upon the object and purpose of the annexation. If the object and purpose was for the permanent and substantial improvement of the land or building, the article will be deemed to be a fixture, but if it was attached to the premises merely for a temporary purpose or for the more complete enjoyment and use of it as a chattel, then it will not lose its chattel character and it does not become part of the realty."
- B That is a useful exposition of the law, and if one wants authority to support it, a very good instance is Holland v. Hodgson (2), where BLACKBURN, J., than whom there was no higher authority on these matters, giving his judgment (L.R. 7 C.P. 335) also emphasised that one has to consider the circumstances.
- C Can anybody doubt that the hut in question was put there for a temporary purpose? It can be removed without doing any damage to the freehold. It is resting on a concrete bed which is let into the land. I should say there is no question that the concrete bed has become part of the land, but this hut which stands on it has not become part of the land merely because some bolts have been put through the floor to stabilise or steady the hut. It was put there merely for a temporary purpose so that soldiers, who were going there for a presumed temporary purpose to man a gun emplacement during the war, would have somewhere to sleep. In my opinion, it would be wrong to hold that this hut was attached to or formed part of the realty. It was not attached to the realty any more than a garden seat which, because it is likely to be blown over, one secures to the ground by driving a spike through it. In one sense that is an attachment, but it is not an attachment making the seat part of the realty. This hut was a chattel, remained a chattel, and is capable of being stolen. Therefore, the justices came to a right decision in law in convicting the appellant.

SELLERS, J.: I agree.

HAVERS, J.: I agree.

- H Solicitors: Reed & Reed, agents for Caunter, Venning & Harward, Liskeard (for the appellant); Jacques & Co., agents for Stephens & Scoun, St. Austell (for the respondent).

Appeal dismissed.

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

ROSS T. SMYTH & CO., LTD. (LIVERPOOL) v.
W. N. LINDSAY, LTD. (LEITH).

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), October 8, 1953.]

Contract—Frustration—Provision for cancellation if export prohibited—Export prohibited as from future date—Duty of sellers during intervening period.

By a contract in writing dated Sept. 14, 1951, the buyers agreed to buy from the sellers five hundred tons of Sicilian horsebeans for shipment from Sicily, as per bill or bills of lading to be dated October and/or November, 1951. The contract provided (inter alia): "Should the fulfilment of this contract be rendered impossible by prohibition of export . . . this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof to be cancelled". At the date of the contract the export of horsebeans from Sicily was allowed under open general licence, but as from Nov. 1, 1951, by a regulation dated Oct. 20, 1951, of the Ministry of Foreign Commerce, Rome, they could only be exported under a specific licence. At the date of this regulation none of the goods had been exported. The sellers claimed that the contract had been cancelled in accordance with the terms of the contract.

Held: the regulation of Oct. 20, 1951, did not of itself render the performance of the contract impossible, for the prohibition did not come into operation until Nov. 1, 1951, and, there being no finding of fact that the sellers had during the intervening period done everything possible to ship the beans, they were in default under the contract and the buyers were entitled to damages.

Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders & John Batt & Co. (London) ([1917] 2 K.B. 679), distinguished.

AS TO IMPOSSIBILITY OF PERFORMANCE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 7, pp. 208-220, paras. 292-298; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 12, pp. 444-452, Nos. 3370-3402.

Case referred to:

(1) Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders & Batt (John) & Co. (London), [1917] 2 K.B. 679; 86 L.J.K.B. 1360; 116 L.T. 805; 12 Digest, Replacement, 451, 3395.

SPECIAL CASE stated by a committee of appeal constituted in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd.

By a contract in writing dated Sept. 14, 1951, on the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd.'s form of contract, No. 62, the buyers, W. N. Lindsay, Ltd., of Leith, bought five hundred tons of Sicilian horsebeans (Favetta) f.a.q., crop 1951 three per cent. admixture, from the sellers, Ross T. Smyth & Co., Ltd., of Liverpool, for shipment from a Sicilian port or ports as per bill or bills of lading to be dated October and/or November, 1951, at a price of £31 15s. per English ton, including cost of freight and insurance to Glasgow. By cl. 10 of the contract, all disputes arising out of the contract were to be referred to arbitration, and the contract also provided:

"Should the fulfilment of this contract be rendered impossible by prohibition of export . . . this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof to be cancelled."

At the date the contract was entered into the export of horsebeans from Italy was permitted under the terms of open general licence pursuant to a regulation of the Ministry of Foreign Commerce, Rome, dated July 10, 1951. By regulation No. 548827/E/5, dated Oct. 20, 1951, and issued by the Ministry of Foreign Commerce, horsebeans could only be exported under open general licence till Oct. 31, 1951, and from Nov. 1, 1951, their export was to be allowed only under specific licence. There was no evidence that the sellers applied for a licence to export the contract goods. No licence for the export of horsebeans was granted by the Ministry of Foreign Commerce for the export of horsebeans between Nov. 1, 1951, and Dec. 31, 1951. On Nov. 2, 1951, the sellers wrote to the buyers setting out a telegram they had received from their Italian sellers on Oct. 31, 1951, which read:

“Decreed today embargo horsebeans with immediate effect act accordingly”,

- A and they went on to state that, in the circumstances, they considered the contract cancelled in accordance with its terms. The buyers declared the sellers in default and claimed arbitration. The arbitrators having disagreed, the dispute was referred to an umpire, who, on Apr. 3, 1952, awarded that the sellers were in default under the contract and that they should pay the buyers the difference between the contract price of £31 15s. per ton c.i.f. and £39 per ton, the value on the day of default. The sellers appealed from this decision
- B to the committee of appeal provided for under the contract, and on Nov. 27, 1952, requested this appellate tribunal to state their award in the form of a Special Case under the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 21. The committee of appeal, on the questions of law whether or not, on the facts found as proved or admitted, (i) the sellers were entitled to rely on the contract clause dealing with prohibition
- C of export and thereby to treat the contract as cancelled or be relieved of their obligations thereunder, or (ii) the contract was discharged by operation of law by reason of the shipment of the horsebeans in Italy having become impossible or unlawful owing to a change of Italian law during the currency of the contract, awarded that the performance of the contract by the sellers had become impossible of performance by reason of a change in Italian law during the
- D currency of the contract, and that the sellers were not liable in damages to the buyers. Alternatively, if, in the opinion of the court, the sellers were in default under the contract, the buyers were entitled to damages.

Eustace Roskill, Q.C., for the buyers.

Mocatta, Q.C., and N. Lawson for the sellers.

- E DEVLIN, J., stated the facts and continued: In my judgment, this case turns on a very short point indeed. Were it not for that short point it would doubtless be necessary to investigate the effects of orders on this sort of clause which covers prohibition of export in relation to unascertained goods, and so on, but, for the purpose of this judgment, I can assume that from Nov. 1, 1951, onwards the sellers were excused from performance of their contract, and that
- F either there was a prohibition of export to excuse them, or, alternatively, the contract was frustrated. The effect of that, if that assumption be correct, is that the period of time during which the sellers had the right to ship was curtailed. Instead of being October/November it became only October. The facts appear to be—subject to an argument by counsel for the sellers which I shall have to consider later—that the regulation which prohibited export
- G was made on Oct. 20, 1951, and came into force on Nov. 1, 1951. Accordingly, the sellers had some eleven days during which they could have exported the goods and they neglected to do so. It appears to me that if a party is going to rely on a prohibition of export, or frustration, whichever it is, he has to show that it covers the whole contract period, and if it covers only a part of the period which the contract gives for shipment, then performance of the contract
- H is not rendered impossible. It is merely rendered more difficult for him. Instead of having the full rights which the contract apparently gives them of selecting any date within the two months, the sellers have to select a date within a more limited period, but that is not rendering performance impossible. The position is exactly the same under a contract of this sort, where there is liberty to ship on any date during a given period, as it would be in a contract which offers to one party an option of doing a thing in two or more ways, for example, to pay in gold in New York or in sterling in London. If, after the contract, it becomes illegal for him to pay in gold in New York he is not thereby relieved altogether from his obligation; he is merely deprived of his option. He has to pay in sterling in London. He cannot elect to tender gold in New York and then say: "That is the way I choose to perform the contract, and as I cannot perform it in that way I am excused from performance altogether". I see no difference in principle between a case of that sort and a case where a party is, in effect, given sixty-one options—to ship on any one of the sixty-one days in September and October. If he is prevented by law from shipping for thirty of those days his rights are so far reduced, but it does not excuse him from shipping in the remaining period. A

There is, of course, a qualification to be made which is illustrated by Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders & John Batt & Co. (London) (1), from which I will isolate the facts that are relevant to the passage which counsel for the sellers cited. The period of shipment was December, 1915, or January, 1916, and the prohibition on shipment came into operation on Dec. 7, 1915. VISCOUNT B
READING, C.J., said ([1917] 2 K.B. 688):

"The result is that it would have been illegal for the sellers to have shipped the aluminium from America on or after Dec. 7, 1915. Their obligation under the contract was to ship during December, 1915, or January, 1916. They were entitled to the whole of that time to perform the contract. They were not in default on Dec. 7. By reason of the operation of reg. 30A [of the Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Regulations, 1914,] they were unable to ship after Dec. 7, 1915. There was therefore no breach by them of their obligation to ship to Vladivostok during December, 1915, or January, 1916, and upon that defence, which is now open to them, they succeed." C D

One can well understand the principle on which that reasoning proceeds. Up to Dec. 7 in that case, and up to October in the present case, the sellers were entitled to suppose that they had a period of two months in front of them from which they could select the appropriate date for making their shipment. Up till Oct. 20 in this case they were not in default, and the result of the prohibition of export, had it been instantaneous—as it was in the Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders case (1)—would have been effectively the cause of their inability to ship. Up to Oct. 20 they would have been acting as they were entitled to do, but after Oct. 20 the prohibition would have come down on them. If the sellers here had been unable to sell notwithstanding that they had eleven days' grace within which to affect the shipment, they would have been able to say that by using the utmost diligence they were unable to effect a shipment within those eleven days and, therefore, the prohibition of export (and I am treating it for the purposes of this case as being an absolute ban) caused those eleven days' grace to be unavailable to them and the ban was, therefore, the real and effective cause of their being unable to fulfil the contract after Oct. 20. The sellers could then contend that, up till Oct. 20, they were not in default, but were doing what they were entitled to do within the principle in the passage which I have cited from the judgment of VISCOUNT READING, C.J., and that thereafter they were effectively prevented from fulfilling their contract. But, in my view, the bare fact that a regulation dated Oct. 20 prohibited export from Nov. 1 onwards is not enough for them. They must have a further finding of fact in their favour to show what they were doing in the intervening eleven days, and neither expressly nor by implication can I discover any such finding of fact in this case. I have refused an application that the case should be remitted for a further finding of fact, and, accordingly, I have to deal with it on the facts that are found and ask myself whether, on these facts, the conclusion at which the tribunal arrived is justified. There is nothing in the facts of the case to show that the sellers took any steps whatever between Oct. 20 and Nov. 1. In those circumstances, counsel for the sellers is driven to seek to extract a finding of fact from E F G H the terms in which the tribunal ultimately phrased its award, which read as follows:

"Subject to the opinion of the court upon the points of law above set out we award and direct as follows:—1. The performance of the contract by the sellers became impossible of performance by reason of a change in the law of Italy during the currency of the contract and the sellers are not liable in damages to the buyers . . ."

- A Counsel contends that I should read into that the implication that the sellers must have done all that they could reasonably be expected to do between Oct. 20 and Nov. 1, otherwise the finding that the contract became impossible of performance by reason of the change in law could not be sustained. If I were to accede to that doctrine it would hardly matter, it seems to me, what facts were found in the Case and what were not, because at the end of it the party who desired to sustain the award would merely point to the terms of the award and say the court was bound to infer that all the facts that were necessary to establish the point had been found in their favour by the tribunal. I do not think that that is a doctrine which can possibly be accepted. I am quite sure that this tribunal (which is very experienced in the statement of Cases) would never have intended as a statement of fact a paragraph, which is phrased as being
- C "subject to the opinion of the court" and is headed: "We award and direct."

Accordingly, on the facts which are set out in the Case, I think that the conclusion of the tribunal was wrong for the reasons I have given, and the result is that the award that they made cannot be sustained and I must pronounce in favour of the alternative award set out in the case.

- D Award that sellers in default under the contract and buyers entitled to damages.

Solicitors: Thomas Cooper & Co. (for the buyers); Jaques & Co., agents for Dodds, Ashcroft & Cook, Liverpool (for the sellers).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

E

R. v. NEWLAND AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.), October 5, 19, 1953.]

- F Criminal Law—Conspiracy—Conspiracy to effect public mischief—Conspiracy to effect unlawful purpose, defeat purpose of statute, or work to prejudice of State—Conspiracy to obtain and sell in England pottery restricted to sale for export—Domestic Pottery (Manufacture and Supply) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 373), art. 1, art. 2, art. 5 (as amended by S.I., 1948, No. 1616).

- G Criminal Law—Trial—Summing-up—Summing-up case of each defendant separately—Verdict on each defendant taken after individual summing-up and before summing-up of case against next defendant.

- H The appellants were convicted on counts alleging a "conspiracy to effect a public mischief", the particulars being that they had conspired together by fraudulent means to obtain and sell in the home market decorated domestic pottery, contrary to the Domestic Pottery (Manufacture and Supply) Order, 1947, which forbade manufacturers to supply such pottery except for export. It was proved that the appellant obtained the goods from registered exporters or manufacturers under the false representation that they were to be exported, that the goods went to three firms controlled by one or other of the defendants, and that they were then sold to retailers under false documents and invoices describing them as frustrated or rejected exports. Persons who obtained from registered exporters or manufacturers decorated pottery, representing that it was for export, and then sold it on the home market were not dealt with specifically in the order of 1947 and no penalty was specified for making a false declaration. In summing-up at the trial the judge first gave a general outline of the case and then proceeded to deal with the case of each defendant separately. After the summing-up of the case against each defendant the jury were sent out to consider their verdict regarding him, and when that verdict had been returned the judge proceeded to deal with the case of the next defendant. At no time were the jury separated when considering an individual verdict.

HELD: (i) the particulars sufficiently alleged the common law misdemeanour of conspiracy either to effect an unlawful purpose, or by dishonest devices to defeat the intention and purpose of an Act of Parliament, or to work to the prejudice of the State, offences long known to the common law.

Per curiam: the right approach to "public mischief" cases is to regard them as part of the law of conspiracy and to hold the actions of an individual not committed in combination with others to be indictable only if they constitute what has been held in the past to be a common law or statutory offence.

Dictum of SOULDON LAWRENCE, J., in R. v. Higgins (1801) (2 East, 21) and R. v. Manley ([1933] 1 K.B. 529), criticised.

(ii) the trial judge acted properly in the method he adopted of summing-up to the jury, especially having regard to the length and complexity of the case, and, therefore, the appellants were rightly convicted.

R. v. Neat ([1949] 2 All E.R. 438), distinguished.

EDITORIAL NOTE. The Domestic Pottery (Manufacture and Supply) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 373), as amended by S.I., 1948, No. 1616, is revoked and replaced by the Domestic and Ornamental Pottery (Manufacture, Marking and Supply) Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1130).

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Brailsford, [1905] 2 K.B. 730; 75 L.J.K.B. 64; 93 L.T. 401; 69 J.P. 370; 14 Digest 117, 861.
- (2) R. v. Porter, [1910] 1 K.B. 369; 79 L.J.K.B. 241; 102 L.T. 255; 74 J.P. 159; 14 Digest 116, 860.
- (3) R. v. Bassey, (1931), 47 T.L.R. 222; 22 Cr. App. Rep. 160; Digest Supp.
- (4) R. v. Manley, [1933] 1 K.B. 529; 102 L.J.K.B. 323; 148 L.T. 335; 97 J.P. 6; Digest Supp.
- (5) Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A.C. 495; 70 L.J.P.C. 76; 85 L.T. 289; 65 J.P. 708; 14 Digest 112, 814.
- (6) Vertue v. Clive (Lord), (1769), 4 Burr. 2472; 98 E.R. 296; 14 Digest 117, 863.
- (7) Clifford v. Brandon, (1809), 2 Camp. 358; 170 E.R. 1183; 14 Digest 116, 852.
- (8) R. v. Leigh, (1775), 1 Car. & Kir. 28, n.; 174 E.R. 697; 14 Digest 116, 851.
- (9) Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co., (1889), 23 Q.B.D. 598; 58 L.J.Q.B. 465; 61 L.T. 820; 53 J.P. 709; 14 Digest 112, 812.
- (10) South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co., [1905] A.C. 239; 74 L.J.K.B. 525; 92 L.T. 710; 34 Digest 169, 1322.
- (11) R. v. Sterling, (1663), 1 Lev. 125 (83 E.R. 331); 1 Sid. 174 (82 E.R. 1039); 14 Digest 114, 824.
- (12) R. v. Daniell, (1704), 6 Mod. Rep. 99, 182 (87 E.R. 856, 937); 1 Salk. 380 (91 E.R. 331); 3 Salk. 191 (91 E.R. 770); 2 Ld. Raym. 1116 (92 E.R. 238); 14 Digest 208, 1898.
- (13) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Westminster (Duke), [1936] A.C. 1; 104 L.J.K.B. 383; 153 L.T. 223; Digest Supp.
- (14) R. v. Higgins, (1801), 2 East, 5; 102 E.R. 269; 14 Digest 107, 782.

(15) R. v. Neal, [1949] 2 All E.R. 438; [1949] 2 K.B. 590; 113 J.P. 468; 2nd Digest Supp.

(16) Crane v. Public Prosecutor, [1921] 2 A.C. 299; 90 L.J.K.B. 1160; 125 L.T. 642; 85 J.P. 245; 14 Digest 538, 6090.

APPEALS by the appellants, Alfred Ernest Newland, Robert Norman Hawes, Ralph Stanislaw Andrew Dean, Vernon Egerton Roland Blunt, Clifford Malcolm Waight, Gerald Edgar Waight, Disposals, Ltd., and Dean, Devitt, Gilbert & Co., Ltd., against convictions of conspiracy to effect a public mischief before GLYN-JONES, J., at the Central Criminal Court.

Ashe Lincoln, Q.C., and K. A. Richardson for the appellants, Dean and Hawes.

K. A. Richardson for the appellant, Blunt.

Sachs, Q.C., Faulks and Hirst for the Crown.

B The other appellants were not represented by counsel.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 19. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The court has already dismissed these appeals and now proceeds to give its reasons. The appellants were all convicted before GLYN-JONES, J., at the Central Criminal Court in April on an indictment containing thirteen counts, but a verdict was taken on only two of them. On the first count the statement of offence was and the particulars were that all the appellants between May 1, 1947, and July 15, 1948, conspired together and with certain persons not before the court by fraudulent means to obtain, and by dishonest devices to distribute to the home market, that is, for eventual retail sale within the United Kingdom, decorated domestic pottery which was not, by reason of the Domestic Pottery (Manufacture and Supply) Order, 1947, whereby the said pottery was only available for sale for currency other than that of the United Kingdom, or under any licence granted by the Board of Trade, available for such supply. The second count charged them with a similar conspiracy, the particulars referring to a later date and not only to the order of 1947, but also to an amending order of 1948, the amendments not being material to this appeal. Some of the appellants were convicted on both counts, others who were alleged to have entered the conspiracy at a later date only on count 2. Again, for the purposes of this appeal this is immaterial and the cases of all the appellants stand on the same footing.

"Conspiracy to effect a public mischief"

It would be convenient at the outset to refer to the order mentioned in the indictment. The Domestic Pottery (Manufacture and Supply) Order, 1947, which is dated Mar. 1, 1947, was made by the Board of Trade in pursuance of powers conferred by reg. 55 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, which was kept in force by virtue of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945. Article 1 (1) provides:

"No manufacturer shall manufacture any domestic pottery except under the authority of a licence issued by the Board of Trade under this paragraph and in accordance with any condition attached to that licence."

By art. 2 it is provided:

"Except under the authority of a licence issued by the Board of Trade under this article and in accordance with any condition attached thereto, no manufacturer shall supply any domestic pottery manufactured by him other than undecorated domestic pottery of a description specified in sched. II hereto."

Article 5 provides:

"(1) The provisions of this order except para. (1) of art. 1 shall not apply to the manufacture or marking of domestic pottery of any description intended for supply, or to the supply of any such goods . . . (b) to the holder of an exporter's certificate issued for the purposes of this article by the Board of Trade, being a person who when placing his order for the goods indorsed it with the words 'for export'. (2) A person referred to in heading (b) of the preceding paragraph shall not supply any domestic pottery in respect of which his order was indorsed 'for export' otherwise than by such exportation."

The order of 1948, made on July 13, 1948, amends the previous order by providing in an explanatory note that any domestic pottery may be supplied without a licence to the holder of an exporter's certificate who surrenders a document, signed and dated by him, clearly indicating that he requires that pottery for export, and by providing that a person so supplied may not supply that pottery except by export.

The object of these orders is clear enough and is designed to assist what was and is commonly known as the export drive. Decorated domestic pottery was a desirable and valuable export which could be sold in overseas markets and thus assist this country to obtain foreign exchange, and, therefore, it was desired to restrict or even prohibit the sale of this commodity on the home market so as to increase the amount available for export. No doubt, this was a policy of the government, but it was a policy authorised by Parliament as the Board of Trade were able to issue the regulations by virtue of the statute referred to therein. Parliament must also be taken to have approved the orders as no prayer was presented against them and it has been recognised over and over again that statutory rules and orders, if intra vires the Act under which they are made, have exactly the same effect as though they were contained in the enactment itself. There has never been any suggestion that these orders were ultra vires. It is to be observed, and this is a matter of importance, that the orders in terms deal only with manufacturers or persons holding export certificates from the Board of Trade and who were referred to in the trade as registered exporters. They may only supply decorated pottery for export. The orders do not in terms deal with a person who obtains from a manufacturer or registered exporter these goods, representing that they are for export, and then, having obtained them, sells them on the domestic market. But it is obvious that, if persons who falsely represent that they intend to export the goods and thereby obtain supplies of them could then with impunity sell the goods in this country, the whole scheme would break down and the object of the legislature would be defeated. Moreover, such conduct on the part of traders who set to work dishonestly by false and deceptive documents and device to obtain and deal with goods contrary to the clear intention of the orders must work serious prejudice to the reputable members of the trade who are carrying on their business in accordance with the law. We may also say at once that it is no answer to the allegation that the appellants were acting fraudulently in this matter to say that the persons who supplied the goods in the circumstances which I shall mention in a moment were not defrauded merely because they were paid the full invoice price. It is enough to show that they would not have acted as they did but for the false representations and dishonesty of the persons who obtained the goods for them. This is so clear that we do not propose to enlarge on it.

The facts which were proved in this case are that the goods came either from registered exporters or from manufacturers, though mainly from the former. A registered exporter who had obtained decorated pottery was not obliged himself to export, but might sell to anyone who gave him an appropriate declaration that he intended to export the goods. No penalty is prescribed for the giving of a false declaration. The appellants were proved either to have given or to have been party to false declarations that the goods were wanted for export and in addition to that to have given or to have been party to giving their suppliers false shipping marks and in some cases false names of vessels in which the goods were purported to be shipped, or to have taken part in the disposal on the home market of the goods so dishonestly obtained from the manufacturers. In fact, these goods went to three firms or companies who were registered, but were proved to have been parties to the fraud. These companies were Dean, Devitt, Gilbert & Co., Ltd., who were charged on both counts as conspirators, Disposals, Ltd., who were charged in the second count only, and Wilfred Hawes & Co., Ltd., a company with which the appellant, Robert Norman Hawes, was connected or controlled. The goods were, in fact, taken to, or were already at, a wharf and then were distributed to firms controlled by the appellant, Clifford Malcolm Waight, and sales to retailers were effected by means of bogus documents and invoices falsely describing the goods as rejected or frustrated exports. It was the case for the prosecution that by these means the appellants were enabled to dispose of decorated pottery to the value of no less than £70,000, the result of which, of course, was that the total of this commodity available for export was decreased by that amount.

Two main grounds of appeal were taken on behalf of the appellants before us: (i) that the charge of conspiracy to effect a public mischief was a crime not known to the law, and, as an alternative, that at least the particulars of the offence did not support a charge known to the law. We will deal with this point before considering the second ground which related to a matter of procedure only. It is much too late to object that a conspiracy to effect a public mischief is an offence unknown to the law. There have been at least three reported cases during the present century in which that charge has been made and convictions upheld. We refer to R. v. Brailsford (1), R. v. Porter (2), and R. v. Bassey (3). There is also R. v. Manley (4), in which there was a charge of effecting a public mischief, but no charge of conspiracy, and we propose to consider that case entirely separately. The court is well aware of the caution with which they should approach the consideration of an offence which is alleged to consist of doing acts which tend to effect public mischief as, if extended, it might enable judges to declare new offences which should be the business of the legislature. The objections to such a course were forcibly pointed out by SIR FITZJAMES STEPHEN, the most prominent institutional writer on the criminal law in the last century, in his HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW, vol. 3, p. 359.

We think we may say that the court should approach the subject at least with the same degree of caution as must be exercised when considering a plea in a civil action that something has been done contrary to public policy. Indeed, nowadays we know that matters which are to be regarded as contrary to public policy, so, for instance, as to invalidate a contract, must be found in cases decided in the past and no additions are now to be made. No one has ever attempted to define what may or may not constitute a public mischief and we have certainly no desire to increase the number of criminal offences by adding to the category of misdemeanours, but there are two points which, in our opinion, do not make it necessary for us to consider whether there is here any attempt to create a new offence. In the first place, it is well known that there may be many acts which, if done by an individual, would not be indictable, or even actionable as a tort, and yet may become both actionable and criminal if done by a combination of persons as the result of a conspiracy, and for this really elementary proposition we need only refer to Quinn v. Leatham (5). Many other illustrations are to be found both in the old and in the more modern reports, for instance, Vertue v. Lord Clive (6), Clifford v. Brandon (7), the note to R. v. Leigh (8), Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (9) and South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. (10). A conspiracy consists of agreeing or acting in concert to achieve an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. Can anyone doubt that, if persons conspire to obtain a commodity for sale in this country by false representations and fraudulent documents when legislative enactments provide that except under licence it is only to be sold for export, they are not using unlawful means to effect the end in view ?

Secondly, in HAWKINS' PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 1, p. 446, a work of great authority, it is stated:

"There can be no doubt, but that all confederacies whatsoever, wrongfully, to prejudice a third person are highly criminal at common law, as where divers persons confederate together by indirect means to impoverish a third person."

This passage was quoted in the judgment of FRY, L.J. (23 Q.B.D. 630), in Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (9) and that judgment is very much in point in this case. He was dealing with indictable conspiracies and refers to R. v. Sterling (11). He quotes (ibid., 631) the explanation of that case given by HOLT, C.J., in R. v. Daniell (12) that:

"The real ground of the decision was . . . that the offence of the defendants [i.e. the conspiracy] was of a public nature and levelled at the government . . ."

and that is exactly the case here. The third person injured and impoverished here is the State or, as HOLT, C.J., called it, the government. The statement of offence in both these counts might have consisted simply of conspiracy to commit a common law misdemeanour and the particulars thereunder plainly show the constituents.

In upholding these convictions, therefore, we are in no way creating a new offence. The particulars sufficiently allege a common law misdemeanour, namely, conspiracy, and whether the matter is looked at simply as a conspiracy to effect an unlawful purpose or a conspiracy by dishonest devices to defeat the clear intention and purpose of an Act of Parliament or to work to the prejudice of the State, in our opinion, they disclose offences which have long been known to the common law of this country. Counsel for the appellants tried to compare this case with one in which persons devised plans for avoiding surtax or death duties, and quoted LORD TOMLIN's well-known dictum in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Duke of Westminster (13) ([1936] A.C. 19, 20). But the cases are in no sense analogous. What the noble and learned Lord laid down was that, if a man can order his affairs so that the tax attaching under the particular Acts was less than it otherwise would be, then, however unappreciative the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or his fellow taxpayers might be of his ingenuity, he cannot be compelled to pay the increased tax. But in that case the taxpayer had done nothing dishonest, nothing false, nothing deceptive. The only question in the case was as to the legal effect of certain admittedly genuine deeds. They were held to create an obligation to pay annuities, not salary or wages and consequently the taxpayer was entitled to deduct the payments in arriving at the total income for surtax purposes. Openly and without fraud of any kind he had become entitled to certain deductions from his income.

We cannot leave this part of the case without referring to R. v. Manley (4), a case binding on this court though it has been subject to considerable criticism. The facts were that the defendant, a woman, had given false information to the police that she had been assaulted and robbed, thereby causing officers of the police to waste their time investigating a bogus crime and exposing individuals answering to the description of the pretended robber to suspicion. In upholding the conviction this court held that such conduct amounted to a misdemeanour, namely, effecting a public mischief. They were relying on a dictum of SOULDON LAWRENCE, J., in R. v. Higgins (14) as well as on R. v. Brailsford (1) and R. v. Porter (2). The dictum in R. v. Higgins (14) was that all offences of a public nature, that is, all such acts or attempts as tend to the prejudice of the public are indictable, but no other member of the court stated the law in such wide terms. It is the breadth of that dictum that was so strongly criticised by SIR FITZJAMES STEPHEN in the passage in his HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW to which we have already referred and also by DR. STALYBRASS in 34 L.Q.R. 183. In effect, it would leave it to the judges to declare new crimes and enable them to hold anything which they considered prejudicial to the community to be a misdemeanour. However beneficial that might have been in days when Parliament met seldom, or at least only at long intervals, it surely is now the province of the legislature and not of the judiciary to create new criminal offences. The Council, or as it was more generally termed, the Court of Star Chamber, in its time rendered considerable service to the criminal law by declaring some matters, notably perjury, to be misdemeanours though they never attempted to create new felonies. But conditions now are wholly different.

A The actual decision in R. v. Higgins (14) was that an incitement to commit a felony was a misdemeanour. The court showed that it was firmly established by decisions that an attempt to commit a misdemeanour was in itself a misdemeanour and applied that doctrine to attempts to commit felony and held that the solicitation was in itself an act sufficient to prevent the application of the doctrine that mere intention unaccompanied by some act would not support an indictment for an attempt. No one would criticise the actual

C decision, but the very wide dictum to which we have referred is unnecessary to support it. The short judgment in R. v. Manley (4), while referring to R. v. Brailsford (1) and R. v. Porter (2), apparently overlooked, or, at any rate, makes no mention of what, in our opinion, was an all-important factor in those cases, namely, that in both there was a charge of conspiracy. With all respect to a case which, as we have said, is binding on us, we believe that the right

D approach to what may be compendiously called public mischief cases is to regard them as part of the law of conspiracy, and to hold the actions of an individual not committed in combination with others as indictable only if they constitute what has been held in the past to be common law or statutory offences. It may be that Manley's case (4) will some day be considered by the House

E of Lords and in any case we venture to think that it would be a useful reform if such conduct as was there disclosed were made a summary offence by the legislature. We need not further enlarge on it as the charge we are now considering was one of conspiracy except to say that, in our considered opinion, the safe course is no longer to follow it.

We now pass to the second ground of appeal. What is challenged is the action

F which the learned judge took in summing-up the case. He started his summing-up, with all the appellants in the dock, by giving the jury a general outline of the case and a charge on the law, and no fault is found with his direction. He then proceeded to deal with the case of each defendant separately and took separate verdicts thereon. For instance, he first dealt with the case of

G Clifford Waight and having summed up the evidence with regard to that defendant he sent the jury out to consider their verdict against him. When the jury returned with a verdict of Guilty that defendant was sent down and the judge started to sum up the evidence against the second defendant, again taking a separate verdict, and so on against all of them. His summing-up occupied altogether three days, and at the conclusion of each day the jury

H were allowed to separate and to come back the following morning. They in no case separated while they were considering a verdict.

We can see no objection in law to the course which the learned judge took. It was, no doubt, unusual, but so also was the case. It had taken the better part of six weeks to try, a mass of documents had to be considered and the case was one of great complexity. To have thrown, so to speak, the whole of the case at the jury, leaving them to sort out afterwards the evidence against each defendant, would have been neither in the interests of the defendants themselves nor in the interests of justice. It was part of the learned judge's duty to remind the jury that they would have to consider the case of each man separately. It would have been impossible for the jury to have done so with a case of this description except by the course which the learned judge took. It was objected that this offended against the decision in R. v. Neal (15), but, in our opinion, that case has no application to what happened here. In Neal's case (15) the recorder, having concluded his summing-up and enclosed the jury in charge of the bailiff, allowed them to separate and go out into the town for refreshment. The court felt obliged to hold that that was so contrary to established practice that the conviction could not be allowed to stand, applying the words of LORD SUMNER in Crane v. Public Prosecutor (16) ([1921] 2 A.C. 331) that leaves the court no option but to quash the conviction. But what was done here amounted to no more than this: when the judge had summed up against the first defendant and taken the verdict the case was still part heard against all the other defendants and so it remained against each defendant until a verdict had been taken against him. It is well known nowadays that judges very often break off their summing-up to enable the jury to obtain refreshment, or, if it has become late, to let them go home and consider the verdict fresh next morning though it may be that very little remains to finish the summing-up. Once the summing-up is finished and the jury enclosed they must not be allowed to separate, but we can see no reason why the jury should not be allowed to depart at night, though the summing-up is concluded and a verdict taken against one, while the case still remains part heard against the others. In our opinion, there is nothing in this objection. We cannot forbear from expressing our appreciation of the way in which GLYN-JONES, J., dealt with a case of extraordinary length and complexity.

" . . . to deprive an accused person of the protection given by essential steps in criminal procedure "

Appeals dismissed.

Solicitors: Randolph & Dean (for the appellants, Dean and Hawes); Freeborough & Co. (for the appellant, Blunt); Solicitor, Board of Trade (for the Crown).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

CUTTRESS AND OTHERS v. SCAFFOLDING (GREAT BRITAIN), LTD. AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), October 5, 6, 1953.]

Negligence—Child—Allurement—Scaffold—Erection for repair of house—Children injured by scaffold being pulled over by boys—Foreseeable danger of young persons interfering with scaffolding.

A To enable their plasterers to work safely at a height on the re-plastering of an exposed interior wall of a bomb-damaged house, the second defendants, who were builders, employed the first defendants, a scaffolding firm, to construct an independent tubular scaffold on an open site immediately adjoining the house. The scaffold was thirty-five feet high, fifty-four feet long, and four feet, four inches wide, and it weighted between four and four and a half tons. A pulley at the top to take up men and materials weighing up to one hundredweight from ground floor level projected outside the scaffold. The scaffold was not tied to the house, and could not safely be tied owing to the state of the building, and it was not strutted or buttressed to prevent its falling over, because no pull was to be exerted calling for such precautions. It was erected according to the best practice known, and many hundreds of such scaffolds had been erected and used previously without mishap. The scaffold was approved by the local authority's surveyor and was found satisfactory in use, as constructed, by the second defendants' workmen before and after the accident. Three days after erection the scaffold was left for the week-end by the second defendants' workmen. The pulley rope, which was 150 feet long, was rolled up round the pulley and tied at the top, planks were taken to the higher stages, and the only ladder was removed. On the Sunday, children, including boys of from twelve to sixteen years of age, gathered on the site, which was commonly used by the public, and by children to play on. One boy climbed up the scaffold, unfastened the rope and threw the end not fastened to the pulley down to the others. About a dozen boys pulled horizontally at the rope and three others hung on it simultaneously. The scaffold fell over and injured three children, the plaintiffs.

F HELD: though it was not tied or strutted or buttressed, there was no evidence on which it could be found that the scaffold was insecure or likely to fall, since it was sufficient for the purpose for which it was erected and on the evidence was not likely to fall through any use for which it was intended; the defendants could not reasonably have foreseen the probability of the events which caused it to fall; and, therefore, they were not liable for negligence to the injured plaintiffs.

Decision of JONES, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 165), reversed.

G AS TO DEGREE OF CARE NECESSARY IN RELATION TO ACTS BY CHILDREN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, p. 584, para. 836; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 68-71, Nos. 433-462.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Bolton v. Stone, [1951] 1 All E.R. 1078; [1951] A.C. 850; 2nd Digest Supp.
- H (2) Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young, [1942] 2 All E.R. 396; [1943] A.C. 92; 111 L.J.P.C. 97; 167 L.T. 261; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Glasgow Corp'n. v. Muir, [1943] 2 All E.R. 44; [1943] A.C. 448; 112 L.J.P.C. 1; 169 L.T. 53; 107 J.P. 140; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562; 101 L.J.P.C. 119; 147 L.T. 281; Digest Supp.

APPEALS by the defendants against an order of JONES, J., at Liverpool Assizes, dated Nov. 3, 1952, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 165.

The three plaintiffs were children who had been injured by the fall of a scaffold erected by the first defendants for use by the workmen of the second defendants. At a week-end the workmen of the second defendants left the scaffold with a pulley rope wrapped round the pulley at the top of the scaffold, planks moved to the top stages, and the only ladder removed. Boys playing on the bomb-damaged site on which the scaffold stood hauled horizontally on the rope (unfastened by one of them) and caused the scaffold to fall. JONES, J., held that each of the defendants owed a duty to the infant plaintiffs to take all reasonable steps to prevent the scaffold falling on them, that each of the defendants ought to have foreseen the probability of the scaffold being pulled over by the children, and that they were both liable to the plaintiffs for negligence in not so doing. He held also that the second defendants ought to have realised that the scaffold was unstable and a danger to passers-by and that they were negligent in not providing a watchman when the scaffold was left unattended. Both the defendants appealed.

S. Scholefield Allen, Q.C., and Clover for the first defendants.

Crichton, Q.C., and Forrest, Q.C., for the second defendants.

Wooll, Q.C., and Youds for the plaintiffs.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal against an order of JONES, J., given at Liverpool Assizes in November, 1952. His judgment was followed by argument in London as to the position between the two defendants in the action, and his judgment on that was given at a later date. The plaintiffs were three very young boys who had suffered injuries in January, 1949. They successfully sued (each by his next friend) the two defendants, JONES, J., awarding as damages out-of-pocket loss to the next friends of the boys, small sums to two of the boys who were not much hurt, and the sum of £2,500 as general damages to the third boy, whose name was Cuttress, and who had suffered very severe injuries. Both defendants appeal against that judgment, and, in my opinion, the appeal of each must succeed.

In December, 1948, the second defendants, Huntingdon Building & Development Co., Ltd., were to repair a house, No. 102, Great Homer Street, in the city of Liverpool. The house had been damaged by enemy action, and houses in the neighbourhood had been destroyed, so that there was an open space close to the house on which children played and across which people could move. The repair to the house consisted of plastering or cementing the end of it as it stood, i.e., rendering in good condition an inside wall which, by reason of the damage, had become an outside wall. Realising that a scaffolding would be necessary, the second defendants consulted the first defendants, Scaffolding (Great Britain), Ltd., a company experienced in the erection of scaffolding, and said to have been one of the pioneers in tubular scaffolding. They undertook to erect the necessary scaffolding so that the second defendants could do their work, and they erected a scaffold, which was thirty-five feet high and fifty-four feet long, and the depth, or width, of the base of which was four feet, four inches. The weight of the structure was between four and four and a half tons. At the foot of each of the tubes there was a metal base, six inches square, and in the lower part of the structure there was a design which one witness said was rather like an "H", to give it additional stability. It was so designed that, if the ground was not quite level, or not everywhere the same height, the tubes could be adjusted to ensure stability of the structure. At the top of the scaffolding was a pulley for the purpose of taking materials up from ground level to the place on the scaffolding at which they were required, and for that to be done the pulley had to project out some distance beyond the tubular scaffolding itself. The pulley was about thirty-five feet above ground.

The scaffolding was handed over by the first defendants to the second defendants on Jan. 6, 1949. At that time there was a rope at the top of the scaffolding which was intended for use on the pulley, but it had not been thrust through the pulley. The second defendants' men put it in the proper position, and thereafter for two and a half or three days they used the scaffolding without complaint or without any apprehension of any danger. It was a scaffolding to which reg. 12 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145) would apply. Sub-paragraph (1) of that regulation provides:

- A "Every scaffold shall be securely supported or suspended and shall where necessary be sufficiently and properly strutted or braced to ensure stability and, unless it is properly designed and constructed as an independent scaffold, shall be rigidly connected with the building."

This was designed as an independent scaffold. It is said for the defendants that it was securely supported and that there was no necessity for it to be sufficiently and properly strutted or braced, because stability was ensured from its construction. The regulation does not apply to the facts in this case, because the boys who were injured were not people for whose benefit or protection the regulations were made, but I have referred to it as it does mention an independent scaffold.

- C When the foreman of the second defendants took over the scaffold he was satisfied with it. He was a man of experience, and he had no reason to doubt its stability. His men worked on it for a few days and the pulley was used, and nothing wrong was observed by anyone. At noon on Saturday, Jan. 8, the second defendants' workmen left work, and the description given by Mr. Williams, the foreman, of what was done was this:

- D "At a quarter past twelve the last bucket of mortar was taken up, the bucket was lowered down again, and the rope was rolled up to the top and tied above the cat-head. Then we removed any planks that were on the lower tiers to a higher position, cleared up the surplus building material, and then removed the ladder. Q.—There was only one ladder? A.—Yes."

- E Thus, the scaffolding was left with no ladder and with no planks on the lower stages, though there were a few planks at the top, and the rope, a long one, was wound round the part where the pulley is. It was thought that everything was safe. Before that time there had been a little trouble from children. Some bricks had been put in with mortar, and a child, or children, had interfered with bricks on ground level. The foreman said that, after renewing that piece of work, he remained until after dark one night to make sure that the setting of the bricks was right. There had been no other trouble with children, though quite a number of them used the piece of waste ground around the house.

- G On the afternoon of Sunday, Jan. 9, some children were on the vacant piece of ground, including boys from twelve to sixteen years of age. The judge accepted the evidence of three girls, who said that a number of boys approached the scaffolding, and one climbed up it. The first stage was six feet up and there were no planks there. The second stage was a little less and, again, there were no planks, planks being only at the top two stages. The boy unfastened the rope wound in the way I have described, and threw down one end to the boys below. It was not an easy journey for anyone, and I find it a little difficult to see that it was something which anyone ought to anticipate being done.
- H Then eleven or twelve boys pulled on the rope away from the building and away from the scaffolding, and three other boys hung or dangled on the rope between those eleven or twelve boys and the staging, so that they were being jerked up and down by the pulling of the eleven or twelve boys. While that was being done someone dressed in workman's clothes came along and drove the boys away. He put the rope behind some corrugated iron alongside the building and departed. The boys returned. They got hold of the rope again and the same thing happened. Some pulled and others hung on the rope.

That was bound to place a strain on the scaffolding. A police officer came along, and the boys ran away. The police officer climbed some little distance up the scaffolding himself, fastened the rope some height above the ground, and departed. As soon as he had gone the boys came back again. A boy got the rope from where it was fastened and the same number of boys pulled on the rope and others dangled on it, and after a short space of time the scaffolding quivered and came down in one piece. Most unfortunately it fell on the three little boys who are plaintiffs, and they sustained injuries.

The writ in the action was issued on Apr. 7, 1949, and the statement of claim was delivered on July 9, 1949. Damages were claimed by reason of the negligence of one or other, or both, of the defendants, their servants or agents, in erecting and/or maintaining the scaffolding in a dangerous manner and condition, whereby the same suddenly collapsed and fell and each of the plaintiffs was struck and severely injured by the falling parts thereof. I do not suppose that, at the commencement of this action, the plaintiffs' advisers would have complete evidence or complete information as to the cause of the accident, but at the trial evidence given by the three girls showed, as the judge found, what had happened and how the collapse of the scaffolding was brought about. Before that time there had been no complaint by anyone against the scaffolding or against the manner of its erection. It had been inspected by those for whom it was erected, and their workmen had worked on it in perfect security. It was the action of a number of boys that brought the scaffolding down, and that was set up by each of the defendants in their defence, and they have said throughout: "Neither of us was negligent in any sense whatever."

A Mr. Martin, a chartered mechanical engineer, and an employee of a firm of consulting engineers in Manchester, gave evidence for the plaintiffs. He said he had not been in court the whole of the time occupied by the plaintiffs' evidence, and he had no details of the erection, and had not seen the plan or the photographs. Asked to look at the plan and to consider whether it showed a suitable erection for this class of thing, he said:

"No, I do not think it was suitable . . . Because by reason of the height in proportion to the width of the base and bearing in mind that a [pulley] wheel was employed . . . In my opinion, the scaffold should have been tied to the building or alternatively braced to withstand the overturning force created by the use of the pulley."

In other words, he was saying that the pulley extending out beyond the line of the scaffolding would involve some pull outwards on the scaffolding, and the scaffolding should be either tied to the building or braced or buttressed. Under cross-examination he was inclined to think that, if the building itself was weak, the scaffolding should not be tied to it, but, still, there ought to have been buttresses, because the pulley was overhanging and there was thus an outward pull. Notwithstanding the view of that witness, it is the fact that the scaffolding had been used for two or three days without any complaint whatever. It had been inspected by those for whom it was made, and there was on the other side a body of evidence to show that it was erected in the ordinary way in which an independent scaffold is erected. It stood on the six-inch square steel parts or footings, and it was sufficient for its purpose. There was strong evidence from the defendants to that effect. Asked if there was a necessity for some sort of board or solid base on which the footings should rest, Mr. Martin thought the six-inch square steel bases were sufficient in the ordinary way for the ground on which they were placed.

The defendants called a number of witnesses of experience, and it is noteworthy that, after this accident, the scaffolding was re-erected in just the same way and work continued for a fortnight or so until what had to be done was finished, without any complaint from anyone. A representative of the Liverpool city surveyor's office had found no fault with it and thought it satisfactory, and after the accident he saw it again and saw what was done. No one, apparently, suggested that this erection, an independent scaffold, was in any way contrary to reg. 12. If anyone had so thought, something would have been done about it. It was an independent scaffold not tied to the building. It could not be very well. It was not buttressed, because buttressing was considered unnecessary by those of experience, as it had a depth of four feet, four inches, and each of the tubes was resting on a six-inch square steel bottom. Practical experience, as shown by the evidence of the defendants, showed that that was sufficient of itself without the necessity for any buttressing, and Mr. Martin's evidence suggested that he did not think it would be any safer or any better if the foot of each tube had been upon a piece of wood or board.

A The learned judge's findings were in favour of the plaintiffs. Objection is taken that there is no evidence on which some of the findings can be supported, and it is submitted by both defendants that, on the evidence, judgment ought to have been entered for the defendants; in other words, that there was no evidence on which the plaintiffs could succeed. The first defendants' witnesses, including the witness from the corporation, and the second defendants' witnesses, showed that this scaffolding was erected according to the ordinary practice and to the best practice as known, and that it was sufficient for the purpose for which it was required. The scaffolding was necessary to enable workmen to work at a height in comparative safety. When men are working at a height of thirty feet or so above ground level, they ought to have something to protect them from falling. That was the purpose of the scaffolding, and unless it were stable and securely placed it would be no use to them. They found it sufficient both before and after this accident. Moreover, it was demonstrated by one witness, perhaps by two witnesses, that in order to cause the scaffold to fall away from the building there would have to be a horizontal pull of five and a half to six and a half hundredweights and that, said one witness, would mean a pull by about eleven men or grown-up boys—a horizontal pull from the top.

E One question to be considered is whether those who erect a scaffolding of this sort are reasonably to expect something of the kind which happened, for the scaffolding was sufficient for the purpose for which it was erected. The judge made certain findings of fact on which the plaintiffs submit that they are entitled to hold the judgment in their favour. One finding is ([1953] 1 All E.R. 166):

F "I find that the scaffold fell in one piece and that it fell because it was not properly constructed and was not sufficiently strutted. I find that the immediate cause of it falling was the interference with it and pressure put on it by some twelve to fifteen boys, aged about fifteen or sixteen. I find that these boys could not have pulled the scaffold over if it had been properly constructed and secured by struts in the nature of buttresses to prevent it from falling in the direction in which it fell. I think that the servants of the first defendants were probably wise in not attaching the scaffold to the wall and I am not convinced that it could have been safely tied to the building in any way, but I am satisfied that there should have been struts placed on the side of the scaffold away from the building to prevent it falling in that direction and that it was negligent of the first defendants not to provide such struts . . . I find that the scaffold was liable to fall and was a danger to passers-by using this open space. I accept the proposition that an independent scaffold is recognised as a safe scaffold in certain conditions, though I believe that such a scaffold may be unsafe to passers-by if not tied or strutted."

H The learned judge in that passage accepts the view that it was not desirable to tie this scaffold to the building, but he says there ought to have been struts, though in the same passage he finds that the immediate cause of the scaffold falling was interference and pressure put upon it by twelve to fifteen boys. He added (ibid.):

"I find that their negligence was a contributing cause of the fall of the scaffold."

I would point out it is, perhaps, more accurate to say that the scaffold was pulled down rather than to say that it fell. The judge said, again (ibid.):

"I find that the scaffold was liable to fall and was a danger to passers-by using this open space."

There is no evidence whatever to show that the scaffold was liable to fall through any ordinary use for which it was intended.

The passage which I have read suggests that the judge is adopting the view that an independent scaffold must be strutted or buttressed. I do not think that the evidence, taken as a whole, warrants any such conclusion. The finding of the judge seems to me to be equivalent to saying that the practice, which has been followed for a long period, of having scaffolding of this kind built as an independent scaffold is not sufficient unless it is also strutted. That would be a departure from the practice of those who have been responsible for these erections for a considerable time, and, though I am far from saying that an independent scaffolding should never be strutted, I feel that those who have had to deal with this kind of work over the years are generally able to form an impression as to what is necessary for what has to be done. If there be anything in the lie of the land or in the nature of the subsoil, which may give apprehension of danger, then clearly additional steps should be taken for the protection of the workmen in the first place, but here there was no such apprehension, and the scaffolding which was erected was sufficient for all the purposes for which it was intended. I do not think that finding of the judge is warranted on the evidence.

[HIS LORDSHIP held that there was no evidence to support a finding that sole plates should have been provided as the foundation for the base plates on which the uprights rested, since on the facts the ground was not such as to require them, and continued:]

I come now to the third finding ([1953] 1 All E.R. 166):

"I find that the servants of the second defendants should have realised that the scaffold was insufficiently secured and that children would probably interfere with it, that they were negligent in leaving a rope attached to the top of the scaffold when they left it unattended, and that their negligence was a contributing cause to the fall of the scaffold."

That seems to me to be going a long way. People engaged on a building or repair operation have a scaffolding erected at the end of a building, and when they cease work at mid-day on Saturday they take away all the planks on the lower part of the staging. They take away the ladder. And it is said that they are negligent because they leave a rope at the top on a pulley thirty-five feet above ground, the rope being wrapped round the pulley, not hanging down, or in any sense a temptation to anyone, though, I suppose, it could be seen. For myself I should hesitate a long time before I found that there was negligence on the part of responsible employees of the builders. They had taken the precaution to put away the ladder and to take away from the lower parts of the structure the planks so that anyone who had to get up to the pulley had to swarm up these tubes to a height of thirty-five feet. I do not think that they ought to have anticipated that someone would climb up there and get hold of the rope and throw it down. I should not describe it as negligence. Even if that could be regarded as negligence, and even if the most careful thought would have caused them to take the rope away at the week-end, it is only one stage in this matter.

The next finding of the judge is (ibid.):

A "I find that it was obvious to the servants of both defendants that this open space was used by the public as a thoroughfare and by children as a playground and that the scaffold would be attractive and alluring to children, particularly to boys aged about fifteen and sixteen, as a place on which to climb and play, especially if so attractive and alluring a piece of equipment as a rope was left on it. In my opinion, the servants of both defendants should have realised that any reasonably active boy would be able to climb to the top of the scaffold and should have foreseen that, if the rope was left on the top, even though coiled up, it was probable that some boy or boys would climb up and detach the loose end and that others would pull on it and pull the scaffold over and cause injury to passers-by."

B Quite a few witnesses were asked questions on that. I think I am right in saying that every one of them said: "I should never have contemplated that for a moment." The foreman said: "If I had contemplated that, I would have taken the rope away." But the judge finds that the scaffolding is attractive and alluring to fifteen- and sixteen-year-olds, and he said it was probable that some boy or boys would climb up and detach the loose end of the rope and that others would pull on it and drag the scaffold over and cause injury to passers-by.

C I hope I am not unduly critical, but every witness asked about this said he had never heard of anything like it before. He had never heard of an accident of this kind, and there was no cross-examination as to that. It cannot, then, I think, be right for the judge to say that the defendants ought to have realised it was probable that some boy or boys would climb up and detach the loose end, and that others would pull on it and drag the scaffold over and cause injury to passers-by. Why should they have realised that, or thought of it, if such a thing had never been heard of before so far as one can find from the evidence? Of course, afterwards when one hears what went on that afternoon one may think of it as something boys might resort to, but I cannot accept that the defendants ought to have realised beforehand that a boy might climb up and that other boys would probably pull the whole thing down. I cannot agree with that finding.

D The next finding is (ibid., 167):

E "I find that the servants of the first defendants should have foreseen this probability as they knew that the scaffolding could be pulled over . . . I find that it should have been obvious to the workmen that, if they left this independent unattached scaffold unattended with a rope attached, even if coiled up at the top of the scaffold, it was probable that some boy would climb up and throw down the end of the rope and other boys pull on it, and that, if they did so, the scaffold would fall over in the absence of ties or struts to prevent that happening."

F The learned judge said that, there being no struts, there was liability on the defendants. I realise that the plaintiffs were in difficulty in the way of witnesses of expert character, but a case of this kind must be determined on the evidence given, and liability ought not to be put upon defendants unless it is shown that, in doing what they did, they failed to exercise the care which a reasonable person charged with their duties would exercise. This is not, as counsel for the plaintiffs said, the ordinary case of allurement of a young child, i.e., of a young child being tempted or enticed into a trap. It is not that case. The case depends on whether either of the defendants, or both, as they left the structure in the condition in which it was left at mid-day on Saturday, Jan. 8, ought to have foreseen a probability of some interference with their structure which might result in injury to passers-by. The judge found that they ought to have foreseen what happened. It is one stage to say that they ought to have foreseen that someone might go and drop the rope down, and that having done that someone might swing on the end of the rope. But far removed from that stage, I think, is the position which arose here, that eleven or twelve boys should be pulling on the rope in a direction which would tend to bring the whole structure away from the building, and that, while that was being done, others should swing on the rope between those boys and the structure itself so that, as a result of renewed pull, the dangling boys, a jerk, too, or it may be many jerks, there came a quiver and the whole thing went. If the defendants ought reasonably to have anticipated anything like that happening, then they are responsible in law, but on this evidence I do not see that they can be.

We were referred to Bolton v. Stone (1) the cricket ball case. LORD PORTER said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 1080):

"In the words of LORD THANKERTON ([1942] 2 All E.R. 399) in Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young (2) the duty is to exercise '... such reasonable care as will avoid the risk of injury to such persons as he can reasonably foresee might be injured by failure to exercise such reasonable care'. LORD MACMILLAN used words to the like effect (ibid., 403). So, also, LORD WRIGHT in Glasgow Corp'n. v. Muir (3) ([1943] 2 All E.R. 50) quoted the well-known words of LORD ATKIN in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (4) ([1932] A.C. 580): 'You must take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour' ", and LORD PORTER added ([1951] 1 All E.R. 1081):

"It is not enough that the event should be such as can reasonably be foreseen. The further result that injury is likely to follow must also be such as a reasonable man would contemplate before he can be convicted of actionable negligence. Nor is the remote possibility of injury occurring enough. There must be sufficient probability to lead a reasonable man to anticipate it. The existence of some risk is an ordinary incident of life, even when all due care has been, as it must be, taken."

LORD NORMAND said (ibid., 1082):

"It is, therefore, not enough for the respondent to say that the occupiers of the cricket ground could have foreseen the possibility that a ball might be hit out of the ground by a batsman and might injure people on the road. She must go further and say that they ought, as reasonable men, to have foreseen the probability of such an occurrence."

Applying those tests, it seems to me impossible, on the evidence given in this case, to say that the defendants ought to have foreseen the probability of anything such as that which happened on Sunday, Jan. 9, 1949. For these reasons I feel that these appeals must be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I think this order ought to be reversed primarily on the ground that, with all respect, the learned judge failed to assess properly the true quality of the evidence given. He ignored for the most part the evidence given for the defence by men of great experience, expert in the particular matter of scaffolding, and he relied on certain evidence which, I think, if truly appreciated, has not very much relevance to the issue to be determined. The learned judge found that the first defendants were liable in that the scaffolding was not properly constructed and was liable to fall. As an adjunct to that he said it was not properly strutted and that sole plates were not provided as they ought to have been. The second defendants, he said, should have realised that the scaffolding was unstable and insecure and liable to fall, though why they should have realised that after working for two and a half days without the slightest trouble I do not know. He said also they should have realised that, that being a place where children came and played, they would probably come and interfere with the scaffolding; that they negligently left a rope coiled some tremendous height from the ground; and (though it played no important part in this case) that they were negligent in not providing a watchman. As against both defendants he said they ought

A reasonably to have anticipated the events which in fact occurred when this scaffolding fell, i.e., three boys dangling in pendulum fashion on a single rope, after one had climbed to a perilous height and uncoiled it and thrown it down, and about twelve all tugging down the rope in a horizontal way.

- I say the evidence was not properly appreciated because the most singular fact in this case is that the expert called for the plaintiffs, Mr. Martin, when
- B he went into the witness-box laboured under the most serious disabilities. Counsel for the plaintiffs said that Mr. Martin had never seen the scaffolding and had no idea as to how this accident had been brought about, or as to how the scaffolding had been brought down by twelve boys tugging in a horizontal tug-of-war on the rope. All he knew had been gleaned from the police constable, who said only: "There was a time when I was on this site, and I saw
- C children playing with the rope, swinging on the rope pendulum fashion. I chased them away, and after I had gone, some little time afterwards, there was a fall. I came back, and there was the scaffolding which had fallen down." He had no idea that twelve boys of fifteen years of age had been doing this. I think Mr. Martin had in his mind the idea that this scaffolding had fallen because these children were swinging pendulum fashion on the rope. The expert for
- D the plaintiffs had to find some cause for a scaffolding of this kind falling, and he actually said the reason was the pulley at the top, which extended beyond the line of the scaffolding, and the rope which came through it. He said that in spite of the fact that expert scaffolding erectors had provided hundreds of these scaffoldings—indeed, hundreds of them in Liverpool—and there had never before been an accident of this kind in any place at any time. Counsel for
- E the plaintiffs asked him in what respects was it not suitable, and he said:

"By reason of the height in proportion to the width of the base and bearing in mind that a [pulley] wheel was employed . . . In my opinion, the scaffold should have been tied to the building or alternatively braced to withstand the overturning force created by the use of the pulley."

- That was Mr. Martin's case, viz., that the normal user of this scaffolding
- F was such that it was liable to overturn. All the evidence to the contrary was utterly ignored—the fact that hundreds had been erected in the city of Liverpool, and never before had there been an accident, never before had a scaffold been overturned. As I have said, all that evidence was quite ignored; and to speak plainly, the constable and the expert, Mr. Martin, had no idea of what had happened when they gave evidence.

- [HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence of Mr. Suckling, branch manager of the first defendants, who had said that a complete independent scaffold had been installed and that sole plates were unnecessary, and continued:] My Lord pointed out that this scaffolding had been worked on during the whole of Thursday, the whole of Friday and the whole of the Saturday morning. The pulley was working. The men were working, and there was no accident
- H of any kind. And my Lord also pointed out, what, I think, is highly significant, that this scaffolding was re-erected in precisely the same way without struts, without tying, and without buttresses.

Those matters seem to me to be of immense importance. Recalling the evidence that nothing like this had ever happened before, that the scaffolding was absolutely safe and stable, and that hundreds of similar scaffolds had been erected with no complaint of any kind, and the evidence of the city surveyor with thirty years' experience that: "Even in this city of Liverpool hundreds of them have I seen like this scaffolding of which no complaint could possibly be made", I think, with respect, that the learned judge was mistaken in assessing the evidence and that there was no real ground on which the findings recited by my Lord could be sustained.

The other point is this: Was it a reasonable thing to say to the defendants: "You should have anticipated this happening"? This is what the defendants were to anticipate—that a gang of boys would come on the waste land, that one of them would climb to the top without a ladder (which no workman, I gather from the evidence, would have done), uncoil the rope and throw it down to his ten or eleven companions, and then descend and join them whilst three of them hung on the rope in pendulum fashion, and then for the ten or whatever number it might be to pull in that horizontal way. All that was to be reasonably anticipated! For my own part, I think it is asking far too much of scaffold erectors or anyone else to anticipate that that extraordinary and unusual thing would take place. I could very well understand that children coming on to the site might play about with the uprights, but that one should foresee that they would indulge in this kind of thing seems to me to be asking of people far too much in the way of reasonable anticipation. I think, therefore, that the learned judge was wrong on the two main points in this case, the evidence on which the findings are based, and the reasonable foreseeability, or reasonable apprehension of events, and I agree with my Lord that these appeals ought to be allowed.

HODSON, L.J.: I also agree. This accident happened because some mischievous boys between the ages of twelve and sixteen pulled over a scaffold, and three smaller children who were on the spot were injured. The action is brought, not against the boys, but against the scaffolding company which built the scaffold, and against the builders who were using it. The learned judge has found as against the constructors of the scaffolding that it was not properly constructed and not sufficiently strutted, and against the builders who were using the scaffolding that they should have realised it was insufficiently secured, and against both defendants on the ground that it was reasonably foreseeable by either of them that such interference as took place here would probably occur.

Dealing with the last point first, it seems to me quite fantastic to say that the two defendants, the scaffolders or constructors, or the builders, should reasonably have foreseen that boys would not only climb up the scaffolding (a task which, I suppose, is not particularly difficult for an active young man), but should untie a rope which was coiled at the top thirty-five feet from the ground, let the rope down, and it being a long rope 150 feet long as against the thirty-five feet height of the scaffolding, should be able to get far enough away from the scaffolding to give a lateral pull on the rope strong enough to pull the scaffolding over. I am bound to say I find it quite impossible to hold that that is reasonably foreseeable within the language of Bolton v. Stone (1), and, in particular, of the passage in LORD NORMAND'S speech ([1951] 1 All E.R. 1082):

"It is, therefore, not enough for the respondent to say that the occupiers of the cricket ground could have foreseen the possibility that a ball might be hit out of the ground by a batsman and might injure people on the road. She must go further and say that they ought, as reasonable men, to have foreseen the probability of such an occurrence."

On the first question, whether there was evidence on which a judge could find that the scaffolding was insecure, I agree with my Lord. The matter was put by the plaintiffs in a variety of ways. Their counsel pointed out that one does not expect scaffolding to fall down, and the fact that it fell down forms an impressive part of the plaintiffs' case. But that part of his case really disappears when one learns that it fell down because it was pulled down by a lateral pull, and, as one of the witnesses put it, anything built by man will fall down if a sufficient lateral pull is exerted. As to the construction of the scaffolding itself, the first head of complaint was that it should have been tied to the wall. That head disappeared in the course of the trial. The learned judge found, and I agree with him, that he was unable to find himself satisfied that tying was requisite. Indeed, the city surveyor went round to the place to see that the scaffolding was not tied to the wall, because the wall was the gable end of an old building, and it would have been unsafe to tie the scaffold to it. It would have been useless for the purpose of supporting the scaffolding, because the middle parts would be pulled out or the wall itself might have come away. So that it was really conceded on all hands, and certainly accepted by the judge, that tying was not required.

- A [HIS LORDSHIP held that there was no evidence on which it could be found that sole plates should be provided and continued:] The third point made against the structure was that it should have been strutted, and, to my mind, that is the only point on which any evidence at all worthy of consideration was called on behalf of the plaintiffs, because Mr. Martin, the plaintiffs' expert, did claim that struts or, alternatively, buttresses, should have been used in the normal practice, at any rate, where tying was not feasible. But when one looks into the matter one sees, I think, the circumstances in which strutting is necessary. I have in mind reg. 12 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, which reads:

"Every scaffold shall be securely supported or suspended and shall where necessary be sufficiently and properly strutted or braced . . ."

- D Bracing does not come into the case, because it refers to transverse pieces which are in the structure, but it is clear from that regulation that there are circumstances in contemplation when strutting or buttressing (as the witness called it) is necessary. I think that matter is explained in the evidence of a Mr. Dranse, who was called on behalf of the defendants as a technical man:

- E "It has also been suggested that it might be strutted or buttressed; what have you to say with regard to strutting? A.—In this case it was not necessary. The work to which the scaffold was to be subjected did not call for strutting or anything of that nature. There are scaffolds which have to be buttressed where we have definite horizontal pulls to arrest. If we know that pull, we can design the buttress to withstand it.
- F This is an independent scaffold for plasterers, and as such it is not subjected to anything like that load."

- This scaffolding was used for workmen employed to plaster the wall, and it had only to carry the weight of the men and material, and to sustain the hauling up from the ground of loads of up to round about one hundredweight at a time, and no question of horizontal pull was involved at all. So this point really merges in the point of foreseeability, which I have already mentioned. There was no question of constructing a scaffolding to resist horizontal pressure at all. The scaffolding was required for vertical work and not for horizontal stress. No abnormal horizontal stresses were to be expected and, to my mind, when one considers the evidence there is nothing in the point that this scaffolding ought to have been buttressed. I agree, therefore, that the appeal of both defendants should be allowed.

Appeals allowed.

Solicitors: Jaques & Co., agents for Dodds, Ashcroft & Cook, Liverpool (for the first defendants); Berrymans, agents for Barrell & Co., Liverpool (for the second defendants); Mawby, Barrie & Letts, agents for Silverman & Livermore, Liverpool (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

ATLANTIC MARITIME CO., INC. v. GIBBON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), October 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 1953.]

Insurance—Marine insurance—Freight—Cover for loss caused through restraint, warlike operations, and civil war, etc.—Frustration clause if voyage or adventure lost through restraint of princes—Proximate cause of loss—Delay—Institute Time Clauses (Freight), cl. 8.

The assured, the owners of a Panamanian vessel, were insured under a Lloyd's marine policy from July 15 to Oct. 15, 1949, in respect of (inter alia) "freight and/or anticipated freight and/or chartered freight in the sum of $93,600". The policy contained, among others, the following clauses. " (1) This policy covers:—(a) the risks excluded from the standard form of English marine policy by the clause:—'Warranted free of capture, seizure, arrest, restraint or detainment and the consequences thereof or of any attempt thereat; also from the consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether there be declaration of war or not . . . Further warranted free from the consequences of civil war, revolution, rebellion, insurrection or civil strife arising therefrom . . . ' (b) loss (total or partial) of the subject-matter hereby insured caused by:—(i) hostilities, warlike operations, civil war, revolution, rebellion, insurrection or civil strife arising therefrom . . . Nevertheless this policy is warranted free of any claim based upon loss of, or frustration of, any voyage or adventure caused by arrests . . . or detainments of kings, princes, peoples, usurpers or persons attempting to usurp power. (2) Warranted free of loss proximately caused by delay". The policy incorporated the Institute Time Clauses (Freight), cl. 8 of which stated: "Warranted free from any claim consequent upon loss of time whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise".

By a charterparty dated July 16, 1949, it was agreed between the agents of the assured and charterers that the vessel should proceed to Taku Bar in North China to load a cargo of salt and thence to a port in Japan to deliver the cargo. At all material times Taku Bar was in territory under the control of Chinese communist forces who were engaged in civil war against the Nationalist Government of China. The vessel arrived at Taku Bar on Aug. 1, and at 10.30 a.m. on Aug. 8, while she was still awaiting instructions to load, a Chinese Nationalist destroyer arrived and an armed party boarded the vessel and forbade the master to communicate with the shore. At 4.30 p.m. a second destroyer arrived, and at 5.30 the master of the vessel was instructed by a message from that destroyer to leave the anchorage. A Chinese ship in the harbour was shelled and sunk, and at 7 p.m. the Atlantic Trader, with all the other vessels at Taku Bar, put to sea. When clear of Taku Bar the master sent a wireless report to agents of the assured and asked for orders. On the evening of Aug. 9 he was instructed by the assured to proceed to British Columbia to load a cargo of lumber. He complied with these instructions, and between Aug. 29 and Sept. 30, the vessel loaded a full cargo of lumber which she carried to ports on the Atlantic coast of the United States. On and after Aug. 10, other ships, chiefly liners, arrived at Taku Bar and loaded small quantities of cargo. In an action against the insurer for an indemnity under the policy it was contended on his behalf, first, that the proximate cause of the loss of the freight was the loss of the adventure within the frustration clause in the policy, and/or, secondly, the loss of freight was due to delay, which excluded the insurer's liability under the policy. It was contended on behalf of the assured that their claim was not based on the loss or frustration of, or delay in, the voyage or adventure, but on the perils insured.

HELD: to establish their claim the assured must, first, satisfy the court that the circumstances, as known at the time of abandoning the voyage, were, on reasonable assessment, such as to warrant the inference that performance of the voyage had become, for practical purposes, impossible by reason of a peril insured against: dicta of LORD DUNEDIN in Watts, Watts & Co., Ltd. v. Mitsui & Co., Ltd. ([1917] A.C. 238), and of LORD SUMNER in Bank Line, Ltd. v. Capel (Arthur) & Co. ([1919] A.C. 454), applied; (per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.) on the facts, the act of the master in leaving Taku Bar on the evening of Aug. 8, 1949, was under compulsion, and was an act which could be classified as being due to restraint of princes; but there was some doubt whether the peril was of such a nature as justified immediate abandonment of the adventure; assuming that the adventure was lost by reason of the interference of the Chinese Nationalist destroyers on Aug. 8, the real, efficient cause of the loss was the restraint of princes, which was covered by the frustration clause in the policy, and it was immaterial that the restraint was, also, an incident of a civil war (to which the warranty did not apply), as the civil war, per se, was not responsible for the loss, and, therefore, the insurer was relieved from liability: Cory v. Burr (1883) (8 App. Cas. 393), applied.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: On the facts, the assured had failed to show that the circumstances, as known on Aug. 8, were such as to warrant the inference that performance of the voyage had been rendered, for practical purposes, impossible by reason of the intervention of the Chinese Nationalist destroyers, and, therefore, their claim failed; assuming that the loss of the adventure was due to the intervention of the Nationalist destroyers, the peril giving rise to the loss was a restraint of princes, within the meaning of the frustration clause, which operated as a bar to the claim, and it made no difference that the restraint was imposed in the course of, or in consequence of, civil war: Cory v. Burr (supra), applied.

Per MORRIS, L.J.: The act of the master in leaving Taku Bar was under compulsion, and, on the facts, it was not wrong for the assured to decide that they would not be justified at that time, and for a reasonable time ahead, in attempting to defy the orders of the Chinese Nationalist officers, but, although the assured claimed that the loss was caused by civil war, the real cause was restraint of princes, and, therefore, the insurer was relieved from liability by the frustration clause, the purpose of which was to exclude liability otherwise arising under the policy: dicta of LORD SUMNER in Samuel (P.) & Co. v. Dumas ([1924] A.C. 467), applied.

Per curiam: it was doubtful whether, in the circumstances of the case, the insurer would be free from liability by reason of the time exceptions in the policy.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: "... in this case, it seems to me that the time element is relevant, not as a consequence of the mishap, but to ascertain correctly the nature and quality of the accident. If, because of the length of time which is likely to subsist during which the peril lasts, it is justifiable to say: 'This finally disposes of the bargain', then the freight is lost immediately on the happening of the insured peril and is attributable solely to that peril. The time element has only been essential in order to estimate correctly the extent of the peril, and, if, in point of fact, the peril ceased a week or two weeks afterwards, that fact would be quite immaterial, provided that the original decision was held, in the circumstances, to have been reasonably justified."

Bensaude v. Thames & Mersey Marine Insurance Co. ([1897] A.C. 609), and Russian Bank for Foreign Trade v. Excess Insurance Co. ([1918] 2 K.B. 123), discussed.

Observations by SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., and MORRIS, L.J., on the amount recoverable under the policy, if recovery had been possible.

Decision of SELLERS, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 893), affirmed on other grounds.

AS TO "WAR RISKS" CLAUSE IN LLOYD'S POLICIES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 18, pp. 314-319, paras. 439-443.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Rickards v. Forestal Land, Timber & Rys. Co., Robertson v. Middows, Ltd., Kahn v. Howard Bros. & Co., Ltd., [1940] 4 All E.R. 395; [1941] 1 K.B. 225; 110 L.J.K.B. 25; 164 L.T. 84; affd. H.L., [1941] 3 All E.R. 62; [1942] A.C. 50; 110 L.J.K.B. 593; 165 L.T. 257; 2nd Digest Supp. A
- (2) Watts, Watts & Co., Ltd. v. Mitsui & Co., Ltd., [1917] A.C. 227; 86 L.J.K.B. 873; 116 L.T. 353; 12 Digest, Replacement, 340, 2628. B
- (3) Atkinson v. Ritchie, (1809), 10 East 530; 103 E.R. 877; 41 Digest 464, 2955.
- (4) Geipel v. Smith, (1872), L.R. 7 Q.B. 404; 41 L.J.Q.B. 153; 26 L.T. 361; 41 Digest 411, 2558.
- (5) Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jenkins & Co., [1896] 2 Q.B. 326; 65 L.J.Q.B. 638; 75 L.T. 163; 41 Digest 521, 3501. C
- (6) Bank Line, Ltd. v. Capel (Arthur) & Co., [1919] A.C. 435; 88 L.J.K.B. 211; 120 L.T. 129; 41 Digest 366, 2136.
- (7) Millar (Andrew) & Co., Ltd. v. Taylor & Co., Ltd., [1916] 1 K.B. 402; 85 L.J.K.B. 346; 114 L.T. 216; 12 Digest, Replacement, 445, 3371.
- (8) Cory v. Burr, (1883), 8 App. Cas. 393; 52 L.J.Q.B. 657; 49 L.T. 78; 29 Digest 217, 1736. D
- (9) Carras v. London & Scottish Assurance Corp'n., Ltd., [1936] 1 K.B. 291; 105 L.J.K.B. 689; 154 L.T. 69; revsg. (1935) 52 Lloyd, L.R. 34; Digest Supp.
- (10) Russian Bank for Foreign Trade v. Excess Insurance Co., [1918] 2 K.B. 123; 87 L.J.K.B. 872; 118 L.T. 645; 29 Digest 219, 1750.
- (11) Bensaude v. Thames & Mersey Marine Insurance Co., [1897] A.C. 609; 66 L.J.Q.B. 666; 77 L.T. 282; 29 Digest 47, 93. E
- (12) Turnbull, Martin & Co. v. Hull Underwriters' Assocn., [1900] 2 Q.B. 402; 69 L.J.Q.B. 588; 82 L.T. 818; 29 Digest 211, 1690.
- (13) Roura & Forgas v. Townend, [1919] 1 K.B. 189; 88 L.J.K.B. 393; 120 L.T. 116; 29 Digest 273, 2214.
- (14) Robertson v. Petros M. Nomikos, Ltd., [1938] 3 All E.R. 249; [1938] 2 K.B. 603; 107 L.J.K.B. 504; 159 L.T. 130; affd. H.L., [1939] 2 All E.R. 723; [1939] A.C. 371; 108 L.J.K.B. 433; 160 L.T. 542; Digest Supp. F
- (15) Mercantile S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Tyser, (1881), 7 Q.B.D. 73; 29 Digest 209, 1683.
- (16) Joseph Constantine S.S. Line, Ltd. v. Imperial Smelting Corp'n., Ltd., [1941] 2 All E.R. 165; [1942] A.C. 154; 110 L.J.K.B. 433; 165 L.T. 27; 12 Digest, Replacement, 436, 3333. G
- (17) Samuel (P.) & Co. v. Dumas, [1924] A.C. 431; 93 L.J.K.B. 415; 130 L.T. 771; 29 Digest 112, 666.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of SELLERS, J., dated Mar. 16, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 893, in an action for indemnity under a policy of marine insurance. H

The plaintiffs were a shipowning company, incorporated under the laws of Panama, and the owner of a Panamanian ship called the Atlantic Trader. By a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance, dated Aug. 29, 1949, they were insured by the defendant and other underwriters for three months from July 15, 1949, in respect of (inter alia) freight in the ship against risks as contained in the "Institute War and Strikes Clauses. Freight—Time" (i.e., the risks excluded from the standard form of English marine policy by the "free of capture and seizure" clause). Among the risks covered by the policy were the consequences of civil war and loss of the subject-matter thereby insured caused by civil war. The policy was warranted free (a) of any claims based on loss or frustration of the adventure caused by restraints of princes, and (b) of loss approximately caused by delay, and, by the Institute Time Clauses (Freight), cl. 8, which was incorporated in the policy, it was warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time.

By a charterparty, dated July 16, 1949, between agents of the plaintiffs and charterers, it was agreed that the Atlantic Trader should proceed to Taku Bar, a port in North China, to load a cargo of salt for delivery in Japan. At all material times Taku Bar was in territory under the control of Chinese communist forces who were engaged in civil war against the Nationalist Government of China. On Aug. 1, 1949, the ship arrived at the port of Taku Bar, and on Aug. 8, while she was at anchor outside the bar awaiting instructions to load, two Chinese Nationalist destroyers arrived. Their officer forbade the master of the Atlantic Trader to communicate with the shore and, later, ordered him to leave the north Chinese ports as soon as possible. On the same day, the master received a wireless message from the charterers' agents to start loading on Aug. 13. In the evening, while the destroyers were firing at various targets, the Atlantic Trader sailed to sea, and, when clear of Taku Bar, the master sent a wireless report to the plaintiffs' agents and asked for orders. On the following evening he was instructed by the plaintiffs to proceed to British Columbia to load a cargo of lumber, and he complied with these instructions. Neither the master nor the plaintiffs made any inquiry as to the possibility of returning to Taku Bar to load under the charterparty. Between Aug. 29 and Sept. 30 the ship loaded a full cargo of lumber which she carried to ports on the Atlantic coast of the United States.

In a claim under the policy, the plaintiffs contended that there had been a total loss of freight by reason of one or more of the perils insured against. The defendant contended (i) that the loss, if any, was due, not to any of the perils covered by the policy, but to the voluntary acts of the master and the plaintiffs in abandoning the voyage contemplated by the charterparty of July 16, 1949; (ii) that, if the loss were otherwise covered by the policy, the underwriters were absolved (a) by the frustration clause, and (b) by the time clauses; and (iii) that, in any event, by reason of the second charter (viz., to load lumber in British Columbia) the plaintiffs had suffered no loss, or very little loss, and, therefore, if the underwriters were under any liability to them the sum claimed should be substantially reduced. SELLERS, J., held that the voyage was lost by reason of civil war and the restraint of princes, that the frustration clause did not apply in so far as the loss of freight was caused by civil war, but that the liability of the insurers was excluded by reason of the warranty "free of loss proximately caused by delay" and by cl. 8 of the Institute Times Clauses (Freight).

Mocatta, Q.C., and C. T. Bailhache for the plaintiffs.

Sir Robert Aske, Q.C., Eustace Roskill, Q.C., and Bateson for the defendant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This was an action by shipowners to recover for loss of freight on a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance. The freight alleged to have been lost was an amount of freight, approximately £12,000, payable in respect of a contract of affreightment whereby the plaintiffs' ship, the Atlantic Trader, was to load, at the port of Taku Bar in northern China, a cargo of salt and carry it to Moji in Japan. The defendant is one of the underwriters of the policy and has been selected in accordance with common practice for the purposes of the suit, the actual sum claimed to be due from him being £10 8s. 5d. There is no dispute, so far, as to the figures.

The defences to the action may be taken to be four in number. It is, first, denied that the plaintiffs have proved that their alleged loss of freight was due to any of the perils covered by the policy, apart from any of the exceptions contained in it. The second and third defences are to the effect that, if the loss were otherwise covered by the policy, the underwriters are absolved by one or other of the exceptions in the policy, particularly by what has been referred to as the frustration clause and certain time clauses. Lastly, it is said that on the facts of the case there was, in any event, no loss at all, or, at least, that the sum claimed should be substantially reduced, having regard to the fact that another freight was earned after the date of the alleged loss. The learned judge found for the defendant and dismissed the action with costs. He found in the plaintiffs' favour on the first of the defences which I have indicated, but held that the case fell within one of the exceptions to which I have alluded. He did not deal with the fourth defence, which has been referred to before us as the quantum point. I agree with the learned judge that this claim fails, though, as will appear, I prefer to base myself on a different exception, namely, the frustration clause, from that which appealed to the learned judge. For reasons which will also appear, I prefer to express no concluded view on the other exception clauses or on the quantum point, and it is right to say that we have not heard full argument on these matters.

The questions involved are all, except the last, questions solely of the construction of the particular policy with which we are concerned. The policy is in a form which is common in cases of this kind, i.e., it is based on what is called the standard form of Lloyd's policy, to which numerous slips, ten in all, have been added, so that little is left of the original foundation. I do not repeat the observations of MACKINNON, L.J. ([1940] 4 All E.R. 403) in the Court of Appeal in Rickards v. Forestal Land, Timber & Rys. Co. (1) in regard to this form of policy. I have no doubt that those engaged in this class of business find it convenient that their policies should take this form. But it cannot, I think, be denied that the effect produced is, in some degree, one of taking away with one hand what has been given with the other, and the task of the courts in construing the resultant documents is certainly rendered more difficult. The numerous cases to which we have been referred make it not easy to contend that those entering into this class of business well understand the meaning of the conventional accumulation of clauses which constitute the policy. It is, however, as I have said, in this case a question of the interpretation of this particular congeries of documents, and that interpretation must be made in the light of such cases as have established or illustrated the principles which have to be applied.

There was no oral evidence taken before the judge. An agreed statement of facts was produced, on the basis of which, together with one or two relatively unsubstantial additions, the whole matter was tried out. The relevant terms of the policy are set out in the agreed statement of facts, but it will be convenient that I should state them in this judgment. The contract of insurance is dated Aug. 29, 1949, and covers a period of ninety-two days from 8 a.m. of July 15 to 8 a.m. of Oct. 15, 1949. It was a policy for covering loss of the hull, machinery, etc., as well as of freight. We are, in this case, concerned only with freight and it is not, therefore, necessary to read the whole of the standard policy or the ten addenda thereto. The standard form of policy indicates its general nature by the following paragraph:

"Touching the adventures and perils which we the assurers are contented to bear and do take upon us in this voyage, they are, of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers . . . arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever."

There then follows in italics, in the standard form, what is called the "free of capture and seizure " warranty, but over that there has been impressed the word " Deleted ". The first of the addenda, which is lettered " A ", indicates (i) the period covered by the policy, and (ii) the " interest insured ", which consists of four items, the first being: " Hull, materials, machinery, boilers and everything connected therewith. Valued $624,000 ". The second, third, and fourth items have figures stated against them, but do not have against them the word " valued ". I, therefore, take it that the policy is what is called a valued policy only in respect of the first item, namely, " hull, materials, machinery ", etc., with which we are not in this case directly concerned. The third item of interest insured is: " Freight and/or anticipated freight and/or chartered freight, $93,600 ". The conditions are stated thus:

A This insurance is only to cover the risks as per Institute War and Strikes Clauses as attached. Including war protection and indemnity, etc., liabilities clauses as attached."

Then, after two paragraphs which I can pass over, is found this observation, " Subject to war cancellation clause as attached ", and, finally:

C " World wide trading, but warranted not in Black Sea, Baltic Sea (east of fifteen degrees east) or China ports (other than Hong Kong) . . . "

The last words which I have read are, however, modified by two other of the addenda, lettered " B " and " D ", which indicate that, in consideration of a small additional premium, the policy was to cover the case of the vessel making an in-and-out passage to Taku Bar, near Tientsin.

D I can now pass to the addendum lettered " G ", which is headed: " Institute War and Strikes Clauses. Freight—Time ". This addendum, which is printed, consists altogether of five numbered clauses of which cl. 1 contains at its end the frustration exception to which I have already referred. Clause 1 is as follows:

" This policy covers: (a) the risks excluded from the standard form of English marine policy by the clause . . . "

E and then there are set out the " free of capture and seizure " paragraphs, which appear in italics in the standard form underneath the word " Deleted ", and which are:

F " Warranted free of capture, seizure, arrest, restraint or detainment, and the consequences thereof or of any attempt thereat; also from the consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether there be declaration of war or not . . . Further warranted free from the consequences of civil war, revolution, rebellion, insurrection or civil strife arising therefrom . . . "

Clause 1 continues:

G " (b) loss (total or partial) of the subject-matter hereby insured caused by: (i) hostilities, warlike operations, civil war, revolution, rebellion, insurrection or civil strife arising therefrom (ii) mines, torpedoes, bombs, or other engines of war, but excluding loss or damage covered by the standard form of English marine policy with the free of capture etc., clause (as quoted in 2 (a)) inserted therein. (c) loss (total or partial) of the subject-matter hereby insured caused by: (i) strikers, locked-out workmen, or persons taking part in labour disturbances, riots or civil commotions (ii) persons acting maliciously."

H I have read all those paragraphs for reasons which will later appear. There then follows what has been referred to as the frustration clause:

" Nevertheless this policy is warranted free of any claim based upon loss of, or frustration of, any voyage or adventure caused by arrests, restraints or detentions of kings, princes, peoples, usurpers or persons attempting to usurp power."

Clause 2 contains one of the time exceptions to which I have referred: "Warranted free of loss proximately caused by delay . . ." Clause 4 is:

"The Institute Time Clauses (Freight) (except cl. 9, cl. 12 and cl. 14) are deemed to be incorporated in this policy, in so far as they do not conflict with the provisions of these clauses."

The "Institute Time Clauses (Freight)", anticipated by cl. 4 of addendum "G", appear in the next addendum. Only three of the clauses need be mentioned. Clause 6 relates to the obligations of the underwriters in the event of total loss, and reads:

"In the event of the total loss (actual or constructive) of the vessel named herein, the amount insured shall be paid in full, whether the vessel be fully or partly loaded or in ballast, chartered or unchartered . . ."

From that it seems to follow that, had the Atlantic Trader been wholly lost, then the obligation under the policy would have been to pay the full sum of $93,600, which is the sum stated as the amount of the cover in respect of the freight. Clause 7, which is relevant to the defence as to quantum, reads:

"Except in respect of a claim arising under cl. 6 [i.e., where there has been a total loss of the ship] the amount recoverable hereunder for any claim for loss of freight shall not exceed the gross freight actually lost."

Then comes the important clause, the second of the two time exceptions, which is, in common and well-recognised form, one which has appeared in some of the cases to which I must allude.

"8. Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise."

The remaining addenda need not be mentioned for the purposes of my judgment. It may be convenient that I should now draw attention to one or two matters in the policy. I have referred to the circumstance that, by virtue of addenda made to it, the policy covered risks incurred during the voyage to and from the port of Taku Bar. It is also to be noted that, so far as the freight is covered, it appears not to be a valued policy. The policy, however, covers a period of time of ninety-two days and during that time covers the assured against loss of freight, whether chartered, unchartered, or anticipated: i.e., this is not a policy covering loss of some freight under a particular contract of affreightment. It covers any loss of freight from an insured peril (subject, of course, to the exceptions) incurred during the period of ninety-two days which the policy covers.

The remaining relevant facts are likewise stated in the agreed statement of facts, but, again, it will, I think, be convenient that I should incorporate my references in my judgment. On the day following the start of the period of cover, namely, on July 16, 1949, the shipowners entered into a contract of affreightment, or charterparty, in regard to the voyage to and from Taku Bar. It is unnecessary to read any of the terms of the charterparty save one clause, but it was a contract whereby the Atlantic Trader was to go to the port of Taku Bar, load with a cargo of salt, and take it to a safe port in Japan, which, for the purposes of this case, has been taken to be Moji. One of the addenda added to this document consists of a printed piece of paper, in the margin of which appear the words "War Risks Clause". Paragraph 2 is:

"The ship shall have liberty to comply with any orders or directions as to departure . . . given by the government of the nation under whose flag the vessel sails or any department thereof, or by any other government or any department thereof or any person acting or purporting to act with the authority of such government or of any department thereof."

In this case the ship sailed under the Panamanian flag. The reason why I have read that particular paragraph will appear later. The Atlantic Trader arrived at or off the port of Taku Bar on Aug. 1, and she anchored outside the bar. Taku Bar is the port of Tientsin, an important city in northern China, which was at that time under the control of the communists and their forces. There was at that time, and had been for a considerable period, a civil war in progress in that part of the world between the communists and the so-called Nationalist Government of China, which was then the de jure government of China. The master of the ship, on his arrival, reported his presence and his readiness to load. He received his instructions to start loading after the first of the episodes to which I shall presently come, the instructions being that he should start on Aug. 13, some twelve days after his arrival. He remained, therefore, at anchor off the bar until the morning of Aug. 8, when the episodes referred to occurred. By that time there were near him in the anchorage three other Panamanian vessels and also a fourth vessel, understood to be a Chinese vessel and bearing the letter and number "K.264".

It is now convenient, in stating what occurred during the first episode, to read from the agreed statement of facts.

"Between 8 and 8.30 a.m. on Aug. 8, 1949, a destroyer arrived at the anchorage flying a Chinese flag, though at that time the master did not know whether it was the flag of the communist forces or of the Nationalist. At about 10.30 a.m. on the same day a Chinese officer and twelve men carrying revolvers and tommy guns approached the vessel in a small tug. The officer in charge asked for the master and on seeing him asked what he was doing at Taku Bar. The master replied that he was waiting to load cargo. The officer then asked if there were any communists on board and was told there were not. The officer went to the master's cabin with the master and chief officer and left two or three of his men outside the cabin door armed with tommy guns. He there asked the master a number of questions as to the vessel and her crew and told him that he was forbidden to communicate in any way with the shore whilst the vessel was at Taku Bar. The officer then said to the master: 'Leave the northern Chinese ports as soon as possible. If any damage happens the Nationalists won't take any responsibility'. He then left the vessel and went towards the other ships in the anchorage. . . . After the above conversation with the Chinese officer the master gave directions for [the Atlantic Trader] to be made ready to sail. Between 3.30 and 4 o'clock that afternoon the destroyer . . . shelled and sank the Chinese ship number K.264. As none of the other vessels moved away, the master continued to wait at the anchorage. Just after 4.30 p.m. another destroyer came in from the sea and at about 5.30 p.m. the master received the following message from that destroyer, which was transmitted in Morse to the ships in the anchorage: 'Messages to all Panama ships from Chinese navy. Good advice to you. Better leave here before 8 p.m. New activity will take place here even if you are close to port. Otherwise you are responsible'. Before 7 p.m. all the lighters and tugboats in or about the anchorage were collected into one spot by Chinese naval craft and there anchored. At 7 p.m. that evening the vessel together with the three other Panamanian ships already mentioned left the anchorage and sailed out to sea. At 8 p.m. when the vessel was about five miles off the Taku Bar lightship those on board saw flashes and heard explosions from gunfire coming from the direction of Taku Bar and some days later the wireless operator intercepted a message stating that another vessel had been sunk within the harbour at Taku Bar on the night of August 8/9. The only signs those on board the vessel saw at Taku Bar of cargo being available was the loading of salt from lighters on the San Fernando and the loading of other cargo on the Nowrooz [the San Fernando and the Nowrooz being two of the three other Panamanian ships]. The plaintiffs have no knowledge of the conditions on land which may or may not have prevented the shippers from bringing up the cargo for loading the vessel."

At this stage, I interpolate the further piece of evidence which was received by the learned judge but which is not part of the agreed statement of facts. It consists of a signal sent by the master of the Atlantic Trader, via San Francisco, to the owners or their agents, at 12 noon, Greenwich mean time, on Aug. 8. It says:

"Today at 11.30 an officer with twelve armed men from Nationalist warships boarded my ship. They asked for some information and they ordered me to abandon immediately the port and the north China coast. I remained to follow the developments of the situation for four other vessels at anchor near my ship. Between 15.30 and 16.00 one of the ships was fired on and sunk by the warship. At 17.30 we are ordered again to leave immediately otherwise they are not responsible for the consequences. All the ships weighed anchor whilst the warships are firing at various targets. I left at 19 o'clock and am proceeding slow waiting for your orders."

The nature of the answer to that telegram appears from the agreed statement, which goes on to say:

"During the night of Aug. 8/9 the master received an inquiry from the charterer's agents at Tientsin in the following terms: 'Please advise immediately whether you are expecting trouble regarding safety'. On Aug. 9 the master replied: 'Left Taku Bar 19.00 eighth'. At 8.30 p.m. on Aug. 9 the master received instructions from the plaintiffs' London agents to proceed to British Columbia to load a cargo of lumber after bunkering at Sasebo (Japan)."

This is the reply to the signal which I have read. The agreed statement goes on to state that the ship complied with these instructions, arriving, accordingly, at Pacific ports, so that between Aug. 29 and Sept. 30 she loaded a full and complete cargo of lumber which she carried to ports on the Atlantic coast.

The reason why those instructions were given is that on Aug. 9, 1949, the plaintiffs had entered into a second contract of affreightment, relating to the lumber to be carried from British Columbia to the Atlantic ports. I need not read the terms of that contract and only pause to state that it required the Atlantic Trader to proceed with all convenient speed to the Pacific ports. By para. 23 it was stated,

"Lay days not to commence before 9 a.m. Sept. 6, 1949, and if steamer is not in every respect ready to load by noon Sept. 14, 1949, charterers to have option of cancelling this charterparty."

The Atlantic Trader was able to arrive at the loading port before the cancelling date. The only other facts which may be mentioned are that the court was supplied with a table, extracted from the records of Lloyd's, of the movements of other vessels which were able to go to Taku Bar after the date of these episodes on Aug. 8, both in August and later, and there load cargo of various kinds. It is, however, right to state that none of these other vessels was a Panamanian vessel. All but four of them were vessels flying the flag of the United States, and all, or most of them, were not cargo vessels or tramp steamers, but liners calling to take up, among other things, relatively small amounts of cargo, the loading of which took only a short time.

On that statement of facts the first question which arises is, putting it as the learned judge put it: Did the master of the Atlantic Trader act voluntarily in leaving, as he did, the port of Taku Bar and sailing away eastwards or did he act under compulsion, i.e., as a result of restraint of princes, which was one of the insured perils? The learned judge answered that question in favour of the plaintiffs. He was of opinion that there was, on Aug. 8, as a consequence of, and illustrated by, the episodes related in the agreed statement of facts, a peril actually present which amounted to a restraint of princes or an episode in the civil war, such as justified the master or the plaintiffs in abandoning the first contract of affreightment. Those events caused the master, as the learned judge said, to treat the adventure comprehended in the charter-party as lost, and the learned judge thought that he was justified in abandoning that contract and that freight then and there. That the learned judge so stated his conclusion is apparent from a passage in his judgment where he said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 901):

“It was because the cargo could not be loaded and the contractual voyage could not be performed within any foreseeable or assessable period of time that the master abandoned the contract and sailed away and the owners entered into a new engagement for the services of the ship.”

With all respect, I think that statement is not quite accurate, and counsel for the plaintiffs so conceded. In light of the signal sent by the master on Aug. 8 and the reply instructing him to proceed to the British Columbian ports, it is, I think, not accurate to say that he had abandoned the contract for good and all when he sailed away from Taku Bar that evening. He sailed away and proceeded at slow speed awaiting orders, and the actual abandonment was determined on by the plaintiffs on the following day, Aug. 9.

So far as the law applicable to this aspect of the case is concerned, there has, I think, been no question in this court that it was rightly stated by the learned judge in the course of his judgment. Without taking undue time on it, I will refer to a passage from LORD DUNEDIN's speech in Watts, Watts & Co., Ltd. v. Mitsui & Co., Ltd. (2), which SELLERS, J., cited. In that case the restraint of princes was an exception to the policy, and the quotation must, of course, be read accordingly, but that is not material to the present matter. LORD DUNEDIN said ([1917] A.C. 238):

“Restraint of princes, to fall within the words of the exception, must be an existing fact and not a mere apprehension. This was held long ago by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Atkinson v. Ritchie (3). The more recent cases cited by the appellants, such as Geipel v. Smith (4) and Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jenkins & Co. (5), do not in any way touch that proposition. They only show that it may be possible to invoke the exception when a reasonable man in face of an existing restraint may consider that the restraint, though it does not affect him at the moment, will do so if he continue the adventure. It would be useless to try to fix by definition the precise imminence of peril which would make the restraint a present fact as contrasted with a future fear. The circumstances in each particular case must be considered.”

As regards subsequent events SELLERS, J., referred to what was said by LORD SUMNER ([1919] A.C. 454) in Bank Line, Ltd. v. Arthur Capel & Co. (6):

“What happens afterwards may assist in showing what the probabilities really were, if they had been reasonably forecasted . . .”

We were also referred to a passage in SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR's LEGAL EFFECTS OF WAR, 3rd ed., p. 165, which, in my judgment, correctly states the problem which is posed in these cases, and I respectfully adopt it as part of my judgment.

“It is submitted that the test can be stated as follows: Would a reasonable man in the position of the party alleging frustration, after taking all reasonable steps to ascertain the facts then available, and without snapping at the opportunity of extricating himself from the contract, come to the conclusion that the interruption was of such a character and was likely to last so long that the subsequent performance or further performance of the contract would really amount to the performance of a new contract ? ”

I would like to make one further citation from the judgment of SELLERS, J. After stating that, no doubt, the Atlantic Trader was not infringing any rule of law but was a neutral vessel, he said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 898):

“ It was in the interest of both the owners and the insurers that the vessel should not be unduly hazarded to a loss by gunfire or arrest, and the master would have been blamed for reckless disregard of the safety of his ship if he had become a casualty in either of these ways after the two warnings which had been given and in the conditions which he had himself observed during the day.”

Before leaving the cases on this aspect of the matter, I should make reference to Andrew Millar & Co., Ltd. v. Taylor & Co., Ltd. (7), decided in this court. The plaintiffs in that case were manufacturers of confectionery. At the outbreak of the first world war, the English government imposed an embargo on the export of confectionery, and the plaintiffs, treating the embargo as likely to be of indefinite duration, claimed that they were justified in repudiating a contract to supply the defendants with confectionery for export. The court, however, held that the owner had acted with undue precipitation, and that the nature of the embargo was such that it was not, in the circumstances, likely to last indefinitely or for a long time. The court was, no doubt, assisted to that conclusion by the circumstance that it was, in fact, lifted shortly after it had been imposed. It was contended by counsel for the plaintiffs in the present case that the Millar case (7) should be regarded as special, and he indicated reasons for saying that it had not been generally regarded with favour. It is, of course, an authority binding on this court, but I think that the only conclusion that one can draw from that and other cases is that stated in the last sentence which I read from LORD DUNEDIN’s speech ([1917] A.C. 238) in Watts, Watts & Co., Ltd. v. Mitsui & Co., Ltd. (2), namely, that one must pay regard in each case to the particular circumstances. There may be circumstances in which the nature of the embargo is such that a reasonable man ought not to regard it as likely to be of long or indefinite duration. But, plainly, it is equally true that a case such as Andrew Millar & Co., Ltd. v. Taylor & Co., Ltd. (7) cannot be regarded as an authority which would compel the master of a ship to wait at sea for a long period of time (highly inconvenient in ordinary business relations), when the nature of the restraint or arrest was such that a reasonable man, according to common-sense standards, would and should take it as concluding any possibility then and there of further performance of the contract of affreightment. Again, I gratefully refer to a passage in SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR’S LEGAL EFFECTS OF WAR, 3rd ed., p. 163, where, after mentioning the Andrew Millar case (7) and what he calls the “ rule ” that emerges from it, the learned author says:

“ This rule does not touch the case where the operative cause is so conclusive as to discharge the contract at once, for in such a case it would be unreasonable to demand delay.”

In the present case, I for my part have no doubt at all that the action of the master of the Atlantic Trader in moving out of the harbourage at Taku Bar at 7 p.m. on Aug. 8, 1949, was an act of his, not voluntary, but under compulsion: i.e., it was an act which could be classified as being due to restraint of princes.

That, however, is not necessarily the conclusion of this part of the case, for the question is: Have the plaintiffs in the action proved that the peril was such—that the circumstances were such—on Aug. 8 or 9, 1949 (or on both of those days) as justified the master, as a reasonable man, or the plaintiffs, as reasonable men, in concluding that the adventure, viz., the Taku Bar salt contract of affreightment, was lost then and there ? In other words, was the master, or were the plaintiffs, justified in making no further attempt (as they did not) and no further inquiry after the evening of Aug. 8 with a view to seeing if that contract of affreightment could still be achieved? In answering or attempting to answer that question, it is necessary to bear in mind certain obvious facts: (i) that the date, Aug. 13, when loading was to begin was still some way ahead; (ii) that the civil war in that part of China had been going on for some considerable time and during that period of time ships like the

- A Atlantic Trader had been trading regularly in this part of the world. What was novel in the situation, so far as the evidence shows, was the arrival in the harbourage of the two Chinese Nationalist destroyers. The later facts, viz., the circumstance that other ships were thereafter able to go in and load cargo (though relatively small quantities), is relevant, as LORD SUMNER said ([1919] A.C. 454) in the Bank Line case (6), only as showing what the real possibilities, correctly forecasted, were on Aug. 8 and 9. How should a man in the master's position then have judged the situation? I have already said (and it has been for me somewhat of a difficulty on this part of the case) that the learned judge seems to have thought that the master, on the evening of Aug. 8, regarded the situation as so tense and threatening and the peril as so actual that he then and there abandoned the contract. The fact is, as I have said, somewhat different.

- Perhaps, unfortunately in a case of this kind, no evidence was taken or heard from the master which would throw further light on his appreciation of the situation and would enable the court to judge whether that appreciation was the appreciation of a reasonable man. The question is one of inference from the facts as I have stated them, comprehended in the agreed statement together
- D with the cable. Do they favour the view that there was here a peril of such a nature as justified immediate abandonment? Counsel for the plaintiffs tabulated certain matters for our consideration: (i) the fact that the master, at the least, was justified on the evening of Aug. 8, in moving out of the immediate neighbourhood; (ii) the fact that the Panamanian ships (and the second message was addressed to them, for by that time they were, apart from the destroyers, the only ships remaining there) were told, not merely to go from Taku Bar, but to leave all the northern Chinese ports; and (iii) the fact that the other three Panamanian ships went with the Atlantic Trader and that, so far as the evidence shows, none of them ever returned. Further, there is the point that (so far as the evidence goes) no complaint was ever made by the charterers of the conduct of the Atlantic Trader in declining to attempt any
- F further performance of the charterparty. As regards that matter, however, it is noteworthy that the charterparty contained the clause giving to the ship (on the face of it) liberty to comply with any orders as to departure given by any department of any government, and it may be that for that reason the charterers could not have complained because the master of the Atlantic Trader obeyed what purported to be an order given by an officer on behalf
- G of the Nationalist Government of China. Counsel for the plaintiffs then asked: What would have happened to the Atlantic Trader if she had been observed by the Chinese warships hanging about outside the harbour of Taku Bar, either disregarding or attempting to disregard their orders against communication with the shore? Those are, and would provide for anyone in the position of the master, somewhat formidable considerations favouring an immediate and final
- H departure from the scene of turbulence. There are, however, other considerations which seem to me to weigh somewhat in the other direction. The civil war had been going on for some time, and trading in those ports had not, apparently, been much interfered with by reason of it. Five days still remained before loading was to begin. There is also the circumstance that anyone well acquainted with the sea would wonder how long two destroyers could remain at sea in the absence of any tanker or other vessel capable of supplying them. Last, and, perhaps, most important of all, it is necessary, I think, clearly to have in mind the nature of the threat or minatory advice given by the Chinese officer and men. There was no suggestion, so far as I can see, that the Nationalist ships were forbidding the Panamanian ships to load cargo which was not material of war or were threatening any harm directly to those ships. Put quite broadly, what I understand the Chinese warships were saying was this: "There is going to be trouble in this water and if you are still present you may get hurt. If you do, we cannot help it." It is not, after all, an uncommon state of affairs. One can well imagine on land a situation in which a party of men about to make some sort of raid on a rival party might say to innocent third persons: "You had better get out of the way. There is going to be trouble," and if you remain here we cannot be responsible if something happens to hit you."

Bearing, then, all these considerations in mind, I confess that I feel some doubt whether, on this major premise of the whole case, the plaintiffs have proved their claim. The matter is, obviously, difficult and I acknowledge the experience in these matters of the learned judge who tried the case and expressed the contrary view. In those circumstances, I do not propose to express, and do not think it necessary that I should express, any final view on this matter. If the adventure was lost, whether strictly the contract of affreightment was frustrated, by which I mean "frustrated" according to our law of contract—if the view taken by the master and the plaintiffs was justified, then the circumstances were such as had the equivalent effect and the adventure was lost—then the freight it would earn would have been lost also. But, in my judgment, as I have earlier indicated, if the adventure was so lost, and was lost by reason of this interference by the warships, then I have come to the conclusion that the underwriters are absolved from liability by the frustration clause in the policy:

"Nevertheless this policy is warranted free of any claim based upon loss . . . any voyage or adventure caused by . . . restraints . . . of . . . princes . . ."

I think that, according to the plain sense of the language and the plain sense of the facts, it was on this hypothesis so lost, and that the case falls within, and exactly within, the ordinary meaning of that paragraph. On this matter, however, the learned judge took a different view. He says that the adventure was lost (and he put it alternatively) either as a result of civil war or as a result of restraint of princes or as a result of hostile operations. He said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 898):

"I find that the Atlantic Trader left Taku Bar on the evening of Aug. 8, 1949, because of the civil war which was taking place there, because of the restraint placed on her by the Chinese government forces who restrained her master from communicating with the shore and from remaining in the harbour and because of warlike operations."

The learned judge having stated the matter thus and invoked all three of those reasons, counsel for the plaintiffs, accordingly, says: "I can now base my claim against the underwriters exclusively on the civil war as the reason for the loss, and so bring myself outside the terms of the frustration clause which, though mentioning 'restraints of princes', etc., does not in terms refer to civil war." Alternatively, as I understand him, counsel for the plaintiffs contended that, reading it with the rest of the policy or of the particular addendum of which it forms part, the frustration clause must be taken to liberate the underwriters from liability for loss caused by restraint of princes, provided that the restraint of princes is not itself an incident of civil war—an argument, of course, which must carry counsel for the plaintiffs this further distance, that the restraint of princes must be a restraint unconnected with any of the other matters specifically set out in addendum "G", viz., hostilities, warlike operations, mines, torpedoes, etc. I am bound to say that, if the latter contention is right, it seems to me to give to the frustration clause a wholly artificial and unnatural restriction in meaning. My own view is that, on the facts and on the assumption which I have made in the plaintiffs' favour, the real, efficient or (if you will) "proximate" cause of the loss was the restraint of princes. It is true that the restraint arose out of, was an incident of, a civil war, but the civil war per se (which had, as I have said many times, gone on a long time) was not responsible for the loss. To establish the claim and to state its nature with sufficient particularity, it seems to me that the plaintiffs were bound to allege and to rely on the particular circumstances narrated in the agreed statement of facts, which, though an incident of the civil war, constituted a restraint of princes. In the course of the argument, I put an example to counsel for the plaintiffs of this character. Let it be supposed that an owner is insured against loss from warlike operations generally, and that there is then an exception "warranted free from any loss caused by torpedoes". Counsel for the plaintiffs conceded (and I think he had to concede on his argument) that, if his ship was sunk by a torpedo fired in the course of the warlike operation, he could still base his claim on warlike operations and ignore the torpedo exception, or, alternatively, could contend that the exception as to torpedoes related only to torpedoes fired otherwise than in the course of warlike operations, i.e., during the course of peace-time practice or by accident.

If, then, I am right in saying that the real, efficient cause of this loss was the restraint of princes, I have already said that it seems to me clearly, as a matter of language, covered by the frustration exception. It is to be noted, as counsel for the defendant pointed out, that the exception is limited in this way. It is applicable, on the face of it, only to cases where the claim is based on loss or frustration of a voyage or adventure, which I take to be in distinction from those cases where the vessel or the cargo is itself lost. However that may be, if I am right so far, it seems to me inevitable that this case is covered by the reasoning of the House of Lords in Cory v. Burr (8). The facts of that case, shortly, were these. The master of a ship having committed an act of barratry, the ship was, in consequence, arrested by the Spanish revenue authorities. The policy covered acts of barratry by the master, but contained an exception, a frustration clause substantially the same as that with which we are concerned. The House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, held (and held quite clearly because they did not find it necessary to call on the respondent) that, though in a sense everything flowed from the act of barratry, and, as LORD BLACKBURN pointed out (8 App. Cas. 399), a case might have been made based in origin on the barratry, on a proper analysis of the matter the true cause of the loss, the efficient cause, or, to use the expression which is found in the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 55, the proximate cause, was the seizure, and it was impossible for the plaintiffs to make good their claim unless they pleaded and alleged the seizure. Put another way, the barratry itself, though it started the train of events which ended in the loss, did not necessarily involve the loss, because non constat that any action of restraint would be taken by those entitled to take it. Counsel for the plaintiffs, who analysed the speeches of the noble Lords in that case, said that it established only that in that case seizure was the proximate cause, so that it did not stand in his way if he could, apart from the restraint of princes, base his claim—as, he said, the judge by his judgment found that he was entitled to do—on civil war without reference to the restraint. But it seems to me that on the facts of this case it is inescapable that the real, efficient cause of this loss was the restraint of princes, and not the civil war.

I do not propose to take time in going through the speeches in Cory v. Burr (8) again, but I cannot accept the view that their reasoning involved the proposition that the barratry could be disregarded altogether. It seems to me that, to take one instance, the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., clearly in his opinion negatives such a conclusion. He said (8 App. Cas. 397):

"But then it is contended that, though there was a capture or seizure, and though the capture or seizure only caused the loss, and there would have been no loss without the capture or seizure, yet that if a claim might be made upon the footing of barratry, then the warranty does not apply. I confess I have never seen how such a construction could be put upon the policy and the warranty, taken together, without leading to consequences altogether destructive of the whole operation of the warranty. Suppose the case of a belligerent capture: that belligerent capture is as much attributable to 'men-of-war', or to 'enemies', to 'taking at sea', as any seizure by reason of barratry can be attributed to barratry—indeed more directly and immediately. Men-of-war and enemies might or might not have taken the ship, but their coming into contact with the ship, their firing at her, their placing her in a position of jeopardy, is the first step towards 'capture or seizure' which is its consequence. Then the argument, if it is sound as to barratry, would seem to be sound as to 'men-of-war' and 'enemies' also, that because there is an express insurance against those things, therefore a 'capture or seizure', and consequently an attack by 'men-of-war' or by 'enemies', is to be taken out of the warranty."

I do not propose to read the rest of the speech, though counsel for the plaintiffs relied particularly on the last sentence (ibid.):

"That appears to me to be equally the case whether remotely it was occasioned by barratry or not . . ."

LORD SELBORNE, L.C., is, as I understand it, stating that to say that seizure was the real cause of the loss is not to deny responsibility in the barratry. So here, putting it the other way round, though it is true that all that followed arose from the civil war, the civil war alone, or the mere allegation of the civil war, could not suffice to make good the claim. The plaintiffs must allege those further acts which, being restraints of princes, are, to my mind, clearly within the plain language of the frustration warranty. Counsel for the plaintiffs further contended, however, that the view for which he argued, viz., that he could base his case exclusively on the civil war risk and disregard the restraint of princes, was supported by the way in which Carras v. London & Scottish Assurance Corpn., Ltd. (9) went in this court. In my judgment, the Carras case (9) is essentially different from the present. In that case the ship, owing to a peril of the sea, stranded in the Straits of Magellan, the damage done to her being such that it was impossible to save her save by an expenditure of money which would exceed in amount the actual value of the ship when repaired. In the circumstances the ship was abandoned to the hull underwriters and eventually passed to the salvors. The freight to be earned by the voyage on which she was then engaged was lost. It was said that, in so far as that loss of the venture was attributable to the delay, i.e., the loss of time which followed the disaster before the ship was finally repaired (as it eventually was), the shipowners' claim against the underwriters would be barred by the time clause in the policy, but, through their counsel, Sir Robert Aske, they said, in effect: "We are not claiming that we lost this voyage through any delay. The time had nothing to do with it. What (we say) lost us the freight was the circumstance that commercially it was uneconomic to repair the vessel. That is how we base our claim. There was here only one peril, the sea peril, which caused the disaster, and we can and do base our case on that peril without any reference to loss of time." That, the court held, they were entitled to do. The case is, therefore, I think, wholly distinct from the present, where the question may be put in one of two ways: first, are there here two perils, and, if so, can the plaintiffs choose between one and the other ?, to which the answer, as I have already indicated, is: "No, both must be proved, or, at least, the peril of the restraint". Alternatively (though this is, perhaps, putting the same point in another way), it is not possible for the plaintiffs to put their case save by alleging and proving the particular restraint, which is covered, as I think, by the frustration clause.

- A That being the conclusion at which I have arrived, it is, of course, the end of this appeal, but, as I have already indicated, SELLERS, J., preferred to base his rejection of the plaintiffs' claim on the time clauses and to say that the underwriters were absolved by their operation. So saying, he dealt somewhat briefly with the point which I have thought the most significant and on which I have preferred to base my own judgment, though he clearly indicated that
- B on that point he was, contrary to my opinion, in the plaintiffs' favour. I have already said that the problem to which the time exceptions give rise has not been fully argued before us, but the clauses seem to me, I confess, to raise points of great difficulty, and, having regard to the view which SELLERS, J., expressed and to the argument which we have heard, I think it right that I should make some observations on them. There are here two clauses, but
- C for present purposes (though I am not to be taken as denying possible distinctions between them) I will confine myself to para. 8 of the "Institute Time Clauses (Freight)", which reads:

"Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise."

- D If the matter were wholly free from authority, I confess at once that I should think this time clause had, in the present circumstances, nothing to do with the case, and that, I apprehend, was the view of BAILHACHE, J., when he came to consider a similar situation in Russian Bank for Foreign Trade v. Excess Insurance Co. (10). But the question now is whether, particularly having regard to the decision which BAILHACHE, J., eventually reached in that case, the authorities, as they now stand, do not inevitably produce the result that
- E on this ground also the plaintiffs fail, and, since it was obviously not possible for SELLERS, J., to attempt to overrule the view expressed by BAILHACHE, J., it is, perhaps, natural that he should have based his conclusion on the time clauses. It is open to this court, if it thought right, to express disapproval of the decision in the Russian Bank case (10).

- The cases are not numerous and begin with the decision of the House of Lords in
- F Bensaude v. Thames & Mersey Marine Insurance Co. (11). In that case, the ship was engaged to convey Portuguese troops and arms to a destination. Through a peril of the sea, she broke her shaft. The damage took so long a time to repair that the Portuguese charterers cancelled the charter, as they were entitled to do by Portuguese law, and, therefore, the freight was lost. It was contended that, since the breaking of the shaft was due to an insured
- G peril, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. The answer was: No, the loss was due essentially, not to the breaking of the shaft, but to the delay which followed the breaking, as a result of which, by Portuguese law, the charterers were entitled to be released from their contract. I think it useful to refer to the first two sentences of the argument on behalf of the appellants, the ship-owners, which, to my mind, make clear the real point of the decision.

- H "The appellants lost their claim for freight owing to the breaking of the shaft, that is owing to the perils of the sea."

So far, that is right if by it is meant that all that was material followed, or flowed, from the breaking of the shaft. Then the second sentence is:

"The claim is consequent, not upon the loss of time, but upon the disabling of the vessel by perils of the sea, and arose at once before any loss of time had taken place."

It was that part of the argument which the House rejected, observing that the loss did not arise at once on the happening of the accident, but it arose only on and as a consequence of the delay which the break occasioned. As LORD HALSBURY, L.C., put it ([1897] A.C. 611):

"The reason why there was a loss of freight was that the repairs would have taken so long a time as would have defeated the adventure."

Or, as put in the passage most often quoted, from LORD HERSCHELL's speech (ibid., 613):

"The whole basis of the claim of course must be the loss of the subject-matter insured—that is, the freight. That loss must arise from one of the perils insured against. What is the meaning of saying that the underwriter is not to be liable for any claim consequent upon loss of time? It must mean that although the subject-matter insured has been lost, and although it has been lost by a peril insured against, if the claim depends on loss of time in the prosecution of the voyage so that [which I read as meaning "in the sense that"] the adventure cannot be completed within the time contemplated, then the underwriter is to be exempt from liability."

Turnbull, Martin & Co. v. Hull Underwriters' Asscn. (12) was, in essentials, similar. There a fire (which was an insured peril) occurred and damaged the refrigerating plant in a ship, which was engaged to carry meat from an Australian port, and, as a result, the contract was lost. The reason why it was lost was that the repair of the refrigerating machinery took so long a time that, putting it broadly, the meat could not wait, but would have to go in another ship. Then comes the Russian Bank case (10) to which I have already alluded. In that case a ship was engaged to sail from Novorossisk in the Black Sea to Falmouth. While she was at Novorossisk the Turkish State entered the first world war against this country and Russia, and the Dardanelles, the exit from the Black Sea, was, accordingly, closed. Having regard to the nature of those circumstances, viz., the consequences of a declaration of war, it followed that the closure was of so long a time or of so indefinite a duration that the restraint which the declaration of war involved was treated as being conclusive, finally making impossible then and there the sailing of the ship to Falmouth. That being the case, BAILHACHE, J., said ([1918] 2 K.B. 127):

"The defendants [the underwriters] have two answers to this. First, they refer to the written clause in the policy reading 'Excluding all claims due to delay', and they say the claim based upon the closing of the Dardanelles is a claim due to delay. I must deal with this answer a little closely, because I confess that I thought during the argument there was very little in the point. I have since read the decision of the House of Lords in Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Insurance Co. (11) two or three times, and I am now satisfied that the point is one that deserves very careful consideration."

The learned judge then referred to the exact terms of the policy and to the facts of the Bensaude case (11), and he continued (ibid., 128):

"I confess I cannot distinguish the two cases. In the Bensaude case (11) there was a peril insured against, namely, of the sea—the propeller shaft broke. Here there was a peril insured against, namely, restraint of princes—the Dardanelles were closed. In the Bensaude case (11) the broken propeller shaft necessitated such delay in the prosecution of the voyage that the adventure was frustrated. Here the restraint of princes did the same thing. In both cases it was delay due to a peril insured against, which caused in one case the total loss of the freight, and in the other the constructive total loss of the cargo. The fact that the subject-matter insured was in the one case freight and in the other case barley seems to me immaterial."

BAILHACHE, J., was, therefore, saying that in principle the two cases are indistinguishable: the logic of the Bensaude case (11) governed the Russian Bank case (10).

Before I make my own observations, it is, perhaps, convenient to mention the other relevant cases. In Roura & Fourgas v. Townend (13) the ship, which was carrying a cargo of coal, was seized by the Germans, and its subsequent fate was that it stranded on the coast of Denmark and was abandoned. It was thereafter recovered, but in the circumstances the judge held that the ship must be treated constructively as a total loss, and for that reason he distinguished the case from the Russian Bank case (10). I hope I am saying nothing that I should not say if I add that I read the passage at the end of the judgment of ROCHE, J., as indicating some doubt in his mind of his acceptance of the reasoning of BAILHACHE, J. ROCHE, J., said ([1919] 1 K.B. 196):

"There remains the defence based upon the fact that claims arising from delay were excluded by the express terms of the policy. It was said that it was the lapse of the time during which the Igotz Mendi was in German hands that caused the loss, and that such lapse of time was delay within the meaning of the exception. The reasoning of BAILHACHE, J., in Russian Bank for Foreign Trade v. Excess Insurance Co. (10) was relied upon in support of this part of the defendants' case. The decision of BAILHACHE, J., in that case has, I understand, been affirmed by the Court of Appeal on a ground having no bearing on the present case. I understand that the Court of Appeal did not consider, or at any rate express any opinion, as to whether they adhered to the view of BAILHACHE, J., upon this point of the delay clause. It is certainly, therefore, undesirable and, in my view, also unnecessary that I should express any opinion on that matter."

In the case before ROCHE, J., the ship was treated as totally lost.

Robertson v. Petros M. Nomikos, Ltd. (14), a later decision of the House of Lords, was, again, a case of total loss. In that case two of the noble Lords expressed some doubt as to the scope of the Bensaude decision (11) and, as I take it, the validity of the application of that decision by BAILHACHE, J., for LORD ATKIN said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 724):

"I wish, however, to reserve the question whether the claim in this case was in any view consequent on loss of time. The question appears to me to be in every case a question of fact, and the authorities should be treated from that point of view. It may prove that the words 'consequent on loss of time' have received too wide a construction in some of the cases, and I only desire to register a caution that it must not be assumed from the decision in this case that the loss of freight in question was in fact in consequence of loss of time."

LORD THANKERTON associated himself (ibid.) with LORD ATKIN's caution. On the other hand, no doubt, treating the Russian Bank case (10) as a good authority and, in part, relying on that authority, PORTER, J., in the Carras case (9), was able to make this formulation (52 Lloyd, L.R. 39):

"What, then, constitutes a total loss or constructive total loss of freight ?

It may, in my view, be due to three causes: (1) loss of ship, total loss or constructive total loss; (2) loss of cargo, total loss or constructive total loss; and (3) loss of the adventure. Loss of the adventure, however, is a claim consequent on loss of time and is, by cl. 7 of the Institute Clauses, irrecoverable . . ."

In terms the Russian Bank case (10) is not, in fact, there mentioned.

I do not think that there is any real, sound, or justifiable basis for distinguishing, on the facts, the present case from the Russian Bank case (10). It seems to me that to attempt such a distinction would be to introduce into a subject already complex enough fine distinctions which would only add to confusion and doubt. On the other hand, to my mind, there are formidable arguments advanced by counsel for the plaintiffs for saying that, in principle and logic, the Russian Bank case (10) is essentially different from the Bensaude case (11), and for this reason. In the Bensaude case (11) and cases of that kind, the peril—the accident, if you will—is complete and distinct from the period of time which thereupon ensues. These are cases, observe, in which the ship or the cargo is physically damaged. The shaft is broken. That, of itself, does not give rise to any claim, since it may be capable of being repaired the next morning, but it is then followed by a definite, ascertained loss of time, and it is that loss of time, distinct from, though consequent on, the accident itself, which gives rise to the loss of the bargain. In a case such as the Russian Bank case (10), and in this case, it seems to me that the time element is relevant, not as a consequence of the mishap, but to ascertain correctly the nature and quality of the accident. If, because of the length of time which is likely to subsist during which the peril lasts, it is justifiable to say: “This finally disposes of the bargain”, then the freight is lost immediately on the happening of the insured peril and is attributable solely to that peril. The time element has only been essential in order to estimate correctly the extent of the peril, and, if, in point of fact, the peril ceased a week or two weeks afterwards, that fact would be quite immaterial, provided that the original decision was held, in the circumstances, to have been reasonably justified. That seems to me a real and sensible, even if it be thought to be a fine, distinction between the two classes of case. In the Robertson case (14), in the Court of Appeal, MACKINNON, L.J., used language which seems to me to be characteristically happy. In reference to the time clause he said ([1938] 3 All E.R. 258):

“It will bar any claim whenever it is necessary for the assured to assert the lapse of time as one of the facts establishing his cause of action.”

That is, the actual lapse of time as it, in fact, occurs. But, in a case such as the present, the lapse of time is not actual, but estimated, and has gone to make up and establish, as I have said, the nature and quality of the risk. If that is so, then it certainly leads to what, to my mind, is the comforting conclusion that a case such as this and the Russian Bank case (10) would be treated as outside the contemplation of the time clause, for, as I said earlier, I am comforted by the view of BAILHACHE, J., that, on a reading of the clause as a matter of English, that is, undoubtedly, one's first impression. But I have already stated that in the circumstances of this case it is not necessary for me to express a final view, and, having regard to the length of time for which the decision of BAILHACHE, J., has stood without adverse comment or criticism—except so far as it can be found in the judgment of ROCHE, J., in Roura & Fourgas v. Townend (13) and in the cautions of LORD ATKIN and LORD THANKERTON in Robertson's case (14)—I am not prepared to say, and I do not think it would be right for me to say that BAILHACHE, J., was wrong. And if he was not wrong, then I have already stated that, in my judgment, his decision covers the present case. But I venture to express the hope that, if this or another similar case should go to the House of Lords, it may then be thought appropriate for the House to review (as, after all, it best can) the scope of its own decision in the Bensaude case (11) and the formulation of LORD PORTER, as a judge of first instance, in the Carras case (9). The House may also then consider to what extent the principle of Mercantile S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Tyser (15), which was cited to us but was not cited in the Bensaude case (11), may not also be relevant. In that case, owing to peril and a consequent lapse of time, a charterer became entitled by his contract to cancel, and he did cancel. The Court of Appeal held that the loss was caused, not by the peril or the length of time, but by the exercise by the charterer of his contractual right. It might have been said that what lost the freight contract in the Bensaude case (11) was, not the peril, nor the length of time, but the Portuguese law which justified the charterer in cancelling the contract. These, however, are matters appropriate for the House to consider, should this or another case find its way to the House.

A There remains only what I have called the quantum point. As I have already said, following the judgment of SELLERS, J., I think it unnecessary to express any concluded view, and I propose to say very little on it. I think the question in this case largely depends, as the other questions have done entirely, on the terms of the policy itself, rather than on the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 68 and s. 70. The point, however, may be simply stated, and is this. If the second, or British Columbia, charter was made in substitution for the first, or salt, charter, in the sense that it would not have been made, and could not have been made and carried out, had the first charter not been lost, then, B subject to any question of figures, prima facie it would appear to me that the plaintiffs suffered no loss at all. If, on the other hand, the second charter, or some other similar charter, could have been made and reasonably might have been expected to have been made notwithstanding the performance of the first charter, then, having regard to the terms of the policy, it seems to me that the plaintiffs would be entitled, if they were in other respects right, to say: C "We have lost this particular £12,000 and it is nihil ad rem that after the time of its performance had gone by we may or could have anticipated some other freight". My difficulty is that there is no evidence before the court of the circumstances in which the second or British Columbia charter was made, nor any evidence on which a decision might be reached on the likelihood or possibility, given performance of the first charter, of making, within such time as D was left, another bargain of affreightment. In the absence of that evidence it is additionally fortunate, to my mind, that I do not find it necessary to express any concluded view. But I am bound to say that, on the facts as they emerge from the agreed statement of facts, there seem, at least, strong grounds for supposing that, in truth, the British Columbia charter, the making of which E caused the decision of the owners that was communicated to the master on Aug. 9, was in substitution for the first charter and would not have been made (so that its freight would not have been earned) had it not been for the loss or abandonment of the first charter. Subject, as I say, to any question of figures, but since the British Columbia charter appears to have produced more for the owners than the first charter, the result would appear, prima facie, to be that there was, in any case, no loss. For the reasons which I have stated, and, particularly, F my conclusion on the frustration point, I think that the learned judge correctly dismissed the action, and I would dismiss the appeal.

G JENKINS, L.J.: I agree that this appeal fails. It is common ground that the plaintiffs, on or about Aug. 8, 1949, abandoned the voyage contemplated by the charterparty of July 16, 1949, and, accordingly, lost the freight payable under that charterparty in the sense that they failed to earn it. But in order to succeed the plaintiffs must further show that their abandonment of the voyage, with the consequent loss of freight, was brought about, not by their own election, but by some peril insured against which made the performance of the voyage for practical purposes impossible and, in effect, left H them no option but to abandon it. The intervention of the Chinese Nationalist destroyers on Aug. 8, 1949, was, clearly, a peril insured against, and, accordingly, any loss of freight demonstrably brought about by such intervention would constitute a valid claim under the policy, unless barred by one or other of the exceptions contained in it. But did such intervention make the performance of the voyage for practical purposes impossible? To secure an affirmative answer to this question, the plaintiffs need not go so far as to establish that in the light of subsequent events it would, in fact, have been impossible to perform the voyage by reason of the peril in question. It would suffice for them to satisfy the court that the circumstances, as known at the time of abandoning the voyage, were, on reasonable assessment, such as to warrant the inference that performance of the voyage had become, for practical purposes, impossible by reason of the peril in question: see the speech of LORD SUMNER in Bank Line, Ltd. v. Arthur Capel & Co. (6), where he said ([1919] A.C. 454):

"The question must be considered at the trial as it had to be considered by the parties, when they came to know of the cause and the probabilities of the delay and had to decide what to do. On this the judgments in the above cases substantially agree. Rights ought not to be left in suspense or to hang on the chances of subsequent events. The contract binds or it does not bind, and the law ought to be that the parties can gather their fate then and there. What happens afterwards may assist in showing what the probabilities really were, if they had been reasonably forecasted, but when the causes of frustration have operated so long or under such circumstances as to raise a presumption of inordinate delay, the time has arrived at which the fate of the contract falls to be decided. That fate is dissolution or continuance and, if the charter ought to be held to be dissolved, it cannot be revived without a new contract. The parties are free."

Nevertheless, if those circumstances were not, on reasonable assessment, sufficient to warrant that inference, it does become material to consider whether the peril in question did, in fact, make the voyage for practical purposes impossible and, if it is not shown to have done so, the plaintiffs cannot succeed merely on the strength of an unwarranted inference of impossibility drawn at the time of abandonment. I would add that, as appears from my use of the expression "for practical purposes impossible", absolute impossibility, inferential or actual, need not be made out. Prevention of performance for such a period, or save at such risk, as to make performance in a business or commercial sense impracticable, would suffice.

These considerations lead me to formulate the primary question in the case as follows: Did the intervention of the Chinese nationalist destroyers on Aug. 8, 1949, and the directions then given by their commanders warrant the inference that the Atlantic Trader would, for some unpredictable but probably substantial period of time thereafter, e.g., for the duration of the civil war, be unable to load the required cargo of salt at Taku Bar without serious risk of attack, sinking or seizure at the hands of the nationalist naval forces? In answering this question it has to be borne in mind that the date appointed for the commencement of loading the vessel was Aug. 13, 1949, and that there is evidence to the effect that on and after Aug. 10 a number of vessels loaded cargo at Taku Bar apparently without molestation. This, so far as it goes, suggests that the impediment brought about by the intervention of the nationalist destroyers was, in fact, of a purely transient and temporary character. That does not in itself conclude the question against the plaintiffs, as the reasonable inference from the circumstances, as they appeared on Aug. 8, 1949, might, nevertheless, have been that the impediment was of a permanent character (e.g., that the Nationalists had resolved to institute a blockade of Taku Bar for the duration of the civil war) and, as I have already indicated, the matter must, primarily, be judged by reference to the circumstances as then known. But were those circumstances, duly considered and assessed at that date, such as to warrant that inference? Speaking for myself, I cannot see that they were. The civil war had been in progress for a long time before Aug. 8, 1949, and it does not appear that there had been any previous molestation by the Nationalists of neutral ships trading to and from Taku Bar. The directions given by the nationalist naval forces, as recorded in the agreed statement of facts, seem to me, on the whole, to suggest a temporary warning-off of neutral vessels for their own safety pending particular operations against the communists in the course of which they might be accidentally damaged, rather than an announcement of something in the nature of a permanent blockade. At best, they were of doubtful import, and, while clearly necessitating a temporary withdrawal on the part of the Atlantic Trader, I do not think that they warranted the immediate conclusion that it would be impracticable for the Atlantic Trader to load salt at Taku Bar on Aug. 13, 1949, or within any reasonable period of time thereafter. The matter standing in this state of uncertainty as regards the Nationalists' intentions, I think it behoved the plaintiffs to wait, at all events for a few days, to see how the situation developed. If they had done so, there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that the vessel could not have loaded in safety at Taku Bar, commencing on the date actually appointed, i.e., Aug. 13, 1949. On the contrary, the evidence as to the activities of other merchant vessels at Taku Bar on and after Aug. 10 suggests, so far as it goes, that the vessel could, in fact, have so loaded. Accordingly, in the view I take, the plaintiffs have failed to show that the circumstances as known on Aug. 8, 1949, were such as to warrant the inference that performance of the voyage had been rendered for practical purposes impossible by the peril in question. Still less have they shown that performance of the voyage would, in fact, have been impossible, the evidence as to the subsequent shipping activities at Taku Bar, so far as it goes, being to the opposite effect. I, therefore, conclude, differing in this respect from the learned judge, that the plaintiffs' case fails on the ground that the facts fall far short of establishing that their abandonment of the voyage, with the consequent loss of freight, was brought about by the intervention of the Nationalist destroyers in the sense above indicated, as distinct from being the product of their own election.

My conclusion on this aspect of the case is, I think, supported by the reasoning in Andrew Millar & Co., Ltd. v. Taylor & Co., Ltd. (7), and by the following passages from SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR'S LEGAL EFFECTS OF WAR, 3rd ed., which appear to me to summarise correctly the law deducible from the authorities. At p. 163 the learned author refers to Andrew Millar & Co., Ltd. v. Taylor & Co., Ltd. (7) and says:

"The Court of Appeal held that the vendors had been too precipitate, that they should have waited for a reasonable time before treating the contracts as impossible of performance, and that the contracts were not in the event frustrated. WARRINGTON, L.J., in a short and illuminating judgment points out the distinction between illegality which 'arises ipso facto from a state of war' and impossibility which may or may not be the result of an act of the executive. The same necessity of waiting a reasonable time appears from Geipel v. Smith (4). This rule does not touch the case where the operative cause is so conclusive as to discharge the contract at once, for in such a case it would be unreasonable to demand delay."

Again, at p. 165, after quoting the passage from LORD SUMNER'S speech in the Bank Line case (6), to which I have already referred, the learned author continues:

"It is submitted that the test can be stated as follows: Would a reasonable man in the position of the party alleging frustration, after taking all reasonable steps to ascertain the facts then available, and without snapping at the opportunity of extricating himself from the contract, come to the conclusion that the interruption was of such a character and was likely to last so long that the subsequent performance or further performance of the contract would really amount to the performance of a new contract? If so, there is frustration. And in considering the probability of the duration, he is entitled to assume that in so far as the outbreak or the existence of a war is the cause of the interruption that cause is of uncertain duration. Moreover, the court will not let him suffer for a determination thus reached if subsequent unexpected events show that he was unduly pessimistic in his forecast."

Finally, at p. 301, the learned author again refers to Andrew Millar & Co., Ltd. v. Taylor & Co., Ltd. (7), which, he says,

" . . . illustrates the importance of not being too precipitate in coming to the conclusion that State action has made it impossible to carry out a contract. A party to a contract before making this allegation and acting upon it must wait for a reasonable time in order to see whether the State interference is brief in its operation or likely to be for all practical purposes permanent."

The conclusion which I have reached on the facts makes it strictly unnecessary for me to deal with the question whether the plaintiffs' claim, if otherwise well founded, would not have been barred by the warranty concerning loss or frustration of the voyage or adventure, which is in these terms:

" Nevertheless this policy is warranted free of any claim based upon loss of, or frustration of, any voyage or adventure caused by arrests, restraints or detentions of kings, princes, peoples, usurpers or persons attempting to usurp power."

The defendant underwriter's submission in regard to this warranty is to the effect that, on the assumption that the Nationalist destroyers imposed a prohibition against the use of Taku Bar, this was a restraint of princes within the meaning of the warranty, and, accordingly, that the plaintiffs' claim was based on loss or frustration of the voyage or adventure caused by restraint of princes and, therefore, expressly barred by the warranty in question. The plaintiffs succeeded before the learned judge in meeting this seemingly unanswerable submission by an argument to the effect that, although the prohibition was a restraint of princes, the intervention of the destroyers was also an incident or the consequence of civil war and a warlike operation and, as such, sufficed to support a claim based on one or other of those insured perils irrespective of its character as a restraint of princes. I find it impossible to concur in the learned judge's acceptance of this argument. If the peril giving rise to the loss was a restraint of princes, it seems to me that the warranty clearly operated as a bar to the claim, and that it makes no difference that the restraint was imposed in the course of, or in consequence of, civil war. The only action taken by the destroyers relevant to the claim was the prohibition or restraint on loading at Taku Bar which, for the purposes of this part of the case, they must be assumed to have imposed. Apart from such prohibition or restraint, there was nothing in their activity (whether regarded as civil war or as warlike operations) which could be said to have brought about the loss of freight to which the claim relates, and, so far as I can see, the claim could not be effectively formulated otherwise than by alleging the prohibition or restraint. Clearly, the mere fact of civil war or warlike operations did not make performance of the voyage impossible. The Atlantic Trader had herself made at least one voyage to and from Taku Bar while the civil war was in progress. Moreover, considering the matter purely as one of construction, I see no ground for construing the reference to restraints as meaning restraints imposed otherwise than in the course of or in consequence of civil war or warlike operations. That mode of construction, carried to its logical conclusion, would, for practical purposes, nullify the exception, for restraint of princes would seldom, if ever, occur otherwise than in association with another or others of the various perils insured against. Finally, the question seems to me to be, in any case, concluded against the plaintiffs by the decision of the House of Lords in Cory v. Burr (8). As to the time clauses, I do not wish to add anything to what my Lord has said. I also refrain from entering into the difficult question which would have arisen concerning the quantification of the loss if it had been held recoverable, and I express no opinion about it. I conclude that, for the reasons I have stated, the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am also of the opinion that this appeal fails. The claim made by the plaintiffs is for loss of freight. They have to prove that there was a loss within the terms of the policy. If they show that there was a loss which is recoverable, then the amount of their loss would have to be assessed, and in that connection cl. 7 of the Institute Time Clauses (Freight) becomes relevant, for it provides:

"Except in respect of a claim arising under cl. 6, the amount recoverable hereunder for any claim for loss of freight shall not exceed the gross freight actually lost."

The claim of the plaintiffs was that there was an actual total loss of freight amounting to £12,420, which was said to result from, or to have been caused by, hostilities, or warlike operations, or civil war, or from some peril insured against. The plaintiffs must show that there was a loss, and that there was a loss caused by a peril insured against. If they do, then it has to be considered whether the underwriters are absolved by any provision in the policy and whether the amount claimed exceeds the recoverable amount.

It is undoubted that the particular freight under the charterparty of July 16, 1949, was lost. The question arises: Was it lost by a peril insured against? That was only so if the loss was caused in one of the ways enumerated. The plaintiffs say that the loss was caused by civil war. The learned judge, after consideration of the facts, held ([1953] 1 All E.R. 898):

"The same facts and circumstances seem to me to establish the three separate risks of civil war, restraint and warlike operations."

Was, then, the loss so caused? This, in my judgment, is a question of fact. The loss was clearly not so caused if all that happened was that the master of the Atlantic Trader was advised, or was required, temporarily to withdraw his ship. If the master and the owners decided voluntarily to abandon the adventure, then there would not be a loss owing to an insured risk. But the learned judge came to the following conclusion (ibid.):

"In the light of the known circumstances I do not think a prudent master could have ignored the warnings and the happenings which he himself saw. It would seem that it was not only Taku Bar, but also the northern Chinese ports which had to be left, and he had no reason to think the risks were slight or the interference was only temporary. In those circumstances I find against the defendant's submission that the act of the master at any material stage was voluntary."

I do not find myself prepared to differ from the learned judge in the conclusion which he summarised in the passage which I have just read. The Master of the Rolls, in his judgment, has stated the considerations which weigh in the one direction and in the other. Speaking for myself, I take the view that those considerations weigh more in favour of the action taken by the owners than against their action. The agreed facts record that what was said to the master was: "Leave the northern Chinese ports as soon as possible. If any damage happens the nationalists won't take any responsibility." The reference to the northern China ports suggests something more than a mere local operation, something bigger than a raid or something different from mere temporary operations in a locality. What the master did was to withdraw and proceed slowly and await orders, and he reported the situation in a telegram to the plaintiffs or their agents. That telegram records the facts of the situation with substantial accuracy. From evidence which was before the learned judge, it appeared that two of the other Panamanian ships were compelled by threats from naval vessels to leave the port with a warning that they were not to return. Those ships did not return. I think there is force in the submission made by counsel for the plaintiffs that it would have been a situation of difficulty for the Atlantic Trader if, in defiance of the warnings or orders given, she had been again found by a Nationalist destroyer in the prohibited area. The list of the sailings into Taku Bar and the takings on of cargo by other ships is not, in my judgment, at all conclusive. We are told that all the ships were liners, and that the majority of them were flying the American flag and were making a stay of short duration in contrast to the time of about ten days which would have been occupied by the Atlantic Trader in taking on her cargo. The new charter was entered into by the plaintiffs within a very short time, but it does not seem to me that, in a case where there has been full discovery of documents, any interpretation of the facts adverse to the owners ought to be drawn from that circumstance. There was, I think, at least the risk that, if the ship had later returned and had been destroyed, the plaintiffs might have been under peril of it being said against them that they had thrown their ship away, whether that suggestion would or would not benefit in litigation those who made it. Though the authorities show that the owners are not entitled to act precipitately, they are not to be criticised merely because subsequent events, or later acquired knowledge, suggest that they took a view which, in retrospect, may have been unduly pessimistic.

On a reasonable view of the facts known at the time and of the future prospects as they might reasonably have been assessed, I do not feel prepared to say that the owners were not entitled to conclude that they were and would be prevented from carrying out the charterparty. It was not, in my judgment, wrong for them to decide that they would not be justified at that time and for a reasonable time ahead in attempting to defy the orders and warnings given. In considering, in this connection, the question of time, I have in mind a passage in the speech of LORD WRIGHT ([1941] 2 All E.R. 184) in Joseph Constantine S.S. Line, Ltd. v. Imperial Smelting Corp., Ltd. (16), where he used the words "within any time consistent with the commercial or practical adventure". I also think that some words used by LORD SUMNER in his speech in the Bank Line case (6) are relevant in that connection. He said ([1919] A.C. 454):

"Rights ought not to be left in suspense or to hang on the chances of subsequent events. The contract binds or it does not bind, and the law ought to be that the parties can gather their fate then and there."

For the reasons which I have stated, I do not feel prepared to differ from the conclusion reached by the learned judge on this part of the case.

The underwriters are, however, in my view, relieved from liability by the terms of the clause which has been called the frustration clause. Here the claim of the plaintiffs is that they have suffered the loss of the voyage or adventure which was the subject of the charterparty of July 16, and that such loss was caused by the restraint of kings, princes, peoples, usurpers or persons attempting to usurp power. That is in reality the claim made by the plaintiffs, even though they choose merely to say that the loss was caused by civil war. The purpose of the words in the frustration clause is to exclude a liability otherwise arising. The word "nevertheless" by which the clause is introduced demonstrates that. It seems to me that the only question here is whether these words apply. In my view, they do, and the claim made by the plaintiffs is covered by this exception clause which relieves the underwriters from liability. I will only add that a useful citation was made by counsel for the defendant, in his argument dealing with this part of the case, when he referred to what LORD SUMNER said ([1924] A.C. 467) in P. Samuel & Co. v. Dumas (17):

"Where a loss is caused by two perils operating simultaneously at the time of loss and one is wholly excluded because the policy is warranted free of it, the question is whether it can be denied that the loss was so caused, for if not the warranty operates."

I, therefore, think that the claim of the plaintiffs is defeated by the language of the clause with which I have been dealing. This view makes it unnecessary for me to express any concluded opinions in regard to the two remaining
A questions.

I would like to express my concurrence with the observations made by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in his judgment in dealing with the question of loss of time and the questions which arise on a consideration of the clause:

"Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time whether B arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise."

As my Lord has pointed out, the most recent of the cases dealing with this clause is the Robertson case (14), which went to the House of Lords. My Lord has already referred to what was said by MACKINNON, L.J. ([1938] 3 All E.R. 258), when that case was before this court, and I do not cite the passage only because my Lord has already cited it. In the House of Lords LORD ATKIN
C said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 724):

"I wish, however, to reserve the question whether the claim in this case was in any view consequent on loss of time. The question appears to me to be in every case a question of fact, and the authorities should be treated from that point of view."

D That observation was concurred in by LORD THANKERTON (ibid.). The question which has to be determined when this clause is under consideration is whether the claim made is consequent on loss of time. The words "whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise" do not add anything. They are surplusage, as BAILHACHE, J., pointed out ([1918] 2 K.B. 127) in his judgment in the Russian Bank case (10). The precise words of a clause of this nature may differ

E slightly, but probably not significantly. The wording in the Russian Bank case (10) was slightly different from that in the Bensaude case (11), but BAILHACHE, J., expressly said that he did not think there was any difference in meaning between the two sets of words. In Roura & Fourgas v. Townend (13), before ROCHE, J., the wording was "excluding all claims arising from delay". In the Bensaude case (11) the facts showed that the claim was consequent on

F the fact that the ship was going to be delayed for a period of time. In the Russian Bank case (10) the claim was held to be consequent on the fact that the ship was delayed at Novorossisk because the Dardanelles were closed. In the present case the claim is, not that the ship was delayed or that there was a loss of time, but that a contract was lost, and that, in spite of the fact that there was no loss of time, or no appreciable loss of time, a claim can be made

G for the actual loss of freight. Though I find it unnecessary, as my Lord has found it unnecessary, to express any concluded opinion, if I may treat the matter as an open one, as directed by LORD ATKIN ([1939] 2 All E.R. 724) in the Robertson case (14), in the sense that the decided cases can merely be regarded as decisions of fact which are not to trammel a fresh determination of the facts of a new case, then I express the doubt whether on the facts of H this particular case it could be said that the claim made was one consequent on loss of time.

There is, finally, the question what would have been the amount recoverable had recovery been possible. Again, I do not find it necessary to express any concluded opinion. The policy covers loss of freight, or anticipated freight, or chartered freight, during a three-months period, and as it is a policy of insurance I think that the reminder given by ROCHE, J., in Roura & Fourgas v. Townend (13), in a passage cited to us by counsel for the defendant in his argument, is worthy to be borne in mind. ROCHE, J., referred ([1919] 1 K.B. 196) to the principle that " . . . an assured cannot, under a contract of indemnity, although he may at one time have suffered a loss, recover in respect of such loss if before action it has already been made good to him."

The insurance in this case covered a loss of money to be earned in the employment of the ship. Though I express no final opinion, it would seem to me to be contrary to good sense if, in a case where the ship remained intact as a freight-carrying vehicle, no account need be taken nor allowance made in respect of earnings resulting from the employment of the ship under a new and substituted contract referable to a period of time covered by the contract which could not be performed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Ince & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Thomas Cooper & Co. (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NOTE.

DIXON v. CITY VENEERING MILLS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), October 23, 1953.]

Costs—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Shorthand transcript of evidence at trial—Copy of part of transcript.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. (after the court had dismissed the appeal): May I again take this opportunity of drawing the attention of parties to the need for care in deciding whether it is necessary to copy the transcript of the whole of the shorthand note of the evidence. As the appeal has failed, no point here arises, but it was obvious that much more of the transcript was copied than was required. I agree that it is not always easy to decide, but I think that sometimes insufficient attempts are made to conclude whether it would not be enough for part only of the transcript to be copied. The copying as a matter of course of everything which was before the court below wastes money, and on some occasions this court has given indications to the taxing master, asking him to consider whether certain of the costs of this copying should be disallowed. The court may have occasion to say something more hereafter of a more general nature, but I hope that what I have said may penetrate a little further than just among those present at the moment.

F.G.

Re WATKINS, WATKINS v. WATKINS AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 9, 13, 1953.]

Family Provision—"Widow"—Presumption of death of first husband—Absence for twenty-six years.Death—Presumption—Absence for twenty-six years.

A In 1913 the plaintiff, who was then aged twenty-two years, married E., a coalminer, then aged twenty-five years. There were two children of the marriage. E. deserted her in 1921. In 1922 E. returned and asked the plaintiff to receive him back, but she refused and she had not seen or heard from or of him since. The plaintiff remained in touch with E.'s father until his (the father's) death in 1927, and with E.'s sister, who died in 1937, but no mention was made between them of E. In 1948 the plaintiff, being

B under the impression that E. had died in 1942, went through a form of marriage with W., and was described on the certificate of marriage as a widow. In 1951 W. died, and the plaintiff applied under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), for reasonable provision to be made for her out of W.'s estate. On the question whether, in the absence of

C direct evidence of E.'s death, the plaintiff could properly be described as the widow and a dependant of W.,

HELD: although the plaintiff had made no inquiries to trace E., having regard to the fact that it appeared that his father, his sister, the plaintiff, and her children, who were the persons most likely to hear of him, had had no word of him since 1922, the plaintiff was entitled, in 1948, to assume that E. was dead, and, therefore, she was free to marry W., whose widow she must now be presumed to be.

D

Observation of ROXBURGH, J., in Re Peete ([1952] 2 All E.R. 602), applied.

AS TO PRESUMPTION OF DEATH, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 630-634, para. 701; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 22, pp. 159-166, Nos. 1444-1516.

E Cases referred to:

- (1) Tweney v. Tweney, [1946] 1 All E.R. 564; [1946] P. 180; 115 L.J.P. 60; 174 L.T. 335; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Re Peete, [1952] 2 All E.R. 599; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (3) Nepean v. Doe d. Knight, (1837), 2 M. & W. 894; 7 L.J.Ex. 335; 150 E.R. 1021; 22 Digest, Replacement, 159, 1448.
- (4) Doe d. George v. Jesson, (1805), 6 East, 80; 102 E.R. 1217; 22 Digest, Replacement, 157, 1430.
- (5) Doe d. Lloyd v. Deakin, (1821), 4 B. & Ald. 433; 106 E.R. 995; 22 Digest, Replacement, 164, 1493.
- (6) Doe d. France v. Andrews, (1850), 15 Q.B. 756; 117 E.R. 644; 22 Digest, Replacement, 165, 1504.
- (7) Prudential Assurance Co. v. Edmonds, (1877), 2 App. Cas. 487; 22 Digest, Replacement, 22, 36.
- (8) Re Stollery, [1926] Ch. 284; 95 L.J.Ch. 259; 134 L.T. 430; 90 J.P. 90; Digest Supp.

H ADJOURNED SUMMONS by which the plaintiff applied under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), for reasonable provision to be made for her out of the estate of William Elias Watkins, deceased, whose widow she claimed to be.

The preliminary objection was taken by the defendants that as the plaintiff could not prove that her first husband was dead on the date of her marriage with the testator, she had failed to show that she had capacity to marry him, and, in consequence, was not his widow and so not a dependant within s. 1 (1) of the Act.

J. A. Gibson for the plaintiff.

Rubin for the first and second defendants, the executors of the will of William Elias Watkins.

Goff, Q.C., for the third defendant, one of the residuary legatees.

HARMAN, J.: The plaintiff started proceedings under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1, on the footing that she was the widow of the testator, and, therefore, was a dependant entitled to apply to the court under the Act. The brother and sisters of the deceased, who were beneficiaries under the will, challenge that statement in limine by saying that the plaintiff is not their brother's widow and, therefore, there is no power to make any provision for her under the Act. A

A great deal of evidence has been filed by the defendants. The first statement which the plaintiff made when she, so to speak, opened her case, B was this:

"I am the widow of the above named William Elias Watkins. I was married to the deceased in 1948. At the time of our marriage I was a widow and the deceased was a bachelor. My former husband, who died in 1942, deserted me in or about 1922 and we never resumed cohabitation." C

That is a plain statement, and in an ordinary case it would be quite sufficient, but it was challenged at once on behalf of the defendants by David Thomas Watkins, the brother of the deceased. He obtained through the solicitors of the plaintiff the death certificate of the man whom the plaintiff had mentioned as being her husband who deserted her in 1922 and died in 1942. That certificate is of a death on Oct. 30, 1942, of one Ernest William Edwards, of 21, Kingsmead Terrace, Bath, a Ministry of Works caretaker, aged sixty-seven years, the informant being a son, N. M. Edwards. In addition to producing that certificate, David Thomas Watkins produced the marriage certificate of the plaintiff, which shows that she was married on Nov. 21, 1913, she being then twenty-two years old and a spinster, to one William Edwards, a bachelor, aged twenty-five years, he being a coalminer, both being inhabitants of Pontypool. There are differences between the description of her husband in the marriage certificate and the man who died at Bath in October, 1942, and it is now conceded by the plaintiff that she was wrong in supposing that the man who died at Bath in 1942 was her husband and that she has no grounds on which she can properly rely to show that her husband did die at Bath, or, indeed, anywhere else, in 1942. That being so, it is said on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiff is not qualified as a dependant at all. D

In answer the plaintiff puts forward the certificate of her marriage to the testator, a marriage celebrated on Jan. 30, 1948, in which she is described as a widow and he as a bachelor. There is no doubt that that is evidence of the marriage, and as such I accept it, on the principle mentioned by PILCHER, J., in Tweney v. Tweney (1), in these terms ([1946] 1 All E.R. 565): E

"The petitioner's marriage to the respondent being unexceptionable in form and duly consummated remains a good marriage until some evidence is adduced that the marriage was, in fact, a nullity . . . This court ought to regard the petitioner, who comes before it and gives evidence of a validly contracted marriage, as a married woman, until some evidence is given which leads the court to doubt that fact." F

The certificate is, therefore, prima facie sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was the widow which she gave herself out to the registrar to be. G

ROXBURGH, J., had this matter before him in Re Peete (2), where the circumstances were these. The plaintiff produced a marriage certificate in which she was described as a widow. That was prima facie evidence of the fact that she was in a position to contract a valid marriage, but it appeared when the matter was gone into that she had told the registrar that she was H a widow because she supposed on hearsay evidence that her husband had been killed in 1916 in an explosion at a factory, three years before the second marriage. ROXBURGH, J., came to the conclusion, when he considered the evidence on which she made that statement, that it was quite unreliable, and, therefore, he said that the statement that she was a widow was of no probative value and she failed to prove that she was a widow, and, therefore, he dismissed her application in limine. At the end of his judgment, he said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 602):

A "That being so, it seems to me that the plaintiff has not proved that she was the widow of the deceased because she has not proved that her first husband died before June 23, 1919, and that she had the capacity to marry the deceased when she went through the ceremony of marriage to him. It occurred to me that, if I was not prepared to accept the evidence of what the sister of the first husband had told the plaintiff, the latter might be able to set up a case that the husband had disappeared over a long period in circumstances in which she would be entitled to presume that he was dead at the time of the marriage, but the evidence does not prove any such case."

B
C So that ROXBURGH, J., was prepared to envisage a case in which, although no direct evidence of the death of the first husband was forthcoming, the court could be asked on the circumstance of the lapse of time alone to assume that the first husband was dead and that the wife was in a position to contract a second marriage.

D In the present case, the lapse of time is considerable. The plaintiff last saw her first husband in 1922, she did not marry the testator till 1948, and there can be very little doubt that, if she had at one time or another made inquiries from all the people who might be supposed to have heard of him, or if there was evidence aliunde about the knowledge of such people, it would be quite easy for me sitting as a jury to assume that the man was dead.

E This is a state of things which has been provided for, from time to time, by statute as a matter of convenience. Since the days of James I it has been the law (see 1 Jac. I, c. 11, s. 2) that when a spouse had not been heard of for more than seven years a man or woman, even though he or she was a deserting party to the marriage, could not be convicted of bigamy if he or she contracted a second marriage. A statute of Charles II [18 & 19 Car. 2, c. 11] provided that where there was a lease for lives, if one of the persons on whose lives the lease depended had not been heard of for more than seven years, it might be assumed that he had died, and often that was the prevailing fact in ejectment actions brought under the fiction of an action by John Doe against the tenant. It has been possible since 1937 for a man or a woman to petition the Divorce Court under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 8, for dissolution of a marriage where the spouse has not been heard of for seven years and there is no reason to suppose that the spouse is alive. Those are all, of course, matters where convenience in conducting human affairs has brought about statutory interference. It has led to a view that there is a kind of magic in the period of seven years, and, indeed, one does find indications of statements that for seven years a man will be presumed to be alive, though he is not heard of, but at the end of that time that presumption ceases, and a presumption arises that the man is dead. I am asked by counsel for the third defendant to say that, although it is quite true that, during H the first seven years of absence, one presumes a man to be alive, after that period he is not presumed to be dead, unless there are circumstances justifying that assumption. What is there here? The first husband was a miner. He was in the army and, after the first war, served in 1920 in Ireland. He appears not to have set up any matrimonial home in a regular way with the plaintiff. They had two children, one of whom was born in 1913 and the other in 1919. The husband deserted the plaintiff for another woman in 1921. He appears to have returned one day in 1922 and asked the plaintiff to take him back, saying, according to her (and I have no reason to doubt this) that, if she would not, she would never see him again. She would not have him back, and she has never seen him since. Counsel for the third defendant says that there is no reason to suppose that he is dead, because he is only sixty-five years old and he had a trade which takes men all over the world, that of a miner. Moreover, counsel argues, there is good reason for the husband's silence, because he has not maintained the plaintiff since he left her. Nor do his children know anything about the matter. They have both given evidence.

On the other side, there is this very long period of time. Also, the plaintiff kept in touch with her husband's father until his death in 1927, and he, apparently, had no communication with his son. She also from time to time had some communication with her husband's sister, who died in 1937, and, says she, no mention was ever made between them of the husband. I am asked to infer from that, and I think I can, that they both assumed that he was dead, or, at any rate, they neither of them ever heard anything of him. She says that he had two brothers, but she never kept in touch with them. The truth of the matter is that so long as the plaintiff saw no prospect of re-marrying she did not trouble herself very much about the matter. She heard from some relation of her former husband in 1942 about his being dead, and, when she wished to persuade the testator that she was in a position to marry him, she bethought herself of that rumour, which was no more than that, and obtained this certificate, which satisfied her and, apparently, him.

What, then, ought I to assume? Supposing I was charging a jury here, should I have to tell them that they were not at liberty to assume from this that the plaintiff's first husband was dead by 1943, or should I have to tell them that the lapse of time was such that they were entitled to suppose him dead?

There is a good deal of authority on both sides on this point. Nepean v. Doe d. Knight (3) was an appeal in an ejectment action, and the point decided was that, though there was a presumption after a certain lapse of time that a man was dead, there was no presumption that he died at any particular moment in that period, and, therefore, the actual point decided is not directly material. The case came before the Exchequer Chamber (in Error), and LORD DENMAN, C.J., gave the court's judgment, which was a considered one, and said (2 M. & W. 912):

"The doctrine . . . is, that where a person goes abroad, and is not heard of for seven years, the law presumes the fact that such person is dead, but not that he died at the beginning or the end of any particular period during those seven years . . . After fully considering the argument at the Bar, we are all of opinion that the doctrine so laid down is correct . . . It is true, the law presumes that a person shown to be alive at a given time remains alive until the contrary be shown, for which reason the onus of showing the death of Matthew Knight lay in this case on the lessor of the plaintiff. He has shown the death, by proving the absence of Matthew Knight, and his not having been heard of for seven years, whence arises, at the end of those seven years, another presumption of law, namely, that he is not then alive."

There the presumption, therefore, is stated as arising simply from the lapse of the seven years.

Much to the same effect is Doe d. George v. Jesson (4). This was before the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. The judgment was given by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in these terms (6 East, 85):

"As to the period when the brother might be supposed to have died, according to the statute [18 & 19 Car. 2, c. 11] with respect to lease dependent on lives, and also according to the Statute of Bigamy (1 Jac. 1, c. 11), the presumption of the duration of life, with respect to persons of whom no account can be given, ends at the expiration of seven years from the time when they were last known to be living. Therefore in the absence of all other evidence to show that he was living at a later period there was fair ground for the jury to presume that he was dead at the end of seven years from the time when he went to sea on his second voyage, which seems to be the last account of him."

- A There, again, it is suggested, though not stated in so many words, that presumption of life is for the first seven years, but drops at that point, and another presumption replaces it, namely, that the man is dead.

In Doe d. Lloyd v. Deakin (5) the court cited LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S decision in Doe d. George v. Jesson (4), and agreed with it; but there the person not heard of was the tenant of certain lands, and, therefore, there was good

- B reason to suppose that he would come and collect the rents or have something done with them, and, as he had not done so for seven years, it was natural to presume that he was dead.

It is said, on the other hand, that mere lapse of time without anything more is of no effect at all, and for that two cases are relied on. Doe d. France v. Andrews (6) was an ejectment action in a case of a lease for three lives, two of

- C the cestui que vies (sic) being dead and the third being someone about whom nothing whatever was known. The headnote states:

"No witness was called who had ever known the third; and, except the mention of him in the lease (which described him as aged ten years), there was no proof that he had ever existed. No evidence of search for him was given. Held that, to raise the presumption of his death, there should have been evidence that he had not been heard of by those persons who would naturally have heard of him had he been alive, or that search had been ineffectually made to find such a person; and that the mere fact that no witness called had heard of him was not sufficient."

D

I think that fairly sums up the result of the case. I find PATESON, J., saying this (ibid., 760):

E

"The mere lapse of time does not raise a presumption of death, unless you go farther and show that the person has been absent, and not heard of by those who would have heard of him if he had returned."

There no inquiries had been made.

F

Lastly, in Prudential Assurance Co. v. Edmonds (7), a case of a policy, LORD BLACKBURN refers to Doe d. France v. Andrews (6), and says (2 App. Cas. 508):

"... he [the plaintiff] relied upon the rule of law which is generally laid down in something like these terms; if a man has not been heard of for seven years that raises the presumption that he is dead. It is generally so enunciated. I do not say that that is the correct way of enunciating it, but I think it may be fairly enough put in those words for this purpose. I think, having regard both to the reason of the thing and the decisions, we must take 'not being heard of' in a certain sense. There was seldom or never a man who had reached the age of forty with regard to whom it would not be easy to call scores of people to say, 'I was at school with him, I knew him perfectly well, and I have not heard of him for the last seven years'. But that would not be enough to raise a presumption that he was dead, because, if ever so much alive, those people might not have heard of him. My Lords, it appears from the case of Doe d. France v. Andrews (6) that it is necessary, in order to raise the presumption, that there should have been an inquiry and search made for the man amongst those who, if he was alive, would be likely to hear of him. ... In like manner, in order to raise a presumption that a man is dead from his not having been heard of for seven years, you must inquire amongst those who, if he was alive, would be likely to hear of him, and see whether or no there has been such an absence of hearing of him as would raise the presumption that he was dead."

G

H

Therefore, the criticism that can be raised against the plaintiff's evidence is that no adequate search has been made. She has not made any inquiries so far as we know. When the brothers of the first husband were alive, who are now said to be dead, she did not ask them. On the other hand, she is the wife, or was the wife, and the nearest relations are her two sons. There was a father and there was a sister, and none of those people had ever heard of this man since 1922, and, in my judgment, a jury would be entitled at this distance of time to presume that the man was dead by 1948. It would be, I think, a sorry state of things if for criminal purposes a jury might assume a man was dead and for the purposes of the Divorce Court a similar presumption might be made, but in a Chancery Court no such presumption could be made. In my judgment, the plaintiff was entitled by 1948 to assume that she was free to marry and describe herself as a widow, and the presumption is that she was right. Consequently, I hold that she is a dependant of the testator and entitled to raise this action.

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the facts. The testator had bequeathed the plaintiff an annuity of £2 per week out of his estate of about £15,000. HIS LORDSHIP ordered that the plaintiff's annuity be doubled.]

Application allowed.

Solicitors: Gibson & Weldon, agents for Everett & Tomlin, Pontypool (for the plaintiff); Drury, Hopgood & Co., agents for Gabb, Price & Fisher, Abergavenny (for the defendants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WARREN v. KEEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), October 8, 9, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Weekly tenancy—Extent of obligation of weekly tenant to repair.

In an action by a landlord to recover from a weekly tenant a sum expended on repairs to the demised premises the landlord alleged that it was an implied term of the tenancy that the tenant would use the premises in a tenantlike manner, would keep them wind and water tight, and would effect fair and tenantlike repairs to them. The landlord, in particulars, alleged defects in the premises which included damp and stained plaster on internal walls, a cracked and broken external wall, window-sills lacking weather-proof joints and with decayed paintwork, and a leak in the hot-water boiler.

HELD: the defects particularised were due to fair wear and tear for which a weekly tenant was not liable, his only obligation being to use the premises in a tenantlike manner, and, therefore, the landlord was not entitled to recover.

Quaere as to the scope and meaning of the obligation stated by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in Wedd v. Porter ([1916] 2 K.B. 100) to keep premises "wind and water tight".

AS TO COVENANTS IMPLIED IN A WEEKLY TENANCY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 145, 146, paras. 156, 157.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Wedd v. Porter, [1916] 2 K.B. 91; 85 L.J.K.B. 1298; 115 L.T. 243; 31 Digest, Replacement, 59, 2157.

- (2) Auworth v. Johnson, (1832), 5 C. & P. 239; 172 E.R. 955; 31 Digest, Replacement, 395, 5227.
- (3) Horsefall v. Mather, (1815), Holt, N.P. 7; 171 E.R. 141; 31 Digest, Replacement, 349, 4798.
- (4) Marsden v. Edward Heyes, Ltd., [1927] 2 K.B. 1; 96 L.J.K.B. 410; 136 L.T. 593; 31 Digest, Replacement, 45, 2044.
- (5) Ferguson v. Anon., (1797), 2 Esp. 590; 170 E.R. 465; 31 Digest, Replacement, 395, 5225.
- (6) Shrewsbury's (Countess) Case, (1600), 5 Co. Rep. 13b; 77 E.R. 68; 31 Digest, Replacement, 41, 1997.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES at Brentford County Court, dated June 12, 1953.

The plaintiff, the landlord, let premises to the defendant on a weekly tenancy. In this action by the landlord to recover from the defendant £23 5s., being the cost of certain repairs to the premises, she alleged in the particulars of claim that "It was an implied term of the said tenancy that the defendant would use the said premises in a tenantlike manner, would keep the same wind and water tight, and would make fair and tenantable repairs thereto. The defendant in breach of the said implied term has failed to use the said premises in a tenantlike manner, has not kept the same wind and water tight, and has not made fair and tenantlike repairs thereto."

The particulars of disrepair alleged were as follows:

"(a) First floor front room (large). Walls—plaster damp—stained below window opening. (b) First floor front room (small). Walls—plaster damp—stained and perished below window opening. (c) External. Front wall—rendering cracked and broken in parts. Front floor window opening—sills not weatherproof, joints and paintwork decayed. (d) Leak in hot-water boiler."

Then followed an alternative allegation of waste. The tenant denied that he was under any liability in respect of the alleged failure to repair.

It appeared that by reason of the disrepair of the premises the borough of Heston and Isleworth served a notice on the landlord requiring her to remedy the defects. She did so and incurred the expense above stated. In the present action the county court judge held that there was an implied covenant in the tenancy that the tenant would keep the premises in a good and tenantable condition and do such repairs as were necessary to that end. He held further that the tenant was in breach of that implied covenant, that he had allowed the premises to deteriorate, and that he was liable to the landlord in respect of the amount claimed.

Croome for the tenant.
R. B. Willis for the landlord.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the landlord did not seek to support the wide form in which the learned judge set out the obligation on the tenant which he found to be implied. That would, in fact, mean that a weekly tenant was under a general covenant to keep, and, perhaps, to put and keep, in repair. No authority was cited for such a proposition, and in principle I am clear that no such implied obligation rests on a weekly tenant. It was suggested that the words in the note were wider than those used at the hearing.

The case for the landlord before us was put in the following way. It was alleged that a tenant from year to year is under an obligation not only to use and cultivate the land or premises in a husbandlike or tenantlike manner, but also to keep the buildings wind and water tight. That will be found stated in the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in Wedd v. Porter (1) ([1916] 2 K.B. 100) and in various other cases and in text-books. On the other hand, the researches of counsel have failed to discover any case which throws light on the scope of that obligation, in other words, any case where a tenant has been held liable for failure to keep wind and water tight where the damage would not be covered by the obligation not to commit voluntary waste or the obligation to use the premises and land in a tenantlike manner. So, whether there is an additional obligation of a limited kind as to repairs in the case of a tenant from year to year remains in a state of, at any rate, some doubt.

In Auworth v. Johnson (2) LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., in an interlocutory observation, said (5 C. & P. 240):

"A tenant from year to year is to keep the premises in a little order . . .", and then he said that the tenant had done nothing. When he summed up to the jury (ibid., 241) he again used the words the meaning of which is obscure,

". . . to keep the house wind and water tight . . ."

The argument is, first, that that obligation to keep wind and water tight applies to a weekly tenant as well as to a tenant from year to year, and then, assuming that it does, the next submission is that the matters set out in the particulars of claim come within the covenant to keep the buildings wind and water tight. I think that submission fails at both stages. If there be a, so far indefinite, obligation on a tenant from year to year to do certain minor repairs necessary to keep premises wind and water tight—and I will assume without deciding the point that there is some such limited obligation—I see no ground in principle for applying that to a tenancy from week to week. It is quite true that under the Rent Restrictions Acts many tenants from week to week are enabled to remain in premises year after year, and the landlord may find great difficulty in fulfilling the conditions which have to be fulfilled under those Acts if he is to get possession. But that consideration does not, to my mind, affect the question of what are the implications of a weekly tenancy. It seems to me that it would be absurd to suggest that a weekly tenant is under an obligation to repair. It is difficult to think of repairs which would not in themselves cost more than the weekly rent in many cases and yet it is suggested that the tenant is impliedly liable to expend that money although his right to the premises may be terminated in a week's time.

In the second place, I am myself clear that the matters particularised in the particulars of claim would not fall within the words "wind and water tight". It seems to me clear that the damage here was due to decay of the walls, and there is no suggestion that that was due to any other cause than fair wear and tear. There is no suggestion that the tenant started knocking the walls about or anything of that sort, but in the course of time they had become cracked and presumably required re-pointing, because water was seeping in through the cracks which had appeared. The same would appear to have applied to the wood of the window-sills. That may have been due, not only to age, but also to the positive failure to have the external woodwork re-painted every three years, or whatever is the normal period. Those would both be matters which, in my opinion, could not on any construction come under this formula of keeping the building wind and water tight having regard to the principles which are to be found in the cases as to the implied liability of a tenant from year to year. Therefore, for these reasons, I think this appeal succeeds and the claim made by the landlord fails.

DENNING, L.J.: Apart from express contract, a tenant owes no duty to the landlord to keep the premises in repair. The only duty of the tenant is to use the premises in a husbandlike, or what is the same thing, a tenantlike, manner. That is how it was put by SIR VICARY GIBBS, C.J., in Horsefall v. Mather (3) (Holt N.P. 9) and by SCRUTTON and ATKIN, L.J.J., in Marsden v.

Edward Heyes, Ltd. (4) ([1927] 2 K.B. 7, 8). But what does it mean—"to use the premises in a tenantlike manner"? It can, I think, best be shown by some illustrations. The tenant must take proper care of the premises. He must, if he is going away for the winter, turn off the water and empty the boiler; he must clean the chimneys, when necessary, and also the windows; he must mend the electric light when it fuses; he must unstop the sink when it is blocked by his waste. In short, he must do the little jobs about the place which a reasonable

A tenant would do. In addition, he must not, of course, damage the house wilfully or negligently; and he must see that his family and guests do not damage it—if they do, he must repair it. But, apart from such things, if the house falls into disrepair through fair wear and tear or lapse of time or for any reason not caused by him, the tenant is not liable to repair it.

- In the present case the landlord sought to put on the tenant a higher obligation.
- B He said that the duty of the tenant was to keep the premises wind and water tight and to effect fair and tenantable repairs thereto. That seems to be based on HILL AND REDMAN'S LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, 11th ed., p. 186. I do not think that is a correct statement of the obligation. Take the first branch, "to keep the premises wind and water tight". LORD TENTERDEN in one or two cases at nisi prius used that expression, and it was followed by the Court of Appeal
- C in Wedd v. Porter (1), but it is very difficult to know what "wind and water tight" means. I asked counsel whether there was any case to be found in the books where a tenant had been found liable for breach of that obligation because I wanted to see what sort of thing it had been held to cover. But no such case was to be found. In its absence, I think that the expression "wind and water tight" is of doubtful value and should be avoided. It is better to keep to the
- D simple obligation "to use the premises in a tenantlike manner". Take the second branch, "to make fair and tenantable repairs". LORD KENYON used the expression in Ferguson v. Anon. (5) (2 Esp. 590), which is reported only by Espinasse, whose reports were notoriously defective. If you read the whole sentence used by LORD KENYON, however, it is clear that he was referring only to cases where a tenant does damage himself, such as breaking the windows or the
- E doors. Then, of course, he must repair them. The sentence used by LORD KENYON was explained by BANKES, L.J., in Marsden v. Edward Heyes, Ltd. (4) ([1927] 2 K.B. 6), by saying that if a tenant commits waste—that, is if he commits voluntary waste by doing damage himself—he must do such repairs to the premises as will enable them to exclude wind and water. So explained, it does not support the proposition stated in HILL AND REDMAN at p. 186.
- F It was suggested by counsel for the landlord that an action lies against a weekly tenant for permissive waste. I do not think that is so. It has been held not to lie against a tenant at will: see the Countess of Shrewsbury's Case (6); and, in my opinion, it does not lie against a weekly tenant. In my judgment, the only obligation on a weekly tenant is to use the premises in a tenantlike manner. That does not cover the dampness and other defects alleged in the particulars
- G of claim. The appeal should be allowed accordingly.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree, and can express in a very few words why I think the learned judge came to a wrong conclusion in this case. He is reported (although inaccurately as we were told) to have said in his judgment as to the original contract of tenancy, which was a weekly tenancy,

- H "There was an implied covenant that the tenant would keep the premises in a good and tenantable condition and do such repairs as were necessary to this end."

That language (had it been used) would be attributing to a weekly tenant a degree of liability in the matter of repairs which is higher than that imposed by the law on tenants from year to year, as has been shown by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in Wedd v. Porter (1) and BANKES, L.J., in Marsden v. Edward Heyes, Ltd. (4), and in other cases to which my brethren have referred. Accordingly, counsel for the landlord is unable to support the degree of liability which the learned judge was reported to have laid down. From the cases I have mentioned I gather that, whatever may be the precise extent of the liability of a tenant from year to year, he is not liable for deterioration due to fair wear and tear, and, if so, a fortiori, a weekly tenant is not so liable. Counsel then submitted (and he has authority to support him) that a yearly tenant is at all events liable to keep the demised premises wind and water tight, whatever that may mean, and that this obligation is also imposed on a weekly tenant. There is no authority supporting that proposition so far as weekly tenants are concerned, and I, for my part, find difficulty in accepting it. But, at all events, it is only necessary for me to say in the present case that, in my opinion, the deterioration of which the landlord complains and on which she is suing in these proceedings is deterioration due to fair wear and tear or failure to paint, or both, and a weekly tenant is certainly not answerable for deterioration of that character. Therefore, the learned judge, in my opinion, was in error, because, whatever the liability of a weekly tenant may be, it does not extend to the damage which is complained of in this case—which, as I say, is due to ordinary deterioration by wear and tear. I, accordingly, agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Merton Jones, Lewsey & Jefferies (for the tenant); Pengelly & Co. (for the landlord).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

BOARLAND (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. KRAMAT PULAI, LTD.
INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. KRAMAT PULAI, LTD.
INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. SOUTHERN MALAYAN TIN DREDGING, LTD.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. MALAYAN TIN
DREDGING, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), October 14, 15, 1953.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Expenditure on company chairman's "supplementary remarks" at annual meeting—Political objects—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

Directors of three companies engaged in tin mining in Malaya incurred expenditure on printing and circulating to shareholders and members of Parliament and publishing in "The Times" and the "Financial Times", a pamphlet containing supplementary remarks of the chairman of the companies at their annual general meetings in December, 1949. The pamphlet was an attack throughout on the policy and acts of the Socialist government, addressed to the shareholders by the chairman "as an independent Englishman who, like yourselves, has the interests of our country, commonwealth and empire, including Malaya, very much at heart". Passages included in the pamphlet were: "Socialist propaganda preached class hatred and disunity", and that certain facts "should be rammed home to the younger generation so that they can be informed about these synthetic patriots, before they record their votes at the coming general election". Evidence was given by the chairman's successor that: (i) the directors had for some years been of the opinion that the vital political and economic factors which had a predominant bearing on the success or failure of tin mining operations in Malaya should in the interests of the [companies] be published to shareholders and to others; (ii) the directors disagreed profoundly with the policy of the Socialist government to which they attributed most of the difficulties under which the companies were operating; (iii) they did not have in mind the fact that a general election was forthcoming; and had the witness thought the document was in the nature of a political pamphlet for the purpose of influencing the election he personally would have had nothing to do with it". The general commissioners held that the expenditure on the pamphlet was a deductible expense in arriving at the profits of the companies for income tax and profits tax purposes.

A HELD: whether on the evidence the expenditure on printing, publishing and circulating the pamphlet was "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade" within the meaning of r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, was a question of law, and, on consideration of that question, the expenditure was not solely incurred with that object, and was, therefore, not deductible.

B AS TO DEDUCTIONS FROM THE PROFITS OF TRADE UNDER CASES I AND II OF SCHED. D TO THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1918, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 17, pp. 309-327 and 371, paras. 149-161 and 177.

FOR THE RULES APPLICABLE TO CASES I AND II OF SCHED. D TO THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1918, r. 3 (a), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, C p. 156; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 28, pp. 42-49, Nos. 215-252.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Morgan v. Tate & Lyle, Ltd., [1953] 2 All E.R. 162; [1953] Ch. 601.
- (2) Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodifield, [1906] A.C. 448; 75 L.J.K.B. 864; 94 L.T. 241; 5 Tax Cas. 215; 28 Digest 57, 290.
- (3) Union Cold Storage Co., Ltd. v. Jones, (1923), 129 L.T. 512; 8 Tax Cas. 725; 28 Digest 53, 270.
- (4) Atherton v. British Insulated & Helsby Cables, Ltd., [1925] 1 K.B. 421; 94 L.J.K.B. 319; 132 L.T. 288; affd. H.L., British Insulated & Helsby Cables v. Atherton, [1926] A.C. 205; 95 L.J.K.B. 336; 134 L.T. 289; 10 Tax Cas. 155; 28 Digest 52, 264.
- (5) Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce, [1915] A.C. 433; 84 L.J.K.B. 417; 112 L.T. 651; 6 Tax Cas. 399; 28 Digest 56, 287.
- (6) Mitchell v. Noble (B.W.), Ltd., [1927] 1 K.B. 719; 96 L.J.K.B. 484; 137 L.T. 33; sub nom. Noble (B.W.), Ltd. v. Mitchell, Mitchell v. Noble (B.W.), Ltd., 11 Tax Cas. 372; Digest Supp.
- (7) Southern v. Borax Consolidated, Ltd., [1940] 4 All E.R. 412; [1941] 1 K.B. 111; 110 L.J.K.B. 705; 23 Tax Cas. 597; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Cooke v. Quick Shoe Repair Service, (1949), 30 Tax Cas. 460; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowlall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd., [1952] 1 All E.R. 531; [1952] A.C. 401; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (10) Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland, Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1948] 2 All E.R. 367; [1948] A.C. 508; [1948] L.J.R. 1557; 30 Tax Cas. 267; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (11) Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales, [1914] 3 K.B. 674; 83 L.J.K.B. 1721; 111 L.T. 848; 6 Tax Cas. 477; 28 Digest 52, 262.

H CASES STATED by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London under the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 64, and the Finance Act, 1937, sched. V, Part II, para. 4. The respondent company in the first two appeals appealed against assessments to income tax made on it under Case I of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the year ending Apr. 5, 1951, and to profits tax for the chargeable accounting periods of six months each ending on Sept. 30, 1949, and on Mar. 31, 1950, respectively. The respondent companies in the third and fourth appeals appealed against two assessments to profits tax made on each of them for the chargeable accounting periods of three months ending on Sept. 30, 1949, and of nine months ending on June 30, 1950. The question for determination was whether each company's share of the total cost (£2,551) incurred in printing, publishing and circulating a document described as "chairman's supplementary remarks at annual general meetings of the companies on Dec. 15, 1949", was an allowable deduction under r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in computing its profits for profits tax purposes and in the case of the first appeal for income tax purposes. Under s. 20 (1) of the Finance Act, 1937, which related by reference to profits tax, profits arising from a trade or business in each chargeable accounting period were required to be computed on income tax principles as adapted in accordance with the provisions of sched. IV. The three companies together constituted the "Malayan group", one of the two principal groups of tin companies operating in Malaya, and they were concerned with the winning and disposal of tin ore in Malaya. Each had its own shareholders, the shares being widely held by the public, very largely in small denominations. The interests of the three companies were substantially identical, their chairman and directors were usually the same and their annual meetings were held concurrently. Following their custom since the war, the companies issued to shareholders at the annual general meetings on Dec. 15, 1949, the chairman's "supplementary remarks" relating to political and economic factors affecting the companies and explaining to shareholders the political and economic issues involved. In order that as many people as possible might be persuaded to read it and so to canvass public opinion, and, if possible, procure support in obtaining from the British and Malayan governments the political and economic changes thought by the directors to be required in the interests of the company's business, the "supplementary remarks" were subsequently printed and published in "The Times" and the "Financial Times" and were circulated to members of both Houses of Parliament.

The companies contended: (i) that the "supplementary remarks" were in fact part of the companies' annual reports and were published solely for the advantage of their trade, to protect their assets and preserve their goodwill, and so enable them to carry on and earn profits; (ii) that the costs of the publication were wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade, their object being to preserve the companies' businesses and assets; and (iii) that the costs were, therefore, an allowable deduction from profits for income tax and profits tax purposes under r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. For the Crown it was contended: (i) that the contents of the "supplementary remarks" showed that it was a document of a general political nature, bearing little or no direct relation to the companies' trade, and that it was printed, published and circulated with a view to the forthcoming general election; (ii) that the costs of such political propaganda could not be regarded as expenses laid out in order to enable the companies to carry on and earn profits, and were not, therefore, money laid out or expended for the purposes of the companies' trade within r. 3 (a); (iii) that, if the costs were money so laid out and expended, they were also incurred for other purposes, e.g., (a) general political propaganda, and (b) the securing of lower taxation, and were, therefore, not "wholly and exclusively" laid out or expended within the meaning of the rule. The costs were, therefore, not allowable as an expense for income tax and profits tax purposes. The commissioners found that the sum was money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the companies' trade and was an admissible deduction. The Crown appealed.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.) and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

Borneman, Q.C., and Beattie for the companies.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an appeal from a decision of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of Income Tax for the city of London, and the question which arises is concerned with certain expenses of three Malayan tin mining companies mining tin in Malaya, or, for the purpose of this (the first) case, one of those companies. The expenses are the expenses of printing, publishing and circulating a pamphlet containing the chairman's supplementary remarks made at the annual general meetings of the three companies on Dec. 15, 1949. The relevant statutory provision laying down what expenses may be deducted for the purposes of assessing income tax on profits of the taxpayer—in this case the company—is to be found in r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. The rule provides:

“In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, profession, employment, or vocation . . .”

It is expressed in a curious negative manner, but the result is that, in order to be deductible, any expenses the deduction of which is claimed must be wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade of this company.

That phrase in that rule has received judicial interpretation in a large number of cases, and the law is very conveniently summarised, after a full examination of the cases, by JENKINS, L.J., in Morgan v. Tate & Lyle, Ltd. (1). He sets out his conclusions as follows (ante, p. 181):

“The principles which emerge seem to be these: (i) the prohibition against the deduction of disbursements or expenses not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade means that, in order to be deductible, a disbursement or expense must be laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purpose of enabling the trader concerned to carry on and earn profits in the trade: LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) ([1906] A.C. 453); but (ii) notwithstanding LORD DAVEY's additional observation to the effect that the disbursement must be made ‘for the purpose of earning the profits’, LORD LOREBURN's observation in the same case (ibid., 452) to the effect that disbursements to be deductible must be ‘really incidental to the trade itself’, and ROWLATT, J.'s reference in Union Cold Storage Co., Ltd. v. Jones (3) (129 L.T. 516) to ‘bringing grist to the mill’, it is clear that disbursements to be deductible need not be directly or immediately productive of profit. ‘. . . a sum of money expended . . . voluntarily and on the grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade . . .’ per VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in Atherton's case (4) ([1926] A.C. 212); and (iii) payments made for the purpose of preserving the assets or goodwill of a business, and thereby safeguarding its earning capacity, and payments for protecting the trader from losses in his trade or from being deprived of the means of carrying it on, may be wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade, just as much as payments made for the immediate purpose of producing or increasing profits: compare the fire insurance premiums in Usher's Wiltshire Brewery case (5), the payment to the retiring director in Mitchell v. B. W. Noble, Ltd. (6), the legal expenses in the Borax case (7), and the discharge of the liabilities of the predecessor in business in the Quick Shoe Repair case (8); but (iv) payments made out of profits when earned (such as the Irish tax in Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (9)), or in relation to the determination of a liability to tax on those profits (as in Smith's Potato Estates (10)), or (by parity of reasoning) payments made with a view to preventing the transfer from one person or class of persons to another of the right to receive, through the trader, the profits when earned, are not made for the purposes of the trade within the meaning of the statutory prohibition."

The last case does not really affect the present appeal. In Morgan v. Tate & Lyle, Ltd. (1) the question was whether it was permissible to deduct the expenses incurred by a sugar refining company in launching a political campaign for the purpose of endeavouring if possible to prevent the nationalisation of the sugar industry. It was held that such an expense did fall within the terms of the rule, and, therefore, was deductible from the profits of the company for the purposes of tax. That actual decision is a long way from the facts of the present case, but the principles which were considered by the Court of Appeal are material to the point which I have to decide. The decision of the Court of Appeal, I understand, is under appeal to the House of Lords, but for the purpose of my judgment I must take the law as being correctly laid down by the majority of the court (SINGLETON, L.J., dissented). A

The expenses which I have to consider are a share amounting to £193 of printing, publishing and circulating the chairman's supplementary remarks at the annual general meeting. The pamphlet is in effect an attack throughout on the policy and acts of the Socialist government, which was in office after 1945 and also at the date of the annual meeting. The author of the remarks does not state that he is addressing the shareholders as chairman of their companies, but says: C

"I therefore address the following supplementary remarks to you, not as a politician, but as an independent Englishman, who, like yourselves, has the interests of our country, commonwealth and empire, including Malaya, very much at heart." D

He discusses a lot of things which he considers to be mistaken or foolish acts of policy on the part of the Socialist government, and it is only incidentally, as it seems to me, that he discusses the effects of Socialist policy on the operations of the tin companies concerned at all. At p. 7, col. 2, after quoting an article in "The Recorder" and the quotation "Socialist propaganda preached class hatred and disunity", he says: E

"'These are not pretty words', says 'Brutus', 'but they are true.'

Well, of course they are, and they should be rammed home to the younger generation, so that they can be informed about these synthetic patriots, before they record their votes at the coming general election."

It seems to me that, at any rate on its face, a speech of that kind cannot possibly fall within the limits of a rule which requires the expenditure in question to be wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the trade of the company. F

But it is suggested that, however unreasonable I may think the conclusion reached by the commissioners, the question in issue is a question of fact, and I am bound by their decision and may not give effect to the conclusion which I would have reached myself on the evidence given before the commissioners, unless there was no evidence on which they could have reached that conclusion. G
In answer to that, the Solicitor-General has referred me to the observations of LORD REID in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (9) ([1952] 1 All E.R. 535):

"It was argued for the respondents that this is a question of fact, and that, therefore, the decision of the commissioners on this matter is final in their favour. I cannot accept this argument. If certain payments made by a taxpayer are of such a kind that they are capable in law of being regarded as coming within the exception in r. 3 (a), then, no doubt, it is for the commissioners to determine whether the circumstances of the case are such that in fact they do come within that exception. But it is, in my judgment, a question of law whether particular payments are H of a nature capable of coming within the exception, and that is the issue here."

A Counsel for the company says that he completely accepts the principles laid down in that quotation, but if it is possible for the expenses in question to come within the rule, then it is a question of fact whether they do come within the rule, as, indeed, LORD REID says. And he says that, once the conclusion is reached that the expenses may come within the rule, the decision of the commissioners on the evidence before them is binding and cannot be upset by me, if there was any evidence at all on which they could have come to that conclusion. In support of that, he referred me to Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales (11). That case concerned a payment made to a law reporter on his retirement, a very different point from that which I have to consider. Though the reporter was in no way entitled to a retiring gratuity, such payments had been habitually made by the Council of Law Reporting because they improved the efficiency of their reporting service, no doubt, by inducing a better class of lawyer to undertake that service. SCRUTTON, J., said ([1914] 3 K.B. 684):

B

C "It seems to me that the question whether money is wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of a trade is a question of fact. Judges of the High Court may know, by the accident of their previous training, something about a particular trade. To take a personal instance, I may be assumed to know something about shipping, but there are many trades about which I know absolutely nothing, and there are equally many trades about which any of my learned brethren would know nothing except what they were told by the commissioners. In many cases the question whether the money was wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade must depend upon a knowledge of the facts of the trade, of the way in which it is carried on, of the effect of payments made in that trade, all of which are questions of fact. There may be cases where it is clear even to a judge who knows nothing about the trade, that a particular payment could not be wholly or exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade. I do not desire to discuss politics, but I take examples which seem to me fairly clear. Payments for political purposes might conceivably be for the purposes of trade. It might be that a payment by a company to the Tariff Reform League might be of great advantage to its trade. It might be that a payment by a company to a political party which was supposed to be identified with the interests of a particular trade might be to the advantage of the trade; but one can easily imagine cases, such as a payment by a company to the National Service League, where it would be impossible to conceive that anybody could find that such money was wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade. There may be cases in which the court would have to say there is no evidence on which any tribunal could find that this sum was laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade, but in most cases it appears to me that it depends on the facts of the trade of which the court has no knowledge, and for which it must depend on the findings of the commissioners."

D

E

F

G

H It is said that those remarks apply to the present case because it is plain from what SCRUTTON, J., said, and, perhaps, also from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Tate & Lyle's case (1), that payments made for a political purpose may be for the purposes of advancing the trade of the company and enabling it to protect its assets and earn profits, and if, therefore, it is possible that payments for political purposes of that kind may be for advancing the trade of the company, it is then a question of fact to be decided by the commissioners, whose decision is binding, whether in fact on the evidence the payments were made for that purpose. It is said that the evidence in the present case shows that the expenditure for the purpose of circulating this pamphlet was in fact incurred by the directors of the company for the purpose of advancing the trade of the company and its interests as a trader.

The material passages in the evidence given before the commissioners, appear in paras. 5, 6 and 9 of the Case stated by the commissioners. Paragraph 5 reads:

"The directors of the 'Malayan group' companies, while recognising the necessity for the report and accounts presented at annual general meetings to be accompanied by a chairman's address to the members of each company relating to its individual activities and finances for the particular year under review, had nevertheless for some years been of the opinion that the vital political and economic factors which had a pre-dominant bearing on the success or failure of tin mining operations in Malaya should, in the interests of the company, be published to shareholders and to other persons. The winning of tin ore in Malaya has since the last war been vitally affected by the economic, financial and political policies of the United Kingdom and Malayan governments in so far as they affect Malayan affairs."

Then reasons are given why the method of circulating the supplementary remarks separately from the annual report was adopted, in order to bring the matter more directly home to the shareholders and to other persons. In para. 6 it is said:

"The post-war period immediately preceding the meetings on Dec. 15, 1949, had been one of anxiety and concern to the directors of the Malayan group. This was due (inter alia) to their profound disagreement with, and apprehension as to, the policy of the Socialist government to which they attributed most of the difficulties under which their companies were operating."

Then the difficulties are summarised under a number of heads: "(a) Communist activities in Malaya"; "(b) Labour conditions in Malaya"; "(c) The price of tin"; "(d) War damage compensation and rehabilitation"; and "(e) Inflation", of which it is fair to say that there is practically no discussion at all in the pamphlet in question issued by the company.

Paragraph 9 reads:

"Mr. Ernest Vivian Pearce, chairman of the companies of the 'Malayan group', gave evidence on behalf of the company, (which evidence we accepted) to the following effect . . ."

I should say that the author of the pamphlet, Mr. Herbert Ashworth Hope, did not give evidence because he was ill, and, therefore, Mr. Pearce gave, no doubt, the evidence which might otherwise have been given by Mr. Hope. The evidence of Mr. Pearce as stated by the commissioners was as follows:

"His boards, with a view to the protection of these companies' businesses and interests, had consistently regarded it as being to the advantage of these companies to see that public opinion should be stirred up and that the shareholders (and as many people as could be persuaded to read the 'supplementary remarks') should appreciate the harm that the policies of the governments were thought by the directors to be doing to their business. He stated that the complaint of the company's directors was against the policies as a whole of the Labour Party and one of these complaints was the high taxation proposed by the Labour government. The 'supplementary remarks' had been prepared by the then chairman, Mr. Ashworth Hope, who submitted a draft to the board for their comments. He did not think the directors had in mind at all when the 'supplementary remarks' were written that there was a general election forthcoming.

Had he thought that this document was in the nature of a political pamphlet for the purpose of influencing the election he personally would have had nothing to do with it."

In view of the passage in p. 7 of the pamphlet which I read a little earlier, it seems to me that either those statements by the witness, Mr. Pearce, were untrue or he had not read the supplementary remarks with any care, and I cannot help thinking that the commissioners were unduly credulous in accepting that statement as being true in fact. His evidence continued in this way:

"He regarded it as a booklet for the protection of the company's business. They had gone into these politics particularly as relating to Malaya. He agreed that the trading results of the three companies at the relevant time were satisfactory up to a point. He affirmed the facts set out in paras. 3 to 8 hereof."

From that last statement I must conclude that evidence was given on the lines of the earlier paragraphs which I have read and that such evidence was accepted by the commissioners.

The argument is that it was open to the directors of this company to think that, by reason of the past conduct of affairs by the Labour government, its continuance in office was bound to be damaging to the interests of the company and obstructive of its attempts to earn profits and carry on its trade, and that, therefore, it was a justifiable activity on the part of the company to subsidise the circulation of a speech which was nothing but an attack on the policies of the Labour government and an inducement to the voters to turn them out of office at the earliest possible opportunity. It is said that that is a possible way of advancing the interests of the company's business, and that, if it is a possible way of advancing the interests of the company's business, I am bound by the conclusion of the commissioners that, in fact, the evidence did support that that was the fact. I do not take that view. It seems to me that on the authorities it is a question of law whether a pamphlet in this form is capable of being wholly and exclusively for the purpose of advancing the trade of the company, and it is a question of law whether the expenditure incurred in printing, publishing and circulating this pamphlet is expenditure which was incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the company's trade. One has only to peruse the pamphlet in question to see that, if it had any such object as is contended, it was not the sole object of the pamphlet in question. It seems to me, therefore, that I am entitled to hold as a matter of law that this pamphlet is not capable of being solely for that purpose, and the expenditure incurred in printing, publishing, and circulating it is not wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the company's trade, and, therefore, does not come within the terms of the rule.

Having reached that conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider whether there was, in fact, any evidence capable of supporting the conclusions of the commissioners, and the appeal must be allowed. The same result will follow in the other cases relating to expenditure for the same purpose.

Appeals allowed.

Solicitors: Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown); Stephenson, Harwood & Tatham (for the companies).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

TEMPLE v. LEWIS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), October 13, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Premium—Recovery—Premium paid, not by tenant, but by third party—Period of limitation for recovery—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 14 (1)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 8 (2) (as amended by Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938 (c. 26), s. 7 (6)—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 2 (5).

The plaintiff was the landlord and the defendant was the tenant of premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied. In an action for possession based on non-payment of rent, the tenant filed a counterclaim, dated June 17, 1953, seeking to recover a premium of £200 which, in May, 1951, had been paid to the landlord by a third party, the son of the tenant. The landlord contended (i) that under s. 2 (5) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, a premium was recoverable only if paid by the tenant himself, and (ii) that s. 8 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, as amended by s. 7 (6) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, imposed a period of limitation of two years for the recovery of premiums, and that period had expired before the date of the tenant's counterclaim.

HELD: (i) section 2 (5) of the Act of 1949 gave a right to recover to a third party where the premium had been paid by that third party; (ii) s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1923 (as amended by s. 7 (6) of the Act of 1938) did not impose any limitation for the recovery of a premium since a premium was recoverable under s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1920 and not under s. 14 (1) of that Act which merely gave an additional right to recover a premium by deduction from the rent; (iii) and, therefore, the premium was recoverable by the tenant and could be set off against the rent due.

FOR THE INCREASE OF RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST (RESTRICTIONS) ACT, 1920, s. 8 (1) and s. 14 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 994 and 1015; and FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT (RENT CONTROL) ACT, 1949, s. 2 (5), see ibid., p. 1097.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE PUGH at Bloomsbury County Court dated July 16, 1953.

The plaintiff was the landlord and the defendant was the tenant of premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied. In May, 1951, the letting had been negotiated by one Lytton, a son of the tenant and an employee of the landlord, who made himself responsible for payment of the rent. The rent was duly paid by Lytton until 1952, when he left the landlord's employment, and from that time onwards no further rent was paid. In an action by the landlord for possession based on non-payment of rent amounting to £162 18s. 9d. the tenant alleged that prior to the date of the letting he had paid to the landlord a premium of £200 which sum he claimed to set off against the rent due under s. 2 (5) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. The county court judge found that a premium of £200 had been paid by Lytton to the landlord as agent for the tenant and held that the tenant was entitled to a set-off in respect of that sum.

Fortune for the landlord.

Lester for the tenant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The first point taken by the landlord was that the premium was paid by Lytton and not by the tenant, and, therefore, was not recoverable. That may raise the question whether, if a premium is paid by a third party as principal, it can be recovered under the Act. The learned judge found against the landlord on that point, because he held that, in making these payments, Lytton was acting as agent for the tenant. I take it that means that as between the parties concerned Mr. Lytton was saying to the landlord: "I am asking that you should grant a lease to the tenant. He is to be the principal, but you can apply to me for the rent and for the premium. You will get my cheque, but I am acting on behalf of the tenant." I can see no reason in law why the learned judge should

A not have so construed the position. In other words, the tenant was the proper plaintiff on the counterclaim in respect of the premium. But we need not be troubled about that because, in my view, even if one treats the premium paid by Lytton as a payment by a principal he could recover it. The learned judge said in his judgment that, if there was in law any necessity for Lytton to be joined as a party, he would give leave for him to be joined.

B Counsel for the landlord submits that both the earlier and the present legislation should be construed as conferring the right to recover a premium only on a tenant, and only, therefore, in circumstances where the tenant has, as principal, himself paid the premium. I do not accept that contention. It seems to me that the original section, s. 8 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and s. 2 (5) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, are plainly so worded as to cover a case, if it arose, where a premium was exacted by a landlord and paid by a third party. Section 8 (1) of the Act of 1920 reads thus:

D "A person shall not, as a condition of the grant, renewal, or continuance of a tenancy or sub-tenancy of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, require the payment of any fine, premium, or other like sum, or the giving of any pecuniary consideration, in addition to the rent, and, where any such payment or consideration has been made or given in respect of any such dwelling-house under an agreement made after Mar. 25, 1920, the amount or value thereof shall be recoverable by the person by whom it was made or given."

E It does not, in other words, say "recoverable by the tenant". Similar words are to be found at the end of what is now the relevant provision, namely, s. 2 (5) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. That, again, contains the words

"shall be recoverable by the person by whom it was paid."

F If, therefore, any criticism in law could be thrown on the learned judge's findings as to agency, the matter could and would have been set right by the joining of Lytton, who could have succeeded in proceedings for the recovery of the premium. That point, therefore, in my opinion, fails.

G The other point is this. It is said that under the Act of 1920 there is a period of limitation of two years for the recovery of premiums and that in the present case the two years had elapsed because the premium which it is sought to set off was paid on May 3, 1951, and the counterclaim was dated June 17, 1953. That is a view which is supported by a note in the LAW NOTES book, RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST RESTRICTIONS, 22nd ed., p. 44. But in MEGARRY'S RENT ACTS, 7th ed., p. 383, the view is taken that there is no period of limitation applicable to the recovery of premiums. The relevant sections are, first H of all, s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1920 which gives the right to recover the premium. Section 14 (1) of the Act of 1920, as originally drafted, provides:

"Where any sum has . . . been paid on account of any rent or mortgage interest, being a sum which is by virtue of this Act, or any Act repealed by this Act, irrecoverable by the landlord or mortgagee, the sum so paid shall be recoverable from the landlord or mortgagee who received the payment or his legal personal representative by the tenant or mortgagor by whom it was paid, and any such sum, and any other sum which under this Act is recoverable by a tenant from a landlord or payable or repayable by a landlord to a tenant, may, without prejudice to any other method of recovery, be deducted by the tenant or mortgagor from any rent or interest payable by him to the landlord or mortgagee."

Pausing there, the effect is that the right to recover rent over-paid, or mortgage interest, is conferred by this section, but in respect of a premium, the right to recover which arises under s. 8 (1), this s. 14 (1) confers a right to deduct it from the rent without prejudice to other methods of recovery. There were at that time no special limitations on the right to recover with which these sections dealt, although, no doubt, the ordinary general provisions of the Limitation Acts were applicable. Section 8 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, provides as follows:

"Any sum paid by a tenant or mortgagor which, under s. 14 (1) of the [Act of 1920], is recoverable by the tenant or mortgagor shall be recoverable at any time within six months from the date of payment but not afterwards, or in the case of a payment made before the passing of this Act, at any time within six months from the passing of this Act but not afterwards."

That period of six months was extended by s. 7 (6) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, to two years, again with certain exceptions which do not matter. The question is whether those words are applicable to premiums recoverable under s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1920. I think that quite plainly they are not. The premium, in my opinion, was recoverable, not under s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920, but under s. 8 (1), and all that s. 14 (1) did was to give an additional right to deduct it from the rent, on the assumption, presumably, that it could not have been set off under ordinary principles of law.

In my opinion, therefore, there never has been in this code a period of limitation applicable to a premium. It may be that, even if there had been such a limitation under these earlier Acts, the legislation of 1949 would not be construed as incorporating them. Once, however, one comes to the conclusion that the sections to which I have referred do not impose a two years' limitation, the basis of the argument disappears altogether. For these reasons, I think the two points taken by the landlord fail, and the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: It is plain that when a person other than the tenant pays a premium, the time limit for recovery is not two years, but six years. So, also, when a person other than the landlord exacts a premium, the time limit for recovery is not two years, but six years. No sensible distinction can be drawn between those cases and the case of a premium paid by a tenant to a landlord. There also the time limit is not two years, but six years. On an analysis of the sections such as SOMERVELL, L.J., has made it is quite plain that the time limit for recovery of a premium is six years. The premium was not recoverable under s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920. It was originally recoverable under s. 8 (1) of that Act, and it is now recoverable under s. 2 (5) of the Act of 1949. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. On the question of limiting the period for the recovery of premiums it seems to me that the landlord, in order to succeed, would have to delete from s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1923 the express reference which is found there to s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920 and read it as though it had said and so on. That is not what is there. A special period of limitation is imposed by the legislature with regard to certain claims. Those claims are limited to sums which are recoverable under s. 14 (1) of the principal Act and amongst those sums premiums are not included. Accordingly, I agree with the view expressed on this point at p. 383 of MEGARRY'S RENT ACTS, 7th ed.

"any sum paid by a tenant or mortgagor which under the principal Act is recoverable",

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Renshaws (for the landlord); Beach & Beach (for the tenant).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

JENKINS v. ELDER DEMPSTER LINES, LTD.

B [COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), March 30, 1953.]

Workmen's Compensation—"Arising out of and in the course of the employment"—Seaman returning to ship after shore leave—Fall from mole—Police stationed at entrance to mole, but public allowed entry—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 1 (1).

C On the night of Dec. 26/27, 1947, the ship in which the deceased was employed moored against the harbour mole of Las Palmas. At the landward end of the mole was a gateway where police were stationed for the purpose, ostensibly, of keeping unauthorised persons off the mole, but all kinds of people were allowed there and entry to it was practically unrestricted. Shortly after the ship moored, the deceased and other members of the crew went ashore for a short while. When they were returning to the ship, the policemen at the gate of the mole asked them which was their ship and allowed them to enter the mole. In the darkness, the deceased fell over the side of the mole and was drowned. In a claim by the widow against the employers for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts,

E HELD: on the facts, there was not such a restriction on the right of persons to enter the mole as would have justified the deceased in saying, when he passed the gate, that he was now acting in the course of his employment, within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 1 (1), and, therefore, the claim failed.

F Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: "I cannot take LORD MACMILLAN [in Northumbrian Shipping Co., Ltd. v. McCullum (101 L.J.K.B. 668)] as meaning and intending that a seaman who loses his life, or is injured by a fall, is not disentitled to recover unless it is shown against him that at the time he suffered death or injury he was in exactly the same position as any member of the public at the place where he was killed or hurt. I think that that over-simplifies or over-states the point. It is . . . essential to bear in mind that the overriding consideration is: Was the workman at the relevant time acting in the scope of his employment?—and the explanation, it is true, which the cases have added will entitle him to say that he was if his presence at the point where he met with the accident is so related to his employment as to lead to the conclusion that he was acting within its scope. It is, I think, quite possible to imagine cases in which a man might be in a place which was not open to every member of the public, that is to say, as regards which some restrictions were imposed (though they had not, in fact, prevented him being there), but in which the restrictions and the man's exemption from them would have nothing whatever to do with his employment so that he could not claim that his presence there was so closely related to his employment as to justify the conclusion that he was acting within its scope."

AS TO ACCIDENTS ARISING WHILE WORKMAN GOING TO AND FROM WORK, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 825-828, paras. 1164, 1165; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 34, pp. 277-279, Nos. 2341-2357.

EDITORIAL NOTE. The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, was repealed by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, s. 89 (1), and sched. 9, as from July 5, 1948, when the Act of 1946 came into force, but the phrase "accident arising out of and in the course of the employment", in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1925, is still of importance as regards industrial injuries: see s. 1 (1) and s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1946.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Northumbrian Shipping Co., Ltd. v. McCullum, (1932), 101 L.J.K.B. 664; 23 B.W.C.C. 284; sub nom. McCullum v. Northumbrian Shipping Co., Ltd., 147 L.T. 361; Digest Supp.
- (2) Stewart (John) & Son (1912), Ltd. v. Longhurst, [1917] A.C. 249; 86 L.J.K.B. 729; 116 L.T. 763; 10 B.W.C.C. 266; 34 Digest 279, 2357.
- (3) Davidson (Charles R.) & Co. v. M'Robb or Officer, [1918] A.C. 304; 87 L.J.P.C. 58; 118 L.T. 451; 10 B.W.C.C. 673; 34 Digest 276, 2339.

APPEAL by the applicant, Mrs. Mary Jenkins, from an order of His Honour JUDGE BROWN, made at Liverpool County Court on Jan. 5, 1953, whereby he dismissed her claim to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts in respect of the death of her husband, Albert Jenkins.

The deceased, a seaman, was employed as a member of the crew of m.v. Fulani, owned by Elder Dempster Lines, Ltd. On the night of Dec. 26/27, 1947, the vessel moored against the harbour mole of Las Palmas for the purpose of re-fuelling. At the landward end of the mole were some gates at which police officers, or similar officials, were stationed. Shortly after the vessel moored the deceased and some other members of the crew went ashore for a short while, having obtained leave to do so. When they were on the mole on their way back to the vessel, the deceased stepped behind to relieve himself, fell off the edge of the mole, and was drowned, notwithstanding the attempt of one of his companions to save him. On Dec. 29, 1947, the applicant was informed of his death. On or about Aug. 18, 1948, the vessel returned to England, and on the day after her return the Board of Trade held an inquiry into the death. On Sept. 1, 1948, the claim for compensation was first made. The applicant contended, inter alia, that the mole was a place to which the deceased had access only by reason of his employment, and that, therefore, the deceased lost his life in the course of his employment, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 1 (1). The learned judge held that the accident did not arise in the course of the deceased's employment. He further held that the provisions of s. 14 (1) (b) of the Act of 1925 were imported into s. 35 (1) (c), so that, in the case of a seaman, a claim for compensation could be made after the expiration of six months from the time when news of the death was received by the claimant provided that the failure to make the claim within the specified period was "occasioned by mistake . . . or other reasonable cause", but that, on the facts, no such mistake or reasonable cause was shown.

Blackledge, Q.C., and Nance for the applicant.

Nelson, Q.C., and Nicklin for the employers.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., stated the facts, and, after saying that, in the circumstances, it was not necessary to decide (i) whether s. 14 (1) (b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, was imported into s. 35 (1) (c), and (ii) whether or not the circumstances were such as to amount to "reasonable cause" within s. 14 (1) (b), His LORDSHIP continued: In my judgment, it is not possible to disturb the conclusion (which, in essentials, is a conclusion of fact) at which the learned county court judge arrived on the vital question: Was the deceased, at the moment that he fell into the harbour of Las Palmas, then on his job, i.e., was he then acting in the course of his employment? From the facts, it is clear that he was not acting in the course of his employment in the sense that he was then doing his duty in the ship as a member of the crew. But several cases have decided that the liability of the employers extends beyond the performance of actual duties so as to cover, in certain circumstances,

- A injury or loss of life while a workman is going to or from the place of his employment. The case to which attention has been mainly directed is Northumbrian Shipping Co., Ltd. v. McCullum (1). In that case the workman was engaged as boatswain in a ship which was then in dock loading cargo. He agreed to act during a Saturday night as a watchman in the ship, which was an additional duty, distinct from his ordinary duties as boatswain, but
- B covered by general clauses in his contract. On his way to take up his position as watchman, he passed the gates which separated the public part of the harbour from the private dockyard where the vessel lay, and was never seen again alive. He had somehow fallen off the side of the dock, and, owing to injuries received in the fall, was killed. The opinion of LORD MACMILLAN in that case was concurred in by the other noble and learned Lords. One of the
- C difficulties to which LORD MACMILLAN'S speech was directed was that of steering a course, not altogether easy to steer, between two earlier decisions in the House of Lords, John Stewart & Son (1912), Ltd. v. Loughurst (2), in 1917, and Charles R. Davidson & Co. v. M'Robb or Officer (3), in 1918. In the latter case, a seaman, while returning to his ship, fell from the quay and was drowned. It was held that his widow was not entitled to recover, although the dock at which
- D the ship lay had been temporarily cordoned off by the Admiralty, under wartime regulations, so that it was contended that it was no longer a public place, but was, in effect, private property. LORD MACMILLAN analysed the distinction between that which might be called private property, part of the employer's premises or of the private property over which the servant must go to get to the employer's premises, on the one hand, and public places, on the other,
- E and, to meet the difficulty of M'Robb's case (3), he held that the temporary restriction imposed by the Admiralty had not deprived the relevant part of the harbour in that instance of its public character. But counsel for the applicant in the present case contended that there are passages in LORD MACMILLAN'S speech which lead to the view that the real distinction lies between that which is a public place, in the sense that any member of the public has
- F unrestricted access to it, on the one hand, and all other places which are subject to some restriction. Counsel went on to say that, in the present case, although others as well as the deceased might have obtained leave to go on the mole at Las Palmas, still the right to go there was restricted, leave was required, and the deceased obtained his leave by virtue of the fact that he was a member of the crew of this ship.

- G I cite one passage from LORD MACMILLAN'S speech on which counsel for the applicant particularly relied. LORD MACMILLAN said (101 L.J.K.B. 668):

- H "So long as the seaman on leave, whether quitting or returning to his ship, is in a public place where he might equally well be although he was not employed as a seaman, an accident befalling him there is not identifiable with his employment; it has not befallen him within the sphere of his employment, and it is not due to risks not shared by him with every member of the public."

That passage, like all other passages in the case, must, of course, be read in the light of its context, and I cannot take LORD MACMILLAN in that passage as meaning and intending that a seaman who loses his life, or is injured by a fall, is not disentitled to recover unless it is shown against him that at the time he suffered death or injury he was in exactly the same position as any member of the public at the place where he was killed or hurt. I think that that oversimplifies or over-states the point. It is, as counsel for the employers pointed out, essential to bear in mind that the overriding consideration is: Was the workman at the relevant time acting in the scope of his employment?—and the explanation, it is true, which the cases have added will entitle him to say that he was if his presence at the point where he met with the accident is so related to his employment as to lead to the conclusion that he was acting within its scope. It is, I think, quite possible to imagine cases in which a man might be in a place which was not open to every member of the public, that is to say, as regards which some restrictions were imposed (though they had not, in fact, prevented him being there), but in which the restrictions and the man's exemption from them would have nothing whatever to do with his employment so that he could not claim that his presence there was so closely related to his employment as to justify the conclusion that he was acting within its scope. A B

This is a difficult and, indeed, a tragic case, and it is necessary to look at the evidence. Two witnesses gave evidence which was relevant. The first was Captain Kay, the second officer of the ship, whose evidence was taken on commission. He was called by the employers, and said this at the end of his examination-in-chief:

“Q.—With regard to the wharf itself, is there a gate providing admission to it? A.—Yes, there is a gate at the inboard end of the sea—the land end of the mole—and a guard. C

Q.—I do not know whether you know the answer to this: Is admission to the public restricted or not? A.—It is absolutely unrestricted in my experience.”

That was taken up in cross-examination, and the following questions were put: D

“Q.—And the land gate is controlled by the civil police? A.—By the police, yes. There are three or four types of police there, as a matter of fact. They may have been special harbour police:

Q.—They may have been special harbour police, civil police, or what else? A.—Maybe a civil guard. There is a peculiar kind of uniform—there are four I can remember. There is certainly a policeman, a guard, on the gate. E

Q.—For the purpose of keeping unauthorised persons off? A.—Yes.

Q.—So a person without authority was not allowed on? A.—That is in theory. I find everybody, including all the rogues and vagabonds of Las Palmas, are allowed on that wharf. F

Q.—But the theory is that unauthorised persons are not allowed on? A.—That is what I presume.

Q.—Of course, [the deceased], whether he had permission or not to go ashore, was an authorised person to go back to his ship? A.—Oh, he is authorised on the wharf.”

The second witness, who was called for the applicant, was Hayden, the shipmate who had attempted to rescue the deceased. In examination-in-chief he said: G

“There is a gate with two policemen. Two little doorways for pedestrians, larger one for traffic. Gates permanently open. They are there to stop people coming on the mole. Spanish people—thieves. They stopped us coming back and asked what ship. [The deceased] stopped behind to relieve himself . . .”, H and then the next Hayden knew was hearing a cry for help. In cross-examination he said:

“Captain and chief officer know all hands go ashore at Las Palmas. Gates always open. Policemen keep order—deter obvious criminals. Several of them, dressed like generals.”

The last observation, I take it, refers to the police rather than to the criminals.

In face of that evidence, the learned county court judge came to this conclusion:

A "I have no doubt that the police would, especially at night, be, at any rate, in some way concerned to prevent known thieves obtaining access to the mole. They might well be on the look-out for persons entering or leaving the island without proper authority, or to prevent the entry of uncustomed goods, but in the absence of proper and cogent evidence of the regulations, or, at any rate, the practice governing ingress and egress of the public, I find it impossible to hold that the mole constituted, even at that time of night (following the language of LORD MACMILLAN in Northumbrian Shipping Co., Ltd. v. McCullum (1)) premises which [the deceased] was only entitled to traverse because he was going to or coming from his work. In my view, the present case much more closely resembles that of Charles R. Davidson & Co. v. M'Robb (3)."

B I find myself unable to accept the argument that that part of the learned judge's judgment is open to challenge. He is applying, as I think rightly, the law which was applicable. He is saying: "I have not been persuaded in this case, on the evidence which I have heard, that there was such a restriction on the right of persons to enter this part of the mole as entitles or justifies the deceased in saying, when he passed the gate: 'I am now acting in the course of my employment'." I think I should be merely repeating myself if I elaborated the matter. As I have said, I have not found this an easy case, but, once the real point is apprehended, it is, I think, a question for the judge to decide on the facts: Has the applicant proved her case that the deceased was acting in the course of his employment when he met with this calamity? The learned judge came to the conclusion that she had not so succeeded, and I cannot see that that conclusion ought to be set aside. I think, therefore, that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

E JENKINS, L.J.: I agree, and have nothing to add.

HODSON, L.J.: I also agree, and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Dubovie, Freeman & Co., agents for A. D. Abrahamson & Co., Liverpool (for the applicant); Lawrence Jones & Co., agents for Forwood, Williams & Co., Liverpool (for the employers).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

COWAN v. WRAYFORD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), October 14, 15, 16, 1953.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Notice by reason of breach by tenant of term of tenancy—Notice invalid—Validity of notice as general notice—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 24 (1), (2).

The plaintiff was the landlord and the defendant was the tenant of agricultural land to which the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, applied. By a notice in writing dated Sept. 29, 1951, the landlord required the tenant to remedy certain defects therein specified by Dec. 21, 1952. On Dec. 22, 1951, the landlord served on the tenant a notice to quit headed "Notice to quit by landlord to tenant stating reasons under s. 24 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948", the reasons stated being failure to remedy the defects specified in the notice of Sept. 29. In an action for possession based on the notice to quit of Dec. 22, 1951,

HELD: at the date when the notice to quit was served the time specified in the notice to remedy had not elapsed, and, therefore, the conditions laid down in s. 24 (2) (d) had not been fulfilled, and the notice could not operate as a valid notice under s. 24 (2); the landlord, having elected to proceed under s. 24 (2), and the notice not being a clear and unambiguous notice that if he wished to rely on it in the alternative as having been given under s. 24 (1), should he fail under s. 24 (2), could not rely on the notice as a general notice under s. 24 (1), it being essential for him to let the tenant know clearly under which sub-section he was proceeding; and, therefore, he was not entitled to possession.

Budge v. Hicks ([1951] 2 All E.R. 245), explained.

FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, s. 24, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 28, p. 46.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Phipps (P.) & Co. (Northampton & Towcester Breweries), Ltd. v. Rogers, [1925] 1 K.B. 14; 93 L.J.K.B. 1009; 132 L.T. 240; 89 J.P. 1; 31 Digest, Replacement, 496, 6221.
- (2) Budge v. Hicks, [1951] 2 All E.R. 245; [1951] 2 K.B. 335; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Hughes v. Metropolitan Ry. Co., (1877), 2 App. Cas. 439; 46 L.J.Q.B. 583; 36 L.T. 932; 31 Digest, Replacement, 556, 6757.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE PRATT at Newton Abbot County Court, dated July 27, 1953.

The plaintiff was landlord and the defendant was tenant of agricultural land to which the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, applied. By a notice in writing dated Sept. 29, 1951, the landlord required the tenant to remedy certain defects therein specified by Dec. 21, 1952. On Dec. 22, 1951, the landlord served on the tenant a notice in the following terms:

"Notice to quit by landlord to tenant stating reasons under s. 24 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. I, the undersigned, hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up on Dec. 25, 1952, possession of the holding known as . . . This notice is given for the following reasons: That you have failed to remedy the breaches of your tenancy agreement as set out in a notice served on you on Sept. 29, 1951, viz. . . ."

The tenant remained in possession, and on Feb. 16, 1953, the landlord commenced an action for possession in which he relied on the notice of Dec. 22, 1951, as terminating the tenancy. The tenant admitted the notices, but alleged in para. 2 of his defence,

A "the said tenancy has not been effectually determined for while the defendant admits receipt of the purported notice to quit (hereinafter called 'the second notice') it alleges failure to comply with the first notice (of Sept. 29, 1951) and was expressed to take effect during the period allowed to the defendant to carry out the said works required by the first notice, and there was, therefore, at the time of service of the second notice no ground as required by s. 24 (2) (d) (of the Act of 1948) entitling the plaintiff to serve the same".

B The landlord contended that, if the notice were inoperative under s. 24 (2) of the Act, it should operate under s. 24 (1), and, as the tenant had not served a counter-notice as required by s. 24 (1), he (the landlord) was entitled to possession without the Minister's consent. The county court judge held that the notice of Dec. 22, 1951, was not a valid notice to quit, and that the landlord, having elected to proceed under s. 24 (2), could not later proceed under s. 24 (1).

P. H. R. Bristow for the landlord.

Cripps for the tenant.

C SOMERVELL, L.J.: Section 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, is in these terms:

D "Where notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding is given to the tenant thereof, and not later than one month from the giving of the notice to quit the tenant serves on the landlord a counter-notice in writing requiring that this sub-section shall apply to the notice to quit, then, subject to the provisions of the next following sub-section, the notice to quit shall not have effect unless the Minister consents to the operation thereof".

From s. 24 (2) I shall read only the words which I think are material to the present case:

E "The foregoing sub-section shall not apply where . . . (d) at the date of the giving of the notice to quit the tenant had failed to comply with a notice in writing served on him by the landlord requiring him . . . within such reasonable period as was specified in the notice to remedy any breach by the tenant that was capable of being remedied of any term or condition of his tenancy which was not inconsistent with the fulfilment of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, and it is stated in the notice to quit that it is given by reason of the matter aforesaid".

F Of course, in a case where the landlord thinks he is entitled to bring those words into operation the tenant may desire to dispute that fact. Section 34 (1) provides:

G "Where the tenancy of an agricultural holding terminates by reason either—(a) of a notice to quit the holding given by the landlord; or (b) of a counter-notice given by the tenant under s. 32 of this Act after the giving to him of such a notice to quit part of the holding as is mentioned in that section; and in consequence of the notice or counter-notice, as the case may be, the tenant quits the holding, then, subject to the provisions of this section, compensation for the disturbance shall be payable by the landlord to the tenant in accordance with the provisions of this section: Provided that compensation shall not be payable under this sub-section where the operation of s. 24 (1) of this Act in relation to the notice to quit the holding or part, as the case may be, is excluded by virtue of . . . para. (d) . . . of sub-s. (2) of that section . . ."

So there is not only a difference in procedure, but also a financial difference affecting both landlord and tenant according to whether the landlord is able to establish a right to proceed under the words I have read from sub-s. (2) or has no case for bringing himself within those words, but serves an ordinary notice and does in fact get the Minister's consent if the counter-notice is served. In one case compensation for disturbance will be payable and in another case it will not.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It is not now suggested, and, indeed, could not be suggested, on the part of the landlord once the dates are looked at, that the notice to quit was a notice which was within the terms of s. 24 (2) (d), because to come within that provision the tenant must be shown to have failed to comply with a notice requiring him to remedy within a reasonable time, and so on. At the time when the notice to quit was served the time specified in what I will call the remedy notice had not elapsed, and, therefore, the conditions laid down in s. 24 (2) (d) had not been fulfilled. It, therefore, admittedly cannot operate under that sub-section. To succeed, the landlord must satisfy us that this was a good notice to quit irrespective of the breaches or alleged breaches referred to in the document and irrespective of s. 24 (2) (d). If it were a good notice irrespective of all those matters, then he submits (and this again is not disputed) that the tenant did not serve a counter-notice requiring that the Minister's consent should be sought and that the notice should not be operative unless that consent was obtained. In other words, the landlord submits that the court should treat this notice of Dec. 22, 1951, as if there was no reference in it to s. 24 (2) (d).

Many points as to notices to quit have been regarded as obscure, but one point is plain, and that is that a notice to quit, to be good, must be clear and unambiguous. That point will be found laid down and applied by this court in P. Phipps & Co. (Northampton & Towcester Breweries), Ltd. v. Rogers (1). The first point, therefore, as it seems to me is whether this document brought home to the tenant in clear and unambiguous language that the landlord was intending to terminate the tenancy subject to s. 24 (1) irrespective of any breaches by the tenant. I do not think it did. We were invited, and I think rightly, to consider this document and the meaning it would convey to a reasonable mind in the light of the Act. If one reads the notice to quit with the Act, in the first place it is plain that the case is not within s. 24 (2) (d), because the time for remedying had not elapsed. In those circumstances it might well be regarded as a piece of waste paper, something which is based, as I think it was in fact based, on a misconception as to the time limit in the original notice to remedy. If the tenant assumed that the landlord's agents had read the first document on which this second document was based, then, I think, he might well have concluded that this was an attempt in advance to bring about a termination if, but only if, he did in fact fail to remedy in the time which the earlier notice had specified. It was not suggested that if that was, as I think it was, a natural interpretation it would be a clear, unambiguous and valid notice to quit. It would, I think, probably fall under the principle which says notices to quit must not be conditional.

We were, however, invited to consider the matter on a rather wider ground, and I think that it is right to do so, because this Act does affect a great number of people and it would be right that we should seek to give what guidance we can on this wider point. If one assumes in the present case that the original remedy notice had been limited to expire on Dec. 21, 1951, and then, as happened here, on Dec. 22, 1951, a notice to quit in the form of the notice in this case giving reasons was served, and then the tenant, either by going to arbitration or, as this court held in Budge v. Hicks (2), by going to the county court, succeeded in showing that the landlord's claim failed not in form but on the facts, could the landlord maintain that he relied in the alternative on this document as what I would call an unqualified notice to quit not in any way based on s. 24 (2)—in other words, one to which s. 24 (1) applied—and then say: “As you did not serve your counter-notice the Minister’s consent is not necessary”. I do not think he could have done so. This notice states on the head of it that it is a “Notice to quit by landlord to tenant stating reasons under s. 24 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act”.

A The sub-paragraph of s. 24 (2) which is relied on is sub-para. (d). When a landlord is proceeding under that sub-section s. 24 (2) of the Act says that

“The foregoing sub-section (that is sub-s. (1) with its provisions as to serving notice) shall not apply . . .”

B I have already referred to the differences, not merely procedural, between the provisions of sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) as affecting both landlord and tenant. I think, therefore, that, if a landlord wishes to rely on a notice in the alternative as a general common law unqualified notice should he fail under s. 24 (2), that must appear on the face of the notice, or, as we were told in argument is sometimes done, two notices can be served. As against that it is said, and

C said rightly, that s. 26 (1) (a), which deals with the regulation-making power, contemplates cases where a landlord gives a notice which raises points under s. 24 (2) but which thereafter can be relied on as a notice under s. 24 (1), because it refers particularly to a power to make regulations for extending the period within which a counter-notice may be given by the tenant where arbitration has been required to deal with issues under sub-s. (2). I do not think there

D is any inconsistency between s. 26 (1) (a) and the conclusion to which I have come, because, as I have said, it is open to a landlord to make it clear, and as I think in one document, that he does wish the notice treated as an ordinary common law notice which would be within the meaning of sub-s. (1) should he fail under sub-s. (2). The words in s. 26 (1) (a) would be applicable in cases where obviously the main contention in the first instance would be under sub-s.

E (2) to prevent the tenant having to serve a counter-notice under sub-s. (1) at the time when he first received the notice. Therefore, I do not think there is any real inconsistency there.

I would refer to certain observations I made in Budge v. Hicks (2), where a notice had been served and the notice undoubtedly gave reasons. It

F read: “The reason for this notice is,” and so on, and the court held there that the notice was bad because it did not indicate on which of the relevant sub-sections of s. 24 the landlord was seeking to rely. The tenant had served a counter-notice under sub-s. (1), and the words which I used were obiter in the sense that they were not necessary to the decision, nor in that case was the point with which I am now dealing raised, namely, whether notices which

G on the face of them fall expressly under sub-s. (2) must always be taken to be good notices under sub-s. (1) if sub-s. (2) is inoperative? What I said was this ([1951] 2 All E.R. 247):

“When the tenant received the notice he served the counter-notice contemplated by s. 24 (1). The notice to quit was good in the sense that

H the length of notice which is laid down by the Act was complied with . . . I think one has to regard it as a notice which falls under . . . s. 24 (1) with certain words added to explain the reason why it was served, but that does not affect its legal nature.”

It is to be noted that in the notice in that case there was no express reference to s. 24 (2). It is also to be noted that the tenant in that case had in fact taken it as a notice which might be valid under sub-s. (1) and had served his counter-notice. In case anybody wishes to quote these words in future I think it would be better if I had put it in this form:

“Assuming in the landlord’s favour that this notice to quit was a good notice which required a counter-notice under sub-s. (1)”, and then gone on to show that he had lost his rights. However, the notice was in a different form, but I do not think those words I used there should be relied on as deciding the point or throwing any real light on the point being decided in the present case. A

For these reasons I think the learned judge was right. He held that the notice to quit was not a valid notice to quit and I agree with him on that point. He also held that the landlord, having elected to proceed under s. 24 (2), could not in the circumstances of this case later proceed under s. 24 (1). I hope I have made it clear that I do not put it precisely in that way. I would have said that this notice to quit was not a clear and unambiguous general notice of which the landlord might avail himself in the alternative. He then dealt with an issue of estoppel which it is unnecessary to determine. Speaking for myself, I think in the circumstances of this case one might find an estoppel in law, but so far as appears from the learned judge’s notes of the evidence I do not think there was sufficient evidence which would justify a finding on those grounds. For those reasons I would dismiss this appeal. B C

DENNING, L.J.: If this notice to quit could be considered at common law without any regard to the Act, I should have thought it was a perfectly good notice. The operative words are clear and unambiguous, and all that is wrong is that it states a bad reason. At common law a landlord need give no reason at all. Even if he gives a bad or an inapposite reason I should not have thought it would invalidate the notice. But this case cannot be considered at common law apart from the Act. The ancient script of the common law has been over-written by the Act, and the two have to be integrated together. In order that a notice to quit an agricultural holding should be good, it must be clear and unambiguous, and for that purpose it must either be a simple notice without stating reasons at all, in which case it will operate under s. 24 (1), or it must be a notice stating reasons as prescribed by sub-s. (2), in which case it will operate under sub-s. (2). The consequences of giving a notice which is intended to operate under sub-s. (1) are so different from the consequences of a notice under sub-s. (2) that it is imperative that the landlord should make it clear under which of those two sub-sections he is proceeding. Just as in the case of Budge v. Hicks (2), this court held that under sub-s. (2) the landlord must make it clear under which sub-paragraph he was proceeding, so also under the whole of s. 24 he must make it clear whether he is proceeding under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2). In this case the notice was purported to be given under sub-s. (2), but, considered as such, it was a bad notice because it said the tenant had failed to remedy certain breaches, whereas in fact the period allowed for remedy had not then expired. It being a bad notice under sub-s. (2), it is not, in my judgment, now permissible for the landlord to pray it in aid as a notice under sub-s. (1). It certainly was not a clear and unambiguous notice for that purpose. If the landlord had intended to go under sub-s. (1), he should have made it quite clear. D E F

On the further point of estoppel I think there was a great deal to be said for the judge’s view that the tenant was led to think that if he completed the work by December, 1952, then the landlord would not seek to eject him. Following Hughes v. Metropolitan Ry. Co. (3) it may well be that if the tenant did the work in the permitted time, the landlord would not be allowed to insist on this notice to quit. It is unnecessary, however, to come to any conclusion on that point. It is sufficient to say that the notice to quit was bad and that the appeal fails accordingly. G H

ROMER, L.J.: The notice to quit purported plainly to be given under s. 24 (2) of the Act of 1948. There is no question as to that, having regard to the reference to s. 24 (2) in the notice itself and to the terms in which the notice was couched. But that it failed to qualify as a good notice under s. 24 (2) cannot be disputed. The only question, therefore, is whether it can be preserved as a valid general notice to quit giving rise to the tenant's rights which are conferred by s. 24 (1). Of course, there may be cases where a landlord serves
A a notice to quit primarily invoking sub-s. (2), but which may be expressed to be, or which may be fairly regarded as being, in the alternative a general notice. I think, however, that prima facie if a lessor elects to proceed in a particular way which gives rise to particular rights in the tenant he cannot, if he fails, treat his notice as founded on a different approach which would have dictated a different course of action by the tenant. It is certain that
B an unsuccessful notice under sub-s. (2) cannot automatically be converted, when it fails, into a general notice to quit, and indeed, if it could be, considerable hardship might be inflicted on the landlord, who might be only desirous of getting the tenant out provided he got him out in such circumstances that he would not have to pay compensation. He might not desire to get him out by determining the tenancy by a general or ordinary notice to quit, which
C would involve the payment of compensation. As I say, it is, therefore, impossible, I think, to suggest that a notice founded on sub-s. (2), if it fails, must be converted of necessity into a notice under sub-s. (1); and I quite agree with my brethren that the lessor must indicate under which he elects to go.

In the present case I can see no reason why the landlord should be able to say that, in the alternative, his notice should operate as a general notice. The D fact that it expressly referred to s. 24 (2) would be calculated to suggest to the tenant that the lessor was nailing his colours to that mast and to nothing else, and that, therefore, it would be quite inappropriate for him (the tenant) to take action under sub-s. (1). But at the lowest the document would, I think, give rise in this connection to ambiguity as to the lessor's intention, and it is well established that notices to quit must be plain and unequivocal. Further,
E I think the notice to quit offended the principle of certainty as to its meaning in another way, because it had to be construed in the light of all relevant surrounding circumstances, and one of the circumstances was the service of the notice to remedy and the terms in which that notice had been expressed. That notice gave until Dec. 21, 1952, to do the work which was specified in the notice. There was no reason why the tenant should think a mistake had
F been made, and indeed it was suggested with some force in argument that having regard to the reference in the notice to remedy

“to clean and properly cultivate eastern portion of field 1125”, which is a job which can be done in a short space of time, but can be done much more efficiently in a long space of time, the document could fairly be

G taken to mean what it said. That first notice was never cancelled; and a little while afterwards the notice to quit arrived. Accordingly, the tenant might well think, as in fact he did think, that it merely meant that unless he complied with the notice to remedy, he would have to go. Accordingly, I agree that the notice to quit gave rise to an ambiguity in that sense also and cannot be treated as a good and valid notice.

H On the final question whether the particular equity to which LORD CAIRNS, L.C., and LORD SELBORNE referred in Hughes v. Metropolitan Ry. Co. (3) applies, it seems to me that there is a difficulty in relying on that in this case. Here the point, as I understood it, shortly, was that the landlord, having acquired certain rights by virtue of the tenant's breach of covenant, elected to exercise one particular right, from which the inference would arise that he released the others and that by serving the notice to remedy he was relinquishing any other rights which might arise from the breach of covenant to which the notice referred.

The argument is that having done that, he could not, as he purported to do, serve a notice to quit founded on exactly the same breaches of covenant a short time afterwards. When I say founded on the same breaches of covenant, that is, I think, a true statement having regard to the strict terms in which the notice to quit was framed. The reasons given in the notice to quit were not that the tenant had failed to remedy the breaches within the time specified by the notice to remedy, but simply that he had failed to remedy what were exactly the same breaches as the ones to which the first notice referred. As I say, I do not think as at present advised that the suggested equity could avail the landlord here, because, first, there was no evidence that any consideration moved from the tenant to the landlord for what would on this view be an entirely voluntary release of legal rights; nor was there any evidence that the tenant altered his position on the faith of some implied promise by the landlord. In the absence of either consideration or of a change by the tenant of his position, it seems to me that the equity in question does not arise in the present case. I agree with my brethren that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Smith & Hudson, agents for Harold Michelmores & Co., Newton Abbot (for the landlord); Baileys, Shaw & Gillett, agents for Tozers, Newton Abbot (for the tenant).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

KINNANE v. KINNANE.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), October 6, 7, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance—Wilful neglect to maintain child—Validity of order in favour of wife.

The parties were married in 1940 and there was one child of the marriage. After a separation, the parties came together again in May, 1952, the husband then agreeing to pay the wife £6 a week for housekeeping and maintenance. Later, that sum was reduced to £3 a week. On Jan. 3, 1953, the husband left the matrimonial home and after that date he paid the wife £1 a week as maintenance for the child. The wife issued summonses under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, alleging that the husband had deserted her and wilfully neglected to maintain her. On Feb. 11, 1953, the justices dismissed the summons for desertion on the ground that the husband's departure was not against the will of the wife "as she had stated she had not wanted him to return [in May, 1952], but had given him a chance, and she did not wish him to return now [at the hearing]". They found the husband guilty of wilful neglect to maintain and ordered him to pay the wife £3 10s. a week, being £2 for herself and £1 10s. in respect of the child. The husband appealed, contending that, in effect, the justices found the separation to have been consensual, and that, since there was no agreement, express or implied, that he should continue to maintain his wife, the justices' finding of wilful neglect to maintain her could not be supported. The wife cross-appealed against the dismissal of her summons for desertion.

HELD: (i) on the facts the justices were entitled to find the husband guilty of wilful neglect to maintain the child; an order for the maintenance of the child was in law an order in favour of the wife; and, therefore, the justices had power to make the order which they made for the maintenance of the wife.

(ii) in any event, even assuming that the separation on Jan. 3, 1953, was consensual, on the facts it was agreed to on the implied undertaking that the husband's liability to support the wife and child continued; and (iii) on the facts the husband had deserted the wife.

AS TO WILFUL NEGLECT TO MAINTAIN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 838, para. 1340; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 701-703, Nos. 6703-6721.

Cases referred to:

- A (1) Harriman v. Harriman, [1909] P. 123; 78 L.J.P. 62; 100 L.T. 557; 73 J.P. 193; 27 Digest, Replacement, 363, 3005.
(2) Baker v. Baker, (1949), 66 (pt. 1) T.L.R. 81; 27 Digest, Replacement, 82, 630.

APPEAL by the husband and CROSS-APPEAL by the wife against a decision of Luton borough justices dated Feb. 11, 1953.

- B The parties were married in October, 1940, and in 1943 the child of the marriage was born. Later, the parties separated, but they were reconciled in May, 1952, the husband agreeing to pay the wife £6 a week for housekeeping and as maintenance. Subsequently that amount was reduced to £3 a week. On Jan. 3, 1953, the husband left the wife. He was then £15 in arrears of the weekly payments to her and after that date he paid her only £1 a week as maintenance in respect of the child. The wife issued summonses under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, alleging that the husband had deserted her and had wilfully neglected to provide her with reasonable maintenance. The justices dismissed the summons for desertion, but found that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide the wife with reasonable maintenance and ordered him to pay her the sum of £3 10s. a week, being £2 for the wife and £1 10s. for the child, the custody of whom they gave to the wife. The husband appealed against the finding of the justices on the second summons, and the wife, having obtained leave for an extension of time, cross-appealed against the dismissal of the summons for desertion.

- D
E D. R. Ellison for the husband.
T. H. K. Berry for the wife.

- F LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the facts and continued: The justices dismissed the charge of desertion on the ground that the parting was not against the will of the wife, but was, in effect, a consensual separation. From that it is argued by the husband that not only can there be no order on the ground of desertion, as, indeed, there is not, but also that the order on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain necessarily fails because, if the separation was consensual, there is no finding that there was any agreement, express or implied, that it was on the basis that the husband would continue to maintain his wife, so that the order of the justices is bad, except as to the award of £1 10s. a week in respect of maintenance for the child. I do not think there is any difficulty about the law. The difficulty in this case is to see what is the proper inference from facts which are, to a large extent, not in dispute. But I think it is necessary at the outset to remind ourselves once more of the underlying basis of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, and that is, in a sentence, that it is the wife who is the applicant and that it is in her favour, and in that of nobody but her, that whichever of the permitted orders the court decides to make is made*. We talk loosely of an order for the children. It is not an order for the children. Although under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5 (b), the custody of the children might be awarded to the wife, there was nothing in that Act about any support for the children at all. It was not until the Married

* For the special circumstances in which a husband may be the applicant, see Licensing Act, 1902, s. 5 (2), the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, s. 1 (3), and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 11 (2).

Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, that it was provided by s. 1 (1) that, in addition to any of the other orders which might be made for the wife, a sum, then limited to 10s. a week as a maximum, might be ordered to be paid to her in respect of any child of whom she was given the custody. That amount is now 30s., and the wife's maximum amount is £5 instead of £2, but, as I read the amending Acts, no alteration whatever has been made in the fundamental conception that whatever order is made is an order in the wife's favour. A separation order can theoretically be made if any of her complaints is proved, although, as has been laid down by the Court of Appeal, justices should not make a separation order unless, in the exercise of their discretion, they consider that it is necessary for the protection of the wife. An order for the custody of the children is an order in favour of the wife. Justices have no power under the Act of 1895 to order custody of the children to the husband, and any sum awarded for the maintenance of the wife, and any sum ordered to be paid to the wife for the support of the children is, as it always has been, an order for the wife. Speaking generally, any of these orders, as I read the code, can only be made if it is established that one of the complaints made by the wife under the code is found to be proved. In other words, I reject the argument that an order cannot be made in favour of the wife for the maintenance of the wife unless it is founded on wilful refusal to provide reasonable maintenance for her, or, put the other way, that, if the only finding is that there has been wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the infant children whom the husband is legally liable to maintain, no order for maintenance of the wife can be made. I do not think that is the law. It may be that the amount which a court thinks reasonable as an award in favour of a wife may depend on whether the neglect has been of the wife or of the children or both, but, in my opinion, the right to make an order is established when the justices are satisfied that any one of the complaints set out in the Act of 1895, s. 4, is proved.

That principle is important in this case. After the parting the husband sent the wife only £1 a week as maintenance for the child. The justices have thought it right to quantify the reasonable amount to be paid to the wife in respect of the child as £1 10s. and it is admitted that the inference is that they did not think the amount sent by the husband, even for the maintenance of the child, was reasonable. Therefore, there has been neglect to pay reasonable maintenance in respect of the child whom he was legally liable to support. That being so, I should be prepared to hold that the whole order can be supported. If, now that the maximum amount which may be ordered to be paid to a wife is £5, the justices had chosen to say that they would order this wife to receive £3 10s. and had not apportioned that sum between wife and child, in my opinion, that order could not have been challenged. But I do not think we can decide this case solely on that narrow ground. This is one of those cases in which the question of the wife's right to support for herself is bound up with the question whether or not she has been deserted and I will examine the case from that point of view. It sounds a logical argument and one at first sight difficult to answer, that, as the justices have found there was no desertion because the wife was not unwilling that the husband should leave her, it, therefore, follows that the separation was consensual, and, there being no finding that there was any agreement, express or implied, to pay maintenance, therefore, she cannot recover under any head whatever—even though, as I have already said, it is admitted to be implicit in the justices' findings that there has been neglect to provide a reasonable amount in respect of the child.

On the assumption for the moment that the separation was consensual, I will deal with the question whether or not it was on the footing that the husband expressly or impliedly agreed to maintain his wife. Manifestly, the question must not be approached on the basis that there is some underlying presumption that a husband is liable to support his wife and that an agreement to continue to do so ought necessarily to be inferred. I do not think that will do. If a wife deliberately chooses to walk out of the matrimonial home even with the tacit consent of her husband, it does not necessarily import that he has agreed to support her outside the matrimonial home. There is abundant authority for that proposition. But that is not this case. This is a case in which a husband, having already left home on an earlier occasion, has begged to be reinstated, and as a condition of reinstatement has agreed to a fixed sum by way of maintenance.

A I will assume that the agreement was varied, and that he was not in the wrong in the first instance in halving the amount which he had promised to pay, but that at the time immediately preceding the separation there was a de facto agreement to pay £3 at least for the maintenance of himself, his wife and the child. Then he is found by the justices to have packed his suitcase before the final quarrel, and to have done so with the deliberate intention of leaving the wife. There is a quarrel on Jan. 3 which resulted in his leaving, thus, as the justices find, wilfully bringing to an end the existing state of cohabitation. Now, if words mean anything (and there is ample evidence to support these findings) there is a clear concurrence of the intention to desert and the fact of separation wilfully brought about by the action of the husband. But the justices go on:

C “The [husband’s] action in leaving was not against the will of the [wife] as she had stated she had not wanted him to return in the first place [in May, 1952] but had given him a chance, and she did not wish him to return now [at the hearing].”

D It seems to me that, even if that is to be taken to mean that she was a party to this separation, the natural implication from the facts is that she consented to it only on the basis that the maintenance continued. To some extent that is recognised by the husband’s own conduct in sending the maintenance of £1 a week, though, in my opinion, he had no right to limit that to the support of the child, and, if the finding that it was a consensual separation is correct, I should be prepared to hold that the surrounding circumstances lead to the inference that it was on the basis that the husband undertook to continue to support the wife and child.

E But I do not think that this was a consensual separation. One does not need to rely on the authority of BUCKLEY, L.J., in a passage ([1909] P. 148) in Harriman v. Harriman (1) for the proposition that

F “Desertion does not necessarily involve that the wife desires her husband to remain with her. She may be thankful that he has gone, but he may nevertheless have deserted her.”

G For that there is abundant authority, apart from that passage. It is one thing to say that this wife took the husband back reluctantly, and to give him a chance. Nevertheless, they resumed cohabitation and she was willing to continue the cohabitation so long as he supported her and the child, and she had done nothing, as I understand it, and nothing is found against her to the contrary, to depart from that attitude until, having made up his mind to go, the husband took advantage of a quarrel to leave her. Supposing, at the moment when he announced his intention of walking out of the house, the wife said: “Well, I don’t mind your going. I shall be thankful to see the last of you. But let us understand what this means. What are you suggesting about the future?” and the husband said: “Please understand that the moment I am outside the front door I wash my hands of you altogether. I have no further liability to support you or the child”. It is unnecessary to ask the rhetorical question: “What would her answer to that have been?” I decline to hold that she is to be taken to have consented to a parting on those terms; of course she did not; and to say that, because at the hearing of her charge of desertion she said she did not then want her husband back because of the way he had treated her in the past and was likely to treat her in the future, she was prevented from asserting that he had deserted her, is, in my opinion, to fly in the face of authority. I cannot see that there is any evidence of her consenting to a parting on the basis that the husband was entitled to shed his responsibility for her and the child. It is really a corollary of the corresponding question of the wilful neglect to maintain, and, in my opinion, the fundamental criticism of the justices' conclusion is that, for a wrong reason, as I think, they have found that the husband's intention to desert, put into effect by the fact of separation, was not desertion because the wife was not unwilling to see the last of him. That decision, in my opinion, was fundamentally wrong, and has given rise to the argument that the finding of wilful neglect to maintain is in conflict with the dismissal of the desertion charge.

The reality of the matter, in my opinion, is that on the facts of this case as found by the justices, the husband intended to desert, gave effect to that intention by the overt act of leaving the matrimonial home and of paying an inadequate amount by way of maintenance afterwards, and that there is nothing in the wife's conduct which disentitles her to charge the husband with desertion and to succeed on that basis as well as on the basis of wilful neglect to maintain.

For these reasons, whichever way one looks at it, in my opinion, this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

PEARCE, J.: I agree. The order based on wilful neglect to maintain can be supported on the narrow ground that on the admitted facts the justices could find wilful neglect to maintain the child. This would entitle them to make an order in favour of the wife. Since the order is for £1 10s. for the child (and £2 for the wife), it appears that the justices considered that to be the proper amount of maintenance. It follows that the £1 which the husband paid for the child unaccompanied by any provision for the wife cannot have been adequate maintenance for the child when one considers the added difficulty and expense of maintaining a child when the mother is forced to work to support herself.

The order can also be upheld on the broader ground of failure to maintain both wife and child. Starting from the principle laid down in Baker v. Baker (2) one has to investigate the facts of the case to see whether the circumstances of the separation (if it did not amount to desertion) raised the implication of a continuing liability by the husband to support his wife. When one considers the history of this marriage, and the background and the facts surrounding the parting as my Lord had set them out, I am led to the belief that, if there was any consensual separation, it was on the implied understanding by both parties that the husband's liability to support continued.

I agree also with what my Lord has said with regard to the issue of desertion. I think that the justices were wrong in drawing the inference that the wife consented to the parting. In my opinion, the husband's appeal must be dismissed and the wife's cross-appeal on the dismissal of her summons for desertion allowed.

Appeal of husband dismissed. Cross-appeal of wife allowed.

Solicitors: Turner & Evans, agents for John Q. Clayton & Co., Luton (for the husband); Lathom & Co., Luton (for the wife).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

CHRISTIE OWEN & DAVIES, LTD. v. STOCKTON.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), October 12, 13, 1953.]

Estate Agent—Commission—Agreement to pay commission “should the owner withdraw after having accepted an offer to purchase by a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract”—Sale of business agreed by vendor and purchaser to be subject to contract—Refusal of vendor to complete.

A The defendant instructed the plaintiffs, a firm of estate agents, to sell his business, and the terms of his agreement with them provided (inter alia) that, “should the owner withdraw after having accepted an offer to purchase by a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract”, the plaintiffs should be paid their commission. The plaintiffs introduced a prospective purchaser who was able and willing to enter into a formal contract, and the defendant came to an oral agreement with him for the sale of the business. It was agreed by both parties that the agreement should be subject to contract. The prospective purchaser's solicitors, on receiving the draft contract, made certain revisions to it, which the defendant's solicitors said they would advise the defendant to accept, but after the prospective purchaser had signed his part of the contract and given his solicitors a cheque for the deposit, the defendant refused to proceed with the sale.

D HELD: “offer” meant a firm offer which was capable of being turned into a contract by acceptance: dicta of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in Bennett, Walden & Co. v. Wood ([1950] 2 All E.R. 136), applied; and the words “after having accepted an offer” meant “after that offer had been turned into a contract by acceptance”; an offer to purchase “subject to contract” was inconsistent with the person making the offer being willing to purchase, because the words “subject to contract” prevented the matter from going beyond the realms of negotiation: dicta of COHEN, L.J., in Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade ([1950] 1 All E.R. 861), applied; further, such an offer could not be accepted in the legal sense of the word “acceptance”; and, therefore, there had been no firm offer which could have been accepted, and it could not be said that the defendant had withdrawn, and, accordingly, the plaintiffs were not entitled to their commission.

F AS TO ESTATE AGENTS' COMMISSION, see HALSBURY, Simonds Edn., Vol. 1, p. 198, para. 457; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 1, pp. 488-493, Nos. 1664-1692, and pp. 512-514, Nos. 1770-1776.

Cases referred to:

- G (1) Bennett, Walden & Co. v. Wood, [1950] 2 All E.R. 134; 2nd Digest Supp.
(2) Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade, [1950] 1 All E.R. 856; [1950] 2 K.B. 257; 2nd Digest Supp.
(3) Eccles v. Bryant & Pollock, [1947] 2 All E.R. 865; [1948] 1 Ch. 93; [1948] L.J.R. 418; 12 Digest, Replacement, 70, 396.
(4) Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper, [1941] 1 All E.R. 33; [1941] A.C. 108; 110 L.J.K.B. 131; 164 L.T. 313; 2nd Digest Supp.

H ACTION for money due and owing by way of commission.

On Feb. 28, 1952, the defendant, who was the lessee of premises known as “The Turn of the Way” in Earl's Court Road, London, W.8, and the owner of the restaurant business carried on there, instructed the plaintiffs, who were estate agents, valuers and auctioneers, in writing to offer the property for sale by private treaty for £3,500. In consideration of the plaintiffs' so doing, he agreed in writing to pay them commission in respect of any completed transaction, and he was also to pay their commission should he withdraw

"after having accepted an offer to purchase by a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract."

The plaintiffs offered the property for sale and introduced a Mr. Hannay as a prospective purchaser. On Apr. 24, 1952, there was a meeting between the defendant and Mr. Hannay which resulted in Mr. Hannay agreeing to purchase the business for £2,800. Both parties agreed that that should be subject to contract. On May 6, 1952, the defendant's solicitors sent the draft contract to Mr. Hannay's solicitors, and on May 27, 1952, it was returned to them with certain revisions. On May 28, 1952, the defendant's solicitors wrote to Mr. Hannay's solicitors saying that they would advise the defendant to accept the revisions. On June 5, 1952, Mr. Hannay signed his part of the contract and paid a cheque for the deposit to his solicitors. On June 12, 1952, the defendant's solicitors wrote to Mr. Hannay's solicitors informing them that the defendant did not propose to proceed with the proposed sale of the business to Mr. Hannay. The plaintiffs claimed their commission from the defendant under the terms of their agreement.

Desmond Neligan for the plaintiffs.

Harold Lightman for the defendant.

SLADE, J., stated the facts and continued: I have no hesitation in finding as facts, first, that Mr. Hannay was at all material times able to find the sum of £2,800 necessary to complete a transaction of this kind; secondly, that Mr. Hannay was at all material times in the colloquial sense not only willing, but anxious, to buy this restaurant, the goodwill, and the lease, for the sum of £2,800; and, thirdly, that it was through no fault of his (Mr. Hannay's) that the transaction did not mature into a binding contract followed by completion.

Having thus dealt with the facts, I have to return to the agency contract. The rights of the parties depend entirely on the language of the contract between them, that is to say, the agency contract, and the proper interpretation of that language. Counsel on both sides have told me that they have been unable to find any case where the language of an agency contract was substantially the same as the language in the present case, and I myself have been equally unsuccessful. I do not think it is of very great assistance to look at decisions on other contracts unless the contracts are substantially identical with the terms of the one which I have to construe. The agency contract itself defines the events on the happening of which the plaintiffs are to become entitled to commission. The events are twofold. For convenience during the argument we called them (A) and (B). (A) was: "Commission is payable by the owner in respect of any completed transaction pertaining to the premises," and (B) was:

"Should the owner withdraw after having accepted an offer to purchase by a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract then [the plaintiffs] shall be paid their commission."

Counsel for the plaintiffs says that he relies on what I have called (B). However, it is material to look at (A): "Commission is payable . . . in respect of any completed transaction . . ." because (B) is, I think, clearly used in contradistinction to (A). Although it is not necessary for me to construe (A), I should say that a completed transaction not only means a transaction which has proceeded to completion—that is to say, in the case, for example, of the sale of freehold premises, by conveyance, or, in the case of leasehold premises, by assignment or an under-lease, and in each case by an assignment of the goodwill of the business, and so on—but also includes the case where the transaction has been completed in equity, that is to say, when a binding and enforceable contract has been signed by both parties to the transaction, or at least by the party to be charged, and which can, in a proper case, be enforced by an order for specific performance. Those are the two events which, I think, are included in (A). Although, in the second case, completion has not taken place, the transaction may well be said to have been a completed transaction, in the sense that the right to the property has passed to the purchaser in equity. The effect of (B) is this. First, the agents, that is to say, the plaintiffs, must introduce a person who is able and willing to enter into a formal contract; secondly, that person must manifest his willingness to do so by making an offer; thirdly, the owner must accept that offer; and, fourthly, having accepted that offer, the owner must withdraw, and when those requirements are fulfilled the agents are expressed to be entitled to their commission, although by reason of the withdrawal the transaction is never completed. It is, of course, open to a principal and an agent to enter into any agreement they are mutually willing to make, and to provide for any event, or any number of events, on the happening of which the right of the agent to his remuneration shall arise. The only question in any particular case is to see what those events are by construing the language which the parties have used. Counsel for the defendant contends that all that is covered by (B) is the case where a prospective vendor and a prospective purchaser, having agreed on the terms of the contract into which they propose to enter, enter orally into a contract containing those terms. Then, as the contract is purely oral and there is no memorandum of it in writing such as is required by s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, although it is a perfectly valid and legal contract, it is a contract which the law will not enforce. He says that that is the true construction of (B), and is clear, first, from the use of the word "offer", secondly, from the use of the word "accepted", thirdly, from the use of the word "withdraw", and (one might also add), fourthly, from the use of the words "formal contract."

I confess I find it difficult to envisage a person who can be said to be able and willing to enter into a formal contract of which no one knows the terms, or of which one only knows one of the terms, such as the price. I should have thought that "a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract" means a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract of which the terms have already been agreed, albeit orally. First, counsel for the defendant says the word "offer" means, and can only mean, a firm offer, that is to say, an offer which is capable of being turned into a contract by acceptance, that "acceptance" is the word for the process used by the offeree in turning the offer into a contract, and that the word "withdraw" of necessity implies that the contract is an unenforceable one because one party to a contract cannot withdraw from it if it is an enforceable contract. He can fail to perform it or he can refuse to perform it, but he cannot withdraw from it because he is legally bound, and, indeed, in a proper case may be enjoined, to perform it. Counsel says that the word "offer" used in a contract of this nature has been held by the Court of Appeal to connote a firm offer. That appears to be so from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bennett, Walden & Co. v. Wood (1), where the words of the agency contract were that the agents were to be entitled to commission on "securing for you an offer," that is to say, precisely the same word "offer" was used as in the agency contract in this case. It was held:

"on a proper construction of the words 'securing for you an offer' the word 'offer' meant a firm offer which by acceptance would give rise to a contractual relationship. An offer subject to contract lacked that essential characteristic, for its acceptance did not create a contract, and the plaintiffs were, therefore, not entitled to commission."

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 136):

"To decide the present case, that . . . is all I need refer to of the facts of the case. The question is solely this: By the phrase in the letter of Oct. 7, 'securing for you an offer,' is it contemplated that something short of what is ordinarily called a firm offer will do? Is it sufficient, in order that the agents shall earn their commission, that they should provide or produce something which, though expressed to be an agreement to purchase on the terms of an offer, is, in truth, no more than a proposal in the negotiations? To my mind, the answer to that question is in the negative."

I can see no distinction in principle between the words "an offer to purchase by a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract" and the words "securing for you an offer", so far as the meaning of the word "offer" is concerned. Therefore, quite apart from other considerations, I should hold the word "offer" in the agency contract that I have to consider to mean "an offer capable of being turned into a contract by acceptance." Equally, I should regard the words "after having accepted an offer" as meaning "after that offer had been turned into a contract by acceptance," albeit (there being no memorandum) an unenforceable contract.

I also derive assistance in arriving at the conclusion at which I have arrived from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (2), where the words of the agency contract were: "... in the event of our introducing a person or persons willing and able to purchase ...". I am not concerned with ability to purchase here—Mr. Hannay always possessed that—but with willingness to purchase, in the light of the words in the contract. I have to construe the words "a person willing to enter into a formal contract." In Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (2) the Court of Appeal held that a mere offer to purchase subject to contract was inconsistent with the view that the person making the offer was a willing purchaser, because all he was prepared to do to manifest his willingness was to enter into an agreement in the colloquial sense, which, by the addition of the words "subject to contract", prevented the matter from going beyond the realm of negotiations and gave him what COHEN, L.J., described as a locus poenitentiae to withdraw from the so-called agreement at any stage until the contracts envisaged by the agreement became binding, that is to say, according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Eccles v. Bryant & Pollock (3), not only until the parties had signed the contracts and both were ready to exchange contracts, but until the exchange of the signed contracts was actually effected. In Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (2) COHEN, L.J., said this ([1950] 1 All E.R. 861):

"In reaching my conclusion I am not saying that the introduction into the preliminary arrangements of the expression 'subject to contract' would necessarily in all cases prevent the agent establishing that the person he introduced was willing to purchase. It clearly would not be fatal to the agent's claim if it was introduced by the vendor in accepting an unqualified offer, but, if it was introduced by the prospective purchaser, the normal inference would be that he did so with a view to reserving to himself a locus poenitentiae, conduct which seems to me inconsistent with the view that he is a willing purchaser."

Where you have an agreement made subject to contract there are four possible outcomes of that so-called agreement. The first one is a completed transaction; the second one is a legally enforceable contract, but one which, at the time when the agent issues his writ claiming commission, for example, has not yet actually proceeded to completion; the third one is a contract, but a contract which is not legally enforceable; and the fourth one is a state of affairs which has never passed beyond the realm of negotiation. Of those four possible outcomes I think the first two, as I have said, are covered by (A) in the agency contract. The third one is the one which, as I construe the phraseology of (B), (B) is designed to cover, because there there is an offer in the sense of a firm offer, an acceptance of the offer, and a person who not only has been willing, but has, in fact, shown his willingness, to enter into a formal contract, the terms of which are, ex hypothesi, already agreed, though not then reduced into writing. Accordingly, there is a position in which a person can lawfully withdraw, because the contract, as I have said, is an unenforceable one. With regard to the fourth outcome, where nothing has proceeded beyond the stage of negotiation, it is, of course, open to a principal and agent to arrive at any agreement they choose, and many attempts have been made by highly reputable estate agents, like the plaintiffs, to hit on a form of phraseology which will prevent a person who has had the benefit of their services and has gone right up to the point of being about to put his pen to sign a contract, from discarding, either from caprice, or, more likely, because at the last moment he receives a better offer, any moral obligation he may have incurred and merely resiling from the negotiations in order to get more money. I feel considerable sympathy with any agent who takes steps to secure a contract which will protect him from being deprived of the remuneration which he might reasonably have expected to receive for his services by perfectly lawful conduct on the part of his principal of that kind, but if he wants to make a form of contract which will render the principal liable to pay him commission on a transaction which has never got beyond the realm of negotiation (that is to say, on the fourth possible outcome of an agreement subject to contract), he must make it perfectly clear to his principal that that is one of the events on which he is to be entitled to commission. I am not suggesting any form—I can imagine it is a very difficult problem—but it seems to me that the principle which counsel for the plaintiffs has advanced so powerfully does involve my construing what I have called (B) in this way: “Should the owner withdraw after having accepted an offer subject to contract to purchase by a person able and willing to enter into a formal contract, to the terms of which he is at the moment in ignorance, then [the plaintiffs] shall be paid their commission.” Even then the word “accept”, except in the colloquial sense, is inappropriate, because you cannot in the legal sense accept an offer which is expressed to be subject to contract.

I was reminded of the words of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (4), although I think that there he was dealing with offers in the sense of firm offers, and not offers subject to contract, where he said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 47):

“It is possible that an owner may be willing to bind himself to pay a commission for the mere introduction of one who offers to purchase at the specified or minimum price, but such a construction of the contract would, in my opinion, require clear and unequivocal language.”

A fortiori, I think it would require clear and unequivocal language to provide that the principal should be liable to the agent for commission in a case where the offer is subject to contract, when the acceptance is only a colloquial acceptance of something which is incapable of being turned into a contract, when there is no formal contract at the time of the acceptance, and the terms of any formal contract which may thereafter come into existence have not even been negotiated, and when the word “withdraw” can only apply to withdrawal from negotiations because there is nothing else from which to withdraw. If it is to be provided that, in those circumstances, the agents are entitled to commission, it must be so stated in the agency contract in the plainest possible terms. Moreover, I find it difficult to see how the responsibility for having withdrawn (because this only applies if the owner withdraws) can be imputed to one person rather than to the other when the negotiations fail to reach fruition simply because the parties are unable to agree on the terms of the contract.

For those reasons, in my judgment, this action fails. In so saying I should like to add that my sympathies are entirely with the plaintiffs, and it is only right to say that the document which they invited the principal to sign is quite irreproachable in its form. The commissions charged are those fixed by the recognised professional institutions, the document is in large print, and, to make assurance double sure, the contract contains a separate sheet which is retained by the principal and sets out the terms as to commission in an equally legible form, so that the principal is at all times fully aware of the terms on which he has availed himself of the agent's services. In a word, throughout this case, the plaintiffs have behaved with exemplary propriety, but I cannot allow that fact to influence my judgment, and there will, accordingly, be judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

Solicitors: Underwood & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Raymond Pollard & Co. (for the defendant).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

Administration of Estates—Grants of representation—Deceased person dying domiciled abroad.

This direction is a consolidation, with minor alterations and additions, of all current directions and circulars relating to applications for grants of representation of the estates of persons dying domiciled out of England.

ORDERS FOR GRANTS IN FOREIGN DOMICIL CASES.—Where the deceased died domiciled out of England, unless the applicant is an executor entitled to probate as hereinafter set out or his attorney or in special circumstances an order to the contrary is made, the grant will be made by order to the person entrusted with administration by the court of the deceased's domicile or entitled to administer by the law of the deceased's domicile. A person entrusted who applies takes precedence over all others and it is not necessary for him to clear an executor. Unless the applicant is entrusted, an affidavit of law is required in every case. An exception to this general principle may be made if the whole of the estate in England consists of immovable property, when a grant limited thereto may issue in an ordinary English title, and no order need be obtained.

Orders for grants to persons entrusted or entitled will be made under s. 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, or s. 162 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, but it will not normally be necessary for a declaration to be filed or for sureties to justify in such cases. An affidavit of law stating that a person is entitled to administer the estate by the law of the place at which the deceased died domiciled will be accepted without further inquiry, and without the persons entitled being required to take a grant or complete any formalities in the foreign country. On the other hand, if it is specifically stated in the affidavit of law that the applicant would be entitled by the law of the domicile only if he were to obtain a grant or comply with some necessary formality, no order can be made for a grant to him in that capacity; but if the circumstances justify it, a discretionary order may still be made under s. 162, and a declaration and justification will be required. Registrars of the Principal Registry have jurisdiction to make such orders whatever the amount of the estate. They will require to know why no representation has been established in the place of domicile and whether this will ultimately be done.

If the powers of a person entrusted are limited as to time, the order for the grant may be made subject to a similar limitation if the registrar is satisfied that the grant is required for the purpose only of collecting English assets, and that this can be done within the time limited by the foreign court, and that there are no debts in this country.

AFFIDAVIT OF LAW.—The registrars will normally accept affidavits of law made by a barrister or advocate practising, or who has practised within the relevant period, in the foreign country and is conversant with its laws and constitution.

A In cases which do not present serious difficulty the registrar may, in special circumstances, accept the affidavit of a person not so qualified if satisfied that by reason of his official position or otherwise he has knowledge of the law and constitution of the foreign country.

The office of consul of itself will not be regarded as a qualification enabling the holder to speak to the law of his country.

B Variations will normally be allowed in the following special cases:—

1. A solicitor's affidavit will normally be accepted as to the law of Scotland, Northern Ireland, Republic of Ireland, Jersey or Guernsey.
2. An affidavit by a lawyer with adequate French qualifications, showing also that he is well conversant with the law of Belgium and is entitled to practise and has actually practised in Belgium, will normally be accepted as to the law of Belgium.
3. A lawyer adequately qualified in one State may speak to the law of any other State of the United States of America if he is able to swear that he is fully conversant with its laws.

C An affidavit by the person claiming to be entitled or his attorney will be rejected whatever his qualifications.

ATTORNEY.—Where a grant has been made by order to the attorney of a person entrusted by the court of the domicile or of the person entitled to administer by the law of the domicile “until further representation be granted,” and the person giving the power applies later for a direct grant, an affidavit will be called for showing:—

- E
- (a) that the order entrusting is still in force, or
 - (b) that the person concerned is still entitled to administer, and a further order will be necessary.

COMMUNITY OF PROPERTY.—Where, by the law of the place of domicile of the deceased, community of property exists between the spouses, the following concluding paragraph to the oath to lead the grant is appropriate and should be used:—

G “the whole of the estate in England in respect of which a grant is required amounts in value to the sum of . . . to the best of my knowledge, information and belief: and that . . . [half] . . . of that sum has accrued to the surviving spouse by reason of the existence of community of property under the law of the place of domicile of the said deceased.”

The grant will be in respect of the whole estate, but a court fee will be payable in respect of half of it only. The penalty in the bond, if any, will be in respect of half the estate.

H DANISH WILLS.—Since 1926 the surviving spouse of a domiciled Dane may take, in Denmark, what is equivalent to a grant of simple administration, notwithstanding any will left by the deceased. Though it is not proved, the will has some legal effect. In such cases a grant of administration with the will annexed will be made in this country, upon registrar's order, to the person entitled to administer by the law of the domicile, or to the person entrusted with the administration by the court of the domicile, upon the usual affidavit of law.

DOMICIL.—Whenever foreign law is relied upon, including cases under Lord Kingsdown's Act, the domicile at the date of death must be sworn to in the oath and recited in the grant. Where, as in the provinces of the Union of South Africa or the States of the United States of America, there are separate jurisdictions, the province or State must be specified and law of the province or State spoken to. It is not necessary to specify the particular division of a country where the testamentary law is uniform, as in Switzerland.

EXECUTOR.—(a) Appointment in English language.—If a valid will of a testator, wherever domiciled, is in the English or Welsh language and appoints an executor, he will be accepted as having full rights of executorship. No expression in a foreign tongue purporting to mean "executor" will be accepted as constituting an executor; but if such a will sets out the duties of a person named therein in terms sufficient to constitute him executor according to the tenor thereof, he may obtain probate or appoint an attorney in that capacity. Failing this, administration with the will annexed will issue to the person entitled to administer the estate under the law of the domicile.

(b) Foreign company.—A foreign corporation appointed executor in a will which would be regarded as giving a right to probate were the executor an individual able to apply, may as executor appoint an attorney to take a grant for its use and benefit and until further representation be granted. It is immaterial whether the will has been proved in the court of the domicile or not, unless there is some other person entrusted by the foreign court who has applied here.

LORD KINGSDOWN'S ACT.—This Act can be used only for curing faults of execution, and appointing executors, but no further. It cannot make good, for example, the will of a minor the law of whose domicile does not permit him to make a will.

Unless the will is in English form the grant should be limited to personalty.

When it is necessary to decide whether the deceased was a British subject reference should be made to the British Nationality Act, 1948, and the Ireland Act, 1949.

INLAND REVENUE AFFIDAVITS.—In all foreign domicile cases the Inland Revenue affidavit must be controlled by the Estate Duty Office prior to the issue of the grant.

MINORITY OR LIFE INTERESTS.—The statement in the oath as to minority or life interests should be based on the law of the domicile. If a minority or life interest arises, even if under the law of the domicile a single person can take the grant, s. 160 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, requires that the English grant shall go to not less than two individuals or to a trust corporation.

In straightforward cases, including cases under Lord Kingsdown's Act, the statement of the applicant in the oath that a minority or life interest does, or does not, exist may be accepted without further evidence. If, however, it appears on the face of the will and in the events which have happened that a minority or life interest does exist, and the oath states that it does not, the statement should be verified by an affidavit of law.

NEW ZEALAND.—Under the statutory procedure in New Zealand the Public Trustee of New Zealand can elect to administer an estate which does not exceed £1,000 in New Zealand, but is required subsequently to take a grant if such estate is increased to over £1,500. Where the Public Trustee applies as the person entrusted, and his capacity as such is established by an election to administer, it should be sworn in the oath that the property of the deceased in New Zealand does not exceed £1,500 and that since the election was filed in the New Zealand Supreme Court no grant has been issued by that court.

OATH AND BOND.—In cases where under s. 73 or s. 162 an order has been made for a grant to the person entrusted by the court of the domicile or entitled by the law of the domicile, an oath or bond describing the applicant as the person entitled or entrusted will normally be accepted whether it recites the order under the section or not.

- A In all other cases where an order has been made under one of these sections the oath and bond must describe the applicants as persons authorised under s. 73 or s. 162 as the case may be.

PERSONAL APPLICATION DEPARTMENT.—An application for a grant to the person entrusted or entitled will not be accepted in the Personal Application Department.

- B TRANSLATIONS OF WILLS.—In applications for a grant where the testator's will written in English has been lodged with a notary abroad, the notarially certified document lodged may contain a copy of the original will or it may merely contain a translation into a foreign language and a re-translation therefrom into English.

- C In this latter case a photographic copy or a duly verified copy of the original will be called for. In view of the decision In the Goods of Rule (4 P.D. 76)*, however, if the applicant objects it will not be open to the registry to insist on the production of such photographic or other copy of the original will. If, however, it appears on the face of the document that the re-translation is, or may be, inaccurate, the registry will require that the re-translation be checked with the original.

- D TREASURY SOLICITOR.—Particular regard must be paid to the provisions of Non-Contentious Probate Rule 75. It must be shown by the applicant that there are kin who under the foreign law will take estate in England passing under a partial or total intestacy, or that the Treasury Solicitor does not propose to take a grant on behalf of the Crown. The case of Re Barnett's Trusts ([1902] 1 Ch. 847)* is in point.

- E VALIDITY OF WILLS IN ENGLISH FORM.—A will in English and in English form will normally be accepted as valid without further inquiry if the domicile is Scotland, Northern Ireland, the Irish Republic, or any of the dominions or colonies except South Africa.

B. LONG,
Senior Registrar.

May 5, 1953.

F

* (1) In the Goods of Rule, (1878), 4 P.D. 76; 47 L.J.P. 32; 39 L.T. 123; 42 J.P. 776; 23 Digest 96, 892.

(2) Re Barnett's Trusts, [1902] 1 Ch. 847; 71 L.J.Ch. 408; 86 L.T. 346; 11 Digest, Replacement, 398, 548.

Re PARKER DAVIES & HUGHES, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), October 19, 1953.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Winding-up petition—Certificate for action and “to enforce any order made therein”—Winding-up petition after judgment obtained.

The petitioner was granted a civil aid certificate under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, Part I, in connection with proceedings brought against him by a company for arrears of rent “and to enforce any order or agreement made in connection with the said proceedings”. On a counterclaim the petitioner obtained judgment for £313, and he then petitioned for the winding-up of the company. His petition was dismissed. On the question of costs,

HELD: the petition for winding-up was not a mode of enforcing the order made in connection with the proceedings to which the civil aid certificate related, and, therefore, in the matter of the petition the petitioner was not a person in respect of whom a certificate was in force, and he was liable to pay the costs.

Re A Company ([1915] 1 Ch. 520), applied.

FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, Part I, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, pp. 532-554.

Case referred to:

(1) Re A Company, [1915] 1 Ch. 520; 84 L.J.Ch. 382; 10 Digest 828, 5399.

PETITION by a judgment creditor to wind-up a company.

The petition was dismissed, and this report relates only to the question of costs.

Whipham for the petitioner.

Woolley for the company.

ROXBURGH, J.: I must order the petitioner to pay the costs unless he is an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, Part I, and that depends on the construction of the civil aid certificate which he has obtained and which is before me. It reads as follows:

“This is to certify that Albert Arthur Jones . . . (hereinafter called ‘the assisted person’) is entitled, in accordance with the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the regulations and scheme made thereunder, to legal aid as defendant in connection with the following proceedings.”

Then it describes proceedings in the King's Bench Division, as it then was, and goes on (and these are the material words):

“and to enforce any order or agreement made in connection with the said proceedings.”

Albert Arthur Jones obtained judgment in those proceedings for £313. I now have to determine whether the petition for the winding-up of the judgment debtor is a proceeding to enforce that order.

I must confess that, but for authority, I should have thought this a difficult question, and it is obviously one of far-reaching importance. Fortunately—and I say “fortunately” because I think, quite apart from authority, that, if it is intended that a civil aid certificate should extend to a winding-up petition, it would be desirable to state that expressly on the face of the certificate—it seems to me that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re A Company (1) is indistinguishable from the present case and is binding on me. In that case the question was whether a winding-up petition was within the following words in the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1914, s. 1 (1):

“ . . . no person shall—(a) proceed to execution on, or otherwise to the enforcement of, any judgment or order of any court . . . for the payment or recovery of a sum of money . . . except after such application to such court and such notice as may be provided for by rules or directions under this Act."

A The Court of Appeal had to consider two questions—(i) whether the winding-up petition was "proceeding to execution" on the judgment, (that point does not arise here), and (ii) whether it was "proceeding to the enforcement" of the judgment, and that is precisely the question which arises here. In delivering his judgment, LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said, with reference to the words "otherwise to the enforcement" of the judgment ([1915] 1 Ch. 526):

B " . . . I cannot so construe the section as to extend it to a winding-up petition which may be presented by a petitioner who is not a judgment creditor, and which does not enure for the sole benefit of the judgment creditor, but must enure for the benefit of all the creditors."

PHILLIMORE, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said (ibid., 528):

C "In the particular case she is a creditor because her damages have been liquidated by a judgment. But it would be the same if she were a simple contract creditor whose debt was merged in a judgment. She is not therefore seeking to enforce her judgment. She is proceeding to a new alternative mode of recovering her debt, a mode by which she no longer seeks to recover for herself alone but for the benefit of all the creditors, as in a creditor's suit for the administration of the estate of a deceased debtor or in a bankruptcy."

D It appears to me that the ratio decidendi of that decision is binding on me, and that there is no possible way of distinguishing the present case from that case. Therefore, though with some reluctance, I must confess, I cannot hold that this present petitioner is covered by the civil aid certificate in these proceedings. The order must follow the usual course and he must be ordered to pay the costs of the petition, to be taxed as between party and party.

Order accordingly.

E Solicitors: Witham & Co., agents for R. C. Roberts, Wrexham (for the petitioner); T. D. Jones & Co., agents for Howel V. O. Cook & Co., Wrexham (for the company).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

F

CHANCERY DIVISION

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

Trust and Trustee—Trustee—Costs—Amount to be allowed.

G In cases in which trustees are parties in their capacity as such and in which it is appropriate that they should be indemnified as to their proper costs and expenses of the proceedings, the order as to the costs of the trustees should direct taxation of their "costs and expenses of and incident to this action [application] [matter]" without the addition of the words "as between solicitor and client". On such a direction all costs and expenses properly incurred by the trustees will be allowed by the taxing master. The costs of other parties H to the proceedings will, as hitherto, be ordered either (a) "to be taxed" (i.e., as between party and party) or (b) "to be taxed as between solicitor and client".

By direction of the judges of the Chancery Division.

W. S. JONES,
Chief Registrar
Chancery Division.

27th October, 1953.

R. J. REUTER CO., LTD. v. FERD MULHENS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.),
July 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, October 16, 1953.]

Trading with the Enemy—Custodian of Enemy Property—Assignment of trade marks—Trade marks vested in custodian by Board of Trade—Assignment by custodian—Extent of powers of board and of custodian—“With a view to preventing the payment of money to enemies and of preserving enemy property . . .”—Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939 (c. 89), s. 7 (1)—Distribution of German Enemy Property Act, 1949 (c. 85), s. 1 (1)—Distribution of German Enemy Property (No. 1) Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1642), para. 18 (1), (3).

Trade Mark—Assignment—Enemy property—Assignment with goodwill by Custodian of Enemy Property—Retention by former owner of right to use mark at common law—“Exclusive rights”—Effectiveness of assignment—Failure to advertise assignment—Trade Marks Act, 1938 (c. 22), s. 22 (1), s. 22 (4), s. 22 (7).

The defendant succeeded to the business of Mulhens in Cologne, Germany, which, before the outbreak of the second world war, was exclusively associated in Germany and elsewhere with the name or description of “4711” eau de cologne. Mulhens was the registered proprietor of a number of English trade marks relating to the perfume known as “4711” eau de cologne and associated products. Until 1930 the products of Mulhens were bought and imported into England by the plaintiffs, an English company, but in that year Mulhens acquired, through a Dutch subsidiary, ninety-five per cent. of the shares in the plaintiffs. Thereafter, some of the products of Mulhens were still imported from Germany, some subsidiary products were manufactured in England from essences made up in Germany, the formulae and methods for making these essences being a closely guarded secret. At the outbreak of the war of 1939 the business of selling the products of Mulhens continued because the plaintiffs were able to acquire from Holland a substantial supply of the essences, sufficient to enable them until 1946 to put the unchanged products on to the English market. The plaintiffs started at some time to make their own perfume, corresponding in appearance to the German product, but until 1950 they described themselves as the sole concessionaires of Mulhens. By an order dated June 26, 1940, the Board of Trade, under powers given to it by the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 7 (1), vested the shares of the plaintiffs, held by the Dutch subsidiary, in the Custodian of Enemy Property. By a second order (also made under s. 7 (1)) dated Jan. 31, 1941, the trade marks, theretofore registered in the name of Mulhens, were vested in the custodian whose name was placed on the register of trade marks. By a third order (made under the same powers) dated Apr. 17, 1951, the second order was varied and the custodian obtained the right to assign the trade marks with or without the goodwill in the United Kingdom of the business concerned. On June 15, 1951, the Custodian of Enemy Property assigned to the plaintiffs all the trade marks together with the goodwill, if any, in the United Kingdom, and on Nov. 13, 1951, the plaintiffs were registered as proprietors of the trade marks. By an Order in Council dated July 6, 1951, the state of war with Germany came to an end. On Dec. 3, 1951, the plaintiffs commenced proceedings against the defendant, inter alia, for infringement of five of the trade marks in question all containing the description “4711” eau de cologne. The defendant claimed (a) that the order of Apr. 17, 1951, was made in excess of the powers of the Board of Trade under the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 7 (1), and also that the assignment of the trade marks to the plaintiffs was invalid, as being similarly in excess of powers conferred on the Board of Trade or the custodian by the Act of 1939; and (b) that under the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 22, the assignment of the marks to the plaintiffs was void on the ground that there was a failure to advertise as required by s. 22 (7) and that, in view of s. 22 (4), the marks were incapable of being validly assigned to them because the defendant was entitled at common law to the use of the marks, and, therefore, was entitled to rectification of the register and to restrain the plaintiffs from making any use of the marks, as constituting a passing off of their goods as the goods of the defendant.

HELD: (i) the opening words of s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1939—"with a view to preventing the payment of money to enemies and of preserving enemy property in contemplation of arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace . . ." were an expression of the Parliamentary purpose in conferring on the Board of Trade the order-making powers, and not an expression of the purposes to which the orders to be made by the Board of Trade must be directed; they ought not to be treated as having a restrictive effect; and, therefore, s. 7 (1) (d) and s. 15 (5) were sufficient authority for the Board of Trade to make the order of Apr. 17, 1951, and to authorise the assignment of the trade marks; but, even if the opening lines of s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1939 would not have justified the making of the order of Apr. 17, 1951, and the assignment, nevertheless, after the passing of the Distribution of German Enemy Property Act, 1949, it was the duty of the Board of Trade to realise the trade marks to best advantage, and, having regard to the Distribution of German Enemy Property (No. 1) Order, 1950, both the order of Apr. 17, 1951, and the assignment made thereunder became intra vires the Board of Trade to make and execute, or direct to be executed.

(ii) the assignment of the trade marks was not rendered ineffective by reason of the failure to advertise the assignment in accordance with the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 22 (7), because the assignment was "in connection with the goodwill of [the] business" in which the trade mark was used, and, in any case, the question what advertisements, if any, should be published by the assignee was a matter for the registrar, who took the view that in the circumstances no advertisement was necessary.

(iii) accepting that, if, notwithstanding an assignment of a trade mark, the assignor retains an exclusive right himself to use the same mark at common law, the assignment will be ineffective by virtue of s. 22 (4) of the Act of 1938, the defendant had not retained the "exclusive rights" at common law (within s. 22 (4)) so as (for instance) to enable him to support an action for passing-off, for he had in England no proprietary right which he was entitled to protect, because the assignment of the trade marks to the plaintiffs operated to confer on them all rights therein whether statutory or at common law, and the business goodwill with which the marks were associated in England was distinct from the goodwill concerned with the trade in other countries, and was effectively assigned to the plaintiffs.

Principle in Lacteosote, Ltd. v. Alberman ([1927] 2 Ch. 117), no longer law.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: It is now clear that by virtue of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 22 (1), a trade mark may be validly assigned by one manufacturer to another without any assignment of the business or goodwill of the assignor and so as thenceforth to be distinctive of a manufacturing origin different in fact from the previous manufacturing origin, so long, at any rate, as the mark is not deceptive.

FOR THE TRADE MARKS ACT, 1938, s. 22, see ibid., Vol. 25, p. 1199.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Bank Voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford, [1952] 2 All E.R. 956; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (2) Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Wright, Crossley & Co., (1900), 18 R.P.C. 95; 32 Digest 205, 2551.
- (3) Samuelson v. Producers Distributing Co., Ltd., [1932] 1 Ch. 201; 101 A L.J.Ch. 168; 146 L.T. 37; 48 R.P.C. 580; Digest Supp.
- (4) Re Lewis's Declaration of Trust, [1953] 1 All E.R. 1005; sub nom. Loudon v. Ryder (No. 2), [1953] Ch. 423.
- (5) Fitzwilliam's (Earl) Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Housing & Local Government, [1952] 1 All E.R. 509; [1952] A.C. 362; 116 J.P. 183; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (6) Blackpool Corpn. v. Locker, [1948] 1 All E.R. 85; [1948] 1 K.B. 349; [1948] L.J.R. 847; 112 J.P. 130; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Lacteosote, Ltd. v. Alberman, [1927] 2 Ch. 117; 96 L.J.Ch. 305; 137 L.T. 319; sub nom. Lacteosote, Ltd. v. Alberman, Re Lacteosote, Ltd.'s Trade Mark, 44 R.P.C. 211; 43 Digest 210, 566.
- (8) Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., (1865), 11 H.L. Cas. 523; 35 L.J.Ch. 53; 12 L.T. 742; 29 J.P. 675; 11 E.R. 1435; 43 Digest 211, 570.
- (9) Aristoc, Ltd. v. Rysta, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 34; [1945] A.C. 68; 114 L.J.Ch. 52; 172 L.T. 69; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (10) Re Betts, [1949] 1 All E.R. 568; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (11) Lecouturier v. Rey, [1910] A.C. 262; 79 L.J.Ch. 394; 102 L.T. 293; 27 D R.P.C. 268; 43 Digest 203, 488.
- (12) Impex Electrical, Ltd. v. Weinbaum, Re Impex Electrical, Ltd.'s Trade Marks, (1927), 44 R.P.C. 405; 43 Digest 220, 655.
- (13) Green & Sons (Northampton), Ltd. v. Morris, [1914] 1 Ch. 562; 83 L.J.Ch. 559; 110 L.T. 508; 43 Digest 85, 896.
- (14) Walker v. Mottram, (1881), 19 Ch.D. 355; 51 L.J.Ch. 108; 45 L.T. 659; 43 Digest 83, 872.
- (15) Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre & Rubber Co. (Gt. Britain), Ltd., [1916] 2 A.C. 307; 85 L.J.K.B. 1333; 114 L.T. 1049; 2 Digest 145, 195.
- (16) Re Munster, [1920] 1 Ch. 268; 89 L.J.Ch. 138; Digest Supp.
- (17) Spalding & Brothers v. Gamage (A. W.), Ltd., (1915), 84 L.J.Ch. 449; 32 R.P.C. 273; 43 Digest 264, 1018.
- (18) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Muller & Co.'s Margarine, Ltd., [1901] A.C. 217; 70 L.J.K.B. 677; 84 L.T. 729; 43 Digest 79, 834.

APPEAL by the defendant and CROSS-APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Mar. 16, 1953.

The plaintiffs, as registered owners of certain trade marks relating to "4711" Eau de Cologne and associated products, commenced proceedings against the defendant for infringement of their trade marks, and for trade libel or slander by alleging that the plaintiffs' goods were not the original "4711" Eau de Cologne products. The defendant challenged the right of the plaintiffs to sue as registered proprietors of the trade marks on the grounds that (i) the assignment of the trade marks by the Custodian of Enemy Property to the plaintiffs under a direction of the Board of Trade was in excess of any powers conferred by the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 7; and (ii) under the Trade Marks Act, 1938 (inter alia), the assignment to and registration of the plaintiffs were void because the trade marks were incapable of being validly assigned to the plaintiffs. The defendant argued that he was entitled at common law to use the marks, and he counterclaimed for rectification of the register and also to restrain the plaintiffs from using the marks as constituting a passing-off of their goods as and for the goods of the defendant. DANCKWERTS, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs on their claim for infringement of the trade marks, and dismissed the plaintiffs' claim for trade libel or slander. He further dismissed the defendant's counterclaim.

Mould, Q.C., R. G. Lloyd and D. S. Paul for the defendant.

Tookey, Q.C., and Aldous for the plaintiffs.

J. P. Ashworth for the Board of Trade as amicus curiae.

A Oct. 16. The following judgments were read.

Cur. adv. vult.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This appeal and cross-appeal have raised a number of questions, some of them under the trading with the enemy legislation of 1939, and some under the Trade Marks Act, 1938, relating to a perfume which has been well known in this country for very many years as "4711" Eau de Cologne.

The plaintiffs in the action, R. J. Reuter Co., Ltd., are an English company who are now the registered proprietors of a number of trade marks relating to "4711" Eau de Cologne and claim to be rightly registered as such proprietors and to be entitled to all the goodwill belonging to the marks and to the business of making and marketing "4711" Eau de Cologne in England.

C The defendant, who is an infant appearing by his mother as next friend, is the present owner of the business in Cologne, Germany, which is, and has for several generations been, associated with the manufacture in Germany and the sale in Germany and elsewhere (but not now in England) of "4711" Eau de Cologne, and he now challenges the plaintiffs' claims, already stated, to proprietorship of the English trade marks and to the business in England of making and selling "4711" Eau de Cologne.

Before I attempt any formulation of the many and complex issues that are raised (one of which appears to involve a consideration for the first time by the courts of the change made in English trade mark law and in the nature and significance of a trade mark by the provision in s. 22 of the Act of 1938 that trade marks are assignable with or without goodwill) it is necessary that I should make some recital of the history of the respective businesses of the plaintiffs and of the defendant, though, for reasons which will appear, it is unnecessary for me to go into all the relevant matters of fact in the same detail as that in which they are set forth in the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J.

The total number of the English trade marks relating to "4711" Eau de Cologne and other associated products is over fifty, but the present action was founded on eleven only of them. For simplicity, it will suffice to describe one mark only, registered in class 48 in respect of perfumery, being the mark well known to users of "4711" Eau de Cologne. It consists of a blue and gold label on the bottles, having prominently in the middle the figure "4711" enclosed in what has been referred to as a "scroll" of simple character but having a small bell depicted on its right side. The so-called "scroll" appears in fact to be an elaboration of the letters "No" meaning "Number". For the rest, the badge has at the top the words "Blue and gold", "Eau de Cologne" and "Double", and it contains representations of a number of medals symbolising awards which the product has gained at European exhibitions. There is at the bottom of the badge a space adapted for a statement of the business origin of the product. In the case of the German product there is in this space (inter alia) the name and address "Glockengasse No. 4711 Koln am Rhein"—the street name accounting for the origin of the bell on the scroll. In the case of the English product, the space is occupied by the plaintiff company's name and address.

H The German business to which the defendant has succeeded and which, until the events later stated, was exclusively associated both in Germany and elsewhere with the name or description of "4711" Eau de Cologne, is an old one, having been established in the second half of the eighteenth century. The use of the number "4711" arose out of the occupation of Cologne by the French armies about 1792. It then occurred to Napoleon I or his representatives to number all the houses in Cologne consecutively and without regard to streets. No. 4711, accordingly, fell to the premises of the defendant's predecessor, who turned the circumstance to account by adopting the number as the distinguishing characteristic of his business and its products, calling the premises "Das Haus der Zahl". The large number of exhibits which we have seen, including printed cards for dispatch by post to the German business in Cologne, establish clearly that No. 4711 Koln am Rhein had become, without more, well recognised as a sufficient, and, indeed, the actual, address. The number "4711" in an appropriate context had become as distinctive of a particular place and of the business carried on thereat as, for example, "No. 10" in a wholly different context may be said to signify the official residence of the British Prime Minister.

Before the first world war the products of the German business (to which I will sometimes refer as "Mulhens") had achieved a great reputation inside Germany and elsewhere in Europe, but they were not sold in England directly or by agents. They were bought and imported into England by the firm of R. J. Reuter, who were given by Mulhens the sole right so to do. In 1914 the undertaking of the firm of R. J. Reuter was transferred to a limited company, the plaintiffs in this action. The name of the plaintiffs underwent more than one change before assuming its present form. These changes are not, in my judgment, material, but, since they were referred to by counsel for the defendant, I will state the fact that the earlier inclusion in the name of the number "4711" was later omitted at the request of the defendant's then predecessor.

We have not been told (and I, therefore, assume it to be immaterial) what exactly were the arrangements (if any) made during the first world war in regard to the trade marks then registered in Mulhens' name or in regard to the carrying on or preservation of the business of selling "4711" Eau de Cologne in England. I take it that under the trade mark law, as it then was and as it remained till the Act of 1938, it would not have been possible to dispose of the marks, e.g., by a sale to an English buyer, separately and dissociated from the German business from which the goods had originated. In any case, after that war had ended, the previous business arrangements appear to have been resumed, "4711" Eau de Cologne and associated products being bought and imported into England from Germany by the plaintiffs and sold by them in this country. The first change in these previously existing arrangements occurred in 1930 on the death of Mr. R. J. Reuter himself. Ninety-five per cent. of the shares in the plaintiffs were at the date of Mr. Reuter's death held by him or members of his family. The whole of these shares were acquired by a Dutch company which was itself, albeit at one remove, wholly controlled by Mulhens. It thus came about that on the outbreak of the second world war the plaintiffs became enemy-controlled within the meaning of the trading with the enemy legislation.

The next material change in the old business products and relationship occurred in or about 1931, and was the result of the fiscal problems then affecting most of the nations of the world. As a consequence, it became desirable that some part at least of the Mulhens' products should be manufactured here. To enable this to be done, and by arrangement between the plaintiffs and Mulhens, a manufacturing plant was established near the plaintiffs' place of business in Slough. Although most of the required personnel appear to have been provided by the plaintiffs, the plant itself was, and was always treated as, the property of Mulhens. The amount of actual manufacturing done was in fact strictly limited. So far as the ordinary "4711" Eau de Cologne perfume was concerned—which has been called in this case "the classic Eau de Cologne" —this was always wholly made and packaged in Germany and imported as theretofore by the plaintiffs for sale in this country, and the classic Eau de Cologne continued to constitute the greater part of the total of the “4711” products. But in the case of the subsidiary “4711” products, a substantial proportion of them was thenceforth manufactured in England in the sense that the final process of distillation or dilution of the essential essences was carried out at Slough with spirit acquired for the purpose in England. It has, however, been made clear, and it is not disputed, that these essential essences were made up in Germany, or outside England, under direct German supervision, and imported here, and that the formulae and methods for the making of these essences were, as they still are, closely guarded secrets. The method of production of these essences may be properly called a secret process, and the composition of the essences is known only at any one time to three persons—at the present time, to the aunt and grandmother of the defendant and one of the two general managers of the defendant’s business, a Herr Schutte, who personally undertakes or supervises the blending, etc., of the essences under conditions of complete secrecy.

Such was the situation at the time of the outbreak of the second world war on Sept. 3, 1939, Mulhens then becoming an enemy and the plaintiffs becoming enemy-controlled. There then were, as counsel for the defendant pointed out, three distinct commercial entities: (i) Mulhens, owning all the trade marks, (ii) the plaintiffs, who were contributing, however, little or nothing to the manufacture of the products and had no interest in the marks, and (iii) the assembly plant at Slough belonging in fact to the plaintiffs, but occupied by or on behalf of Mulhens. The business of the making-up and selling “4711” products continued to be carried on during the war years by the plaintiffs, who were able to acquire from Holland, before that country was invaded, a substantial supply of the essences sufficient to enable the products made therefrom as theretofore to be continuously marketed till as late as 1946. At some time also the plaintiffs began to make up on their own account and to market a perfume corresponding in appearance, at least, to the classic “4711” Eau de Cologne. Whether and to what extent the imported essences were used I am unable to say, but it is certain that for some time since and during the war this English counterpart of the classic perfume, not derived from German essences, has been sold in England by the plaintiffs, and these sales now continue on a large scale. It was a point made by counsel for the defendant that the volume of business in this so-called “4711” Eau de Cologne and other associated products has, on the plaintiffs’ own statement, greatly increased both during and after the war by comparison with the plaintiffs’ former sales of products made in Germany or from essences imported by the plaintiffs. It follows, therefore, that for some fourteen years past bottles bearing the badge I have described have been on sale in England, and this badge has been and is, on the face of it, indicative of an English origin, namely, the manufacture of the plaintiffs. On the other hand, it is also the fact, as counsel for the defendant emphasised, that on their letter headings the plaintiffs continued, at least until the autumn of 1950, to relate their products with the former German source by describing themselves as sole concessionaires for Great Britain for No. 4711, the famous house of Eau de Cologne.

The business carried on by the plaintiffs after the outbreak of war appears at first to have been the result of some informal arrangement between the plaintiffs and the Board of Trade. Later, however, vesting orders were made in favour of the Custodian of Enemy Property by virtue of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 7. I shall have to refer later to the terms of that section, but, since the form of the vesting orders made is important to one part of the defendant’s case, it is convenient to refer to them now in some detail. The first order, which has been referred to by its number “238”, was made on June 26, 1940, and related to the 35,186 shares in the plaintiffs then registered in the name of Mulhens' Dutch subsidiary. By the order the Board of Trade, in exercise of its statutory powers, thereby ordered:

"(1) That the right to transfer the said shares and to receive any dividends now due and to accrue due thereon do vest in [the Custodian for England under the Trading with the Enemy Act]. (2). That the said Custodian is to be at liberty to transfer the shares or any of them into his own name to be held by him as such Custodian and shall do so as and when requested by the Board of Trade. (3) That the said Custodian (whether the said shares or any of them shall be transferred into his name or not) shall sell all or any of the said shares as and when requested so to do by the Board of Trade."

The remaining two paragraphs need not be recited. We were given to understand that the shares were in fact in due course registered in the Custodian's name. It follows that from the date of that order all enemy taint affecting the plaintiffs was removed.

The second order is known as "238A" and was not made until Jan. 31, 1941. It related specifically to the trade marks, and by it the Board of Trade, in exercise of its statutory powers, ordered, so far as material, as follows:

"(1) That the said trade marks [specified in the schedule and registered in Mulhens' name] together with the goodwill (if any) in the United Kingdom of the business concerned in the goods for which the trade marks are registered do vest in [the Custodian for England under the Trading with the Enemy Act]. (2) That the provisions of s. 22 (7) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938 [relating to advertisements on sales of trade marks apart from goodwill] shall not apply to the assignment of the said trade marks affected by this order. (3) That the said Custodian do have power (a) to apply under s. 25 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, for the registration of his title to the said trade marks in the register of trade marks; (b) to apply with R. J. Reuter & Co., Ltd., for the registration of R. J. Reuter & Co., Ltd., as registered users of the said trade marks in accordance with the provisions of s. 28 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938."

It will be observed that there is not in this order, as there was in the first order relating to the shares, any power for the Custodian to sell or transfer to another any of the marks or the goodwill (if any) vested in him by the order. It was not in fact until Oct. 15, 1941, that the Custodian's name was put on the register of trade marks in respect of all the marks vested in him by the order, and at the same time the plaintiff company was registered as registered users of the marks as contemplated by para. (2) of the order. The effect, then, of this vesting order was that the Custodian became the legal owner of the marks and of any other proprietary rights which the order had been apt to vest in him. In accordance with what must now be taken as well established, the beneficial ownership of the marks became in statutory suspense. Counsel for the defendant has drawn attention to certain observations of my own in Bank Voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford (1) ([1952] 2 All E.R. 967), in support of the proposition that the suspension of the beneficial ownership in the marks did not involve its extinction even during the war; and I assume that this proposition is correct.

The third and last order, for present purposes the most significant of them all, is known as "No. 238B", and was made many years later, after the cessation of hostilities in the war, viz., on Apr. 17, 1951. After reciting the second order, No. 238A and the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 15 (5), to the effect that any power conferred by the Act to make orders should be construed as including powers exercisable in like manner to vary or revoke them, and after stating that it was deemed expedient that order

No. 238A should be varied as thereafter appearing, the Board of Trade, in exercise of its statutory powers, ordered as follows:

"That the said order [No. 238A] is henceforth to be read and construed as if the following article were included in the said order: '3A. That the said Custodian do have power to assign and transmit the said trade marks either in connection with the goodwill of the business referred to in art. 1 hereto or not'."

This order was, no doubt, made in contemplation of the two assignments which were executed in the following June. By the first of them, the Custodian, in exercise of his powers under the first vesting order (No. 238), sold for a large sum of money (we were told about £300,000) all the shares in the plaintiffs vested in the Custodian to another English company, Scott & Bowne, Ltd.

This company, which also later acquired the shares held by Mr. Cooper, the plaintiffs' manager, thus became in effect the proprietor of the plaintiff company's business. Since, however, the plaintiffs and their predecessors have for many years been exclusively concerned with the marketing of "4711" Eau de Cologne products, first as acquired by them from Germany or made up at the assembly plant in Slough, and since September, 1939, as manufactured by themselves, it is obvious that the value of the shares sold depended on the plaintiffs continuing to have the right to manufacture and market, or at least to market, these goods under their well-established marks.

On June 15, 1951, by deed made between the Custodian of Enemy Property for England of the first part, the Board of Trade of the second part, and the plaintiffs of the third part, after reciting the vesting order No. 238A of Jan. 31, 1941, as varied by the order No. 238B, and after further reciting that the Board of Trade had "directed the Custodian to transfer the trade marks with the goodwill (if any)" to the plaintiffs and that the plaintiffs, in consideration of such a transfer had agreed "to covenant with the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks, acting as Registrar of Trade Marks, in manner" thereafter appearing, it was witnessed as follows:

"(1) In pursuance of the said direction the Custodian hereby assigns unto the assignee all the said trade marks together with the goodwill (if any) in the United Kingdom of the business concerned in the goods for which the trade marks are registered. (2) The assignee in consideration of the direction given by the Board of Trade to the Custodian as hereinbefore recited hereby for itself and its successors in title covenants with the Board of Trade that it will not assign the said trade marks and goodwill to nor allow them to come into the ownership or control of any person firm or company residing or carrying on business in Germany or any person firm or company known or believed to be a nominee thereof and further (for the more effectual enforcement of this covenant) to ensure that on the occasion of any assignment during a period of fifteen years from the date of these presents that the written consent of the Board of Trade is first applied for and obtained provided that in the case of an assignee who is otherwise suitable the Board of Trade shall not unreasonably withhold its consent. (3) The parties hereto hereby certify that the transaction hereby effected does not form part of a larger transaction or of a series of transactions in respect of which the amount or value or the aggregate amount or value of the consideration exceeds £500."

It will be observed that notwithstanding the terms of the second recital the covenant made by the plaintiffs was made not with the Comptroller-General of Patents, etc., but with the Board of Trade. Nothing, however, turns for present purposes on this somewhat peculiar circumstance. Following on the execution of the last-mentioned assignment the plaintiffs in due course applied to have themselves registered as proprietors of the marks and they were so registered. Two matters of fact should, however, be noted in regard to this application and registration. In the first place, since five of the marks contained on the face of them a reference to German origin, the assignment of these marks, if it was to be effective, would be plainly deceptive. These marks were, therefore, withdrawn by the plaintiffs from their application and abandoned by them as marks. The circumstance is relied on by counsel for the defendant as illustrative of the continued connection between the badges and the goods sold under the badges with the old manufacturing source in Cologne. The second matter of fact is that no advertisement of the application for registration was directed by the registrar under s. 22 (7) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, the form of application being in fact adjusted, at the suggestion of the registrar, in order to make it unnecessary. Since it is one of the defendant's contentions that for this reason the assignment and registration never became effective in law, I shall have to return to the matter later and refer in greater detail to the circumstances. For present purposes, it is sufficient to note the point.

The date of the actual registration of the plaintiffs as proprietors of the marks was Nov. 13, 1951, but it is conceded that the plaintiffs' title as proprietors dates back to June 15, 1951, being the date of the assignment to them.

On July 6, 1951, His Majesty, by Order in Council, declared that the state of war with Germany had ended, and Mulhens thereupon ceased to have enemy status. He became once again able to litigate in the English courts any rights that he had which were subject to the jurisdiction of those courts. The defendant has, however, not attempted to trade in this country in Eau de Cologne and, as I understand from his counsel (for it is fundamental to one of their points under the Trade Marks Act, 1938), he has no present intention of so doing.

In August, September and October, 1951, occurred the events which have given rise to the present proceedings. The first event arose out of an issue of "Vogue" newspaper in July, 1951, and the juxtaposition in that paper of an advertisement by the plaintiffs and of an article by a Mrs. Forbes relating to a visit by her to Frankfurt in Germany and the purchase by her there of a bottle of German "4711" Eau de Cologne. The defendant or his solicitors thereupon wrote letters in the months of August, September and October to the editor of "Vogue" and to Mrs. Forbes complaining of this juxtaposition in "Vogue" and alleging that it would be bound to cause confusion between the defendant's products and those of the plaintiffs. In the course of this correspondence the defendant or his advisers referred to the product of the German business as "the genuine original '4711' Eau de Cologne" and to the plaintiffs' produce as "the non-genuine product".

The second incident was a letter dated Oct. 23, 1951, addressed to Lyall, Willis & Co., Ltd., who were and are the export agents of the plaintiffs, complaining principally of an advertisement issued by a customer of Messrs. Lyall, Willis & Co., Ltd., in Eritrea relating to the plaintiffs' products. In the course of this letter, the defendant again referred to his own product as "the genuine and original Eau de Cologne" and accused the plaintiffs of passing-off their goods as and for the goods of the defendant. This letter was enclosed in an envelope, the left hand side of which was largely occupied by the legend: "The original house of genuine '4711' Eau de Cologne, Koln am Rhein". The figure "4711" was represented against a dark green background surmounted by a scroll and bell device in all respects identical with that forming part of the trade marks in suit. It was admitted at the trial that this envelope was of a kind which had been used substantially for the purpose of sending business communications to persons in England.

These incidents may be regarded, as DANCKWERTS, J., regarded them, as of a somewhat trivial character, but they set fire to the train of litigation that has since ensued. For, on Dec. 3, 1951, the plaintiffs issued their writ against the defendant claiming that the envelope constituted an infringement of the plaintiffs' trade marks, and that the letters I have briefly quoted constituted a trade slander on the plaintiffs' business and their goods, and they sought declarations, injunctions, and other relief accordingly.

The answer of the defendant in his defence and counterclaim, in addition to containing a denial of the plaintiffs' allegations, challenged the validity of the plaintiffs' claims to sue as registered proprietors of the trade marks in question. This challenge was based on submissions in part made in reference A to the trading with the enemy legislation, and in part under the Trade Marks Act, 1938. It was, and is, the claim of the defendant, while not contesting the validity of the vesting order No. 238A, that the later order No. 238B was made by the Board of Trade in excess of their powers under the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, as not being fairly required for any of the purposes for which, as the defendant says, orders might be made by the Board of Trade B under s. 7 of that Act. The defendant further claimed and claims that, in the event, the assignment of June 15, 1951, was ultra vires the Custodian and the Board of Trade being similarly in excess of any powers conferred on, or capable of being conferred on, them by the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, particularly since it amounted, on the face of it, to a giving away or relinquishment of the marks and any interests connected therewith formerly belonging C to Mulhens, and later vested in the Custodian under the trading with the enemy legislation. It is to be observed that if these contentions, or either of them, were well founded, the result would, from the defendant's point of view, be of a somewhat qualified character, for, though the plaintiffs' cause of action would have been successfully challenged, the result would be merely to re-vest the marks and other property transferred by the assignment in the Custodian D of Enemy Property.

Under the Trade Marks Act, 1938, the defendant contended: (i) that, as already indicated, the assignment to the plaintiffs, and their entry in the register as proprietors of the marks, was ineffective by reason of non-compliance with the terms as to advertisement of s. 22 (7) of the Act; (ii) that in any case the envelope used by the defendant did not amount to an infringement under s. 4, E as not having been used in the course of any trade or business transaction in England, and, further, was protected by s. 8 as constituting a bona fide use by the defendant of his name or the name of his place of business; (iii) that the defendant's use of the mark or insignia, if otherwise liable to constitute an infringement of the plaintiffs' rights, was protected by s. 7 as being a use by the defendant of a mark which he and his predecessors in title had continuously used from a date anterior to the use of their marks by the plaintiffs, F or their predecessors in title, or to the registration of those marks in the plaintiffs' name. As counsel for the defendant explained, this contention rested on the proposition that the transfer to, and registration of, the plaintiffs, if otherwise effective, amounted to a forfeiture or confiscation of the defendant's pre-existing rights in the trade marks so as to constitute a fresh root of title in the plaintiffs on registration dissociated from any previous proprietorship. G (iv) More important, however, than any of these contentions has been the point taken by the defendant under s. 22 (4), a point that has seemed to me by far the most difficult question raised in the case. Under that sub-section the defendant claims that the assignment to the plaintiffs, and their registration as proprietors of the trade marks, were void on the ground that the H marks were incapable of being validly assigned to them, and, accordingly, that the defendant, being entitled at common law to the use of the mark or badge which I have above described, is entitled to rectification of the register, and also to restrain the plaintiffs from making any use of the badge themselves, as constituting a passing-off of their goods as and for the goods of the defendant. It will be seen that, if this contention is well founded, the defendant will achieve a much more far-reaching result than would flow from a mere re-vesting of the marks in the Custodian of Enemy Property.

These, then, are the issues raised, and on them the learned judge found substantially in the plaintiffs' favour. He held that the plaintiffs were entitled to remain on the register as proprietors of the marks in question, and that the use by the defendant of envelopes of the kind I have described constituted an infringement of the plaintiffs' rights as registered proprietors of the marks. He rejected, accordingly, all the defendant's submissions based both on the trading with the enemy legislation and the Trade Marks Act, 1938, and dismissed his counterclaim. On the other hand, DANCKWERTS, J., held that the defendant had not slandered the plaintiffs' business or its goods, and he, therefore, rejected so much of the plaintiffs' claim as related to slander of title. Against that judgment and order the defendant has appealed to this court, and the plaintiffs have served a notice of cross-appeal against the learned judge's rejection of their claim in respect of slander of title.

On this last matter, the plaintiffs did not, before us, contend that the judge should have found that they had established a good cause of action for trade slander, but have suggested that the assertion in the letters I have quoted, which was substantially repeated by Herr Schutte in the witness box, amounted to a sufficient threat to justify the court, in its discretion, making some form of declaration under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the facts relating to the relief sought in the cross-appeal and referred to Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Wright, Crossley & Co. (2), Samuelson v. Producers Distributing Co., Ltd. (3), and Re Lewis's Declaration of Trust (4). HIS LORDSHIP continued:] In my judgment, and without the necessity of making any further reference to the facts relied on by the plaintiffs, there is no ground shown for reversing or varying the conclusion of DANCKWERTS, J., on this part of the plaintiffs' case, assuming that in other respects the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed. It follows, therefore, that the cross-appeal must in any case fail.

I turn now to the appeal, and first to the submissions of the defendant on the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939. I have already stated that the defendant, if right on either or both of his submissions under this Act, would obtain only a qualified respite, since success on his part could do no more than re-vest the trade marks and any goodwill or other proprietary rights in the Custodian of Enemy Property, who could, and presumably would, then proceed to deal anew with them in a manner unlikely to benefit the defendant. Still, such success would suffice to defeat altogether the plaintiffs' right to sue in the present action.

It was made plain by counsel for the plaintiffs that he did not seek to invoke any powers other than those conferred by the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, itself; e.g., he did not rely on anything in the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and orders made thereunder; and, though reference was made in the vesting orders to the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1198), it is plain that, if the powers of the Board of Trade conferred by the Act were limited in the manner and to the extent that the defendant alleges, these powers could not have been effectively extended by a general order made by the Board of Trade itself under the powers which fall to be construed. The question, then, turns exclusively on the true interpretation of the terms of the Act, and more particularly of the opening words of s. 7 thereof. That section, so far as relevant, provides as follows:

"(1) With a view to preventing the payment of money to enemies and of preserving enemy property in contemplation of arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace, the Board of Trade may appoint Custodians of enemy property for England, Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively, and may by order . . . (b) vest in the prescribed Custodian such enemy property as may be prescribed, or provide for, and regulate, the vesting in that Custodian of such enemy property as may be prescribed; (c) vest in the prescribed Custodian the right to transfer such other enemy property as may be prescribed, being enemy property which has not been, and is not required by the order to be, vested in the Custodian; (d) confer and impose on the Custodians and on any other person such rights, powers, duties and liabilities as may be prescribed as respects—(i) property which has been, or is required to be, vested in a Custodian by or under the order, (ii) property of which the right of transfer has been, or is required to be, so vested, (iii) any other enemy property which has not been, and is not required to be, so vested, or (iv) money which has been, or is by the order required to be, paid to a Custodian; . . . and any such order may contain such incidental and supplementary provisions as appear to the Board of Trade to be necessary or expedient for the purposes of the order . . . (4) Any order under this section shall have effect notwithstanding anything in any Act passed before this Act.”

B Reference was also made to s. 15 (5), which is as follows:

“Any power conferred by the preceding provisions of this Act to make an Order in Council or an order shall be construed as including a power, exercisable in the like manner, to vary or revoke the Order in Council or order.”

C The argument of the defendant has been concentrated on the opening words of s. 7 (1). It is said that the only orders or other activities which the section contemplates and empowers the Board to make or direct are orders and other activities which can fairly be required, or justified, on the face of them, for achieving the object of preventing the payment of moneys to enemies, and, whether the word is used conjunctively or disjunctively, of preserving enemy property in contemplation of arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace. So far as the latter words are concerned, counsel for the defendant observes that it has never been the policy of English law to confiscate the property of enemies (for which proposition there is indeed well established authority), and he contends accordingly that, with the orders vesting in the Custodian the marks and any other property capable of being thereby vested, the powers of the Board of Trade under s. 7 were exhausted quoad the marks and any such other property. Counsel for the defendant conceded that, in the case of consumable goods, and, perhaps, some other kinds of property, a power of sale and a sale would be justified, and, therefore, implicitly conferred, on the ground that, having regard to the nature of the property, nothing, or nothing of value, could otherwise be “preserved” in contemplation of peace arrangements; but these considerations could, according to his argument, have no place in the case of the trade marks here in question, or, indeed, in the case of the shares in the plaintiff company.

I have no doubt that, unless the opening words of sub-s. (1) have the limiting or restrictive effect for which counsel for the defendant contends, the opening words of para. (d) of the sub-section, the final three lines of the sub-section, and the terms of s. 15 (5) are together amply sufficient, on their ordinary construction, to justify the conferment of a power of sale or transfer and its subsequent exercise. The question, then, resolves itself into that of construing the opening words of sub-s. (1). On this matter we had the advantage, in addition to hearing counsel for the plaintiffs, of hearing also the argument of counsel for the Board of Trade as amicus curiae. It was submitted to us that the formula here used—“with a view to preventing . . .”—is quite distinct from the formulae used in other Acts, e.g., the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and the Supplies and Services (Transitional Provisions) Act, 1945, where the power conferred on the Minister or government department are powers to make orders or do other acts for a particular purpose, e.g., in the case of s. 43 of the former Act to acquire land “for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act . . .”:

see Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Housing & Local Government (5), and in the case of the latter Act to make orders "for the purpose of so maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services as—(a) to secure a sufficiency of those essential to the well-being of the community . . .":

see Blackpool Corpn. v. Locker (6). In the present case the formula used is not, according to the argument, on its fair interpretation an expression of the purposes to the achievement of which the orders to be made by the Board of Trade must be directed, but is rather an expression of the Parliamentary purpose in conferring on the Board of Trade the order-making powers later specified. In support of this argument it was pointed out that in the trading with the enemy legislation passed on the occasion of the first world war the corresponding Parliamentary intention was expressed by way of a preamble to the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914. The preamble to that Act is thus framed:

"Whereas it is expedient to make further provision for preventing the payment of moneys to . . . 'enemies' . . . and for preserving with a view to arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace, such money and certain other property belonging to enemies . . ."

This earlier legislation remained on the statute book until it was repealed by the Act of 1939 now in question, and it was forcibly argued to be highly unlikely that Parliament, in enacting new trading with the enemy legislation on the occasion of the outbreak of the second world war, could have intended by what is in effect a transposition of the preamble in the old Act, still subsisting until the repeal, to cut down substantially the powers conferred. I was for myself somewhat troubled by what appears as a cross-heading immediately before s. 7 in the print of the Act, bound up with the orders made thereunder, with which we were supplied, namely: "Property of Enemies and Enemy subjects. Collection of enemy debts and custody of enemy property." But a reference to the King's Printer's copy of the Act in the LAW REPORTS shows that the second part of the cross-heading is not in fact any part of the Act.

In the circumstances I think that the argument put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs and counsel for the Board of Trade is well-founded and that the opening words of the sub-section ought not to be treated as having the restrictive effect for which counsel for the defendant contends. But if I am wrong on that matter there is, in my judgment, a second answer to the defendant's attack on the vires of the power of sale and transfer and its exercise, viz., the effect of the Distribution of German Enemy Property Act, 1949, and the Distribution of German Enemy Property (No. 1) Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1642) made thereunder. This Act (passed, we were told, in implementation of the Potsdam Agreement and other later allied conferences, and described in its preamble as "An Act to provide for the collection and realisation of German enemy property and for the distribution of the proceeds thereof") provided by s. 1 (1):

"His Majesty may by Order in Council make provision for the collection and realisation of German enemy property and for the distribution of the proceeds thereof, to such extent as may be prescribed by the order, to persons who establish claims in respect of German enemy debts."

It is not in doubt that the words "German enemy property" were apt, by virtue of the interpretation section, s. 8, to comprehend the marks and other property here in question. I need not refer at length to the terms of the order of 1950. Paragraph 18 of that order provides:

"(1) Except in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this part of this order, or with the consent of the administrator, no person other than a custodian shall transfer, dispose of or otherwise deal with any German enemy property; and any transfer, disposal or dealing in contravention of this paragraph shall be void . . . (3) Nothing in this article shall prohibit or restrict the transfer or disposal of or dealing with any property or the payment of any money—(a) by or to a custodian, or (b) in accordance with any direction, or with the consent, of the Board of Trade.”

A In my judgment, the passing of the Act of 1949 materially altered the nature of any arrangements that could reasonably be contemplated as likely, or, indeed, possible, to be made at the conclusion of peace. Thenceforward it was, as it seems to me, plain that any such arrangements would not comprehend the return to German nationals of property formerly belonging to them, such as the trade marks here in question (at least if capable by their nature of being sold or disposed of), and that thenceforth it was the duty of the Board of Trade, in contemplation of arrangements which would ultimately be made for applying the proceeds of German enemy property in the manner indicated in the Act of 1949 to realise the trade marks to the best advantage as occasion offered. In these circumstances, even if prior to the passing of the Act of 1949 the terms of the opening lines of s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1939 would not have justified the making of vesting order No. 238B and the assignment of June 15, 1951, thereunder, after the passing of the Act of 1949 both the order and the assignment became intra vires the Board of Trade to make and execute or direct to be executed. In my judgment, this conclusion can clearly in no way be affected by anything stated by the Board of Trade in the TRADE MARKS JOURNAL for Feb. 4, 1953, which related exclusively to trade marks vested in the Custodian by virtue of the later Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) (No. 2) Order, 1951 (S.L., 1951, No. 779).

D [HIS LORDSHIP referred to an argument advanced on behalf of the defendant that, in any event, even if the Board of Trade had power to sell the trade marks, it could not give them away, as, on the face of the assignment, it had purported to do. HIS LORDSHIP found that the point was not open to the defendant on his pleading, and continued:] My conclusion, therefore, on the points raised by the defendant under the trading with the enemy legislation is in accordance with the view of DANCKWERTS, J., that they cannot be sustained.

E I turn, therefore, to the arguments under the Trade Marks Act, 1938. I have already tabulated them and, save for the substantial and difficult question under s. 22 (4) of the Act, I can deal with them briefly, for I agree with DANCKWERTS, J., in rejecting all of them. I shall take them in the order in which I have stated them, save that it will be convenient to postpone consideration of the contention made under s. 7 of the Act until after I have considered the argument under s. 22 (4). Section 22 (7) of the Act is as follows:

G “Where an assignment in respect of any goods of a trade mark that is at the time of the assignment used in a business in those goods is made, on or after the appointed day, otherwise than in connection with the goodwill of that business, the assignment shall not take effect until the following requirements have been satisfied, that is to say, the assignee must, not later than the expiration of six months from the date on which the assignment is made or within such extended period, if any, as the registrar may allow, apply to him for directions with respect to the advertisement of the assignment, and must advertise it in such form and manner and within such period as the registrar may direct.”

H I have already stated the point made by the defendant under this sub-section, viz., that, no directions having been given and the registrar, indeed, having held, wrongly, that the sub-section was inapplicable, the assignment never became effective. The relevant facts are stated in greater detail by the learned judge (70 R.P.C. 115). From this recital it appears that the plaintiffs applied in the usual form to the registrar for registration of themselves as proprietors of the marks by virtue of the assignment, and tendered the assignment showing that its subject-matter was the marks together with "the goodwill (if any)", etc. Thereupon, at the suggestion of the registrar or those acting on his behalf, the application was altered so as to state that "the trade marks at the time of the assignment were not used in the business of the assignor . . .", the view of the registrar being that the word "business" in the second line of the sub-section meant the business of the assignor, in which case it followed, since the Custodian carried on no business, that the sub-section, therefore, did not apply. If this view were wrong, I agree, nevertheless, with DANCKWERTS, J., that in fact. In any case, the question what advertisements, if any, should be published by the assignee was a matter for the registrar. The plaintiffs made their application in due form and without any attempt to avoid compliance with the sub-section. All that followed was the result of the view taken of the matter by the registrar. In my judgment, there is nothing on the facts proved which enables the defendant to challenge the effectiveness of the assignment under this sub-section, and I, therefore, agree with DANCKWERTS, J., in rejecting this part of his case.

"it is hard to see how the assignment was otherwise than in connection with the goodwill of the business in which the trade marks were used"

The point sought to be made by the defendant under s. 4, which was strenuously argued before us by Mr. Lloyd on behalf of the defendant, is, as I understand it, that the envelope of which the plaintiffs complain, though having on it a device clearly identical or so nearly identical with the plaintiffs' trade mark as otherwise to constitute infringement, is not an infringing use within this s. 4, since the use was neither use as a trade mark (having particular regard to the terms of the definition section, s. 68) nor as an advertisement issued to the public. As regards the latter alternative, it was clearly shown to have been by way of advertisement and admitted as such by Herr Schutte. It was also admitted that the envelope in the plaintiffs' hands was one of many sent to members of the public in England. As regards the former alternative, counsel argued that for the use of the mark to be an infringing use it must have been the present intention to use the mark in the United Kingdom in relation to goods in the course of some transaction which could fairly be described as trading in the United Kingdom, and it was said that (as I have already noticed) there was and is no present intention on the defendant's part to undertake any trading in the class of goods in question in the United Kingdom. I cannot find any justification for importing this qualification into the language of s. 4. Since, admittedly, the device on the envelope was advertising matter, the use of the envelope constituted, in my judgment, an infringement of the plaintiffs' rights under s. 4 if they are in other respects entitled to succeed.

I can deal more briefly still with the argument under s. 8, that the use of the device on the envelope was no more than a bona fide use (within the terms of the section) by the defendant of the name of his place of business. The bona fides of the defendant is not now in question, nor do I doubt that, as I have earlier explained, "No. 4711" in connection with the city of Cologne may fairly be said to be the name of the defendant's place of business. But the use here is not merely use of the number, but the use of the number represented in a particular and characteristic way with the embellishment of the scroll and bell. Counsel for the defendant read the terms of s. 68 (2):

"References in this Act to the use of a mark shall be construed as references to the use of a printed or other visual representation of the mark . . ."

But we are here concerned not with the use of a mark, but, as it is said, with the use by the defendant of the name of his place of business. In my judgment, it is clear that, according to the ordinary meaning of language and the common sense of the matter, the use of this particular representation of the number 4711 is not within the protection of s. 8 (a) of the Act. I, therefore, agree with DANCKWERTS, J., that this defence also fails.

I approach now what I have stated to be, and what to my mind is, the most substantial and difficult question raised in the appeal, one, moreover, which involves a consideration for the first time of the extent and effect of the change made in trade mark law by s. 22 (1) of the Act of 1938:

- A “notwithstanding any rule of law or equity to the contrary, a registered trade mark shall be, and shall be deemed always to have been, assignable and transmissible either in connection with the goodwill of a business or not.”

- The last few words, and particularly the use of the phrase “in connection with”, make it clear to my mind that, subject to whatever may be the effect of the qualification in sub-s. (3) and sub-s. (4), it was from the passing of the Act contemplated that trade marks could be assigned, as it is said, “in gross”, that is, dissociated from the goodwill of their business of origin. Beyond doubt this enactment involved a far-reaching and significant change in trade mark law, in which it had been previously regarded as fundamental that trade marks, whether registered or unregistered, being indicative of a particular origin, usually but not necessarily a manufacturing origin, could not be separated from the business of origin and from the goodwill of that business.

- The old principle is well illustrated in Lacteosote, Ltd. v. Alberman (7) before CLAUSON, J., on which counsel for the defendant strongly relied, partly because of the similarity in language between the purported assignment in that case and the language of the assignment in the present case, and partly because, as he contended, the principle stated by CLAUSON, J., survived the amending effect of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, and still applies so as to provide the answer to the present question.

- The Lacteosote case (7) concerned a product known as Sirop Famel, which was at all material times manufactured in France according to the process and specification of M. Pierre Famel, a chemist in Paris to whom, before the purported assignment, the mark in question had unquestionably belonged. The plaintiffs had for many years been the sole wholesale agents for the sale of Sirop Famel in the United Kingdom, but as such they were, of course, unable to sue in England for infringement of the mark. The purported assignment was intended to give to the plaintiffs that right, so as to enable them to prevent the sales of the Sirop in England by persons (the defendant being one) who, having purchased it in bottles in France, brought it over to this country to offer for sale here, which, by reason of the state of the exchange, they were able to do at a less price than that charged by the plaintiffs. The English trade mark was thereupon “assigned” by Famel to the plaintiffs - “together with the goodwill of the business concerned in the goods with respect to which the said trade mark is registered.”

- G These goods were in fact described as “a pharmaceutical product for medical use made in France”. It was plain, accordingly, that the assignment did not operate, and was never intended to operate, as an assignment of the goodwill of the entire manufacturing business in France. It was, however, contended that ([1927] 2 Ch. 129):

- H “the assignment must be treated as being what obviously all parties must have intended it to be, namely, an assignment of the British portion of Famel’s business, namely, the business of importing the preparation into Great Britain and selling it there.”

It was this argument which CLAUSON, J., rejected, holding that, according to trade mark law, it was incompetent effectually to assign a mark, not together with the business of origin (and in this case, of declared origin) as a whole but with a department only of that business. The learned judge

(who had earlier referred to the Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. (8), as the leading authority for the proposition that a purchaser of a mark becomes owner of it only if he becomes at the same time purchaser of the manufactory or the business concerned in the goods to which the mark has been affixed) used this language in stating his conclusion (ibid., 130):

"If it were not so, the result would be that a mark distinctive of goods produced and sold in the business carried on by Famel would become by the assignment distinctive, not of goods produced and sold in that business by Famel, or his successors, but of goods sold in a newly separated and, therefore, different business by persons who succeeded Famel as vendors in Great Britain of the goods, but not as producers of them. Such a position seems to me to be inconsistent with the principle that a trade mark is distinctive of goods with which a particular business (whether carried on by the original trader or his successors) is concerned. If the identity of the business is destroyed, the mark is destroyed with it."

In my judgment, CLAUSON, J., in using the phrase "distinctive of goods", clearly meant in the context "distinctive of the origin of goods."

It may well be that it is still true to say that a mark which is on the face of it distinctive of goods made by "A" cannot be assigned or transferred so as to be applied to goods made by "B", for a trade mark is still distinctive of origin: see Aristoc, Ltd. v. Rysta, Ltd. (9), which decided that a trade mark could not be validly registered in respect of goods which was not distinctive of the business origin of the goods, but only of the fact that a repairing process had been applied to them. A mark on the face of it distinctive of one origin, if applied to goods of a different origin, would prima facie be deceptive and, therefore, subject to the terms of s. 11 of the Act. It was not, however, suggested by the defendant in the present case that the marks, if registered in the name of the plaintiffs, would be so deceptive. They still indicate their manufacturing origin, which is in fact the plaintiffs' business, and, in my judgment, it is now clear that by virtue of s. 22 (1) of the Act of 1938 a mark may be validly assigned by one manufacturer to another without any assignment of the business or goodwill of the assignor and so as thenceforth to be distinctive of a manufacturing origin different in fact from the previous manufacturing origin, so long, at any rate, as the mark is not deceptive. It is also, no doubt, true that since the Act a mark distinctive of a manufacturing origin, which is in fact the business of "A", may be assigned by "A" to "B" and will thenceforth be applied by "B" to goods originating from "A" so that the mark still remains distinctive of the same manufacturing origin. But circumstances of this character are not material to the present case.

To the extent I have indicated the earlier principles of trade mark law to which CLAUSON, J., referred have, in my view, been altered by the express terms of the new Act. Nor did counsel for the defendant contend to the contrary. An example was taken during the course of the argument which may be cited here as simply illustrative of the point and of the change made. A firm of well-known cigarette manufacturers and proprietors of a trade mark such as "Gold Flake" might, as I apprehend, effectively sell or transfer to another cigarette manufacturer the mark "Gold Flake" without any contemporaneous transfer of their own goodwill or any part thereof, and thereafter the mark, although still indicative of origin, would be indicative of the manufacturing origin of the assignee and no longer of the previous owners. So much I understood counsel for the defendant to concede. If that is so, then, unless the registration of the mark in the assignee's name were held to be deceptive under s. 11, it would appear not to matter that the goodwill previously attached to the mark was a manufacturer's goodwill associated in fact with the well-known business of the assignors. I cannot, therefore, think that the validity of the transfer to the plaintiffs is affected by the circumstances, assuming it to be the fact, that, as counsel for the defendant contended in opening his appeal, the goodwill attached to the marks was the goodwill of a manufacturer whose business was situated in Germany and was based on secret knowledge belonging to that German business. Indeed, as it seemed to me as the argument developed, the defendant's point under the section was a different and narrower point, viz., that the vesting and transfer still left the defendant, once he had disembarrassed himself of his enemy character, with an unqualified right at common law to the use of the mark or badge so as to bring into play the qualification placed on s. 22 (1) of the Act by s. 22 (4).

It is appropriate at this stage to refer to the relevant language of the section. I have already cited sub-s. (1). Sub-section (2) is directed to the assignability of a mark in respect of part only of the goods in respect of which it is registered, and sub-s. (3) provides that unregistered (that is common law) marks are also assignable in gross, provided (inter alia) they are at the time of the assignment used in the same business as registered marks which are also assigned at the same time and to the same person. Then follows sub-s. (4), which provides:

"Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing sub-sections, a trade mark shall not be, or be deemed to have been, assignable or transmissible in a case in which as a result of an assignment or transmission there would in the circumstances subsist, or have subsisted, whether under the common law or by registration, exclusive rights in more than one of the persons concerned to the use, in relation to the same goods or description of goods, of trade marks nearly resembling each other or of identical trade marks, if, having regard to the similarity of the goods and of the trade marks, the use of the trade marks in exercise of those rights would be, or have been, likely to deceive or cause confusion: Provided that, where a trade mark is, or has been, assigned or transmitted in such a case as aforesaid, the assignment or transmission shall not be deemed to be, or to have been, invalid under this sub-section if the exclusive rights subsisting as a result thereof in the persons concerned respectively are, or were, having regard to limitations imposed thereon, such as not to be exercisable by two or more of those persons in relation to goods to be sold, or otherwise traded in, within the United Kingdom (otherwise than for export therefrom) or in relation to goods to be exported to the same market outside the United Kingdom."

It follows, then, says counsel for the defendant, that, if notwithstanding an assignment the assignor retains an exclusive right himself to use the same mark at common law, the assignment will be ineffective. That proposition I am prepared, at any rate for the purposes of the assignment, to accept. Thus, to revert to my previous illustration, if on the sale of the trade mark "Gold Flake" it was provided by or resulted from the sale agreement that the sellers were still entitled to the use of the name or insignia of "Gold Flake" on their own products, the assignment would be ineffective, and obviously and necessarily so, for the resultant competition would inevitably create deception and confusion. But has the defendant the exclusive right at common law within the terms of the section, as he contends that he has, such a right as entitles him to bring an action for passing-off, as he has done by his counterclaim, against the plaintiffs or against any third party who seeks to make use of the number "4711" in regard to perfume? In my opinion, he has not. Counsel for the defendant sought to rest this part of his case largely on two propositions; (i) that, as a fact, there was a substantial number of persons, members of the public in England, to whom the use of "4711" in relation to eau de cologne signified the products of the German business, and (ii) that the "exclusive rights" in the sub-section meant no more than the right to exclude others from using the badge. In my judgment, neither premise is established or valid.

On the matter of fact, the learned judge who heard the evidence of the dozen or so witnesses called, to the transcript of which we have been referred, came to the conclusion that such evidence was "of no assistance". On a matter of this kind, where the weight of the evidence must depend on the way in which it was given no less than on the words in fact used, I should hesitate long before drawing a different inference from that of the trial judge. And, plainly, if the defendant be unable to prove the requisite association of the marks with his business, any passing-off action on his part must fail. I will, however, assume that the witnesses should be taken as proving the association alleged, and, as the judge himself observed, to anyone at all well acquainted with the pre-war German-made "4711" confusion would be inevitable. Still, I do not think the defendant is entitled to succeed in his claim for passing-off. He is conducting in England no business, selling here no goods. As it seems to me, he has not in this country any proprietary right which he is entitled to protect. Proof of the facts as I have assumed does not create or give him such a right. Reverting again to my example, if the sale by the cigarette manufacturers were of their English trade mark "Gold Flake" with the English goodwill connected therewith and if the sellers covenanted not to use in England the name "Gold Flake" in connection with any of their products, it could not affect the matter that, as would, no doubt, be the case, large numbers of people continued to associate the name "Gold Flake" with the old and well-known manufacturing business. And if the sellers retained the right to the use of "Gold Flake" on cigarettes made by them here but for sale outside this country, the terms of the proviso to s. 22 (4) show that the assignment would not be invalidated under that sub-section. Equally, in the case supposed the original manufacturers would, as I think, have no cause of action for passing-off against a third party who used the name "Gold Flake" on cigarettes of his manufacture for sale by him in England.

Nor am I satisfied that the "exclusive rights" referred to mean no more than the right to exclude others. According to the ordinary use of language an "exclusive right" to the use of something, whether a room in a house or a trade mark, signifies primarily the "sole" or "single" use. In the case of one having been given the exclusive use of another's room, he is probably not in law able to exclude others, having no such proprietary or other interest as would support an action for trespass. In the case of a trade mark, whether registered or unregistered, the proprietary right is, no doubt, sufficient to support an action to exclude. Nevertheless, I cannot think that, at any rate in the absence of some very special circumstances, a person who is not trading in this country and has in this country no proprietary interest in a name or mark can be said to have "the exclusive rights" contemplated by s. 22 (4) because of the goodwill he possesses in another country. As DANCWERTS, J., observed, we are not here concerned with the respective rights the plaintiffs or the defendant may have in some other country, say, in Eritrea. Those rights will presumably depend on the laws of that other country. The question, and the only question, with which we are concerned is whether the defendant in this country has any such proprietary interest, under common law or otherwise, in the mark or badge or in the business of making and selling eau de cologne as will support a claim on his part for passing-off against the plaintiff company or any other person.

I agree with counsel for the plaintiffs that the vesting and assignment of the trade marks, whether (having regard to s. 22 (1)) the latter was expressed to be in connection with the goodwill of a business or not, prima facie operated to confer on the plaintiffs all rights whether statutory or at common law to the use of the mark or badge. Further, the vesting and assignment, according to their terms, operated to assign to the plaintiffs "the goodwill (if any) in the United Kingdom of the business concerned in the goods for which the trade marks are registered"—i.e., all the business goodwill with which the marks had been associated in this country and which, apart from the war, would or might have belonged to the defendant. The nature of goodwill has been many times stated; it represents in connection with any business or business product the value of the attraction to customers which the name and reputation possesses. However difficult of identification, an English goodwill appears to be a species of English personal property capable of being sold or charged (as commonly in the case of a company's goodwill by debentures) or of being bequeathed by will: see Re Betts (10). And in the case of a business product sold all over the world, the English goodwill dependent on the English trade in the product may be a proprietary interest distinct from the goodwill concerned with the trade in the product in another country: see, for example, the "Chartreuse" case (Lecouturier v. Rey (11)) where the respondents, who were in fact the original producers and held the secret of the liqueur, were held entitled to the English trade marks, and, therefore, the English goodwill, notwithstanding the sale by order of a competent French court of the goodwill of the business in France, and the "Dario" case (Impex Electrical, Ltd. v. Weinbaum (12)) where the mark was held validly registered in England in the name of the plaintiffs, who carried on the business of marketing under that name valves manufactured by a French company who sold them in France under the same name but themselves did no business in England: see also the terms of the proviso to s. 22 (4) already noticed.

It seems to me, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to say that they are in the same position, vis-à-vis the defendant, as if the defendant had voluntarily sold to the plaintiffs, not only all his English marks relating to eau de cologne, but the goodwill formerly belonging to him in England by virtue of the association of those marks, on sales of the products in England, with the products of his manufacturing business, together with the right, which a sale of goodwill confers, to represent themselves as the defendant's successors in that business. Such a transaction might have taken place, and, if it had done so, the defendant could clearly not thereafter have said that the mark was inseparable from his manufacturing business in Germany. If the plaintiffs' rights are as I have described them then, in my judgment, the defendant cannot now bring an action for passing-off against the plaintiff company and cannot invoke s. 22 (4) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, to invalidate the assignment to the plaintiff company.

Reference was made by counsel for the defendant to Green & Sons (Northampton), Ltd. v. Morris (13) in support of the general proposition that, since the assignment to the plaintiffs had been an involuntary assignment from the point of view of the defendant of his former property, the rights acquired by the assignee are of a far more limited character than would have been obtained from a voluntary assignment from the defendant himself. But Green v. Morris (13) (a case of an assignment of a business with its goodwill by a trustee under a deed of arrangement), which followed the earlier case of an assignment by a trustee in bankruptcy (Walker v. Mottram (14)), establishes only that the assignee under an involuntary assignment fails to obtain those benefits which require the covenant of the assignor, viz., the covenant, normally given by a vendor on a voluntary sale, not personally to compete with the business sold or to solicit in his own name his old customers. Nothing in those cases qualifies the right of an assignee under an involuntary assignment to enjoy the benefits properly flowing from an assignment of goodwill, including the right to represent himself as carrying on the business as the successor of its former owner.

For these reasons I think that the learned judge rightly rejected the defendant's contentions based on s. 22 (4) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, and that part also of his counterclaim directed to alleged passing-off.

Finally, s. 7 provides:

"Nothing in this Act shall entitle the proprietor or a registered user of a registered trade mark to interfere with or restrain the use by any person of a trade mark identical with or nearly resembling it in relation to goods in relation to which that person or a predecessor in title of his has continuously used that trade mark from a date anterior—(a) to the use of the first-mentioned trade mark in relation to those goods by the proprietor or a predecessor in title of his; or (b) to the registration of the first-mentioned trade mark in respect of those goods in the name of the proprietor or a predecessor in title of his; whichever is the earlier . . ."

The defendant's argument under this section as presented by counsel in his opening speech involved the proposition that the word "proprietor" in para. (a) meant "beneficial proprietor" as distinct from the registered proprietor or legal owner, and that the defendant had not ceased continuously to use the marks in question by reason of his disability due to the war and his enemy status. Whatever may be said of the latter of these propositions, I have been wholly unable to accept the former, for which it does not seem to me that there is any warrant according to the fair construction of the language. But counsel made it clear in his reply that the validity of his point under this section depended on his establishing that the assignment of the marks to the plaintiffs involved a forfeiture or confiscation of the rights previously vested in the defendant so as to create, as it were, a new root of title in the assignment, or the previous vesting in the custodian, and to disentitle the plaintiffs to treat themselves as the successors in title of the defendant in respect of the marks. I confess that I have experienced some difficulty in appreciating this argument, but, in any case, the reasons I have given for rejecting the defendant's arguments under s. 22 (4) necessarily involve a refutation of the premise that the assignment to the plaintiffs operated by way of a forfeiture or confiscation of the defendant's rights. This point, therefore, falls to the ground.

In the result, I think that DANCEWERTS, J., was correct in all his conclusions and I would dismiss both the appeal and the cross-appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., which has just been delivered. That judgment has dealt so completely with the contentions raised before the learned judge in the court below and in this court that no useful purpose would be served by travelling over the same ground again and re-stating the same conclusions. I have also had the opportunity of reading the judgment that my brother, ROMER, L.J., will deliver, dealing particularly with the argument addressed to us on the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 22 (4), and to his judgment on that matter I have nothing to add except to state my agreement with it. But there is one further matter on which I think it is, perhaps, desirable that I should say a very few words. Counsel in the course of his argument on behalf of the defendant, made certain submissions on the true construction of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939. He made those submissions with great force, and at times with great fervour, and he clearly regarded them as being of great importance in the presentation of his case. The opening words of s. 7 of the Act of 1939 were the words on which counsel for the defendant relied, and the material words of the whole section have already been set out in full in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. Perhaps I may repeat the most material words in s. 7 (1):

"With a view to preventing the payment of money to enemies and of preserving enemy property in contemplation of arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace, the Board of Trade may appoint Custodians of enemy property . . . and may by order . . ."

Then follow the detailed matters with which the orders may deal, which have already been read. The first order with which we are concerned, was made on June 26, 1940, and it related to the 35,186 shares in the plaintiff company then registered in the name of a subsidiary company of the defendant. The second order with which we are concerned was made on Jan. 31, 1941, and related to the trade marks. The third order, and, perhaps, the most vital one of all, was made on Apr. 17, 1951, and it gave power to the Custodian in whom the trade marks had been vested by virtue of the order of January, 1941, to assign and transmit the trade marks either in connection with the goodwill of the business or not. In June, 1951, the two assignments which have already been described so fully were executed, the first dealing with the sale of the shares, and the second dealing with the transfer of the trade marks.

The submission of counsel for the defendant was that the power of the Board of Trade to make orders was limited by the opening words of s. 7. The Board of Trade were confined to the purposes of preventing the payment of money to enemies, or preserving enemy property in contemplation of arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace, because, on the true construction of s. 7, no other order-making powers were given to the Board of Trade. It is fairly plain, I think, that if the whole of s. 7 is read and considered in conjunction with s. 15 (5) of the Act larger powers are in fact given to the Board of Trade. For example, the board may by order confer and impose on the custodian such rights, powers, duties and liabilities as may be prescribed as respects property which has been vested in the custodian. But counsel for the defendant submits that, despite such wording, everything is governed by the opening words of the section. He says that what has been done in this case by the Board of Trade amounts to confiscation of the property of an enemy, and that confiscation of the property of enemy subjects is not the law of this country. It is true that in the House of Lords both LORD FINLAY, L.C., and LORD HALDANE asserted that the law of this country does not in general confiscate the property of an enemy. In Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre & Rubber Co. (Gt. Britain), Ltd. (15) LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON said ([1916] 2 A.C. 347):

“Subject to any legislation to the contrary or anything to the contrary contained in the treaty of peace when peace comes, enemy property in this country will be restored to its owners after the war just as property in enemy countries belonging to His Majesty’s subjects will or ought to be restored to them after the war.”

It is to be observed that the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, contained a preamble substantially in the same form as the opening words of s. 7 of the Act of 1939; and in Re Munster (16) RUSSELL, J., said ([1920] 1 Ch. 278):

“In my judgment the Act of 1914 does not depart from these principles or involve confiscation. Under its provisions, the enemy is deprived of beneficial ownership during the war, and the Custodian, after the termination of the war, is bound to deal with it in such manner as His Majesty (keeping no doubt in view the arrangements made at the conclusion of peace) may by Order in Council direct . . . The phraseology used in the preamble and in s. 5 establishes in my judgment that, pending its disposition by Order in Council after the determination of the war, the property is removed from the control and from the beneficial ownership of the enemy. At the termination of the war fresh considerations will arise; and whether the enemy will recover, and to what extent he will recover, the beneficial ownership will depend upon the arrangements made at the conclusion of peace . . . and upon the terms of any Order in Council, made, I doubt not, with those arrangements in view, under s. 5.”

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has already pointed out the difference between the words used in the sub-section to s. 7 of the Act of 1939 and the words used in other enactments conferring powers to make orders for specific purposes, and when the preamble to the Act of 1914 is also kept in mind the argument addressed to us by counsel for the plaintiffs and counsel for the Board of Trade receives strong support. They submitted that it was quite wrong to construe the opening words of s. 7 in the manner contended for by the defendant, and that the true construction was that the words were intended, not to limit the Board of Trade to making orders only for the purposes set out in the opening words, but were rather expressive of the purpose Parliament had in mind when giving to the Board of Trade the powers to make orders relating to the many matters specified in some detail. In my opinion, the construction contended for by counsel for the plaintiffs and counsel for the Board of Trade is a reasonable one, and I think the right one, and I think the argument of counsel for the defendant fails.

I need add nothing to what SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has already said about the effect of the Distribution of German Enemy Property Act, 1949, and the statutory instrument made thereunder. As from the date of the passing of that Act, it was plain that no arrangements on the conclusion of peace would include the return of this property to German nationals, and the Board of Trade had a clear duty to act in accordance with the statute, and to deal with the trade marks in question in the way that brought the greatest advantage. When the transfer of the trade marks was made in June, 1951, it was made in the light of the provisions of the Act of 1949 and the statutory instrument, and the "arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace" referred to in s. 7 of the Act of 1939 could never be such arrangements as would contemplate the handing back of this enemy property to German nationals. Neither need I add anything to what has already been said about the argument counsel for the defendant addressed to us, that, even if there were power to sell or transfer the trade marks for good consideration, there was no power to part with them for nothing. My Lord has dealt with the facts of that situation and I need not repeat them. I agree with the judgment of my Lord in dismissing this appeal.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. As SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., pointed out in his judgment, the most difficult point in this case is that which arises out of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 22 (4), and such observations as I propose to make are mainly confined to this particular feature, which is, I think, both novel and interesting.

The firm of Mulhens (to whom, for convenience, I will refer hereafter as "the defendants") cannot successfully invalidate the assignment by the custodian to the plaintiffs of June 15, 1951, by invoking s. 22 (4) of the Act unless they can show that at the date of the assignment they (the defendants) possessed exclusive rights at common law to the use in this country, in relation to eau de cologne, of the trade marks which are in dispute in the present proceedings. That they possessed such right in, and for many years prior to, 1939 can hardly be open to doubt, and the question would, accordingly, appear to be whether their rights continued to subsist in them notwithstanding the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and of the relevant orders made thereunder; and, if so, whether in any event such rights survived the assignment to the plaintiffs.

The defendants' business before the war consisted of the manufacture in Cologne of the secret essences which constituted the vital elements in their "4711" products and the marketing of such products in many countries, of which Great Britain was one. They sold their goods to the public of this country through the medium of the plaintiffs, who were the sole concessionaires. For the purpose of protecting their trade in Britain they caused to be registered (inter alia) the trade marks which are now in issue, and thus acquired the statutory rights which such registration conferred. Apart from these rights, however, they had their rights at common law arising out of long user of the marks and the resulting association in the minds of purchasers in this country between such marks and the particular goods to which they were applied. As was pointed out by LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Spalding & Brothers v. A. W. Gamage, Ltd. (17) (84 L.J.Ch. 450), an invasion by a third party of the rights conferred at common law by reason of the use of the marks would have constituted a violation of the defendants' goodwill in the business in connection with which the marks were used. In other words, the rights formed part of such goodwill. Did that goodwill have a locality and, if so, what was the locality? Was it in Cologne, where the secret essences were manufactured? Did it exist, as an indivisible entity, in all the markets of the world to which the defendants resorted? Or was its habitat Britain? I cannot but think that the goodwill in question was attached, and solely attached, to the business which the defendants carried on in this country as a distinct and severable enterprise and in respect of which the defendants had had the trade marks registered. If so, then the goodwill did possess a locality and that locality was Britain.

This conception is in accord with the following observations of LORD LINDLEY in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Muller & Co.'s Margarine, Ltd. (18) ([1901] A.C. 235):

"Goodwill regarded as property has no meaning except in connection with some trade, business or calling. In that connection I understand the word to include whatever adds value to a business by reason of situation, name and reputation, connection, introduction to old customers, and agreed absence from competition, or any of these things, and there may be others which do not occur to me. In this wide sense, goodwill is inseparable from the business to which it adds value and, in my opinion, exists where the business is carried on. Such business may be carried on in one place or country or in several, and if in several there may be several businesses, each having a goodwill of its own."

Applying these observations to the facts of the present case I am, as I have said, of opinion that the defendants possessed amongst their assets in 1939 a business goodwill in Great Britain by virtue of which they could have sued at common law in respect of the unauthorised user of their marks, as also in respect of any imitation of the general set-up of their goods which might amount to passing off. From this it follows that, as both the trade marks and the goodwill of the defendants' business here were enemy property when the war broke out, they fell to be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and could properly be, and were, vested in the custodian. Such vesting operated as an assignment of the assets (albeit involuntary) by the defendants to the custodian.

It is true that, as has been pointed out on many occasions (and most recently by this court in Bank Voor Handel v. Slatford (1)), the beneficial interest of the defendants was not utterly destroyed by the vesting of the assets in the custodian. The beneficial interest therein was thenceforward in a state of suspense, but it is clear that, so long as that state lasted, the goodwill of the defendants' business here was taken out of the defendants and reposed thenceforth in the custodian. Nor could the defendants, during the war, attempt to build up a substituted goodwill in this country, for they were precluded from trading here at all.

On June 15, 1951, the custodian assigned the registered trade marks to the plaintiffs. It may well be that this assignment in itself would have carried to the plaintiffs the rights at common law to the marks without express mention. Be that as it may, the custodian did, in addition to transferring the registered trade marks, specifically assign the goodwill as well.

In these circumstances it is difficult to see how, at the time of or after the assignment, any common law rights to the marks remained vested in the defendants, let alone the "exclusive" rights on which the invalidating provisions of s. 22 (4) of the Act of 1938 are based. Throughout the war and down to the date of the assignment, the defendants possessed no legal rights in relation either to the registered trade marks or in relation to the goodwill of the business which they had formerly carried on here. All that the defendants did possess was the suspended beneficial interest to which I have already referred, and if the custodian had the power to sell the trade marks and goodwill, as, in my judgment, he had, even this somewhat shadowy interest was automatically destroyed by the exercise of that power, and nothing survived to the defendants.

Inasmuch as the assignment was executed before the defendants became released from their enemy status, I am not sure how, on any view, the "result" (which presumably means immediate result) envisaged by s. 22 (4) of the Act could be said to have arisen in the present case; but, apart altogether from that, I am of opinion that the sub-section has no application, on the short ground that the common law rights on which the defendants rely formed part of the goodwill of their former business in this country and that this goodwill constituted an asset which was capable of being and was vested in the custodian and validly assigned by him to the plaintiffs. It appears to me, in truth, that the essential basis of the appellant's argument to the contrary must be that the business which the defendants carried on in this country before the war had no separate or distinct goodwill of its own, and that the only relevant goodwill was a manufacturers' goodwill which was situate exclusively in Germany and was inalienable except with the defendants' business as a whole or was an indivisible goodwill situate in all of the countries in which the defendants traded. Once those conceptions of the position are rejected, as, in my opinion, they should be, I think that the results which I have indicated must logically follow on.

In conclusion, on the bearing which s. 22 (4) of the Act of 1938 has on the position, I would like to express my agreement with the observations of the Master of the Rolls in his judgment with regard to the decision of CLAUSON, J. (much relied on before us by the defendants) in the Lacteosote case (7). For the reasons which, and to the extent to which, my Lord has indicated, it appears to me that the earlier principles of trade mark law, which were so relevant to the decision of CLAUSON, J., have been abrogated by the Act of 1938.

On the question whether the opening words of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 7, have any, and if so what, operational effect, I should prefer myself to express no concluded opinion. I entirely agree, however, with SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., that the argument which the defendant sought to found on that section is fully answered by the Distribution of German Enemy Property Act, 1949, and the general order made thereunder. In any event, I do not accept the contention of counsel for the defendant that, on the true construction of s. 7 of the Act of 1939, the Board of Trade could not authorise the custodian to sell any enemy property that had become vested in him unless such property was of a perishable or wasting nature.

On all other points which were argued before us, I am in full accord with the reasoning and conclusions which SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., has expressed and there is nothing that I wish to add. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Faithfull, Owen & Fraser (for the defendant); Slaughter & May (for the plaintiffs); Solicitor, Board of Trade.

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

THOMSON v. CREMIN AND OTHERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, L.C., Lord Thankerton, Lord Wright, Lord Romer, and Lord Porter), July 14, 15, 17, 18, 22, 23, 24, October 20, 1941.]

Invitee—Negligence—Injury to invitee—Liability of invitor for negligence of third party—Stevedore's labourer injured by "shore" while unloading cargo from ship—"Shore" fixed by independent contractor.

Ship—Negligence—Stevedore's labourer injured by "shore" while unloading cargo—Duty of stevedores to inspect ship before unloading cargo.

On Apr. 29, 1938, the first respondent, who was employed by the second respondents as a stevedore's labourer, was injured while engaged in discharging bulk grain from the hold of the appellant's ship, when a heavy wooden shore stretching from the ship's side to the shifting-board fell on his head. This shore had been fixed by a firm of shipwrights in Australia in accordance with regulations made under the Navigation Act, 1912-1926, of the Commonwealth of Australia, and the Australian government had issued a certificate that these regulations had been complied with. The appellant contended that the shore had been securely fixed in Australia, that compliance with the regulations was the full extent of his duty, and that the fall of the shore was not due to any default in him, but was caused by the negligence of the second respondents.

HELD: (i) the appellant owed a duty to the first respondent as an invitee to take reasonable care; the duty of an invitor to an invitee was a duty personal to the invitor, and, while he was not an insurer, he warranted that due care and skill to make the premises reasonably safe for the invitee had been exercised by himself, his servants or agents, or an independent contractor, he was not excused for a failure to perform that duty merely because he had entrusted performance of it to an independent contractor, however reputable and competent, nor by the fact that the Australian government had certified that the local regulations as to shifting boards had been complied with; and, therefore, the appellant was liable to the first respondent.

Wilkinson v. Rea, Ltd. ([1941] 2 All E.R. 50), approved.

(ii) the shifting-board, including the shore, was part of the fittings of the ship; the second respondents were on board for the special and limited purpose of unloading the cargo, and there was no duty on their part, in the absence of special circumstances of suspicion, to inspect the structure of the ship, whether permanent or temporary; there was no evidence that the operation of discharging the cargo caused the shore to collapse; and, accordingly, no negligence on the part of the second respondents had been shown.

AS TO INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 710-715, paras. 1002-1005; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 98, 99, Nos. 655-659.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Indermaur v. Dames, (1866), L.R. 1 C.P. 274; 35 L.J.C.P. 184; 14 L.T. 484; 36 Digest 35, 208.
- (2) Wilkinson v. Rea, Ltd., [1941] 2 All E.R. 50; [1941] 1 K.B. 688; 110 L.J.K.B. 389; 165 L.T. 156; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Simpson v. Paton, (1896), 23 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 590; 33 Sc. L.R. 413; 3 S.L.T. 309; 34 Digest 198, h.
- (4) M'Lachlan v. The Peverill S.S. Co., Ltd. & Macgregor & Ferguson, (1896), 23 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 753; 33 Sc. L.R. 634; 4 S.L.T. 19; Digest Supp.
- (5) Pickard v. Smith, (1861), 10 C.B.N.S. 470; 4 L.T. 470; 142 E.R. 535; 36 Digest 51, 312.

- (6) Dalton v. Angus, (1881), 6 App. Cas. 740; 50 L.J.Q.B. 689; 44 L.T. 844; 46 J.P. 132; 34 Digest 158, 1234.
- (7) Hughes v. Percival, (1883), 8 App. Cas. 443; 52 L.J.Q.B. 719; 49 L.T. 189; 47 J.P. 772; 42 Digest 982, 124.
- (8) Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English, [1937] 3 All E.R. 628; [1938] A.C. 57; 106 L.J.P.C. 117; 157 L.T. 406; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the first defender against an interlocutor pronounced by the Second Division of the Court of Session, dated July 26, 1940, upholding an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (LORD ROBERTSON) who held the first defender solely liable for damages for personal injuries sustained by the first respondent.

Duffes, K.C., and G. S. Reid (both of the Scottish Bar) for the appellant.

John Wheatley and G. G. Stott (both of the Scottish Bar) for the first respondent, the pursuer.

G. R. Thomson, K.C., and John Bassett (both of the Scottish Bar) for the second respondents, the master stevedores.

The House took time for consideration.

Oct. 20. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C.: My Lords, on Apr. 29, 1938, the first respondent, Joseph Cremin, who was pursuer in the action, received serious injuries while employed by the second-named respondents as a stevedore's labourer in discharging bulk grain from No. 2 hold of the s.s. Sithonia, belonging to the appellant, which was lying in Princes Dock, Glasgow, after a voyage from Fremantle in Western Australia. A heavy wooden "shore" which stretched from the ship's side to the "shifting-board" fell on the pursuer's head while he was below propelling a grain "plough", which was being used for feeding the buckets of an elevator working from No. 2 hold to the main deck. The pursuer in the first instance brought his action against the appellant alone, alleging that, owing to the negligence of the appellant, the shore was insecurely attached to the shifting-board. On the appellant attributing the accident to the negligence of the second-named respondents, the pursuer added them as defenders in the action and sued the appellant and the second-named respondents jointly and severally for damages in respect of the injuries which he had sustained. The Lord Ordinary (LORD ROBERTSON) reached the conclusion that the appellant's negligence was established, and that he was liable to compensate the pursuer in the sum of £1,350. As against the master stevedores, the Lord Ordinary held that negligence was not proved and he, accordingly, assoilzied the second-named respondents. The present appellant appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session, contending either that the second-named respondents were solely responsible, or, at any rate, that the responsibility should be shared between them. The Inner House affirmed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. LORD MACKAY, however, would have preferred a finding of joint responsibility, and there are indications that other of the judges composing the court did not in all respects agree with the mode of reasoning by which the Lord Ordinary reached his conclusion.

The case for the appellant before this House was again stated alternatively, his contentions being (a) that there was no failure of duty by him towards the injured man, but that the sole responsibility lay on the second-named respondents; (b) that, in any event, if liability was established against the appellant, fault causing the accident was also proved against the second-named respondents. This double-barrelled case was presented to us in an argument which thoroughly examined every detail of the evidence, but the House intimated that the decision already reached by the courts in Scotland must stand, for reasons which would be given later. I have now to state, with such brevity as the subject-matter permits, what are the reasons why I consider that the appeal should be dismissed.

The holds of a vessel which is about to undertake a voyage with grain in bulk as its cargo require to be fitted with shifting-boards, i.e., wooden partitions running fore and aft from bulkhead to bulkhead in the centre line of the ship, so as to obviate the danger of the grain shifting in heavy weather from one side to the other. These shifting-boards are, for the most part, supported in position by attachment to the permanent iron pillars which are fixed at intervals inside the holds; but, in the way of the hatch, lateral support for the shifting-board is provided by shores—short shores stretching from the hatch coamings (with these we are not in this case directly concerned), and long shores stretching from either side of the ship at a rising angle of about ten degrees from the horizontal. These long shores, in the case of the Sithonia, were about twenty-seven feet long with a scantling of six inches by eight inches, and these dimensions were not challenged as inadequate. Since the long shores meet the uprights of the shifting-boards at a slope, it is important that their midship ends should be cut at such an angle as will present a flat surface for making contact with the perpendicular. The Lord Ordinary held, and the fact may be accepted, that this was done in the case of the Sithonia. But it is not enough that the midship ends of the long shores should be suitably shaped, or even that the shores should be pressed down so as to make solid contact; they must be so held in position as to make sure that they will remain firm. There was some difference of view as to what additional precautions were needed, but the evidence fully warranted the Lord Ordinary's conclusion that a safe construction would be provided by (i) securely nailing the midships end of a shore to the upright against which it pressed, and (ii) fitting a "chock" or "cleat" of wood above the midships end of the shore by nailing it with five-inch nails of No. 5 gauge driven through it into the upright, and thus counteracting any upward thrust of the midships end of the shore. Indeed, I understand the appellant to accept this standard. His argument on the facts was directed to establishing (a) that the shore which fell on the pursuer was securely fixed in Australia in accordance with the above construction; (b) that its fall was not due to any default in the shipowner, but was caused by the negligent operations of the second-named respondents while discharging the cargo under contract with the appellant.

As regards (a), the testimony was conflicting. The appellant relies on the evidence of three witnesses taken in Australia, where Messrs. Petterson & Co., a firm of shipwrights with a large experience of fitting grain ships with shifting-boards, were employed for this purpose in the Sithonia in preparation for her taking on board her cargo. The partner in this firm who supervised the work gave evidence that the construction above described was duly carried out: a marine surveyor who inspected and certified the work for an underwriting association testified that the structure was properly executed—(the Lord Ordinary notes that he did not state that the inboard ends of the shores were secured by nails, but, on the other hand, he declared that he would not expect the shore to be dislodged by less than repeated blows with a sledge-hammer)—and a government inspector who gave the official certificate spoke more generally of the shifting-boards being efficiently fitted. As against this, there is the fact that, after the shore was exposed by the removal of the grain in which it was embedded during the voyage, the shore fell, and fell without the application of any violence corresponding to sledge-hammer blows; and, according to the evidence of three fellow-workmen of the pursuer who were in the hold when it fell, the chock which should have helped to keep the shore in position became detached and fell also, when it was observed that the nails in it, instead of being five inches long, were short nails of about two and a half inches. The details of Messrs. Petterson's bill show that a quantity of three-inch nails were charged for in the course of the work, but no evidence was given as to the purpose for which they were used. The erection of the shifting-boards, and the fitting of shores to support them, were required by regulations made under the Navigation Act, 1912-1926, of the Commonwealth of Australia, and the Sithonia could not have left the port of Fremantle with her cargo of bulk grain without the official certificate that these regulations had been complied with. The appellant's counsel contended that compliance with the regulations was the full extent of the shipowner's duty. This is plainly not the case. The regulations are for the purpose of securing that ship and cargo can safely face the dangers of the voyage, but the shipowners have undertaken, not only to carry the cargo to its destination, but to unload it there, and must have contemplated that stevedores would be employed for this purpose. As between the shipowner and the pursuer, the former must be regarded as the occupier and the latter as an invitee who comes to work in the hold in consequence of the contract made between the shipowner and the pursuer's employers. The shipowner's responsibility for the safety of the structure is not, indeed, absolute, but, on the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (1), he owes to the invitee a duty of adequate care. If adequate care was not exercised in fitting and securing the shore, it would be no answer (as the appellant's counsel candidly admitted) to say that the shipowner employed an independent contractor at Fremantle to do the work. For this last proposition, reference may usefully be made to a recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Wilkinson v. Rea, Ltd. (2), and especially to the observations of LUXMOORE, L.J. ([1941] 2 All E.R. 60). I can see no ground for drawing a distinction between the permanent structure of the ship and the temporary erections put up in her holds for the purpose of the special cargo she was carrying.

The first, and crucial, question, therefore, is whether the fixing and securing of the shore at Fremantle were done with adequate care. This, in turn, largely depends on whether the chock was fastened by nails of adequate length, or whether the evidence as to shorter nails is to be believed. It would be difficult to imagine an issue in which the decision more completely depends on the view of the trial judge as to the trustworthiness of the testimony given in his presence by the witnesses who asserted that the chock became detached by the accident, and that they found it had only been fastened with short nails. The Lord Ordinary, who alone had the opportunity of judging of their veracity at first hand, has believed what they said. It is unfortunate that neither the chock nor the shore were preserved after the accident so that they could be produced at the trial, but I am not satisfied that their absence helps the shipowner to whom the pieces of wood belonged. Without throwing any doubt on the sincerity of the Australian witnesses, it is fair to observe that they were testifying some fifteen months after the accident and eighteen months after the work was done. If small nails were improperly used to fasten the chock, this must have escaped their attention, and, once the mistake was made, it may well be that inspection would not detect it. The four judges of the Second Division did not differ from the Lord Ordinary's view that short nails were employed and, in such a case as this and in view of the evidence given, the House could not, in my opinion, properly set aside this concurrent finding of fact.

As regards (b), the appellant made a series of allegations of fault against the second-named respondents and contended that the approximate cause of the accident was to be found in one or other of these alleged shortcomings. First, he contended that it was the duty of master stevedores, as soon as the unloading of the cargo had proceeded far enough to expose the shores which had been buried in the grain, to remove the shores altogether, and thus obviate the possibility of their falling at a later stage on those who were working below them. The appellant's evidence in support of this view largely related to practice in a particular line of vessels where the company does its own stevedoring, and where the removal of shores might be explained because they would otherwise impede the work of discharge, or because the holds were being cleared for a return cargo other than bulk grain. I agree with the view of the Lord Ordinary that the evidence did not establish any practice of removing shores for reasons of safety or security, and, indeed, if shores are securely and properly fixed, there would seem to be no need to remove them for such reasons. The Sithonia met with no exceptionally severe weather on her voyage and it is a striking fact that the fall of a shore in circumstances like the present is so unusual

A an event that none of the witnesses called in the case could speak to it ever having happened before. This circumstance, to my mind, strongly confirms the view that there was something faulty in the fixing of this particular shore that was the cause of the accident. Next, the appellant contended that the second-named respondents were liable for failure to inspect the shores and to detect the weakness of this particular shore before it fell. Here, again, I agree

B with the view of the Scottish courts that it was not proved to be part of the regular practice or course of duty of stevedoring firms to make such inspection. Of course, if they observed that a particular shore was loose, their duty would be to take immediate precautions, but, in the present case, there seems no reason to think, and it certainly was not proved, that the shore which collapsed gave any appearance, before its fall, of being dangerous. The appellant

C further urged that an explanation of the collapse might be found in the vibration set up by the working of the two elevators used for discharging the grain, or by a portion of this apparatus getting into actual contact with the shore, or by the wires which hauled the "ploughs" in the hold fouling the shore in some way. These arguments were developed before us at considerable length, but the short answer to them is that, though it is conceivable that one or other

D of these matters might bring about the accident, there is no sufficient evidence that any of them did. The method of discharging grain cargoes at Princes Dock, Glasgow, is exceptional; for the more modern and customary use of suction is not employed. But the evidence does not at all justify the conclusion that the methods of unloading employed at Princes Dock are not proper, and, as I have said, no one was able to say that an accident of this sort had happened

E there before. The appellant went so far as to argue that, since Glasgow was not named in his contract as the port of discharge, he was not required to provide against the special circumstances of unloading at that port. The answer, of course, is that Glasgow was within the range of ports at which he might be required to discharge, and that, in any event, it is not proved that the methods employed at Princes Dock caused the shore to fall when it would not have fallen had the unloading taken place elsewhere.

F

My Lords, the decision in this case turns almost entirely on questions of fact, as to which the courts in Scotland have given the fullest attention and have reached the unanimous conclusion that the appellant, and the appellant alone, is liable for this deplorable accident. There are no adequate grounds on which that conclusion could be disturbed, and I, accordingly, move that the

G appeal be dismissed with costs.

My Lords, my noble and learned friend, LORD ROMER, authorises me to say that he has read the opinion which I have just delivered and concurs in it.

LORD THANKERTON: My Lords, in this action the first respondent seeks to recover damages for injuries sustained by him on Apr. 29, 1938, while

H employed as a stevedore's labourer by the second respondents in the discharge of bulk grain from No. 2 hold of the s.s. Sithonia which belonged to the appellant and was then lying alongside in Princes Dock, Glasgow. The first respondent originally raised the action against the appellant, but, in view of the defence stated by the appellant, he convened the second respondents as defenders, and now sues the appellant and the second respondents jointly and severally or severally for the damages claimed. After proof led before him, the Lord Ordinary (LORD ROBERTSON) decerned against the present appellant for payment to the pursuer of £1,350 in the name of damages, and assolizied the present second respondents. On a reclaiming motion by the appellant, who did not challenge the quantum of damages awarded, the decision of the Lord Ordinary was affirmed by the Second Division of the Court of Session. The present appeal is taken against these decisions.

As in the Inner House, the appellant maintained in this House that he was entitled to absolvitor and alternatively that the appellant's injuries were jointly caused by his fault and that of the second respondents, who were thus jointly liable with him. Again, no question was raised as to the quantum of damages, if liability was established. There is no doubt that the serious injuries sustained by the first respondent were caused by a heavy timber shore which fell on his head while he was operating a grain plough, which gathered the grain so as to feed the elevator, which raised it to the main deck. The Lord Ordinary has fully described the position and purpose of the shore in relation to the shifting-boards, and the construction of the shifting-boards, as also the way in which the discharge of the grain was being conducted by the second respondents, who were employed by the appellant for that purpose. The shifting-boards are a necessary precaution in the case of cargoes of grain in bulk, so as to obviate the risk of the grain shifting during the voyage in heavy weather; the province of the shores is to maintain the shifting-boards in position. While the shifting-boards serve no purpose after the cargo has reached its destination, it is not really practicable to remove the shores until at least a substantial portion of the grain in the particular hold has been removed. The Lord Ordinary held it proved that the amidships end of the shore in question had not been properly secured at Fremantle, in respect that the wooden chock, which was designed to prevent the shore from springing upwards, had been nailed to the shifting-board by nails of an inadequate length, and that this was the cause of the accident; he held that the appellant was therein negligent, and that such negligence was a breach of the duty owed by the appellant to the first respondent. This view was affirmed by the Inner House. As regards the crucial finding of fact as to the failure of the appellant to have the shore properly secured at Fremantle, I may express my concurrence in the view of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in the speech which he has just delivered, which I have had the opportunity of considering, and I agree that this finding must stand.

There remains the question whether such failure of the appellant constituted a breach of any duty owed by him to the first respondent, and, if so, whether it can be causally connected with the accident. My Lords, I have no doubt that the shifting-boards, including the shores, were part of the fittings of the ship, and, contrary to the view of LORD MACKAY, I am of opinion that Simpson v. Paton (3) and M'Lachlan v. The Peverill S.S. Co., Ltd. (4) are directly relevant, and that, unless the appellant can show special circumstances which would impose the duty of inspection on the stevedore, he is liable for the results of the unsafe condition of the shore to the first respondent, to whom he owed a duty to take reasonable care under the well-known principle of Indermaur v. Dames (1). While the certificate of the Australian surveyors, given under the statutory regulations of Australia, may be of some evidential value, in a case such as the present one, as to the steps taken by the appellant to secure the proper construction of the shifting-board, it cannot absolve the appellant of his duty to the first respondent; further, the ship undertook not only the carriage of the grain during the voyage, but the discharge of the grain at any port at which it undertook the discharge had a contract of carriage or by subsequent agreement. Counsel for the appellant submitted that this would place an unreasonable burden on the ship, the ultimate port of discharge might not be in view at the time of the contract on the shifting-boards, but the answer is simple, viz., either secure

A adequately the shifting-boards, or take steps to remove them or make sure of their adequacy by inspection at the port of discharge by the ship itself or by arrangement with the stevedores. Of course, it might be that the practice of a particular port was so inveterate that the ship was entitled to rely, as part of their arrangement for employment of the stevedore, on the discharge of such duty of inspection by the latter, and it may be that the employees of the stevedore would be affected by such transfer of the duty of inspection, but that question does not arise for consideration in this appeal, for I am clearly of opinion that the evidence in this case falls far short of proving any such inveterate practice. If it proves anything it proves a variety of practice, and is inconsistent with the appellant's case. The same is true of the alleged practice of removal of the shores by the stevedore.

B The appellant maintained that the second respondents were negligent in three respects, viz., (i) in putting in an apparatus which might foul the shore in course of the operations, (ii) in the amount of vibration caused during the operation, and (iii) in the operation of the ploughs, any of which caused, or might tend to cause, the loosening of the shore. But, in my opinion, these contentions are excluded by the admission of the appellant's counsel, made in answer to a question by one of your Lordships, that nothing that was done in C the present case was unusual, and that this is the first time that a shore has fallen as this one did. It is not suggested that, in the present case, the second respondents, or any of their employees, observed, or should have observed, prior to the falling of the shore, anything which would have warned them that the shore was loose or dangerous. The appellant's case against the second D respondents fails, and it follows, in my opinion, that the courts below were well justified in holding that the appellant's negligence in construction of the shifting-boards was the cause of the accident and was in breach of the duty owed by him to the first respondent, and that he alone is liable to the first respondent. I, therefore, agree with the motion proposed by my noble and learned friend.

E LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, I have had the advantage of considering in print the speech which my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, has just delivered. I agree with it and merely add a few supplementary observations on some general matters of principle which seem to me to be involved.

F That the first respondent was working on the appellant's premises, the steamship Sithonia, as an "invitee" and not as a mere licensee has not been questioned. Thus, the case fell within the general rule enunciated in Indermaur v. Dames (1). The rule there laid down as to the duty of the "invitor" to the "invitee" has been affirmed in several decisions of this House, whether the particular case was held to fall within or without the rule. In the present appeal, however, the failure to exercise due care for the safety of the invitee which has been found was due, not to the negligence of the appellant or his G servants, but to that of independent contractors, the Australian shipwrights who constructed the shifting-boards before the grain was loaded. I agree with the Lord Chancellor in his approval of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Wilkinson v. Rea, Ltd. (2), where it was held by LUXMOORE, L.J., with whom MACKINNON, L.J., concurred, that the invitor was not excused for a failure to perform his duty to the invitee merely because he had entrusted performance to another. LUXMOORE, L.J., adopted the view of WILLIAMS, J., in H Pickard v. Smith (5). The duty of the invitor towards the invitee is, in my opinion, a duty personal to the former, in the sense that he does not get rid of the obligation by entrusting its performance to independent contractors. It is true that the invitor is not an insurer: he warrants, however, that due care and skill to make the premises reasonably safe for the invitee have been exercised, whether by himself, his servants, or agents or by independent contractors whom he employs to perform his duty. He does not fulfil the warranty merely by leaving the work to contractors, however reputable or generally competent. His warranty is broken if they fail to exercise the proper care and skill. This is only an instance of the general rule which was stated by LORD BLACKBURN in another connection in Dalton v. Angus (6) (6 App. Cas. 829), where he distinguished the case of what has been called the collateral negligence of a sub-contractor from their negligence in failing to perform a duty resting on the principal himself “who cannot escape from the responsibility attaching to him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor.”

LORD BLACKBURN again enunciated the same principle in Hughes v. Percival (7) (8 App. Cas. 446). More recently this House, again in a different context of fact, applied this rule in Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (8). It is always a question of the extent of the duty incurred. In the present case, the invitee is not concerned with the course which the invitor adopts by way of discharging the duty. He is entitled, when he comes on the invitor's premises, to rely on the warranty that the invitor's duty to him has been performed and to complain if he is injured because the duty has not been properly performed.

Counsel for the appellant, when this question was raised in the argument before this House, said that he did not rely on the fact that the neglect was that of the sub-contractor, first, because the point was not pleaded, and, secondly, because he was not optimistic of success in arguing it. I feel that the fairness and candour of counsel deserve a recognition on my part that he was justified in his want of optimism. On the facts found and admitted the question raised by the employment of the independent contractors hits one in the face. Speaking for myself, I should be unwilling to decide against the appellant if I did not think, as I do, that the employment by the appellant of the Australian shipwrights, though a competent firm of good repute, afforded him no defence in this action. Nor do I think that the appellant can, in this action, rely on the Commonwealth government certificate that the regulations as to shifting-boards had been complied with, or claim that it constitutes sufficient evidence that he had fulfilled his duty to the first respondent. These regulations are for the purpose of satisfying the requirements of the public policy of the Commonwealth, and do not, in general, affect private and personal duties and rights, whether contractual or such as those arising in this case from the relationship between the appellant and the first respondent.

With the greatest respect to LORD MACKAY, I cannot see any reason to hold the second respondents responsible to the first respondent either solely or conjunctly with the appellant. To hold a master stevedore, in the absence of special circumstances of suspicion, subject to a general duty towards his men to inspect the structure of the vessel, whether permanent or temporary, whether shifting-boards, stanchions or the like, would, I think, be contrary to practice and inconsistent with the exigencies of the case. He comes on board the vessel, the shipowner's premises, to carry out the loading or discharging, and, unless there are special stipulations in the contract, is prima facie entitled to assume that the shipowner has discharged his duty of care in regard to the safety of the premises. He is on board the ship for a special and limited purpose and has in the ordinary course no right to interfere with the structure, temporary or permanent, of the vessel. No doubt, if there are apparent indications which he observes, or ought to observe, that the structure is defective, he owes a duty to take reasonable measures for the protection of his men. But there was nothing of the sort in the present case. I agree generally with what was said on this question by the Lord Justice-Clerk (RT. HON. J. H. A. MACDONALD) in M'Lachlan v. The Peverill S.S. Co., Ltd. (4) (23 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 757), though, if there was something manifestly wrong and dangerous, I think the stevedore should refuse to go on with the work until the defect was remedied. I cannot, however, see what purpose would be served by a slight inspection of the structure by the master stevedore where there was no special ground of suspicion, while to require it would place an unwarranted and unbusinesslike burden on the stevedore.

A I do not find in this case any occasion for invoking the formula generally described as "res ipsa loquitur". That is little more than a prima facie presumption of evidence of very limited use; where it exists, it can always be rebutted. It does not arise at all in the present case. Though the structure was throughout in the possession and control of the shipowner, it was exposed to many external influences not involving negligence of the appellant from the date when it was erected until the time when the shore fell, such as perils of the seas, and possible damage in the course of the unloading operations; in addition the risk of a latent defect cannot be ignored. Hence the occurrence of the accident is not, in itself, any evidence, even prima facie, of breach of duty by the appellant. Some evidence pointing to a specific fault is, in my opinion, here necessary to satisfy the onus which rests on the first respondent to establish negligence. It is on the specific evidence of defective workmanship that the decision is to be justified in this case. The various observations which I have made are merely supplementary to the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor, with which, as I have already stated, I agree. I concur in the motion proposed.

C LORD PORTER: My Lords, the question to be considered in the present case is, I think, one of fact rather than of law, and ultimately turns on whether the view of the Lord Ordinary and his method of solving the problem can be supported. The first respondent, Joseph Cremin, was injured by the fall of a shore in No. 2 hold of the s.s. Sithonia when he was engaged in discharging her at Princes Dock, Glasgow. He was a docker in the service of the second respondents, Andrew Main and Sons, who were the stevedores employed by the appellant to effect that discharge. The shore was erected to support certain shifting-boards placed below the hatch in accordance with the provisions of statutory rules made under the Navigation Act, 1912-1926, of the Commonwealth of Australia. By Part III, r. 9, of those rules it was provided:

E " (1) Where bulk grain is loaded in any ship shifting-boards shall be erected in the ship to the satisfaction of the surveyor . . . (2) Shifting-boards where fitted . . . (b) shall be properly secured to the satisfaction of the surveyor . . . between uprights and shored or stayed in position."

In the Sithonia the shifting-boards in way of the hatchway did not extend to the bottom of the hold: they were supported by stilts and by vertical wooden uprights nailed on each side of the shifting-boards. They received lateral support from the shores, which were made fast at the skin of the ship and ran thence at an upward angle of ten to fifteen degrees to the shifting-boards in the centre of the hold where they were kept in position by being driven down on the vertical wooden uprights and fastened with nails; a wooden chock was then fastened above the inboard end of the shore, also with nails, in order to prevent upward thrust. It was found by the Lord Ordinary that, had nails of an adequate size been used, this was a proper and usual method of securing the shore, its lateral movement being prevented by the nails fastening it to the uprights, whilst the upward thrust, which was the chief force exercised on it, was checked by the chock nailed above. The nails, however, in each case should have been five inches long by five-inch gauge, and the Lord Ordinary has found that, whereas those used to prevent lateral movement were of the right kind, those used to secure the chock were only two and a half or at most three inches in length, with the result that the chock and shore came away and fell, injuring the first respondent. This finding was strongly controverted by the appellant on the grounds that: (i) It was not relied on in the condescendence. (ii) It was not put, or at any rate not adequately put, to the witnesses in Australia who were responsible for the erection. (iii) That it was against the weight of evidence.

(i) and (ii). The allegation in the condescendence is that the shore rested on a light piece of wood about one inch thick secured to the shifting-board by means of small nails, and by cross-interrogatories the Australian witnesses were asked whether such a construction was a proper one. It is quite true that the suggested defence might have been put more clearly and definitely. The statement, as made, contains, I think, three separate grounds of complaint not differentiated one from the other, viz.: (a) that the chock was too narrow, (b) that it was placed below the shore instead of above it, and (c) that both chock and shore were secured by small nails. But I think the condescendence does give sufficient warning that one ground on which reliance was placed was that improper nails were used in the chock as well as the shore. In the case of the cross-interrogatories the same case was put to the Australian witnesses and the same warning given. The method of obtaining evidence from abroad by means of interrogatories and cross-interrogatories has the advantage of cheapness and often saves time. No doubt, it is fully justified for these reasons, but in a case where the facts are seriously in dispute and a careful inquiry into the observation and recollection of witnesses is called for it necessarily fails to achieve the best results. Even a direct inquiry whether short nails were not used would be an inadequate test since it would not probe the grounds on which the witness based his answer. The court, which has to decide the question, must in such circumstances do the best it can on the material before it, acting on the general impression created by the answers to the interrogatories in conjunction with the viva voce evidence given in Scotland. (iii) The Lord Ordinary was able to form a view of the witnesses he saw and of their evidence, and if he thought it more reliable than that from Australia to accept it as against the other. Indeed, speaking for myself, I should say that there is a good reason for thinking that the Australian witnesses were not recollecting exactly what was done in the particular ship, but speaking to a general practice. I recognise that Mr. Heron, who was in charge of the work on behalf of the contractors, does say that five-inch nails of five-inch gauge were used in this ship in fastening both shore and the chock, but as his evidence had to be obtained by means of interrogatories he could not be subjected to close cross-examination and the Scottish witnesses may well have been more accurate. If, then, five-inch nails were required to make the structure secure and were usually inserted and if only three-inch nails were used, the shipowner, subject to certain considerations which I deal with below, would be guilty of negligence and would be liable to the injured man.

The first consideration urged against his liability was that the only duty which the shipowner owed in respect of the shifting-boards and any shores erected to secure them was that the requirements of the surveyor in Australia should be complied with. Admittedly, this had been done and the appropriate certificate secured. Primarily, shifting-boards are erected for the safety of the ship to prevent the grain shifting and to make her seaworthy for the voyage she is undertaking. Even for that purpose the certificate of the surveyor would, I think, only be effective provided the obligation was merely to take due care to make the ship seaworthy, not if the obligation were absolute to make her so. To comply with the regulations is to fulfil an obligation towards the Commonwealth and to avoid the guilt of breaking a statutory obligation. Its fulfilment would protect the shipowner from criminal liability for such a breach, but would not insure him against all claims for negligence by a third party. I cannot accept the argument as having any bearing on the liability of the ship to a docker working in her holds. Toward him the duty is at least to refrain from negligently erecting anything likely to do him injury, or, to put it more broadly, as a minimum to take due care to make the structures in the hold secure against causing injury to any one required to work in the hold for the ship's purposes. But, said the shipowner, this shore was not likely to injure

A the man because it should have been removed by the master stevedore before the docker worked under the place where it was, and even if its removal was not obligatory it should have been carefully inspected on behalf of the stevedore as soon as the discharge of the grain which surrounded its fastenings made this course possible. Accordingly, the stevedore, it was contended, was either solely responsible for the accident, or, at any rate, his negligence contributed to its incidence, and, if so, by Scottish law, each of the defenders, the ship and the stevedore, would be under a conjunct and several liability to the injured man under which he could recover the whole sum awarded from either or both, but each would be liable to indemnify the other if that other should pay more than half.

In my opinion, this argument fails on the evidence given and facts as found.

B No general practice of removing shores was proved except in a case where they interfered with the work being done in the hold. Indeed, the general effect of the evidence was to the contrary. It is true that some of the witnesses from amongst the dockers and their representatives speak to the practice of removing shores, as does one of the ship's officers, but the former base themselves largely on the practice of the Donaldson Atlantic Line, who do their own stevedoring and, therefore, are authorised by the ship itself to remove the shores from their own ship without requiring special permission, and the latter has a very slight acquaintance with the carriage of grain in bulk. Moreover, the stevedores employed on the Donaldson Atlantic Line themselves stated the object of removing the shores to be, not the safety of the men engaged, but the due performance of the work, which would be impeded by leaving the shores in position. In the case of their line, bulk grain is generally carried in the bottom of the hold only. Where this occurs, the shifting-boards must extend to the bottom of the hold and if not removed would interfere with the discharge of the grain. They are not erected, as in the case of the Sithonia, at the top of the hold only, where they do not get in the way of men working below. Nor can I put much reliance on the allegation of dockers who say after an accident has occurred, that the removal is for their safety. The administrative staff, not the workers, know the object of the removal and it is illuminating to remember that the occurrence of such an accident was unprecedented and even after it had occurred the men discharging the Sithonia continued to work below the long shores without demur, though some shorter shores across the mouth of the hatch, which have no bearing on the matters discussed before your Lordships, but appear to have been loose, were first made secure on the orders of the ship's officer left on board.

E

F

But the appellant argues that there was another circumstance to which the loosening of the shore should be attributed. It is common ground that two elevators were used in discharging the hold and it was said that to use two and not one would result in greatly increased vibration and would naturally shake the shore from its fastenings. Some vibration, no doubt, there was and it may well have had some effect on loosening a shore which was insufficiently secured, but it was not proved to be unusual to use two elevators and the Lord Ordinary did not accept the contention that any undue vibration had occurred. A further argument, however, was put forward on behalf of the ship. It was said that the normal method of discharge of a bulk grain cargo is by suction, that that method does not require the presence of dockers in the hold, and that the shipowner was not obliged to make himself acquainted with unusual means of discharging which are confined to an individual port. It was further said that the ship was sent to discharge part of her cargo at Southampton, and that it was not until that port was reached that she received orders to proceed to Glasgow for final discharge. Therefore, her owners, when erecting the shifting-boards, did not know that the method of discharge adopted at Princes Dock, Glasgow, would be used or that the dockers would be exposed to the risk of a falling shore. The simplest answer to this argument is, I think, that a shipowner chartering a ship or carrying a cargo to a range of ports, even though the choice of the individual port be postponed until a later date, knows, when loading, to what ports or range of ports he may be ordered and must make himself familiar with the normal incidents of discharge at those ports. To fulfil his contract, he requires stevedores to put out the cargo and he must safeguard them against risks of which he knows or ought to know and they do not. In the present case, such an obligation casts no great burden on him when it is remembered how important a grain port Glasgow is and that even Princes Dock receives a considerable number of cargoes of bulk grain. If, then, the ship be responsible at least for taking all reasonable precaution that the structures in her hold, whether permanent or temporary, be erected with care sufficient to ensure that no danger shall exist which is likely to cause injury to men employed to work in her holds, she is liable in the present instance unless some intervening negligence of another, in this case of the stevedores, is also a cause of the accident, and is solely liable unless that negligence contributed to the accident.

G

H

In the present case I agree with the Lord Ordinary and the Lower House in thinking that no negligence has been shown on the part of the stevedores. If the shore had been obviously loose, and if any casual observation would have shown this state of affairs, the stevedore might have had to share the blame. But no general practice of examination was proved to exist, no severity of weather in the course of the voyage gave rise to any suspicion of damage, and no such accident had been known to occur before.

In M'Lachlan v. The Peveril S.S. Co., Ltd. (4) the pursuer was injured by the fall of a stanchion which was said to be insufficiently fastened so that the slight touch of a sling in the course of the discharge caused it to fall and injure him. He sued both ship and stevedores and against the latter his allegation was that their foreman knew or ought to have known that the stanchion was practically unfastened and unsupported. Yet the Inner House held that no relevant plea had been averred against the stevedores. The Lord Justice-Clerk, with whom LORDS TRAYNER and MONCRIEFF agreed, in the course of his judgment assented to the proposition that a stevedore is not called on to look to the fastenings on board a ship on which he has to work. He adds (23 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 757):

"Of course a stevedore who happened to notice anything which was seriously wrong should point it out, but he could not have any power in the management of the ship; and if the people on board the ship—the master or owner—to whom he made a complaint were to say to him, 'Attend to your own business, we will attend to ours; we are quite satisfied with it,' I do not think he could have refused to carry on his work to the best of his ability."

Even LORD YOUNG who dissented said (ibid., 758):

"I think there is authority to the effect that a very slight supervision will be sufficient on the part of the stevedore to exempt him from responsibility, and that he may assume that this, that, and the other thing are all right in a ship without making a special examination."

In dealing with the present case it is not necessary to go so far as the Lord Justice-Clerk. If LORD YOUNG be right, and I think he is, the stevedores are not liable. There is nothing to suggest that the shore was so obviously loose that it must have been seen by anyone making a casual inspection and no circumstances which would fasten an accusation of negligence on those to whom the discharge was entrusted. It was urged, however, that the Lord Ordinary had approached the subject in the wrong way—he had relied on the argument that the shore had fallen, that shores do not normally fall without some negligence on the part of those who set them up, and that the shipowner was in control of the ship's hold from the time of the erection until the finish of the discharge. He, accordingly, applied the doctrine which is commonly referred to as res ipsa loquitur. Even if the first two assumptions were conceded it was contended that the third was not justified since the stevedore and not the ship was in charge of the unloading. I doubt if this criticism is justified. It is true, I think, to say that the doctrine cannot strictly apply inasmuch as the shore might have been displaced by the activities of the stevedore or his men. Had there been no evidence except that the shore fell the argument that the shipowner had not been proved to be in fault would have had considerable weight. But the method of discharging, the events which happened during its incidence, and the possibility of negligence on the part of the stevedore and of danger from vibration were all thoroughly canvassed. The Lord Ordinary, after hearing this evidence, came to the conclusion that no act of the stevedore or his men caused or contributed to the accident and there was ample evidence to support his finding. If all causes, except improper fastening in Australia, be eliminated, the blame may rightly be attributed to those responsible for failure to make the shore fast there and in a somewhat loose sense it may be said that the mere fall of something which should not have fallen shows negligence in those who erected it. I agree that the shipowner was solely to blame and would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Thomas Cooper & Co., agents for Boyd, Jameson & Young, W.S., Edinburgh (for the appellant, the shipowner); Landons, agents for William Thornton, Glasgow, and Thos. J. Addy, S.S.C., Edinburgh (for the first respondent, the pursuer); Lawrence Jones & Co., agents for Niven, Macniven & Co., Edinburgh, and Macpherson & Mackay, W.S., Glasgow (for the second respondents, the master stevedores).

NOTE.

PADLEY v. PADLEY

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), October 13, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Appeal—Notes of evidence and reasons—Need to supply before appeal set down—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 71 (3).

AS TO NOTES OF PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 850, para. 1359; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, p. 734, Nos. 7014-7023.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES RULES, 1950, r. 71 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 10, p. 231.

FOR THE LEGAL AID (GENERAL) REGULATIONS, 1950, see ibid., Vol. 5, pp. 202-220.

APPEAL by the husband from an order made by Nottingham city justices on Mar. 18, 1953, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949. The justices found the husband guilty of desertion and of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife and the infant child of the marriage, but not guilty of persistent cruelty to the wife.

R. L. Bayne-Powell (John Latey with him) for the husband.

K. B. Campbell for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: The justices have expressed a hope that we would give them some guidance on a technical matter. The appeal was out of time, due, partly, to delay in obtaining the reasons of the justices for their decision. This, I gather, was because, through their clerk, they expressed the view that they would prefer to wait for the appeal to be set down and become effective before they went to the trouble of stating their reasons. They wish to know whether that was correct or not. I shall answer that question in two ways. Looked at from a strictly technical point of view, it was certainly wrong, because the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 71 (3), governing appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, provides that, at the time of lodging the notice of motion stating the grounds of appeal, the appellant must file

A

“ . . . two copies of the justices' clerk's notes of the evidence and two copies of the reasons of the justices for their decision.”

That sub-rule cannot be complied with if justices withhold their reasons until the case is set down. But, apart from the question of a strict compliance with r. 71 (3), there is, in my opinion, a good reason for obtaining at the earliest possible moment from justices, not only the notes of the evidence, but also the reasons for their decision. It is a matter of common knowledge that some legal aid certifying committees, when asked to give a certificate to an appellant from a decision under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, prefer, in the first instance, to give a limited certificate to enable the appellant to take up the notes of evidence and the statement of reasons, so that the committee can then consider for themselves whether there is any likelihood of the appeal being successful. I am not laying down any rule that that ought to be done. Suffice it to say that many people take the view that it would be desirable if that practice were more frequently followed, and, of course, it could not be followed if justices were to refuse to give their reasons until the appeal had become effective. There is no provision in the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, whereby any costs can be recovered which have been incurred before the period covered by the certificate,* and, therefore, if parties have to take up the notes and the statement of the justices' reasons at their own expense, it might conceivably result in a denial of justice.

B

C

D

PEARCE, J.: I agree. Quite apart from the requirement of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 71 (3), it is not satisfactory to compel a would-be appellant to incur the expense of starting an appeal before he can obtain the notes and reasons, which alone will show him whether there is the faintest prospect of success. To do so would merely multiply the number of hopeless appeals, as one knows from experience that, once an appeal is launched, even if it later appears to have little hope of success, it tends to go forward of its own momentum. As so many appellants in this court have legal aid, that is a matter of which one must take particular note.

E

F

[The court then dealt with the appeal on its merits.]

Solicitors: Gibson & Weldon, agents for Crockford & Anderson, Nottingham (for the husband); S. C. Elphick, agent for Clayton, Ellis & Massey, Nottingham (for the wife).

A.T.H.

* See Hatch v. Hatch, [1951] W.N. 235; 27 Digest, Replacement, 729, 6955.

BAKER v. BAKER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), October 13, 14, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Summons for maintenance on ground of desertion—Expulsion from matrimonial home—Reasonable belief in husband's adultery induced by his conduct.

A Divorce—Desertion—Constructive desertion—Expulsion of wife from matrimonial home—Reasonable belief in husband's adultery induced by his conduct.

B A wife's belief, induced by her husband's conduct, that he has committed adultery justifies her, until that belief is proved to be without foundation, in leaving the matrimonial home and living apart from him, and entitles her to succeed in a claim against the husband for maintenance on the ground of his desertion.

Glenister v. Glenister ([1945] 1 All E.R. 513) and observations of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Everitt v. Everitt ([1949] 1 All E.R. 913), applied.

C AS TO CONSTRUCTIVE DESERTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 655, para. 964; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 350-352, Nos. 2897-2913.

Cases referred to:

- D (1) Glenister v. Glenister, [1945] 1 All E.R. 513; [1945] P. 30; 114 L.J.P. 69; 172 L.T. 250; 109 J.P. 194; 27 Digest, Replacement, 367, 3040.
 (2) Russell v. Russell, [1924] A.C. 687; 93 L.J.P. 97; 131 L.T. 482; Digest Supp.
 (3) Wood v. Wood, [1947] 2 All E.R. 95; [1947] P. 103; [1948] L.J.R. 784; 111 J.P. 428; 27 Digest, Replacement, 320, 2667.
 (4) Everitt v. Everitt, [1949] 1 All E.R. 908; [1949] P. 374; 113 J.P. 279; 27 Digest, Replacement, 348, 2881.
 (5) Allen v. Allen, [1951] 1 All E.R. 724; 115 J.P. 229; 27 Digest, Replacement, 84, 633.

E APPEAL by the husband against a decision of a metropolitan magistrate sitting at the South Western Magistrate's Court on Feb. 20, 1953, whereby he found that the husband had deserted the wife.

F The parties were married on Feb. 15, 1947. On Apr. 29, 1952, the wife left the husband, and on Jan. 29, 1953, she issued a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, alleging that the husband had deserted her on Apr. 29, 1952, and that he had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her. On Feb. 18, 1953, the wife caused a notice to be served by her solicitors on the husband as follows:

G "Take notice that in compliance with the recent ruling of the High Court, we are now intimating to you that it may be necessary to produce evidence of adultery between yourself and a Mrs. [S.] . . . between January, 1951, and Apr. 29, 1952, in the forthcoming proceedings for desertion between your wife and yourself in the South Western Magistrate's Court."

H At the hearing of the summons the wife stated in evidence that the marriage had been happy until about February, 1951; that in April, 1951, she suspected that the husband was associating with another woman; that they had had no sexual relations for a long while and he smelt of scent when he came home at night; that she questioned him about it and he said she was imagining things; that in August, 1951, she again noticed the same perfume and that the husband had again said she was imagining things and that he would have her in a mental home; that on Aug. 25, 1951, she arranged to meet the husband at a club after he had made a journey and that the speedometer of his car showed ten miles more than the journey he had described and she again noticed the same perfume; that in October, 1951, she asked the husband about a Mrs. S. and he said he knew no one of that name; that between October, 1951, and April, 1952, they had had no sexual relations and that when she had asked him he said he was not feeling well; that in April, 1952, he had said he would soon have her in a mental home, and that she should "take the lot" of a bottle of sleeping tablets; that on Apr. 29, 1952, she, accompanied by a friend, found the husband and Mrs. S. sitting together in the front of the car; and that she believed the husband had committed adultery. The husband denied that he had been intimate with Mrs. S., and said that he destroyed the sleeping tablets because he thought his wife "might overdo it"; that once he told her she was going mad; that he believed her aunt committed suicide; and that he did not think it would not distress her, the wife, to tell her that she was "going the same way as her mother and aunt." The magistrate found:

"Adultery not proved, but satisfied wife had reasonable grounds for suspecting he had committed adultery. Glenister v. Glenister (1)."

He, accordingly, found the husband guilty of desertion, and the husband now appealed against that finding.

Miss M. Morgan Gibbon for the husband.

K. B. Campbell for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the facts and continued: The legal question is: Who broke up the matrimonial home? The magistrate has found that the husband did, and the reasons he gives for his decision are:

"Adultery not proved, but satisfied wife had reasonable grounds for suspecting [husband] had committed adultery. Glenister v. Glenister (1)."

In order to make that statement of the reasons intelligible, it is necessary to point out that the wife, although charging her husband with, in effect, constructive desertion, on the ground that she had been driven from the matrimonial home had, a few days before the hearing, given notice to the husband by her solicitors

"that in compliance with the recent ruling of the High Court, we are now intimating to you that it may be necessary to produce evidence of adultery between yourself and a [Mrs. S.] . . . between January, 1951, and Apr. 29, 1952, in the forthcoming proceedings for desertion between your wife and yourself in the South Western Magistrate's Court."

There was evidence that the wife had objected to what she believed was an improper association between her husband and this woman, and when it had been persisted in and lied about, as she asserted, she had withdrawn from cohabitation, as being, it was suggested, the only thing a decent woman could do. In my opinion, the magistrate was justified in saying, hypothetically and as a matter of law, that, if a man deliberately induces the belief that he is carrying on an adulterous association, and, in consequence, his wife leaves the matrimonial home, he can be held to have expelled her, and, therefore, to have deserted her, even though she fails to bring a charge, or to prove the fact, of adultery.

I myself should have thought that the simplest method of approaching this case was to find that the wife's story was true and the husband's story untrue, not only in relation to the association with this woman, but generally, and that the facts as a whole amply warranted holding that the wife had been expelled from the home. [His LORDSHIP considered the evidence and continued:] I should be prepared, on the evidence as a whole, to draw the inference which the learned magistrate has not directly expressed, that the husband had been guilty of conduct which could fairly be held to have expelled his wife from the home. But I must also deal with the specific point on which he decided this case, namely, that, although he was not satisfied that adultery had been proved, the wife had reasonable ground for suspecting that her husband had committed adultery. He founded his decision on Glenister v. Glenister (1). In that case a wife had charged her husband with desertion in a court of summary jurisdiction, and the husband's answer was: "She convinced me by her conduct that she was committing adultery, and in those circumstances I could not be expected to stay. Therefore, I am not a deserter". That view was supported by this court, in spite of the fact that the husband was not able to give in evidence one of the essential ingredients in his belief that she had committed adultery because the rule in Russell v. Russell (2) was still in force. Without going into unnecessary detail, he tried to get round that difficulty by a circumstantial inference from an alleged communication of a venereal disease. But the point is that this court decided, as a matter of principle that, although a husband may not be able to prove by admissible evidence that his wife has committed adultery, yet, if the conduct of the wife has been such as to create in the mind of the husband a reasonable belief that she has been guilty of a matrimonial offence, he has a sufficient defence to proceedings based on desertion.

In Wood v. Wood (3) I gave as an illustration of such conduct on the part of the wife the hypothetical case of a circumstantial confession by her of adultery which afterwards might be proved to be a lie, but which, so long as it held the field, justified the husband in withdrawing from cohabitation. That view of the matter was upheld in Everitt v. Everitt (4) by a Division of the Court of Appeal in which I was presiding, and it was approved by another Division of the Court of Appeal in Allen v. Allen (5). The point of the last case was that there was, at one time, reasonable belief, induced by the wife's conduct, that she had committed adultery, but that the issue had subsequently been tried and it was then held that she had not committed adultery. HODSON, L.J., who was sitting with SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., and JENKINS, L.J., and gave the leading judgment, adopted ([1951] 1 All E.R. 728) the following passage from my judgment in Everitt v. Everitt (4) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 913):

"On this hypothesis the facts, at the earliest, were ascertained at the moment when the learned judge gave judgment. In Wood v. Wood (3) I called attention ([1947] 2 All E.R. 97) to this sort of position—a confession by the wife of adultery with every circumstantial detail fully justifying the husband's belief in the fact that she had committed adultery and, so long as that belief subsisted, entitling him to withdraw from, or to refuse to resume, cohabitation, but there might come a moment when, in spite of her confession, or, indeed, because of her oath that her confession had been false, and supported with equally circumstantial detail, a judge might hold that, not only was the charge of adultery not proved, but the wife had not, in fact, committed adultery. From that moment the fact has been ascertained and there is no longer any room for the belief, but that does not act retrospectively or retroactively. So long as the belief is reasonably and properly held, the husband's conduct and their respective rights in relation to cross-charges of desertion are regulated by the existence of the belief, though there may come a moment beyond which that is no longer possible."

In another passage in his judgment ([1951] 1 All E.R. 728) HODSON, L.J., emphasised what he described as the temporary nature of this defence. It subsists only until it is displaced by the facts being found in the sense opposite to the belief.

The learned magistrate has used the decision that in such circumstances a husband cannot be held guilty of desertion so long as the belief holds the field, so to speak, in reverse, to justify the proposition that the wife's charge against her husband of desertion cannot be displaced so long as a belief, induced by her husband's conduct, that he was committing adultery, held the field. In other words, he was saying that their respective rights in relation to cross-charges of desertion are regulated by the existence of the belief, a proposition which has twice been held by the Court of Appeal to be right.

In those circumstances, in my opinion, this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

PEARCE, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Lees, Smith & Matthew, Croydon (for the husband); S. C. Elphick (for the wife).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. POWELL.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Havers and Glyn-Jones, J.J.), October 28, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Preventive detention—When an appropriate sentence.

Criminal Law—Committal for trial—Chairman of examining magistrates also deputy chairman of quarter sessions—Validity of committal—Course desirable to be followed at quarter sessions.

The chairman of the examining magistrates who committed the applicant for trial was also deputy-chairman of quarter sessions and there sentenced the applicant.

HELD: where a case was committed by a court of summary jurisdiction of which either the chairman or the deputy chairman of quarter sessions was the chairman it was desirable that neither of those persons should sit in the court of quarter sessions before whom came the person committed, but there was no reason in law why they should not so sit, and, if they did, it was not a ground on which the Court of Criminal Appeal could interfere with the conviction or sentence at quarter sessions.

Per curiam: the mere fact that a prisoner was over thirty years of age and had three previous convictions should not, ipso facto, render him liable to preventive detention which was intended for prisoners who had shown by their previous history and conduct that they could not be trusted to abstain from crime.

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Askew, [1949] 2 All E.R. 687; 113 J.P. 511; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) R. v. Gardner, (1952), unreported.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against sentence.

The applicant, William Alfred Powell, was convicted at Monmouthshire Quarter Sessions on July 4, 1953, of the larceny of a quantity of copper cable and of carrying an offensive weapon, contrary to the Prevention of Crime Act, 1953, s. 1 (1), and was sentenced to five years' imprisonment for the larceny and two months' imprisonment concurrently for the offence under the Prevention of Crime Act, 1953.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The applicant pleaded Guilty at the Monmouthshire Quarter Sessions to the larceny of a quantity of copper cable, and to carrying an offensive weapon, contrary to s. 1 (1) of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1953. He was sentenced to five years' imprisonment for the larceny and two months' imprisonment concurrently for the offence under the Prevention of Crime Act. He applies for leave to appeal against his sentence on the ground that the deputy chairman who sentenced him was also chairman of the examining magistrates who

A committed him for trial. We cannot say that there is any reason in law why the chairman of committing magistrates, who happens to be a chairman or deputy chairman of quarter sessions, should not sit to deal with the case at quarter sessions, though, no doubt, it is not altogether desirable that that should take place, and, as a general rule, if it happens that a case has been committed to quarter sessions by a bench of which either the chairman or the deputy chairman of quarter sessions was a member, it should be arranged that the prisoner, when tried on indictment at quarter sessions, should be brought before a court in which the chairman or deputy chairman is not sitting. But it is not a ground in law on which we could interfere with the sentence, and there is no question about the conviction because the applicant pleaded Guilty.

B There is one other matter the court thinks it necessary to point out for the guidance of this particular deputy chairman, who, apparently, does not understand, or has not read, what the court has said on previous occasions on appeals from him. This was a case in which quarter sessions appear to have considered that it would have been proper to have passed a sentence of preventive detention. The applicant has a very bad record, and it is just the sort of case for which Parliament has provided preventive detention. The deputy chairman said the bench would have given preventive detention but for the decisions of this court, which he seems to have thought prevented him from doing so. It is perfectly true that, soon after the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, came into force, this court did, in R. v. Askew (1), say that preventive detention should be kept for habitual criminals and that it was not every person who had the statutory number of convictions, which are three, who should be sent to preventive detention. The learned deputy chairman seems to have thought that the court was laying down that, unless the prisoner was one who could have been convicted under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1908, as an habitual criminal, it was not right to give a sentence of preventive detention. That was not what the court meant, and I do not think it was what the court said. What we meant was that a case where a prisoner has shown by his conduct that he is a recidivist in crime is one in which preventive detention should be given, but that it was not necessary to give preventive detention every time it was brought to the notice of the court that the prisoner had three previous convictions. That was pointed out emphatically by this court, consisting of HILBERY, STREATFIELD, and McNAIR, JJ., in R. v. Gardner (2), an appeal from this learned deputy chairman in November, 1952, and I hope the learned deputy chairman will now understand that the court is not attempting to put any limit on the provisions Parliament has made, save that they have indicated that the mere fact that a man has three previous convictions and is over thirty years of age should not, ipso facto, render him liable to preventive detention. Preventive detention ought to be kept for men who have shown by their conduct and previous history that they cannot be trusted to abstain from crime, though they may do spells of honest work between convictions.

Application dismissed.

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

SOUTHPORT CORPORATION v. ESSO PETROLEUM CO., LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), June 23-27, October 21, 1953.]

Nuisance—Ship—Discharge of oil to lighten vessel stranded in river—Damage to adjoining foreshore—Need to prove negligence.

The plaintiffs were owners of a certain area of foreshore; the first defendants were the owners and the second defendant was the master of an oil tanker. At 11.45 on Dec. 3, 1950, the vessel was bound from Liverpool to Preston and on approaching the Ribble estuary in rough weather developed a steering fault. In view of the weather and the danger of turning round the master decided to continue into the channel. At 15.15 the vessel took an uncontrollable sheer to starboard and ran aground on an underwater revetment wall. There the vessel and the lives of the crew were in a position of grave danger, and in order to lighten her the master started to jettison his cargo of fuel oil. After he had jettisoned over four hundred tons the vessel came off the wall and grounded on some sand. A great deal of the oil became deposited on the foreshore of the plaintiffs and they suffered damage. In an action for trespass and/or nuisance and/or negligence,

HELD: as to private nuisance there was no prerequisite that the nuisance should emanate from neighbouring property of the defendant; as to public nuisance the estuary in question was a public navigable river and analogous to a highway; though the plaintiffs' foreshore was not contiguous to the river, it was sufficiently proximate to it to be affected by the misuse of it by the discharge of oil; and, therefore, the plaintiffs had a good cause of action in nuisance, either public or private; the principles relating to nuisance on a highway applied to damage (either direct or indirect) done by a ship in a public navigable river to adjoining property; and, consequently, to succeed the plaintiffs had to prove negligence on the part of the defendants: dicta of LORD BLACKBURN in Fletcher v. Rylands (1866) (L.R. 1 Exch. 286) and River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (1877) (2 App. Cas. 767), applied; on the facts the defendants had not been negligent, and, therefore, the action failed.

Per curiam: the burden of proving negligence was on the plaintiffs, and the defendants merely had to satisfy the court that they had not been negligent and had not to prove inevitable accident: The Merchant Prince ([1892] P. 179), discussed.

AS TO DISCHARGE OF OIL IN NAVIGABLE WATERS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 33, pp. 603-605, paras. 1060-1065.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Waddle v. Wallsend Shipping Co., [1952] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 105.
- (2) Cunard v. Antifyre, Ltd., [1933] 1 K.B. 551; 103 L.J.K.B. 321; 148 G
L.T. 287; Digest Supp.
- (3) Smith v. Great Western Ry. Co., (1926), 135 L.T. 112; 36 Digest 198, 384.
- (4) Benjamin v. Storr, (1874), L.R. 9 C.P. 400; 43 L.J.C.P. 162; 30 L.T.
362; 36 Digest 212, 550.
- (5) Jones v. Llanrwst Urban Council, [1911] 1 Ch. 393; 80 L.J.Ch. 145; 103 H
L.T. 751; 75 J.P. 68; 36 Digest 190, 320.
- (6) Nicholls v. Ely Beet Sugar Factory, [1931] 2 Ch. 84; 100 L.J.Ch. 259; 145
L.T. 113; Digest Supp.
- (7) Goodwyn (Goodwin) v. Cheveley, (1859), 4 H. & N. 631; 28 L.J.Ex. 298; 33 L.T.O.S. 284; 23 J.P. 487; 157 E.R. 989; 2 Digest 226, 182.
- (8) Tillett v. Ward, (1882), 10 Q.B.D. 17; 52 L.J.Q.B. 61; 47 L.T. 546; 47 J.P. 438; 2 Digest 224, 167.

- (9) Gayler & Pope, Ltd. v. Davies (B.) & Son, Ltd., [1924] 2 K.B. 75; 93 L.J.K.B. 702; 131 L.T. 507; 36 Digest 64, 414.
- (10) Holmes v. Mather, (1875), L.R. 10 Exch. 261; 44 L.J.Ex. 176; 33 L.T. 361; 39 J.P. 567; 2 Digest 232, 216.
- (11) The Swift, [1901] P. 168; 70 L.J.P. 47; 85 L.T. 346; 41 Digest 260, 1028a.
- A (12) Fletcher v. Rylands, (1866), L.R. 1 Exch. 265; 35 L.J.Ex. 154; 14 L.T. 523; 30 J.P. 436; affd. H.L., sub nom. Rylands v. Fletcher, (1868), L.R. 3 H.L. 330; 37 L.J.Ex. 161; 19 L.T. 220; 33 J.P. 70; 2 Digest 228, 195.
- (13) River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson, (1877), 2 App. Cas. 743; 47 L.J.Q.B. 193; 37 L.T. 543; 42 J.P. 244; 36 Digest 105, 705.
- B (14) Mouse's Case, (1608), 12 Co. Rep. 63; 77 E.R. 1341; sub nom. Gravesend Barge Case, 1 Roll. Rep. 79; 81 E.R. 341; 24 Digest 976, 97.
- (15) The Merchant Prince, [1892] P. 179; 67 L.T. 251; 36 Digest 102, 681.
- (16) Scott v. London Dock Co., (1865), 3 H. & C. 596; 34 L.J.Ex. 220; 13 L.T. 148; 159 E.R. 665; 36 Digest 91, 601.
- (17) Hall v. Fearnley, (1842), 3 Q.B. 919; 12 L.J.Q.B. 22; 114 E.R. 761; 36 Digest 106, 707.
- C (18) Rumbold v. London County Council, (1909), 25 T.L.R. 541; 36 Digest 106, 709.
- (19) The Kite, [1933] P. 154; 102 L.J.P. 101; 149 L.T. 498; Digest Supp.
- (20) Imperial Smelting Corpn., Ltd. v. Joseph Constantine S.S. Line, Ltd., [1940] 2 All E.R. 46; [1940] 1 K.B. 812; 162 L.T. 267; revsd. C.A., [1940] 3 All E.R. 211; [1940] 2 K.B. 430; 109 L.J.K.B. 968; 163 L.T. 168; revsd. H.L., sub nom. Joseph Constantine S.S. Line, Ltd. v. Imperial Smelting Corpn., Ltd., [1941] 2 All E.R. 165; [1942] A.C. 154; 110 L.J.K.B. 433; 165 L.T. 27; 12 Digest, Replacement, 436, 3333.
- D (21) The Dageid, (1947), 80 Lloyd's Rep. 517.
- E (22) Woods v. Duncan, Duncan v. Hambrook, Duncan v. Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd., [1946] 1 All E.R. 420, n.; [1946] A.C. 401; [1947] L.J.R. 120; 174 L.T. 286; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for trespass and/or nuisance and/or negligence.

F The first defendants were the owners of a tanker of 680 tons called the Inverpool and the second defendant was the master of the vessel. On Dec. 3, 1950, the Inverpool was proceeding from Liverpool to Preston with a cargo of 736 tons of heavy fuel oil. At 14.45 when she was between the Gut Buoy and Wall End Buoy in the approaches to the Ribble estuary with the weather clear and the wind force 7/8 she shipped two or three heavy seas over the port quarter, immediately afterwards the steering of the ship became erratic without any apparent cause, and she started sheering four or five points to port and starboard.

G The master ordered the engineer to increase the pressure to the steering. At 15.05 the engineer felt two violent blows on the propeller (sounding like metal hitting metal) which he reported to the master. The ship had then entered the channel and was in mid-channel. On the south side of the channel there was a revetment wall about seven to eight feet in width, and over it, at the state of the tide at the material time, there was eight to twelve feet of water. At 15.15 the

H Inverpool took a heavy sheer to starboard which could not be corrected and ran aground on the revetment wall, thirty feet of her bows passing over the wall while the remainder of the hull was afloat in the channel. The master immediately ordered the engines full astern, but it was found that the propeller was fouling some object and the vibration was so great that the engineer feared that the main steam pipe would fracture. The vessel remained aground on the wall and her position became precarious as the hull was pounding on the wall under the pressure of wind and tide and there was serious danger of the vessel breaking her back with probable loss of life and of the ship as well. At 15.25 the master began to discharge the oil tanks in order to lighten the ship, and at 17.30, when he had discharged over four hundred tons of oil and raised the ship three and a half feet, she bounced along the wall and off it, coming to rest on a bank of sand. The oil discharged by the Inverpool became deposited on the foreshore which belonged to the plaintiffs, the deposit extending for about $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles and varying in thickness from one to three inches and in width from three to twenty feet. It became necessary for the plaintiffs to close the Marine Lake at Southport and also parts of the foreshore and they suffered considerable damage. A survey report of the Inverpool showed that there was considerable damage to the hull, that the stern frame was badly bent and fractured in two places, and that one blade of the propeller was completely broken off and the other three were broken at the tips. A

HIS LORDSHIP found on the facts (i) that the decision of the master to enter the channel in spite of the defect of steering was right in view of the impossibility of anchoring in the weather prevailing at the time and of the danger of turning round; (ii) that in the situation of grave peril in which the master found himself and of the danger of loss of life his decision to jettison some of his cargo of fuel oil could not be criticised; (iii) that the stern frame was fractured before the vessel stranded (though there was no proof of the cause of fracture); and (iv) that the fractured stern frame was the cause of the vessel getting out of control. B C

Carpmael, Q.C., and Baucher for the plaintiffs.

Nelson, Q.C., and G. B. H. Currie for both defendants.

Cur. adv. vult. D

Oct. 21. DEVLIN, J., delivered the following judgment. In this case questions of seamanship and navigation arise and acting under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 98, and R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 43, I have appointed one of the Elder Brethren of Trinity House to act as an assessor and advise me on them. In Waddle v. Wallsend Shipping Co. (1) ([1952] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 131) I called attention to what seemed to me to be the undesirability of having questions of this sort tried by a judge of the Queen's Bench Division sitting without assistance. The practice of sitting with the Elder Brethren is always followed in the Admiralty Division, and, if it is not followed in this Division as well, it is bound to lead to the belief that the result will not be as satisfactory as it should be. I have, therefore, been advised by an Elder Brother, Commodore Hubbard, R.D., R.N.R., before arriving at my conclusions in this case, but I have not had his assistance during the hearing. I hesitated in this case, as I did in Waddle v. Wallsend Shipping Co. (1), to adjourn the trial so that an assessor might be present because of the inconvenience to the parties and their solicitors and counsel. But I doubt whether I shall in any similar case in the future allow these considerations to deter me again. E F

The case concerns a small tanker called the Inverpool belonging to the defendant company which stranded in the Ribble estuary on Dec. 3, 1950, and the master, in order to float her, discharged about four hundred tons of fuel oil. The oil became deposited on the foreshore which belongs to the plaintiffs, the Southport Corporation, and entered the Marine Lake, a feature of the foreshore. The deposit extended for a distance of about $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles and varied in thickness from one inch to three inches and in width from three feet to twenty feet, at one point amounting to one hundred feet. It became necessary to close the Marine Lake for a time and also parts of the foreshore, and it has cost, or will cost, the corporation a substantial sum to make good the damage. G H

The deposit of oil around the coast is, it is admitted, causing considerable anxiety, and it is satisfactory to know that the authorities are not being inactive. At first sight it may appear to be unreasonable that shipowners whose servants cause such damage in order to save their own property should not automatically have to pay for it, but counsel for the defendants submits that at common law there is no duty at all on ships to avoid this type of damage. If Parliament considers that further legislation is necessary for the protection of the public, no doubt such legislation will be enacted. My duty is to apply the common law, and to examine, therefore, the causes of action on which the plaintiffs rely. These are trespass, nuisance and negligence. The trespass, alternatively the nuisance, is said to arise from the bare fact that oil was discharged on to the plaintiffs' property. The negligence is put under two heads: (i) that there was negligent navigation resulting in the stranding, and (ii) that it was unreasonable and unnecessary after the stranding to jettison cargo. The charge of negligent navigation rests in the first instance on the fact of stranding, which obviously calls for an explanation. The master's explanation is that it was due to a defect in the steering. The plaintiffs contend that if this is true the defendants must show that the defect in steering was not their fault, and, further, they say that with defective steering the vessel ought not to have entered the estuary. Counsel for the defendants, as I have said, disputes that there is any cause of action at all. It is not trespass, he says, because there is no direct physical interference with the property of the plaintiffs. It is not a public nuisance because the plaintiffs have suffered, not as members of the public, but as owners of property. It is not a private nuisance because the oil did not emanate from an adjoining property. It is not negligence because no duty was owed to the plaintiffs. If it was careless on the part of the Inverpool to enter the estuary of the Ribble, it was not a foreseeable consequence of that carelessness that she might strand and have to discharge oil which would be carried by the wind and tide to the Southport foreshore. Thus, counsel for the defendants argues that the plaintiffs have not on any possible view of the facts any case at all. If they have a case in trespass or nuisance, he submits a twofold defence. The first is that the plaintiffs enjoy their property subject to the right of members of the public to navigate on the seas, and they cannot, therefore, complain of damage which is done to their property in the exercise without carelessness of that right. Secondly, he relies on the defence of necessity—in discharging the cargo the ship, he contends, was doing no more than was reasonably necessary for the safety of the crew and of the ship and cargo.

I think it is convenient to begin by considering whether there is a cause of action in nuisance. It is clear that to give a cause of action for private nuisance the matter complained of must affect the property of the plaintiffs. But I know of no principle that it must emanate from land belonging to the defendant. Counsel for the defendants cited Cunard v. Antifyre, Ltd. (2), and I think that the statement of the principle is put there as clearly and concisely as can be. TALBOT, J., said ([1933] 1 K.B. 557):

"Private nuisances, at least in the vast majority of cases, are interferences for a substantial length of time by owners or occupiers of property with the use or enjoyment of neighbouring property; and it would manifestly be inconvenient and unreasonable if the right to complain of such interference extended beyond the occupier, or (in case of injury to the reversion) the owner, of such neighbouring property."

It is clear from this statement of principle that the nuisance must affect the property of the plaintiff, and it is true that in the vast majority of cases it is likely to emanate from the neighbouring property of the defendant. But no statement of principle has been cited to me to show that the latter is a prerequisite to a cause of action, and I can see no reason why, if land or water belonging to the public or waste land is misused by the defendant, or if the defendant as a licensee or trespasser misuses someone else's land, he should not be liable for a nuisance in the same way as an adjoining occupier would be. Smith v. Great Western Ry. Co. (3) is a case on which the plaintiffs rely as showing that oil emanating from a chattel is sufficient to establish a cause of action in nuisance. It may well be that, if the nuisance emanates from the highway, whether it be a road or a waterway, the action is properly laid for a public nuisance. In Benjamin v. Storr (4) the plaintiff was given relief because his light was blocked by vans standing in the highway outside his property and his property affected by offensive smells from their dung. The channel which leads through the Ribble estuary to the port of Preston is, admittedly, a public navigable river and the nuisance in this case emanated from there. I do not think it matters that the navigable river does not adjoin the property of the plaintiffs. An action for a public nuisance of this type cannot in principle depend on contiguity to the highway; it must depend on whether the plaintiffs' property is sufficiently proximate to the highway to be affected by the misuse of it.

I have dealt with nuisance first because it is a wider class than trespass. If there is an unlawful interference with the plaintiffs' property, the question whether it is a trespass or a nuisance depends on whether or not it is a direct physical interference. I incline to the view that in this case it is, but, having regard to the views I have expressed about nuisance, I think it is unnecessary to enter into this matter which is not covered exactly by precedent. It may well be that it is one of those cases which are described in the books as a nuisance of a particular kind analogous to trespass: see Jones v. Llanrwst Urban Council (5) ([1911] 1 Ch. 402, per PARKER, J.) and Nicholls v. Ely Beet Sugar Factory (6) ([1931] 2 Ch. 87, per FARWELL, J.).

In my judgment, the plaintiffs have a good cause of action in trespass or nuisance subject to the special defences raised by the defendants which I shall next consider.

On the first of these, if one seeks an analogy from traffic on land, it is well established that persons whose property adjoins the highway cannot complain of damage done by persons using the highway unless it is done negligently: Goodwyn (Goodwin) v. Cheveley (7), Tillett v. Ward (8), and Gayler & Pope, Ltd. v. B. Davies & Son, Ltd. (9). These cases amplify the principle in Holmes v. Mather (10) which dealt with collisions on the highway itself and which is the foundation of the modern practice whereby a plaintiff in a running-down action sues for negligence and not for trespass to the person. I know of no case in which the same principle has in terms been applied to collisions in public navigable waters, but clearly it is so applied, for a plaintiff would not get very far in an Admiralty action if he sued for trespass to a chattel. This suggests that the amplification of the principle ought likewise to be applied in the case of property adjacent to public navigable waters. Again, I know of no case which on its facts decides that in terms, though there are dicta in The Swift (11) ([1901] P. 173)—a rather different type of case—on which counsel for the defendants properly relied.

But there is hardly need to search for exact authority, for the point is covered by two dicta, which may be obiter, but which bear the great authority of LORD BLACKBURN and lay down the same rule on land and water. In Fletcher v. Rylands (12) BLACKBURN, J., said (L.R. 1 Exch. 286):

"Traffic on the highways, whether by land or sea, cannot be conducted without exposing those whose persons or property are near it to some inevitable risk; and that being so, those who go on the highway, or have their property adjacent to it, may well be held to do so subject to their taking upon themselves the risk of injury from that inevitable danger . . ."

The learned judge then goes on to say (ibid.) that such persons cannot recover

"without proof of want of care or skill occasioning the accident . . ."

In River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (13) LORD BLACKBURN said (2 App. Cas. 767):

"My Lords, the common law is, I think, as follows:—Property adjoining to a spot on which the public have a right to carry on traffic is liable to be injured by that traffic. In this respect there is no difference between a shop, the railings or windows of which may be broken by a carriage on the road, and a pier adjoining to a harbour or a navigable river or the sea, which is liable to be injured by a ship. In either case the owner of the injured property must bear his own loss, unless he can establish that some other person is in fault, and liable to make it good."

LORD BLACKBURN refers to injury by a ship. The principle is not, in my judgment, restricted to direct injury, as when a ship strikes a pier, but is equally applicable to injury which is done indirectly by a ship in the ordinary course of navigation. It covers injury done as the result of the discharge of oil, if the discharge is a prudent measure of safety taken by the master of the ship because of the vessel finding herself in distress without her fault. The Oil in Navigable Waters Act, 1922, is not directly in point because it applies only to criminal offences, but it is interesting to observe the test there laid down.

Prima facie it is an offence under the Act to discharge oil in territorial waters, but it is a good defence if it was necessary to discharge the oil by reason of the happening to the vessel of some accident. I think that the same test is under the common law applicable in the case of civil proceedings; and that owners whose property adjoins the sea, equally with owners whose property adjoins the highway, take the risk of damage being done by users of the sea or of the highway who are exercising with due care their rights of navigation or of passage. To the word "adjoin" I give the interpretation I have already considered, i.e., the test is proximity and not contiguity.

On this view of the law it is unnecessary for me to consider in detail the alternative defence of necessity, which is in some respects only a variant of the defence which I have already considered. One of the earliest cases of necessity, Mouse's Case (14), was a case of jettison. But the defence of necessity applies irrespective of the situation of the property damaged and so of the principle I have just considered; on the other hand, I am not satisfied that it applies (as it does under the principle I have just considered) if the only object the salvation of which is at stake is a ship. I am not prepared to hold without further consideration that a man is entitled to damage the property of another without compensating him merely because the infliction of such damage is necessary in order to save his own property. I doubt whether the court in such circumstances can be asked to evaluate the relation of the damage done to the property saved, by inquiring, for example, whether it is permissible to do £5,000 worth of damage to a third party in order to save property worth £10,000.

In the ordinary case of jettison the property which is sacrificed is the property of a person who is interested in the venture, and an equitable adjustment is made by the application of general average. The same considerations may not apply to the property of a third party who has no stake in the venture which is being saved. The defence of necessity would, therefore, have called for close examination if in fact it had been based solely on the saving of property and if in law I had thought that the plaintiffs' rights of ownership in the foreshore were unqualified by their proximity to the sea. But, apart from the law, on which I have already expressed my view, the facts of this case, when examined, show that the peril said to justify the discharge of the cargo is that the ship was in imminent danger of breaking her back. The consequence of that would be not merely that the ship herself would become a total loss but that in the circumstances of this case the lives of the crew would have been endangered. The safety of human lives belongs to a different scale of values from the safety of property. The two are beyond comparison and the necessity for saving life has at all times been considered a proper ground for inflicting such damage as may be necessary on another's property. I think, therefore, that, if I am wrong in the application of the principle which I have taken from LORD BLACKBURN, the defence in this case can equally well be put on the ground of necessity.

It is, of course, an answer to either of these defences if the predicament in which the ship found herself was due to her own negligence. Indeed, in the principle I am applying it is necessary, as LORD BLACKBURN says, for the plaintiffs to prove negligence, and so my examination of the law results in the conclusion that this action is to be treated in the same way as any running-down or collision case in which the plaintiff alleges negligence. I do not accept counsel for the defendants' submission that if the master was careless, nevertheless he could not have anticipated this form of injury to the plaintiffs' property. The damage and nuisance that is caused to the coast by oil on the water is well known. If done deliberately it is punishable by statute, and I think that it is a matter which should be well in the mind of the master of every coastal tanker. He must be aware that if in an estuary he gets himself into a position where he has to jettison oil, it is very likely to reach some part of the coast. In this case the master accepted the likelihood of the oil reaching the Southport foreshore.

In saying that this is an ordinary case of negligence, I must make one qualification. The plaintiffs allege on the authority of The Merchant Prince (15) that the circumstances in which the stranding occurred shift the burden of proof and require the defendants to prove inevitable accident. It will be more convenient to deal with this after the facts have been ascertained. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] I turn back now to deal with the matters in dispute. The charges that the master ought not to have entered the channel or to have jettisoned after stranding cause me little difficulty, and I can deal with them both broadly by saying that I see no reason to criticise the decisions of the man on the spot and certainly none to condemn them as evidencing his incompetence. The plaintiffs contend that the master, knowing before he entered the channel that there was something wrong with his steering, ought to have anchored or turned about and hove to or put back to sea. The master answered that in the weather at the time, to anchor was impossible and to turn about more dangerous than to proceed. He recognised the danger of proceeding into a narrow channel with defective steering gear; he weighed up the two evils, he said, and considered that the lesser of the two was to attempt to get into sheltered water. I should not without assistance be able to say whether he made the right choice or not, but I should feel able to say that his choice was not a careless or unskilful one, which would be enough to dispose of the charge of negligence. In fact, the Elder Brother advises me that, in his opinion, the master's decision was the right one, and I accept that advice. As to the jettisoning I consider, and the Elder Brother agrees with this, that the master's decision to lighten his vessel cannot fairly be criticised. On the whole, I see no sufficient reason to think that the master did not fix with reasonable accuracy the spot where he went aground. But I do not regard the point as of paramount importance. His course of action was not, in my view, to be determined by an exact calculation of where he was and a close assessment of his chances of safety if he left it to the tide. His ship was, the Elder Brother advises me, in a situation of grave peril with a real and imminent danger that she might break her back with consequent loss of life. In these circumstances, I think the master was right in making sure, even at the risk of making doubly sure, that she got off before the tide turned. I do not say he did make doubly sure. I am impressed with the point that counsel for the defendants made that, since the vessel, even after jettisoning four hundred tons, did not get off the wall until just at or after high water, it is difficult to criticise the master for being over-cautious.

- The remaining point is much more difficult, because it has not proved possible to arrive at any clear conclusion as to what caused the defect in steering. It remains, the master said, a puzzle and a mystery to him. The plaintiffs say, therefore, that the defendants have failed to prove that they were not responsible for the loss. I approach the problem by considering, first, what relevant damage was found on the ship at her survey. The propeller blades were broken and so was the stern frame. If the stern frame was fractured or even cracked, it would be quite enough to account for the ship's behaviour. Is there sufficient evidence to support the inference that the stern frame was fractured before the vessel stranded? I think on the whole that there is. The damage could, of course, have been done as she was crossing the wall or afterwards on the sand.
- But if I accept, as I do, the engineer's evidence of the propeller fouling on two occasions when the stern was still afloat, first, between Wall End Buoy and Salter's Buoy, and, secondly, just after the stranding, it points to the damage being done earlier. On both occasions it sounded as if the propeller was striking metal. That suggests that in two different places in the channel it was the same sort of metal object that was being struck, and, therefore, that it was a metal object that was travelling with the ship. The defendants' theory that the propeller was fouling a part of the stern frame that was loose or out of alignment fits in with this, and the theory is certainly not weakened by the fact that the stern frame was afterwards found to be fractured. I accept this theory and find as a fact that the stern frame was fractured before 15.05 when the propeller first fouled. I find that the fractured stern frame was the cause of the vessel getting out of control.

- Is there evidence to show how the stern frame was fractured? The defendants' theory is that it was done by the two or three very heavy seas that she shipped at about 14.45. Assuming the stern frame to be sound, I cannot see how heavy seas could by themselves fracture it, and I am advised by the Elder Brother that they could not. They could, of course, if they drove the stern frame up against some hard object. The Elder Brother points out that between the Gut Buoy and the Wall End Buoy just about the bar, there are places where the ship would not have much water under her stern, and suggests as a possibility that the stern frame might have been broken against the bed of the channel. This hypothesis was not advanced at the trial and I feel now that it is too speculative for me to adopt in the absence of any supporting evidence from the master or engineer. The plaintiffs' theory is that the fracture was caused by the vessel striking the revetment wall owing to negligent steering at some point before that at which she grounded. I do not accept this. In the first place I am advised that it is unlikely that she could have struck the wall in such a way as to damage her stern; the plaintiffs' theory was put to the defendants' witness, Mr. Evans, and the Elder Brother considers that Mr. Evans's opinion on this point is correct. In the second place, I do not think it could have happened without the knowledge of the engineer, whose evidence I accept. Thirdly, it certainly could not have happened without the master's knowledge; and while I do not want to decide the matter simply by accepting his evidence, the circumstances do not point to his telling a lie and I do not feel that he was. The evidence of the master of the Clyde Brae, a following ship, for what it is worth, bears out his story. On the evidence I am unable to say how the stern frame fractured. I may add that I do not accept the theory that the vessel's loss of control was due to sea damage done to some part of the steering gear such as the rods and chains along the deck. As in the case of the stern frame, I am advised that it is unlikely that the sea alone could do any serious damage. If it had, I should have expected it to be found in the survey; if there were any signs of it there, my attention was not drawn to them.

In this state of the evidence counsel for the plaintiffs submits that the defendants must prove inevitable accident. To do this they must prove the cause or causes of the accident, and, if they cannot do that, they fail. He relies on The Merchant Prince (15). In that case the defendant ship under way ran into the plaintiff ship at anchor. FRY, L.J., said ([1892] P. 189):

"The burden rests on the defendants to show inevitable accident. To sustain that the defendants must do one or other of two things. They must either show what was the cause of the accident, and show that the result of that cause was inevitable; or they must show all the possible causes, one or other of which produced the effect, and must further show with regard to every one of these possible causes that the result could not have been avoided."

If there is a burden on the defendants in the present case to prove inevitable accident they have not, in my opinion, discharged it. They have not shown the ultimate cause or causes: indeed, they have not set about the proof at all. I accept that on the voyage in question the vessel showed no sign of any defect in her steering until 14.45, and I am satisfied that until then the master knew nothing of it. But I cannot exclude the possibility that there was some defect in her stern frame which made it liable to fracture. I think that the proof of inevitable accident in such a case as this requires that the defendants should offer some detailed evidence of the steps they took, by way of surveys and so forth, to make sure that there were no discoverable defects in her structure; in short, they should prove that they had exercised due diligence to make and keep her seaworthy. This they have not done.

I do not find The Merchant Prince (15) an easy case to apply. One must distinguish, I think, between a case where inevitable accident has to be proved as a matter of defence and a case of res ipsa loquitur. Take, for example, trespass to which inevitable accident may be a defence. When the plaintiff proves the trespass (I am dealing now with the ordinary case and not with trespass arising from use of the highway) his cause of action is complete, and the defendant fails unless he proves his defence. But when the cause of action is negligence, the plaintiff must prove negligence; res ipsa loquitur is a principle which helps him to do so. If one looks at the classic statement of the rule by ERLE, C.J., in Scott v. London Dock Co. (16) (3 H. & C. 601), one finds that it says no more than that the happening of an accident may in certain circumstances itself be reasonable evidence of negligence; and when there is reasonable evidence of negligence put forward by the plaintiff and no explanation put forward by the defendant, the plaintiff is, of course, entitled to succeed. If the defendant offers a plausible explanation consistent with his diligence, the plaintiff is back where he was before and must show the greater probability of negligence. The distinction is seen at once in pleading. In trespass the defendant must plead inevitable accident: Hall v. Fearnley (17). In negligence he need only plead a denial: Rumbold v. London County Council (18). The cases in which the res ipsa loquitur rule is elaborated were cited and applied by LANGTON, J., in The Kite (19), and more of them will be found in the judgment of ATKINSON, J., in Imperial Smelting Corpn., Ltd. v. Joseph Constantine S.S. Line, Ltd. (20). The rule as there stated does not require from the defendant the sort of proof demanded by FRY, L.J. The Merchant Prince (15) was not a case of trespass or anything of that sort, but one in which the plaintiff alleged negligence and sought to prove it by offering the circumstances of the collision as prima facie evidence. The case embodies a rule of long standing in Admiralty matters involving a collision with a ship at anchor. It may be that it is properly to be regarded as a rule of limited application. If I had to rely on my own judgment, I should not be able to appreciate the distinction that has been drawn between The Merchant Prince (15) and The Kite (19) in later cases such as The Dageid (21) (80 Lloyd's Rep., 522). But I need not pursue these difficulties, because in relation to a decision of the Court of Appeal they are impertinent and because I think that I can without directly meeting them give to the decision in The Merchant Prince (15) all the effect that I am bound to give to it. That decision does not enable the plaintiffs to succeed otherwise than on a charge of negligence which they have pleaded. The only negligence alleged in this case is against the master, who is the second defendant, in respect of his navigation and management of the Inverpool in relation to this voyage; the owners of the ship, the first defendants, are sued only as answerable for the master's wrongdoing. I am satisfied that the master was not personally negligent and that he had not before 14.45 any reason to apprehend that there was any defect in his ship. If the rule in The Merchant Prince (15) requires him personally to prove what the cause of the defect in the steering was, and I doubt that it does, then it cannot stand against the decision of the House of Lords in Woods v. Duncan (22), which lays it down that, if a defendant can satisfy the court that he personally was not negligent, he does not have to explain how the accident occurred.

There can be no doubt that, apart from any principle that may be derived from The Merchant Prince (15), the rule laid down by LORD BLACKBURN which I am applying, requires the plaintiff to prove negligence and not the defendants to prove inevitable accident. For the reasons which I have given the plaintiffs have failed to prove negligence and, accordingly, there must be judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for defendants.

Solicitors: Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for R. E. Perrins, town clerk, Southport (for the plaintiffs); Thomas Cooper & Co. (for the defendants).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

THE WAZIRISTAN. THE SEIRSTAD (OWNERS) v. HINDUSTAN SHIPPING CO., LTD.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), June 18, October 14, 15, 16, 19, 1953.]

Harbour—Pilot—Compulsory pilot—Collision in foreign territorial waters—Iraq—Ship under jurisdiction of local port authority—Defence of “compulsory pilotage” under Iraq law—Effect of incorporation in port bye-laws of note similar, in substance, to Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea (Sea Regulations, 1910 (S.R. & O., 1910, No. 1113)), art. 29.

The Waziristan, a motor vessel owned by the defendants, was proceeding down the Shatt-al-Arab river, within the territorial jurisdiction of Iraq, when she grounded, thereby blocking the navigable channel. The plaintiffs' motor vessel, the Seirstad, which had been following astern of the Waziristan, was forced by the effect of wind and tide to ground herself and salvage services were required to re-float her. The Shatt-al-Arab river was under the Basrah port authority, by whose bye-laws pilotage for the two vessels was compulsory. Incorporated in the bye-laws was a note which was, in substance, in the same terms as art. 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

In an action for damages against the defendants, the plaintiffs claimed that the damage suffered by the Seirstad was due to the negligent navigation of the Waziristan. The defendants raised the defence, inter alia, of “compulsory pilotage”. A former judge in Iraq gave evidence that by the law of Iraq a shipowner was not civilly liable for the negligence of a compulsory pilot. The plaintiffs contended, inter alia, that the effect of the incorporation of the note in the bye-laws was to reserve the ultimate control to the master of a ship so as to leave the pilot only as an adviser.

The court found that there was no negligence on the part of the master of the Waziristan or of any other servant of the defendants. On the question of the defendants' liability for negligence on the part of the pilot, HELD: pilotage being compulsory, the pilot was entitled, and the master was bound to permit him, to conduct the ship, i.e., to take charge of the navigation of the ship: observations of HILL, J., in The Andoni ([1918] P. 18), applied; and the incorporation in the bye-laws of the note similar to art. 29 of the collision regulations did not have the effect of leaving the control of the ship with the master; if the owners of the Waziristan had been sued in respect of the collision in the courts of Iraq, there would have been no answer to the defence that the collision was caused by the negligence of a person who was not their servant, and such a defence, if made good, would be an answer to an action in an English court for negligence committed in Iraq waters: observations of HILL, J., in The Arum ([1921] P. 20), applied; and, therefore, assuming that there was negligence on the part of the pilot, the defendants were not liable, but, on the facts, there was no negligence on the part of the pilot.

AS TO LIABILITY FOR COLLISIONS IN CASE OF COMPULSORY PILOTAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 30, p. 849, para. 1117; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 41, p. 795, Nos. 6548, 6549.

FOR THE REGULATIONS FOR PREVENTING COLLISIONS AT SEA, art. 29, see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 20, p. 96.

Cases referred to:

- (1) The Augusta, (1887), 57 L.T. 326; 41 Digest 909, 8020.
- (2) The Guy Mannering, (1882), 7 P.D. 132; 51 L.J.P. 57; 46 L.T. 905; 41 Digest 763, 6165.
- (3) The Andoni, [1918] P. 14; 87 L.J.P. 28; 119 L.T. 154; 41 Digest 906, 7996.
- (4) The Benue, [1916] P. 88; 85 L.J.P. 161; 116 L.T. 220.
- (5) The Arum, [1921] P. 12; 90 L.J.P. 166; 41 Digest 795, 6549.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

On June 10, 1950, m.v. Seirstad, owned by the plaintiffs, and m.v. Waziristan, owned by the defendants, were among a number of vessels proceeding down the Shatt-al-Arab river from Abadan within the territorial waters of Iraq, the Seirstad lying astern of the Waziristan. Both ships were carrying pilots. At about 8.22 a.m. the Waziristan grounded, thereby blocking the navigable channel. Owing to the effect of wind and tide the Seirstad was also forced to take the ground and had to engage salvage services to re-float her. The plaintiffs claimed damages from the defendants for the damage sustained and expense incurred on the ground of the defendants' negligence in that they, their servants or agents, inter alia, caused or allowed the Waziristan to go and/or to remain aground so as to obstruct the navigable channel. By their defence, the defendants denied negligence. Alternatively, they contended (a) that, if there were any negligence, it was solely that of the pilot compulsorily on board the Waziristan, and (b) that, in any event, the grounding of the Seirstad was caused solely by the negligence of the plaintiffs, their servants or agents. This report deals only with the defence of compulsory pilotage.

Porges, Q.C., and H. E. G. Browning for the plaintiffs.

Naisby, Q.C., and J. B. Hewson for the defendants.

WILLMER, J., stated the facts, dealt with the issue of negligence, and continued: Having come to the conclusion that the Waziristan was not at fault for taking the ground, I have disposed of the case, and, on that basis, the defendants are entitled to judgment. But, in case I am wrong, and as the question of compulsory pilotage has been argued before me, I think that I - should state my views on that question. This casualty took place in Iraq territorial waters. The whole of the Shatt-al-Arab river is under the jurisdiction of the Port of Basrah Authority. Navigation in the river is governed by a code of port rules and bye-laws, under which pilotage for vessels such as the Seirstad and Waziristan is compulsory. Pilots are licensed and supplied by the Basrah port authority. It is common ground that in Iraq there is no equivalent of the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15 (1), which makes a shipowner in this country responsible for the negligence of a compulsory pilot. In those circumstances, the question was raised whether the presence of a compulsory pilot on board the Waziristan would constitute a defence for the defendants. It would not, of course, constitute any defence for them if I were able to find negligence on the part of any servant or agent of their own. If, for instance, I had found the master guilty of negligence, the defence of "compulsory pilotage" would have been of no avail to the defendants, even though the pilot was also negligent. But I am unable to find any such negligence on the part of any actual servant of the owners. Although I do not find that the pilot was guilty of negligence, I am satisfied that, if there was any negligence on the part of anyone, it could only have been on the part of the pilot—and that would raise in the clearest form the question whether compulsory pilotage would be any defence. The argument put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs is that, on the true construction of the port rules, pilotage is made compulsory only in the sense that the ship must carry on board a pilot as an adviser. It was contended that under the rules there was nothing to compel a master to hand over the navigation of his ship to the control of the pilot. Counsel, in fact, went further and said (as was, indeed, the fact) that on the evidence the master of the Seirstad never did hand over the control of his vessel to his pilot, whatever the master of the Waziristan might have done. According to the evidence of the master of the Seirstad, he regarded his pilot merely as an adviser, and he, the master, remained in charge of the vessel. (I noticed, incidentally, that counsel for the plaintiffs did not make any application to amend para. 2 of the statement of claim, which avers that the Seirstad was "in charge of a duly licensed pilot".) In support of his argument counsel for the plaintiffs relied on the special note printed at the beginning of the Basrah port bye-laws. Apart from one or two verbal alterations, the note is the same, in effect, as art. 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea [contained in sched. I to an Order in Council, dated Oct. 13, 1910 (S.R. & O., 1910, No. 1113)], which reads:

- "Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case."
- It is argued that the effect of incorporating that note in the book of rules and bye-laws is to reserve the ultimate control to the master of every ship, so as to leave the pilot only as an adviser. On that basis, counsel for the plaintiffs relied on the old decisions in The Augusta (1) and The Guy Mannering (2), both of which raised questions of compulsory pilotage in foreign waters. In The Augusta (1) it was a question of the law of France, and in The Guy Mannering (2) it was a question of the law of the Suez Canal. In each of those cases the court, after inquiry into the foreign law, came to the conclusion that the pilot was not compulsorily in charge of the vessel, but was merely taken on board as adviser, leaving the control of the vessel with the master, and, in those circumstances, the court came to the conclusion that "compulsory pilotage" was no defence. It seems to me at least open to question whether the special note in the bye-laws, on which counsel relies, does not prompt precisely the opposite inference from that which he claimed for it. As I have said, it reproduces in substance, art. 29 of the collision regulations, and it seems to me equally arguable that its real purpose is to serve as a reminder that, although control of the ship is handed over to the pilot, the master and crew are not to be absolved from their ordinary duties, such as exhibiting lights, keeping a look-out, taking all precautions as are required by the ordinary practice of seamen, and so on. It might be argued that the very fact that it is necessary to incorporate such a note in the bye-laws prompts the inference that the pilot was, indeed, intended to be compulsorily in charge of the vessel so far as her navigation was concerned. In any case, I should have been disposed to hold that, when the bye-law says, as it does, that pilotage is compulsory, it means exactly what it says, i.e., that the operation of piloting the ship (which is equivalent to the control of the navigation of the ship) is to be placed in the hands of the pilot. That was the view which HILL, J., took in The Andoni (3), and it is not unhelpful to refer to a passage in his judgment where he said ([1918] P. 18):

“ In my opinion a pilot, in the mouths of British authorities, prima facie means, to use LORD TENTERDEN’S words, ‘ A person taken on board at a particular place for the purpose of conducting a ship through a river, road or channel or from or into a port ’. And where you find that pilotage is compulsory, that, prima facie, means, in the mouths of British authorities, that the pilot is entitled, and the master is bound to permit him, to conduct the ship, that is, to take charge of the navigation of the ship.”

It was pressed on me by counsel for the plaintiffs that, as was laid down by SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., in The Benue (4), there is a severe burden of proof on any defendant relying on the defence of compulsory pilotage. Having pointed out that the plaintiffs must first establish a case of negligent navigation, SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., went on to say ([1916] P. 98):

“ The defendants must then prove that a pilot was in charge compulsorily and in fact; that the negligent navigation was due solely to the fault of the pilot; that is to say, that the particular negligent acts or defaults, found by the court to have caused the collision, were committed by the pilot himself, or by the master or crew in obedience to the pilot’s orders. If the case rested in that state, the defence of compulsory pilotage would prevail. But if, in addition, evidence is given, either adduced by the plaintiffs, or obtained from the defendants’ own witnesses, or in any other way forthcoming in the course of the case, that there were also acts or defaults on the part of the master or crew which might have contributed to the collision, the defence would fail, unless the defendants satisfied the court that such acts or defaults did not in any degree contribute to the collision. If the defendants did satisfy the court of that, their defence would hold good; if they did not, their defence would fail.”

In my judgment, in so far as the onus of proof has passed to the defendants in this case, they have, on the facts that I have found, discharged that onus of proof. It follows, therefore, that I should, in any case, have found difficulty in accepting the contention of counsel for the plaintiffs.

The matter, however, goes further than that. We are concerned here with a question of foreign law. So far, I have been attempting to interpret these bye-laws as they would be read by a court in this country. But it is clear that a question of foreign law is raised, as it was in The Augusta (1) and The Guy Mannering (2), and, on the question of that foreign law, I have had the benefit of hearing the evidence of Mr. Lloyd, who was for many years a judge in Iraq. I think that his views can be summarised by two or three answers which he gave. When he was asked, in examination-in-chief, what was the position in regard to compulsory pilotage in Iraq at the time of the casualty, he said:

"The shipowner is not civilly liable for the negligence of a compulsory pilot by the law of Iraq". In cross-examination, he enlarged on that, and said:

"If the owner has to surrender control of the ship to a third party, liability can only arise if an actual servant has been guilty of neglect or default . . . The Iraq court would assume that the ship was in control of the pilot."

A Finally, in re-examination, he was asked a hypothetical question based on the facts of this case, to which his answer, in the abbreviated form in which I took it down, was this:

"If ship A. grounds solely through the negligence of the pilot, and, in consequence, ship B. sustains damage which could not be prevented, the owner of ship A. is not liable."

B It seems to me that Mr. Lloyd had no doubt what was, in his view, the law of Iraq on the subject at the date of this casualty. No evidence to the contrary was called by the plaintiffs, and, in my judgment, I must accept Mr. Lloyd's evidence as a correct statement of Iraq law. That being so, this case is left in exactly the same position as was The Arum (5). That was a case, tried before HILL, J., arising out of a collision which occurred in the harbour at Gibraltar, where it was held that the position had not been affected by British legislation dealing with compulsory pilotage. HILL, J., said ([1921] P. 20):

"If the owners of the Arum had been sued in respect of the collision in the courts of Gibraltar, there would have been no answer to the defence that the collision was caused by the negligence of a person who was not the owner's servant. The tort of which the plaintiffs complain was one which did not create a cause of action against the defendants by the law of the place where the tort was committed. How then does the Pilotage Act make it a cause of action against the defendants in this country? Before the Pilotage Act the defendants could have pleaded: (1) 'We are not liable by the law of the United Kingdom for the negligence of a compulsory pilot who is not our servant', and (2) 'we are not liable by the law of Gibraltar for such negligence'. Either defence, if made good, would have been an answer to an action in these courts for negligence committed in the enclosed waters of Gibraltar. Conceding that the effect of the Pilotage Act is that the defendants can no longer set up the first defence, they can still set up the second."

F It seems to me that, substituting the word "Iraq" for the word "Gibraltar" and the word "Waziristan" for the word "Arum", every word of what HILL, J., there said applies to the present case. Therefore, had I found negligence on the part of the pilot of the Waziristan in this case, I should, undoubtedly, have come to the conclusion that the state of the law in Iraq is such that the defendants could not be made liable here for such negligence.

G On the remaining point raised in this case, namely, whether, assuming that there was negligence for which the defendants are responsible, the damages claimed flow from such negligence, I should have been disposed to conclude that the damages here claimed did flow from the negligence complained of. But, on my findings, that is an academic question, and I do not propose to waste further time over it. For the reasons which I have given, it is my duty H to dismiss this action on the ground that there was no actionable negligence on the part of the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors: Thomas Cooper & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Middleton, Lewis & Co., agents for Middleton & Co., Sunderland (for the defendants).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re GILPIN (deceased). HUTCHINSON v. GILPIN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), October 14, 15, 16, 19, 1953.]

Will—"Children"—Inclusion of adopted children—Adoptive mother incapable of bearing children—"Disposition" made before Jan. 1, 1950—Whether disposition made at date of will or date of testator's death—Adoption Act, 1950 (c. 26), s. 13 (2), sched. V, para. 4.

Under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, s. 5 (2), the expression "child" used in any disposition whether made before or after the adoption order is not to include an adopted child or children of an adopted child unless a contrary intention appears. Under the Adoption Act, 1950, s. 13 (2), in any disposition of property made, whether by instrument inter vivos or by will, after the date of an adoption order, any reference to the child or children of the adopter shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as a reference to the adopted person. Schedule V, para. 4, to the Act of 1950, provides: "Sections 13 to 15 of this Act shall apply in relation to an adoption order made under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926 . . . as if it were an adoption order within the meaning of those sections respectively: Provided that nothing in s. 13 of this Act shall affect the devolution of any property on the intestacy of a person who died before Jan. 1, 1950, or any disposition made before that date". In 1917 the testator's daughter, M.A.H., underwent an operation which prevented her from bearing children, which fact was well known to the testator. In 1941 she and her husband adopted the plaintiff by an adoption order made under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, and the plaintiff was always thereafter recognised by the testator as his grandchild. By cl. 8 of his will dated Sept. 3, 1947, the testator gave his residuary estate to trustees on trust for his son and daughters (whom he had previously named) in equal shares and from and after their death "in trust for the children of my same son and daughters . . . or any of their issue in such shares . . . as they and each of them shall by deed or will appoint and in default of such appointment . . . in trust for the children of my same son and daughters . . . in equal shares". On Oct. 11, 1950, the testator died. On a summons to determine whether the plaintiff was a "child" of M.A.H. within the meaning of cl. 8 of the will,

HELD: (i) the word "disposition" in the phrase a "disposition made before that date" in para. 4 of sched. V to the Act of 1950 meant the document and not the benefit conferred by the document, and, therefore, for the purposes of para. 4 the relevant date was that of the will and not that of the death of the testator, and s. 13 of the Act of 1950 did not affect the devolution of the testator's residuary estate, but,

(ii) on the construction of the will, as the testator knew that his daughter, M.A.H., could have no natural lawful children and approved of the fact that she had an adopted child, he must have intended to include in his testamentary disposition the plaintiff, who was, therefore, a child within the meaning of cl. 8 of the will and entitled to benefit.

Principle stated by LORD CAIRNS in Hill v. Crook (1873) (L.R. 6 H.L. 282), and Re Fletcher ([1949] 1 All E.R. 732), applied.

AS TO DESCRIPTION BY RELATIONSHIP, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 292-298, paras. 344-348; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 807-818, Nos. 6603-6696.

FOR THE ADOPTION ACT, 1950, s. 13, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 477; and FOR Sched. V, see ibid., p. 506.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Berkeley v. Berkeley, [1946] 2 All E.R. 154; [1946] A.C. 555; 115 L.J.Ch. 281; 175 L.T. 153; 2nd Digest Supp.

- (2) Hill v. Crook, (1873), L.R. 6 H.L. 265; 42 L.J.Ch. 702; 44 Digest 808, 6614.
- (3) Re Eve, [1909] 1 Ch. 796; 78 L.J.Ch. 388; 100 L.T. 874; 44 Digest 812, 6646.
- (4) Re Wohlgemuth, [1948] 2 All E.R. 882; [1949] Ch. 12; [1949] L.J.R. 231; 2nd Digest Supp.
- A (5) Re Fletcher, [1949] 1 All E.R. 732; [1949] Ch. 473; [1949] L.J.R. 1255; 2nd Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of cl. 8 of the will of the testator, George Gilpin, and of s. 13 of and para. 4 of sched. V to the Adoption Act, 1950, the plaintiff, as the adopted child of Margery Annie Hutchinson, one of the daughters of the testator, was a "child" of the said daughter within the meaning of the said clause and entitled as such to share in the residuary estate of the testator.

By cl. 8 of his will dated Sept. 3, 1947, the testator gave his residuary estate to his trustees (the defendants in the summons) on trust for sale and conversion, payment of debts, etc.,

C "to stand possessed of the residue thereof in trust for my son and my said four daughters [named in cl. 5] in equal shares. Provided always and I declare that my trustees shall retain the share of my son and each of my said daughters of and in my residuary estate upon the trusts following (that is to say) upon trust to pay the income thereof to my son and daughters during their lifetime but so that they shall not have power to dispose of same by way of anticipation and from and after the death of such son or daughters in trust for the children of my same son or daughters or any of them or any of their issue in such shares (if more than one) and in such manner as they and each of them shall by deed or will appoint and in default of such appointment and so far as any such appointment shall not extend in trust for the children of my same son and daughters who being male shall attain the age of twenty-five years and being female attain that age or marry in equal shares and if there shall be only one such child the whole to be in trust for that one child and in case there shall be no child of my same son and daughters then and in such case in trust for my other children in equal shares and so that the share or shares accruing to each or any my said son or daughters of mine under this trust shall be subject to the trusts hereby declared concerning the original share of the same son or daughters under this my will. Provided always and I hereby declare that if any child of mine shall die in my lifetime leaving a child or children who being a male shall attain the age of twenty-five years or being a female shall attain that age or marry then and in every such case the last mentioned child or children shall take and if more than one equally between them the share of capital in my residuary estate to which his her or their parent would have been entitled to the income thereof under this my will if such parent had survived me including any share or shares which would have accrued to such parent under the trusts and provisions in that behalf hereinbefore contained."

By cl. 9 he gave his

H "trustees . . . power to raise any part or parts not exceeding together one moiety of the vested or expectant share of any grandchild of mine under the trusts of this my will and apply the same for his or her advancement preferment and benefit as my trustees shall think fit."

On Oct. 11, 1950, the testator died, and his will was duly proved by the first three defendants on Mar. 17, 1951.

The plaintiff was the adopted son of Margery Annie Hutchinson and her husband, Mrs. Hutchinson being a daughter of the testator. The adoption order was made in the Leeds County Court on Feb. 12, 1941, under power conferred by the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. It appeared from the evidence that Mrs. Hutchinson, who was born in 1899, underwent at the age of eighteen an operation which prevented her from bearing children. The effect of that operation was known to her father, the testator, and members of her family. She later married her husband and in 1941 adopted the plaintiff, who was the lawful nephew of her husband, and was twelve years old at the date of his adoption. From that time forth the plaintiff lived with his adoptive parents during infancy and called them "Uncle" and "Aunt". The adoption was made with full approval of the testator who recognised the plaintiff as his grandson.

Robert S. Lazarus for the plaintiff.

M. Nesbitt for the defendants.

UPJOHN, J.: This summons raises an interesting question on the construction of the will of the testator, George Gilpin, and as to the true interpretation of the Adoption Act, 1950. The plaintiff is the adopted son of one Margery Annie Hutchinson and her husband, Mrs. Hutchinson being a daughter of the testator. The adoption order was made in Leeds County Court on Feb. 12, 1941, under the powers conferred by the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. Section 5 of that Act is in these terms:

"(2) An adoption order shall not deprive the adopted child of any right to or interest in property to which, but for the order, the child would have been entitled under any intestacy or disposition, whether occurring or made before or after the making of the adoption order, or confer on the adopted child any right to or interest in property as a child of the adopter, and the expressions 'child', 'children' and 'issue' where used in any disposition whether made before or after the making of an adoption order, shall not, unless the contrary intention appears, include an adopted child or children or the issue of an adopted child . . . (4) For the purposes of this section 'disposition' means an assurance of any interest in property by any instrument whether inter vivos or by will including codicil."

On Sept. 3, 1947, the testator made his will by which, inter alia, he made a provision for his five children, one of them being Mrs. Hutchinson, and, having given each of his children shares in his residuary estate, he settled each child's share on his or her issue as they should appoint, and, in default of appointment, for the children who attained twenty-one years (reading it subject to the Law of Property Act, 1925), with accruer to other shares if no child of any particular child took. It follows from that that, in view of the provisions of s. 5 of the Act of 1926, the plaintiff would not take any part of the property under that disposition in the will unless he can satisfy the court that a contrary intention appears.

The Act of 1926, however, was replaced by the Adoption of Children Act, 1949, which came into force on Jan. 1, 1950. That Act in turn was repealed and replaced by the Adoption Act, 1950, which came into force on Oct. 1 of that year. The Acts of 1949 and 1950 radically altered the policy of the law in relation to the benefits which adopted children might receive from their adopting parent. Section 13 of the Adoption Act, 1950, is in these terms:

"(1) Where, at any time after the making of an adoption order, the adopter or the adopted person or any other person dies intestate in respect of any real or personal property (other than property subject to an entailed interest under a disposition made before the date of the adoption order), that property shall devolve in all respects as if the adopted person were the child of the adopter born in lawful wedlock and were not the child of any other person. (2) In any disposition of real or personal property made, whether by instrument inter vivos or by will (including codicil), after the date of an adoption order—(a) any reference (whether express or implied) to the child or children of the adopter shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as, or as including, a reference to the adopted person; (b) any reference (whether express or implied) to the child or children of the adopted person's natural parents or either of them shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as not being, or as not including, a reference to the adopted person; and (c) any reference (whether express or implied) to a person related to the adopted person in any degree shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as a reference to the person who would be related to him in that degree if he were the child of the adopter born in lawful wedlock and were not the child of any other person."

A

B Sub-section (3) deals with dispositions of real or personal property that go with the dignity or title of honour. Section 14 provides:

"(1) For the purposes of the application of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, to the devolution of any property in accordance with the provisions of the last foregoing section, and for the purposes of the construction of any such disposition as is mentioned in that section, an adopted person shall be deemed to be related to any other person being the child or adopted child of the adopter or (in the case of a joint adoption) of either of the adopters—(a) where he or she was adopted by two spouses jointly, and that other person is the child or adopted child of both of them, as brother or sister of the whole blood; (b) in any other case, as brother or sister of the half-blood. (2) Notwithstanding any rule of law, a disposition made by will or codicil executed before the date of an adoption order shall not be treated for the purposes of the last foregoing section as made after that date by reason only that the will or codicil is confirmed by a codicil executed after that date. . . . (4) Where an adoption order is made in respect of a person who has been previously adopted, the previous adoption shall be disregarded for the purposes of the last foregoing section in relation to the devolution of any property on the death of a person dying intestate after the date of the subsequent adoption order and in relation to any disposition of property made after that date."

C

D

E

Therefore, in cases where an adoption is made under the Adoption Act, 1950, the rights of the adopted child are radically altered, because, unless the contrary intention appears, he or she is for all purposes of devolution to be treated as the child of the adopter born in lawful wedlock. The order in Leeds County Court was made under the Act of 1926, and to such an order the transitional provisions of the Adoption Act, 1950, are applicable. The relevant provision is to be found in para. 4 of sched. V, which is in these terms:

F

G

"Sections 13 to 15 of this Act shall apply in relation to an adoption order made under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, or the Adoption of Children (Scotland) Act, 1930, or made before the commencement of this Act under the Adoption of Children Act (Northern Ireland), 1929, as if it were an adoption order within the meaning of those sections respectively."

Then follow the important words:

H

"Provided that nothing in s. 13 of this Act shall affect the devolution of any property on the intestacy of a person who died before Jan. 1, 1950, or any disposition made before that date."

The testator died on Oct. 11, 1950, and his will was duly proved by the first three defendants, his executors and trustees, on Mar. 17, 1951.

The first point I have to consider is this. If, for the purposes of the proviso to para. 4 of sched. V, a disposition means the document creating the benefit then the disposition was made at the date of the will—i.e., Sept. 3, 1947—and s. 13 of the Act of 1950 will not affect it. If, on the other hand, the disposition must be taken to be, as is submitted by the plaintiff, an effective disposition, that is, one which came into force on the death of the testator, because his will then became an effective instrument, the relevant date would be Oct. 11, 1950. Thereupon, unless a contrary intention appears, s. 13 of the Act of 1950 would apply and the plaintiff would be, for the purposes of devolution under the will of the testator, a child of his adopting parent, Mrs. Hutchinson. A

Counsel for the plaintiff has submitted that the disposition means an effective disposition. A will, he submits, is purely ambulatory in its operation and, until the death of the testator, can affect no rights and no interests. It remains revocable, provided the testator remains of sound mind, memory and understanding, up to the very moment of his death, and, therefore, it would not be right to consider such a document as a disposition. The disposition to which the Act is pointing is, he submits, the effective disposition made by the death of the testator and the coming into operation of his will. Counsel pressed me with a decision of the House of Lords in Berkeley v. Berkeley (1). That was a decision on the Finance Act, 1941, s. 25 (1), which provides: B

“Subject to the provisions of this section, any provision, however worded, for the payment, whether periodically or otherwise, of a stated amount free of income tax, or free of income tax other than surtax, being a provision which—(a) is contained in any deed or other instrument, in any will or codicil, in any order of any court, in any local or personal Act, or in any contract, whether oral or in writing; and (b) was made before Sept. 3, 1939; and (c) has not been varied on or after that date, shall, as respects payments falling to be made during any year of assessment, the standard rate of income tax for which is 10s. in the pound, have effect as if for the stated amount there were substituted an amount equal to twenty twenty-ninths thereof.” C

The question there was whether the provision meant the benefit conferred by the document or whether it meant the document itself. Four of their Lordships came to the conclusion, after a close analysis of the words of the section, that it had the former meaning, LORD PORTER dissenting on that point, but agreeing with the order made by the House on other grounds. The problem which the House of Lords had to consider was succinctly stated by VISCOUNT SIMON ([1946] 2 All E.R. 157): D

“The crucial question is what is the meaning of the phrase ‘any provision, however worded’. It may mean, as the Court of Appeal thought, the words which define a benefit and which are contained in the document or oral contract referred to in s. 25 (1). Or it may mean the benefit conferred by such a document or oral contract. If it bears the first of these meanings, it is to be found in the language of the document or oral contract and is necessarily of the same date, being in effect equivalent to a clause. If it means the second, its date will be the date when the benefit is conferred.” E

Then his Lordship went on to discuss the reasons which led him to come to the conclusion that the correct construction was the second meaning which he had mentioned. F

The word I have to consider is not “provision”, but “disposition”, and I find that word in quite a different context from that which the House of Lords had to consider in the Berkeley case (1). I do not myself derive great assistance from the observations they made which were necessarily made in relation to the very different words they had to consider, and I do not think that I need quote further from that case. As I have said, the word here is “disposition”, and, although it may be that a disposition can refer to the benefit conferred by an instrument, it seems to me that ordinarily the word “disposition” would G H be used in reference to a written document and not to the effect of that document. As counsel for the defendant said in argument, most wills start with this well-known clause:

“ I revoke all testamentary dispositions heretofore made by me.”

Therefore, I approach this problem with the view that the word “ disposition ” is more apt to mean a document, and, therefore, in reference to the making of a
A disposition, the date of the document rather than at the date on which it comes into operation. However, I do not decide this case on any such ground, because, in my judgment, when s. 13 and s. 14 of the Adoption Act, 1950, are analysed closely, there is ample ground for thinking that the draftsman must have intended, when using the word “ disposition ”, to refer to the document which created the right, rather than the event when the benefit thereby given came
B into effect. Counsel for the defendants pointed out that the meaning sought to be put on the word “ disposition ” by counsel for the plaintiff is inconsistent with the phraseology in s. 13 (1), particularly the phraseology used within the brackets:

“ other than property subject to an entailed interest under a disposition made before the date of the adoption order.”

C There is a clear distinction there between property or benefit and the disposition which gives rise to the benefit. The words, he submitted, in sub-s. (2) are even stronger, because they open with this phrase:

“ In any disposition of real or personal property made, whether by instrument inter vivos or by will . . .”,

D those words again showing that the reference was being made to a document. It goes on:

“ (a) any reference (whether express or implied) shall . . .”

and so on. That phraseology is repeated in para. (b) and para. (c). Therefore, when the sub-section is talking of a reference and the construction of a reference,
E one is almost necessarily driven to the view that the draftsman is referring to the document rather than to the operation of the document. The same general comments can be made on s. 14 (1), because it refers to the purposes of the construction of any such disposition, which, again, is apt only when a document is being considered. But what, to my mind, is conclusive on this matter is s. 14 (2), because, if the construction sought by counsel for the plaintiff
F is right, that sub-section is wholly useless and can have no operation whatever, for that sub-section refers to a will or codicil being confirmed by a codicil executed after the date of an adoption order. If the relevant date be the death of the testator, that section can have no conceivable operation. For these reasons, therefore, I come to the conclusion that in para. 4 of sched. V a “ disposition made before that date ” is, for the purposes before me and when considering a dis-
G position by will, referring to the date of the will and not to the date when the provisions of the will became effective by the death of the testator. I do not, of course, in this case have to consider the question of any codicil. Accordingly, in my judgment, the disposition was a will which was made in 1947, so that s. 13 to s. 15 of the Adoption Act, 1950, are not to affect the devolution of any property.

H That, however, does not conclude the matter against the plaintiff, because counsel's second broad point is this: He says, either by operation of the general law or by the operation of the Act of 1926, which (although repealed by the Act of 1950) is kept in force as regards acts done under it by the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 38 (2) (b), a contrary intention appears. His submission is that on the true construction of the will, the word “ children ” or “ children of the testator ” must necessarily include the adopted child, the plaintiff. [His LORDSHIP read the relevant provisions of the will and continued:] Counsel for the defendants has directed some forcible remarks to the grammar in the residuary gift in cl. 8. He points out that it is a collective gift and it is not necessary to suppose that the testator intended it to become effective in relation to the issue of all his children. I think the will is open to some grammatical criticism, but I cannot feel the slightest doubt as to what the testator was effecting in cl. 8 of his will. He gave nominatim to each child a fifth share of his residue. That fifth share was settled on each for life, and, on his or her death, that share was to go to the issue of that child as that child should appoint; if the child did not appoint, then it was to go to the children who attained twenty-one years (as corrected by the Law of Property Act, 1925) in equal shares, and if there were no such children, that share was to go over to the other shares and was to be held on the same trusts as those other shares. I do not think there can be any doubt that that is the true construction of the will. In the circumstances which appear in the evidence, counsel for the plaintiff invokes a well known principle of construction to bring in the adopted child. [His LORDSHIP stated the circumstances and continued:] Counsel for the plaintiff contends that the testator must necessarily, when making a gift to the children of Mrs. Hutchinson, have intended to benefit the plaintiff, because when he made his will the testator well knew that his daughter never could have any natural legitimate children. The principle on which he relies is expressed in the oft quoted words of LORD CAIRNS in Hill v. Crook (2) (L.R. 6 H.L. 282). That passage was quoted in Re Eve (3), and it will be sufficient for me to quote the passage from the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, J. In that case, the testatrix made a gift equally among the children of her sisters, Mary Ann Burns and others, and the issue of such of them as should die in her lifetime leaving issue. Mary Ann Burns was, at the date of the will, a widow nearly sixty-eight years of age. She had been married in 1869, having had two children by her husband before marriage, and had no other children. She was living with the testatrix at the date of her will and her death and the testatrix knew all the facts and was on affectionate terms with the children, and the other sisters and brother had legitimate children living. It was held that Mary Ann Burns' two illegitimate children took shares on the ground that there were not, and never could be, any legitimate children to answer the description. SWINFEN EADY, J., said ([1909] 1 Ch. 799):

"I propose merely to state the law as laid down by the highest authority and apply it to this case. The term 'children' in a will prima facie means legitimate children, and if there is nothing else, the circumstance that the person whose children are referred to has illegitimate children will not entitle those illegitimate children to take. Then LORD CAIRNS said in Hill v. Crook (2): 'But there are two classes of cases in which that prima facie interpretation is departed from. One class of cases is where it is impossible from the circumstances of the parties that any legitimate children could take under the bequest. A familiar example of that might be given in this way: Suppose there is a bequest "to the children of my daughter Jane", Jane being dead, and having left illegitimate children, but having left no legitimate children. There, inasmuch as the testator must be taken to have known the state of his family, and must be taken to have intended to benefit some children of his daughter Jane, and inasmuch as she had no children who could be benefited except illegitimate children, rather than that the bequest should fail altogether the courts will hold that those illegitimate children are intended, and they will take under the term "children".' Applying that statement of the law to this case, I have to ask myself who could the testatrix have meant when she made this gift to the children of Mary Ann Burns, the old widowed sister who was then living with her. There were two illegitimate children whom she knew all about, and there never could be any other or legitimate children who could take under this bequest. LORD CAIRNS said that one class of cases in which illegitimate children may take is, where there is a gift to children and it is impossible that legitimate children should take. That is this case. In the circumstances which existed at the date of the will it was impossible that any legitimate children should take. There were none and never could be any. It is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the testatrix intended these two children to take, and I must give effect to that intention—an intention which I arrive at not from any conjecture as to what the testatrix meant, but from the will itself with the assistance of such surrounding circumstances as I am bound to look at. I therefore decide that the two illegitimate children of Mary Ann Burns are entitled to shares in the residue.”

The principle was applied in two later cases. In Re Wohlgenuth (4) JENKINS, J., applied the general principle of Hill v. Crook (2) to the case, a rather exceptional one, where it was proved that the testator himself was incapable of having further children. In that case, the learned judge came to the conclusion that in his will the testator must have intended to benefit two earlier illegitimate children. The learned judge said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 886):

“In the unusual circumstances of this case and on the evidence I find that it is proved that at the date of his will the testator was permanently incapable of having any further children by his wife, and that he was well aware at that date that he was so incapable. One may add also that, rightly or wrongly, he believed that in any case there was no longer any possibility of his wife having a child, irrespective of his own capacity. That being so, in my judgment, the case is brought within the first of the two exceptions to the general rule stated by LORD CAIRNS and applied by SWINFEN EADY, J., in Re Eve (3), and, accordingly, the material parts of this will must be construed as making provision for the two children of the testator and the first defendant notwithstanding that they were not legitimate children.”

In Re Fletcher (5) ROXBURGH, J., extended the principle to adopted children. The case (which was not unlike the present, although there were many circumstances in that case which are not present in this case) was that the testator's daughter was incapable herself of bearing a child and she adopted a child, and the learned judge came to the conclusion that the testator, in making a gift to the children of that daughter, must have intended to benefit the adopted child. The learned judge said this ([1949] 1 All E.R. 734):

“There is no doubt (and I start with this as a fundamental proposition) that ‘children’ in an English will prima facie means legitimate children and does not include either illegitimate or adopted children.”

Having dealt with the first two arguments, the learned judge said he would deal with the third (ibid., 735):

“... though this case concerns, not illegitimate but adopted, children, I must refer to the case of illegitimate children because, while several decisions have been given with regard to illegitimate children, there has been none so far as I am aware, with regard to adopted children.”

Then the learned judge cites the passage from LORD CAIRNS' speech in Hill v. Crook (2) and continues (ibid.):

“Counsel for the fifth defendant has submitted that I ought not to apply to an adopted child the principles which are applicable to an illegitimate child because an illegitimate child is at least a natural child of the person named whereas an adopted child has no status as a child, except such as is conferred on it by the adoption order. I am disinclined to draw such a distinction. It seems to me that the question in every case is: In what sense has the testator used the word ‘children’? Prima facie he has used it in its natural sense as meaning lawful children, but, if once the court comes to the conclusion that he has not used it in its natural sense of lawful children, it seems to me that it must be legitimate for the court to inquire into the sense in which he has used the word and that it makes no difference in principle whether the court finds that he has used it in the sense of illegitimate children or in the sense of adopted children. It is common for people to speak of both illegitimate children and adopted children as 'children' simpliciter."

I apply the principle illustrated by those cases to this case. I cannot accept the argument of counsel for the defendants that, because it is a collective gift, it was not intended to take effect in favour of each child, but it is sufficient if the words are satisfied in the case of the children who have legitimate children. That submission seems to me to be contrary to principle and certainly contrary to Re Eve (3). It seems to me clear that the testator intended to give one fifth share to his daughter for life and then to benefit her children. In 1947 he knew that she could have no natural lawful children. He knew and approved of the fact that she had an adopted child. It was argued by counsel for the defendants that the reference to the word "parent" in the proviso at the end of cl. 8 and the reference to "any grandchild of mine" in cl. 9 was an indication that the testator intended to benefit only his lawful natural grandchildren. I do not take that view. Once it is established, as I think it is, that the testator intended to benefit an adopted child by including such a child amongst the description of "child or children" in the early part of cl. 8, I see no difficulty in assuming that, when he used the word "parent", he intended to include adopted parent, and when in cl. 9 he used the word "grandchild" he meant to include grandchildren by adoption of the daughter. I venture to think that the case is a clear one and that the testator must have intended to include in his testamentary disposition the plaintiff, and I shall declare accordingly.

Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors: Waterhouse & Co., agents for Ford & Warren, Leeds (for the plaintiff); Haslewood, Hare, Shirley Woolmer & Co., agents for W. Bateson, Coates & Co., Leeds (for the defendants).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

NOTE.

STRETTON v. STRETTON.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Collingwood, J.), October 22, 1953.]

A Justices—Husband and wife—Appeal—Notes of evidence—Exhibits—Documents produced before justices—Need to make exhibits to notes.

APPEAL by the husband against an order, dated June 15, 1953, of Norfolk justices sitting at East Harling.

B On Aug. 3, 1948, the justices made an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, in favour of the wife on the ground that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide her with reasonable maintenance, and granted her, inter alia, custody of the two children of the marriage. On Nov. 8, 1948, that order was varied by granting custody of the children to the husband. On June 15, 1953, the order was again varied by granting custody of the children to the wife. Against that decision the husband now appealed.

C Stimson for the husband.

R. M. O. Havers for the wife.

D LORD MERRIMAN, P.: I wish to deal by way of preface with a matter to which we have to refer too frequently. There is attached to the notice of motion stating the grounds of appeal a reply from the clerk to the justices, in response to the usual inquiry from the registry, stating that no exhibits were handed in to the court. The notes of evidence show that several documents were produced and handed to the court which were not, as they should have been, made exhibits and sent to us as such. Some of them are extremely important documents. One is the school report of the elder child, a girl, whose educational future is very much one of the matters to be taken into account in considering the paramount question, the welfare of the children. The others concern the relations, whatever they may be, of the husband with a German woman, said by him to be a domestic servant in the house. There is a bundle of letters written before Aug. 3, 1948, which, though they were not all read, were, we are told, produced at the hearing. We have looked at one of them, dated May 7, 1948, which happened to be the one on the top of the pile. It is a fervent love-letter, which affords some confirmation of the wife's statement that the husband's association with this young woman was responsible for the break-up of the marriage in 1948. It is admitted that the others are in the same sense. There was also a bundle of correspondence, about which the husband was cross-examined, between himself and the Home Office, which shows conclusively that he was representing to the Home Office that he wished a passport to be granted to the German woman on the basis that she was his fiancée and that they were about to get married as soon as possible.

G [HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with the merits.]

Solicitors: Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co., agents for A. D. Foxon, Leicester (for the husband); Ford, Michelmores, Rose & Binning, agents for Greenland, Houchen & Co., Attleborough, Norfolk (for the wife).

A.T.H.

NOTE.

BEAL v. BEAL, READE cited.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Mr. Commissioner Latey, Q.C.),
October 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 1953.]

Divorce—Practice—Trial—Allegation of adultery—Submission by party cited of no case—Need to elect—Election—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 5.

PETITION by the wife for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty. By his answer the husband denied the allegations of cruelty and cross-prayed for a decree of dissolution on the ground of the wife's adultery with the party cited.

At the hearing, the wife gave evidence as to her allegations of cruelty and as to the husband's allegation of adultery. No other witness was called for the wife. The husband then gave evidence and called witnesses in support of his case. At the close of the husband's case the party cited submitted that as he was in the position of a co-respondent and the husband in that of a petitioner for the purposes of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 5, he was entitled to be dismissed from the suit on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence against him, and that, in view of the wording of that section, he was not bound to be put to his election in making that submission, according to the rule of convenience in Alexander v. Rayson ([1936] 1 K.B. 169). The commissioner ruled that, prima facie, s. 5 allowed the court to hear the submission without asking the party cited to make his election, but held on the evidence there was a serious case against the party cited who thereupon gave evidence and called witnesses in support. In his judgment, the commissioner said that it would be wrong to hold in principle that s. 5 counteracted the authority of Alexander v. Rayson (supra), and that the course he had taken must not be treated as a precedent.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 5, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 395.

Case referred to:

- (1) Alexander v. Rayson, [1936] 1 K.B. 169; 105 L.J.K.B. 148; 154 L.T. 205; Digest Supp.

A. B. Hollis for the wife.

Aarvold for the husband.

Curtis-Raleigh for the party cited.

Solicitors: Kinch & Richardson (for the wife); Haslewood, Hare, Shirley Woolmer & Co. (for the husband); Graham, Hooper & Betteridge, Brighton (for the party cited).

A.T.H.

H. (orser. D.) v. H.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Karminski, J.), October 2, 22, 30, 1953.]

Nullity—Fear—Marriage in country under communist government—Marriage to foreigner to obtain passport—No consummation of marriage.

- A The parties were married in Hungary on Mar. 9, 1949. The wife was a Hungarian, and the husband a French, citizen, and both were living in Hungary. The parties never lived together and the marriage was never consummated. After the marriage the wife obtained a French passport, and on May 7, 1949, she left Hungary and on May 15, 1949, came to England, where she had resided since. She petitioned for a decree of nullity on the ground that she was induced to be a party to the marriage ceremony by fear and duress. She stated in evidence that, before the ceremony of marriage, it was agreed between the husband and herself that they should not live together after the marriage and that it should be dissolved at the earliest possible opportunity, and that she was most anxious to leave Hungary because "the time was so terrible. I was afraid of what was going to happen there." At the time of the marriage a communist government ruled Hungary and the wife came of a family which, owing to its financial and social position, might not be sympathetically regarded by such a government. Two witnesses gave evidence that for the same reasons they had been in grave fear that they might be taken to prison or a concentration camp; that, to obtain a foreign passport and leave Hungary, they had gone through ceremonies of marriage in Hungary with foreigners; and that those marriages had since been dissolved.

- E HELD: the essence of a valid marriage in English law was the consent of the contracting parties; consent might be negated by the fear of a party to the marriage: see observations of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in Moss v. Moss ([1897] P. 268); although, here, the parties intended to become husband and wife, nevertheless the fear of the danger which would imperil the wife if she remained in Hungary was reasonably entertained by her and was of such a kind as to negative her consent to the marriage; in the absence of such consent there was no valid marriage; and there would be a decree of nullity.

- F AS TO CONSENT AS A REQUISITE OF A VALID MARRIAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 16, pp. 560, 561, paras. 838, 839; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 36-40, Nos. 131-167.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Moss v. Moss, [1897] P. 263; 66 L.J.P. 154; 77 L.T. 220; 27 Digest, Replacement, 36, 131.
- G (2) Fulwood's Case, (1638), Cro. Car. 482.
- (3) Scott v. Sebright, (1886), 12 P.D. 21; 56 L.J.P. 11; 57 L.T. 421; 27 Digest, Replacement, 38, 147.
- (4) Field's Marriage Annuling Bill, (1848), 2 H.L. Cas. 48; 9 E.R. 1010; 27 Digest, Replacement, 38, 154.
- (5) Brodie v. Brodie, [1917] P. 271; 86 L.J.P. 140; 117 L.T. 542; 27 Digest, Replacement, 217, 1726.
- H (6) Griffiths v. Griffiths, [1944] L.R. 35.
- (7) United States v. Rubinstein, (1945), 151 Federal Reporter, 2nd Series 915.
- (8) Martens v. Martens, [1952] 3 South African L.R. 771.

PETITION for nullity of marriage.

By her petition dated Mar. 30, 1953, the wife stated that she was married to the husband on Mar. 9, 1949, at the registry office at Budapest in the republic of Hungary; that after the ceremony of marriage the wife and the husband never lived or cohabited together, and that the marriage had never been consummated; that the wife was now living in London, and that the husband at all material times was domiciled in, and believed to be living in, France; that the wife had resided in England for three years last past and that the proceedings were brought under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 18 (1) (b); and that, being in fear owing to the facts that there was a communist government in Hungary, she was a person of some means and social position, and persons in her circumstances had been imprisoned or sent to concentration camps, she determined to leave Hungary, but found it was impossible to do so unless she acquired foreign nationality; that she arranged with the husband, who was a cousin, that they should go through a form of ceremony of marriage, but that it should be a marriage in name only, its sole purpose being to enable the wife to escape the danger which, from the fate of others, she had good reason to apprehend for herself; and that she would never have consented to go through the form of ceremony of marriage had she not, with a good cause, been in fear for her life, liberty and virtue. The wife prayed for a decree that the marriage was null and void. The husband did not enter an appearance to the petition, which came, undefended, before KARMINSKI, J., on Oct. 2, 1953. KARMINSKI, J., adjourned the suit for argument by the Queen's Proctor under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 10 (1).

“that the [wife] was induced to be party to the said form of ceremony of marriage not of her own free will but through fear and duress”;

Shelley, Q.C., and R. L. Bayne-Powell for the wife.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.) and Colin Duncan for the Queen's Proctor.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 30. KARMINSKI, J., read the following judgment. At the time of the ceremony of marriage the wife was a spinster of the age of eighteen years, a Hungarian citizen living in Budapest. The husband, who is her second cousin, was some six months her junior. He was by birth and nationality a French citizen and at the time of the ceremony of marriage he, too, was living in, and attending school at, Budapest. The parties, therefore, were minors under both English and Hungarian law. It appears from the evidence of Dr. K., a member of the Hungarian Bar and a doctor of laws of the university of Budapest, that a marriage between parties under the marriageable age, which is eighteen for men and sixteen for women, is voidable, but the Minister of Justice can give exemption and I was assured by Dr. K. that registrars of marriage in Hungary invariably obtain the permission or sanction of the Minister before performing the marriage ceremony between parties of whom one or both are under the marriageable age. In any event, the period of time during which this marriage could have been avoided under Hungarian law is now long past. I am satisfied that in form this marriage was valid by the law of Hungary.

After the ceremony of marriage the wife and the husband separated. The wife, having obtained a French passport, left Hungary on May 7, 1949, going first to Paris and soon after to this country where she has resided since May 15, 1949. The parties never lived together and the marriage was never consummated. I have evidence from a gynaecologist that as recently as June 23, 1953, the wife presented on examination all the indications of a virgin. The circumstances attending the ceremony of marriage were unusual. The husband was a school-boy and it appears that on the morning of the ceremony he attended school as usual for the first lesson, obtained leave to absent himself from the second lesson on the convenient pretext that he had to visit his dentist, went through the ceremony of marriage with the wife instead of visiting his dentist, and returned from the office of the marriage registrar in time to take his place at school for the third lesson of the day. The wife asserts, and I accept, that before the ceremony was performed she agreed with the husband that they should not live together after the marriage and that it should be dissolved at the earliest possible opportunity. The wife had discussed it with her widowed mother who entirely approved the scheme on the basis that it was the only practicable way in which the wife could leave the country.

A The reasons why the wife was anxious to leave Hungary were as follows. She came of a family engaged in a substantial business and of comfortable circumstances—the kind of family who might not be well or sympathetically regarded by a communist government. When Russian troops occupied Hungary in 1945, the wife, then about fourteen years of age, was dressed as a boy in the hope that thereby she might escape the attentions of the occupying troops. She wore this disguise for a few months and then returned to normal feminine dress. It does not appear that she was at any time molested by Russian or other troops. In 1948 a communist government ruled Hungary and the position of the wife, and of many others of her class and background, deteriorated. The wife, undoubtedly, heard many stories of people in her position being taken to prison or concentration camps, and she believed herself to be in real danger of sharing a similar fate. Asked why she was so anxious to leave Hungary, she answered:

“Because the time was so terrible. I was afraid of what was going to happen there.”

D Anxieties of this kind were not peculiar to the wife. A friend of hers, Mrs. A., gave evidence of her own difficulties and anxieties at this time. Mrs. A. herself was, in 1948, in grave fear of being taken away to a prison or a camp. She, too, was determined to leave Hungary. She, too, went through a form of ceremony of marriage at Budapest on Mar. 14, 1949, to an Austrian stranger, with whom she never lived. That marriage has now been dissolved and she has re-married. Another witness, who gave her evidence by affidavit and is now living outside the United Kingdom, was Mrs. P. Though not, I think, present at the actual ceremony, she went with the wife to the civil authorities to make the necessary arrangements and was well aware of the wife's motives, namely, that she was going to use her marriage as a means of obtaining a passport whereby she could leave Hungary. Mrs. P. shared fully the fears of the wife and Mrs. A. Mrs. P. also went through a ceremony of marriage with a foreigner with whom she never lived, left Hungary, and soon afterwards obtained a dissolution of that marriage. Mrs. P. has subsequently re-married. Mrs. P. states that she, too, went through a ceremony of marriage at a time when she was seventeen years of age because she was frightened for her liberty and, possibly, her life. Mrs. P. suggests that she might have purchased safety at the price of becoming the mistress of a Russian officer or official. Mrs. P.'s anxieties did not appear to be groundless: so far as her present information goes her parents have been deported, an order for her own deportation is believed to have been made, but at the time when it was sought to effect it Mrs. P. had left Hungary.

Soon after the ceremony of marriage the husband left Hungary and returned to France. Some letters from him written from Marseilles between 1951 and 1953 have survived. They are of little importance except to make it clear that he regarded his marriage at an end and was anxious to have it annulled or dissolved.

H In a case of this kind the question almost inevitably arises as to what system of law is applicable. In this case it was agreed that either English law or Hungarian law applied. Though the husband was and still is a French citizen it was not contended that French law could apply to the validity of this marriage. The choice between English and Hungarian law would appear to be almost academic, since the evidence of Dr. K. shows that under the Hungarian Marriage Act, 1894, s. 53,

"a marriage is voidable for duress if one of the spouses entered into the marriage as a result of a well-founded fear induced by threats."

The English law in relation to the avoidance of marriage under fear or duress seems largely similar, and it is probable that on this subject both English and Hungarian law derive from the common parentage of the canon law. I proceed, therefore, to consider this case on the basis that English law is applicable. A

In English, as in canon, law, the essence of a valid marriage is the consent of the contracting parties. AYLIFFE in his PARERGON JURIS CANONICI ANGLICANI states (p. 362) that the consent of the parties contracting is sufficient alone to establish such a marriage. But the consent must be perfect, and fear may vitiate consent. AYLIFFE states his proposition thus (ibid., p. 361): B

"Matrimony ought to be contracted with the utmost freedom and liberty of consent imaginable, without fear of any person whatsoever: for matrimony contracted through any menace or impression of fear is null and void ipso jure."

The general doctrine that fear may negative consent to marriage has long been accepted in the courts of this country. In Moss v. Moss (1) SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., said ([1897] P. 268): C

"There must be the voluntary consent of both parties . . . It has been repeatedly stated that a marriage may be declared null on the ground of fraud or duress. But, on examination, it will be found that this is only a way of amplifying the proposition long ago laid down (Fulwood's Case (2)) that the voluntary consent of the parties is required. In the case of duress with regard to the marriage contract, as with regard to any other, it is obvious that there is an absence of a consenting will." D

In Scott v. Sebright (3) BUTT, J., stated the principle thus (12 P.D. 24):

"Whenever from natural weakness of intellect or from fear—whether reasonably entertained or not—either party is actually in a state of mental incompetence to resist pressure improperly brought to bear, there is no more consent than in the case of a person of stronger intellect and more robust courage yielding to a more serious danger. The difficulty consists not in any uncertainty of the law on the subject, but in its application to the facts of each individual case." E

In Scott v. Sebright (3) BUTT, J., was considering facts very different from those in the present case. There the wife complained that the husband had threatened that unless she married him he would shoot her, would ruin her financially, and would accuse her to her mother and in every drawing-room in London of having been seduced by him. This last suggestion was wholly false, and, indeed, the wife was proved to be virgo intacta. In the present case it is not suggested that the fears of the wife derived from any action by the husband or from any default on his side. Indeed, he is represented as a youth of blameless character, who was willing to help the wife even at some possible risk to himself. There appears to be no case reported where fear or duress emanated from any other source than from the respondent or his servants or agents. An analysis of some of the earlier cases is to be found in SIR FITZROY KELLY'S argument in Field's Marriage Annuling Bill (4) (2 H.L. Cas. 57). In the majority of the cases there discussed the petitioners were of tender years but ample incomes. In some of the cases violence was used as well as threatened. F

It was argued by the Attorney-General that the facts of the present case cannot be said to prove that the ceremony of marriage was performed under fear or duress, and he rightly emphasised, and I accept, that the principles are strict and should not be rashly extended. He argued, further, that a mental G reservation as to a vital condition of marriage does not vitiate its validity, though the reservation itself may be bad as against public policy. Thus, in Brodie v. Brodie (5) HORRIDGE, J., held that an agreement entered into by the parties before marriage to live apart thereafter was illegal and void. But it was not argued, or suggested, in that case that because of such a reservation by the parties the marriage was itself void or voidable. On the contrary, HORRIDGE, J., affirmed the validity of the marriage by a decree of restitution of conjugal rights.

I agree entirely with the Attorney-General's proposition that mental reservations cannot avoid a marriage. And I also entirely agree with his argument that the court must be slow to pronounce against the validity of a marriage perfect in form and celebrated between, apparently, competent parties, even when, as in this case, it is difficult to withhold a feeling of sympathy with the present difficulties of the parties. There is no doubt that the presumption of law is in favour of the validity of a marriage in form duly celebrated, but the presumption is rebuttable by evidence. The English and Irish cases and the principles to be derived from them have been carefully examined by HAUGH, J., in an Irish case, Griffiths v. Griffiths (6). There a man was induced to go through a ceremony of marriage under the threat that he would otherwise be prosecuted for carnal knowledge of the wife, then under seventeen years of age. The threat was in fact false to the knowledge of the wife, but the husband was put in fear by it, and HAUGH, J., found as a fact that the husband married under the duress caused by such fear. As HAUGH, J., explained ([1944] I.R. 42):

"Duress must be a question of degree, and may begin from a gentle form of pressure, to physical violence, accompanied by threats of death."

I respectfully agree, adding only my own view that the question of degree is a question of fact for the court.

In the course of argument my attention was drawn to United States v. Rubenstein (7), a decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. That was an appeal from a conviction on a charge of conspiracy to obtain the entry of an alien into the United States by false representations and by the wilful concealment of material facts. A Czechoslovak woman married an American man in order to stay in the United States: the man received $200 from the woman, and both agreed that a divorce should take place six months after the marriage. HAND, J., found that the suppression of these material facts was a fraud even though the marriage was valid. But he went on to assert that the man and woman were never married at all, and said (151 Fed. Rep., 2nd Series 918):

"Mutual consent is necessary to every contract; and no matter what forms or ceremonies the parties may go through indicating the contrary, they do not contract if they do not in fact assent, which may always be proved . . . if the spouses agree to a marriage only for the sake of representing it as such to the outside world and with the understanding that they will put an end to it as soon as it has served its purpose to deceive, they have never really agreed to be married at all. They must assent to enter into the relation as it is ordinarily understood, and it is not ordinarily understood as merely a pretence, or cover, to deceive others."

The South African courts have more recently taken a different view. In Martens v. Martens (8) CLAYDEN, J., had to consider a suit for a declaration of nullity or in the alternative for a decree of restitution in the following circumstances. A Greek woman living in Greece desired to enter the Union of South Africa in order to live with a married man there residing. In order to secure admission into the Union, the Greek woman had to satisfy the authorities that she was coming there to get married and for that purpose she engaged herself to marry another man resident in South Africa. This man she deserted immediately after the ceremony of marriage and went to live with the married man. There was no suggestion that the Greek woman was in any personal difficulty in Greece or under any apprehension of danger to herself in that country. Dealing with these facts, CLAYDEN, J., said ([1952] 3 South African L.R. 775):

"It seems to me that the facts show that the parties did intend that the defendant should become the wife of the plaintiff. That was the very object of the ceremony, so that she could remain in the country, and that object was brought about with a realisation by both contracting parties that there would be need for divorce to end the marriage. As explained later, any agreements contrary to the relationship of marriage must be disregarded. The action for a declaration of nullity of marriage must be dismissed."

In both the United States v. Rubenstein (7) and in Martens v. Martens (8) the primary object of the marriage was in each case to evade, or at least to circumnavigate, the immigration laws of the United States and of the Union of South Africa respectively. In neither case can I find evidence that the ceremony of marriage was entered into under any fear. It is true that the two courts appear to have come to different conclusions, and, indeed, they were administering different codes of law. With the greatest respect to the persuasive authority of any decision of HAND, J., I find the reasoning of CLAYDEN, J., the more convincing in its relation to English law.

If the present case were devoid of the element of fear I should be compelled to find that the parties to the present suit intended that the petitioner should become the wife of the respondent. It was conceded in argument by the Attorney-General that, if it had been announced before this ceremony of marriage by the Hungarian authorities that all single women would be put into brothels, a woman might marry with no other intention than to escape that particular fate. But he argued, further, that the essence of the marriage between the wife and the husband in this case was to obtain a passport. It is true that the wife here was desperately anxious to obtain a passport which would enable her to escape from Hungary, but I have to inquire into the reason why she was so desperately anxious to leave her native country. That reason I believe to have been fear of the danger which would imperil her if she remained in Hungary, and I must find on the evidence of the wife herself and of Mrs. A. and Mrs. P. that her fears were reasonably entertained. I find that the fear entertained by the wife was of such a kind as to negative her consent to the marriage. In the absence of consent there can be no valid marriage. There was here neither consent nor valid marriage. I find the contents of the petition proved, and decree, accordingly, that the marriage in fact celebrated between the wife and the husband is null and void.

Decree accordingly.

Solicitors: Woodham Smith, Borradaile & Martin (for the wife); Treasury Solicitor.
[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

PROBATE AND DIVORCE DIVISION.

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

Divorce—Probate—Practice—Receipt or certificate given by solicitor's clerk—Signature by clerk.

A receipt or certificate given on behalf of a firm of solicitors by a clerk authorised to do so should be signed by him personally for the firm (e.g., J. Jones for Smith & Smith & Brown).

By direction of the registrars of the Probate and Divorce Registry.

27th October, 1953.

Re BAWDEN'S SETTLEMENT. BESANT AND OTHERS v.
BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE LONDON HOSPITAL
AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), January 23, 1953.]

National Health Service—Hospital—Legacy to hospital—Discretion to trustees to divert gift if hospital becomes amalgamated or absorbed—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 11 (8), s. 60 (1).

Perpetuities—Rule against perpetuities—Gift to charity—On amalgamation gift over for purposes of charity or benevolence.

By a settlement dated Dec. 21, 1905, the trustees were directed to pay or distribute the annual income of the trust fund thereby constituted to or between the several charities mentioned in the schedule thereto in the proportions there specified. By cl. 8, the settlement provided that in case at any time thereafter any of the charities "shall cease to exist or shall become amalgamated with or absorbed in any other charity or institution . . . the trustees may in their discretion either pay or apply the share or proportion of the annual income of the trust fund which under the provisions hereof was for the time being payable to or for the benefit of the charity or institution so ceasing to exist or becoming amalgamated or absorbed as afore-said . . . to or for the benefit of the charity or institution with or in which the same shall have become amalgamated or been absorbed . . . or may apply such share or proportion of the annual income to or for such other objects or purposes of charity or benevolence or amelioration of human suffering or advancement of knowledge as the trustees shall in their opinion consider to be most in accordance with the original desire and intention of the settlor." Included in the list of charities in the schedule were two hospitals, the London Hospital and the Poplar Hospital for Accidents, which were affected by the National Health Service Act, 1946. The London Hospital was, together with Queen Mary's Maternity Home, designated a teaching hospital under s. 11 (8) of the said Act. The Poplar Hospital for Accidents became one of a group of hospitals called, in the scheme which was approved by the Minister of Health under s. 11 (4), No. 8 Bow.

HELD: (i) having regard to the terms of s. 11 (8) the London Hospital had become amalgamated (within the meaning of cl. 8) with Queen Mary's Maternity Home, but the Poplar Hospital for Accidents was only associated with other hospitals of No. 8 Bow group for the purposes of management and administration, and that did not constitute amalgamation within cl. 8.

(ii) section 60 (1) of the Act of 1946 did not preclude the operation of cl. 8 of the settlement, for the sub-section was designed merely to ensure that funds applicable to a hospital before the operation of the Act should continue to be so applicable thereafter, and was not intended to deal with a case in which, under the trusts of the trust instrument itself, the funds were diverted.

(iii) clause 8 would, however, on its true construction, enable funds to be paid to or applied for the benefit of non-charitable objects at any time in defeasance of the perpetual primary trust in favour of charities, and, therefore, it was void as transgressing the rule against perpetuities.

FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, s. 11, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 348; and for s. 60, see ibid., p. 391.

Cases referred to:

(1) Ministry of Health v. Simpson, [1950] 2 All E.R. 1137; [1951] A.C. 251; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Re Peel's Release, [1921] 2 Ch. 218; 90 L.J.Ch. 369; 8 Digest 328, 1109.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of a settlement dated Dec. 21, 1905, and made between Edward George Bawden of the one part and trustees of the other part, and of the National Health Service Act, 1946, the share of the annual income of the trust fund subject to the trusts of the said settlement which before July 5, 1948, was payable to or for the benefit of the London Hospital, Whitechapel, E., had been since the said date and was (a) payable to the first defendants, the board of governors of the London Hospital, or (b) payable or applicable according to the trusts declared in cl. 8 of the settlement to or between the charities, institutions, objects or purposes in such clause referred to, or (c) held on a resulting trust for the estate of the settlor, the said Edward George Bawden (since deceased), on the footing that the trusts declared in the said cl. 8 were void, or (d) held on any other and what trusts. Similar questions were raised by the summons in relation to the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) of Fulham Road, Brompton, S.W., and the Poplar Hospital for Accidents.

H. E. Francis for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the settlement.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and J. A. Armstrong, and V. M. C. Pennington, Raymond Walton, McMullen, J. A. Wolfe and N. S. S. Warren for various defendants.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The questions which I have to decide in this case arise in regard to the trusts of a settlement dated Dec. 21, 1905, of a fund amounting to some £100,000, and at the present time of a value of over £114,000. The deed is obviously one over which a great deal of care has been taken, but, unfortunately, the result is not entirely happy. It was a settlement made by a Mr. Edward George Bawden, and there are three trustees named in the deed. The personal representatives by representation of Mr. Bawden are parties to this summons, and claim that in the result there is a resulting trust in their favour.

The deed begins with certain recitals apparently expressing the intention of the settlor:

"Whereas the settlor for the purposes of charity and benevolence and the advancement of knowledge especially in aid of human suffering is desirous of creating a trust fund the annual income whereof is to be applied for the benefit of such charities and institutions . . ."

It is a curious feature of this deed that the words "charities and institutions" are used in a number of places as though they were two different things. Whether that was really intended or not, I do not know, and fortunately, at any rate for the purposes of this case, it does not matter. The recital continues:

"and in such proportions and manner as hereinafter appears and with that intent has transferred into the names of the present trustees the investments specified in sched. I hereto."

The second recital reads:

"And whereas for the purpose of the distribution of the annual income of the trust fund intended to be hereby constituted but for no other purpose the settlor is desirous that the said capital sum of £100,000 shall subject as hereinafter mentioned be considered as appropriated to or for the benefit of the respective charities and institutions mentioned in sched. II hereto in the respective proportions specified in the same schedule . . ."

I pause, again, to observe that that seems to indicate a desire that, unless something happens to upset that result, the proportions of the income of the sum are to be appropriated to the different bodies mentioned in the schedule. The recital continues:

"it being the desire and intention of the settlor that each of the said respective charities and institutions shall so long as it shall continue an existing charity or institution and shall not attempt to alienate charge or anticipate its proportion of the income of the trust fund receive such proportion of the total annual income of the said trust fund from time to time distributable between the said respective charities and institutions as the capital sum appropriated to such charity or institution as mentioned in the said sched. II hereto bears to the said total capital sum of £100,000."

A After certain administrative provisions with which I need not concern myself, the important clauses in the operative part of the deed are cl. 4 and cl. 8. Clause 4 is in these terms:

B "The trustees shall subject as hereinafter mentioned pay or distribute the annual income of the trust fund to or between the several charities and institutions mentioned in sched. II hereto in the shares and proportions which the capital sums appropriated to such charities and institutions respectively as mentioned in the said schedule respectively bear to the total capital sum of £100,000 at such times in the year as to the trustees shall appear most suitable and convenient but so that such payment or distribution shall not in the case of any charity or institution be made less often than half-yearly. And all payments made by the trustees to or for C for the benefit of any charity or institution shall be made to the treasurer for the time being of such charity or institution or such person as shall from time to time be nominated in writing to receive the same by the governing body of such charity or institution as defined in cl. 1 of sched. III hereto."

D The clause further provides that the receipt of the treasurer or person nominated is to be a good receipt, and then there is a proviso that the trustees are not bound to pay out in excess of income at the rate of four per cent. on the proportions of the shares in question. There are provisions as to the application of any surplus.

It is plain that, though they may be referring to other clauses, in cl. 4 the words "subject as hereinafter mentioned" refer to cl. 8. Clause 8 is in the following words:

E "In case at any time hereafter any of the charities and institutions mentioned in sched. II hereto or any other charity or institution which shall under the provisions herein contained hereafter become entitled to participate under the trust hereby constituted shall attempt to alienate charge or anticipate its share or proportion of the annual income of the trust fund or shall cease to exist or shall become amalgamated with or F absorbed in any other charity or institution (whether mentioned in sched. II hereto or not) the trustees may in their discretion either pay or apply the share or proportion of the annual income of the trust fund which under the provisions hereof was for the time being payable to or for the benefit of the charity or institution so ceasing to exist or becoming amalgamated or absorbed as aforesaid as follows (that is to say) in the case of a charity G or institution becoming amalgamated or absorbed as aforesaid to or for the benefit of the charity or institution with or in which the same shall have become amalgamated or been absorbed or as well in the case of any charity or institution so becoming amalgamated or absorbed as in the case of any charity or institution attempting to alienate charge or anticipate its share or proportion of the annual income of the trust fund or H ceasing to exist as aforesaid to or between or for the benefit of such one or more of the other charities and institutions mentioned in the said sched. II hereto or any other charity or institution or charities or institutions for the time being entitled to participate under the trust hereby constituted and in such shares and proportions as the trustees shall think proper or may apply such share or proportion of annual income to or for such other objects or purposes of charity or benevolence or amelioration of human suffering or advancement of knowledge as the trustees shall in their opinion consider to be most in accordance with the original desire and intention of the settlor."

There is a large number of bodies whose names appear in sched. II, and it appears that they are all of them charitable in nature, notwithstanding that the deed refers constantly to them as charities or institutions. There are certain hospitals included in the list, and in particular there is the London Hospital, Whitechapel, E., the Poplar Hospital for Accidents, 303, East India Dock Road, E., and the Cancer Hospital (Free), Fulham Road, Brompton, S.W. The questions which I have to decide arise because of the effect of the National Health Service Act, 1946, which came into operation on the appointed day for the purposes of that Act, July 5, 1948. Certain things were done by that Act or pursuant to its provisions, which affected these three hospitals, or may have affected them. In the case of the Cancer Hospital, an order was made which merely continued the Cancer Hospital as a teaching hospital, but not in association with any other previous hospital, and consequently it is clear that in the case of the Cancer Hospital no question of amalgamation really arises. That was admitted in the course of the case, and, therefore, although a question was raised in regard to the Cancer Hospital in the summons, it is not necessary for me to consider the matter any further. Two questions arise in regard to the London Hospital and in regard to the Poplar Hospital for Accidents.

I will take first the London Hospital, which, under the terms of the National Health Service Act, 1946, was made a teaching hospital, and consequently was dealt with in a different way from those hospitals the property of which vested in the Minister and which were not treated in the same way as teaching hospitals. For the purposes which I have to consider, primarily, at any rate, the relevant provisions of the Act are to be found in s. 11 (8). That sub-section provides:

"The Minister may, after consultation with the university concerned, by order designate as a teaching hospital any hospital or group of hospitals which appears to him to provide for any university facilities for undergraduate or post-graduate clinical teaching, and the Minister shall, in the case of any hospital or group so designated, by order constitute, in accordance with Part III of sched. III to this Act, a board of governors for the purpose of exercising functions with respect to the administration of that hospital or group; and any group of hospitals so designated shall, as from the appointed day or the date of the designation (whichever last occurs), be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be a single hospital."

By the National Health Service (Designation of Teaching Hospitals (No. 2)) Order, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 979), and made pursuant to the provisions of that s. 11 (8), it was provided by para. 2:

"Each of the hospitals or groups of hospitals set out in the second column of the schedule hereto is hereby designated as a teaching hospital and shall be known by the name inserted in the first column of the schedule opposite thereto."

Referring to the schedule, I find that the second group is described as "the London Hospital", and the hospital or group of hospitals which are designated as a teaching hospital in the right-hand column are these:

"The London Hospital, E.1 (including the Croft Home, Reigate, the Marie Celeste Annexe, Reigate, the Zachary Merton Annexe, Banstead, the London Hospital Annexe, Brentwood, and the Herman de Stern Convalescent Home, Felixstowe)."

They are all in one paragraph, and as a matter of fact all those mentioned in parentheses were really small branches of the London Hospital before these recent events. Then, secondly, I find mentioned Queen Mary's Maternity Home, Hampstead, N.W.3. It seems to me the result of that order is that the London Hospital and Queen Mary's Maternity Home are designated as one teaching hospital—"a teaching hospital", as the order says—and, accordingly, that they form one hospital between them. Indeed, as expressed in s. 11 (8) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, there has been an amalgamation in the case of the London Hospital with Queen Mary's Maternity Home. Therefore, it seems to me that one of the events mentioned in cl. 8 of the deed has come into operation in the case of the London Hospital.

A In the case of the Poplar Hospital for Accidents, the matter is somewhat different, because it is not a teaching hospital under the new scheme, and different provisions of s. 11 apply in consequence. For instance, s. 11 provides:

B " (3) Every regional hospital board shall, within such period as the Minister may by direction specify, submit to the Minister a scheme for the appointment by them of committees, to be called hospital management committees, for the purpose of exercising functions with respect to the management and control of individual hospitals or groups of hospitals, other than teaching hospitals, providing hospital and specialist services in the area of the board. (4) The Minister may approve, with or without modifications, which may include additions or exceptions, any scheme submitted to him by a regional hospital board under the last foregoing sub-section, and it shall be the duty of the board to give effect to the scheme as approved by the Minister. (5) A regional hospital board may at any time, and if directed by the Minister shall within such period as may be specified in the direction, submit a new scheme providing for the modification of the scheme in force under this section, and the last foregoing sub-section shall apply to any such new scheme. (6) A hospital management committee shall be constituted in accordance with Part II of sched. III to this Act."

E It is to be observed, and it is very striking, that there is nothing whatever in those sub-sections corresponding to the provisions to be found in sub-s. (8), that any group so constituted under a scheme shall "be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be a single hospital"; indeed, there is not a word of any kind on that point at all. In the present case, a hospital management committee has been constituted in respect of a number of hospitals, and a scheme has been put forward which has received the approval of the Minister of Health, and, therefore, comes into effect. The scheme in question provides for a management committee of a certain character, and it deals with certain hospitals in a schedule.

F Nothing is very explicit in this scheme. On the point I have to consider, all it says in the schedule under the heading "Number and name of group" is "Bow". Whether it is Bow Group or Bow Hospital that it is to be called, I do not know. Then the next column is headed "Name of Hospital", and I find, first, St. Andrew's, secondly, St. Clements, and thirdly, Poplar, which is, undoubtedly, the old Poplar Hospital for Accidents. They, therefore, are grouped together under the number and name, "No. 8 Bow", and the same appears in the letter of the Minister of Health approving the scheme. I find, therefore, that there is a group consisting of three hospitals, of which the Poplar Hospital is one, but I am unable to see that there is any amalgamation in the same sense that there has been in the case of the London Hospital and in the sense which,

G I think, should be applied to the word (albeit with no technical meaning) in the settlement of 1905 that I have to consider. Certainly Poplar Hospital is grouped with two other hospitals for the purposes of management and administration by the committee, but that, it seems to me, is the extent of the nexus between the three, and I do not find, therefore, that there has been an amalgamation in respect of the Poplar Hospital for the purposes of the settlement of 1905. Consequently, so far as the Poplar Hospital is concerned, it is unnecessary to consider the matter any further.

H

In the case of the London Hospital there are questions to consider. Is the share of that hospital taken away, or may it be taken away, under the discretionary power by the trustees, and is such a trust, if it is intended to operate, valid and effectual?

I propose to dispose, first, of one argument which was put up (not, indeed, on behalf of the London Hospital, but by counsel for the Poplar Hospital), viz., that the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 60, overrode any provisions of the trust which would divert the funds in the events which have happened and would require the funds in question to be paid to the hospital management committee.

Section 60 provides:

"(1) Where property, other than property transferred to the Minister or to the board of governors of a teaching hospital or to a hospital management committee under s. 6 or s. 7 of this Act, is held on trust immediately before the appointed day . . ."

Pausing there for a moment, the property subject to the trusts of the settlement would come within that description of property which is not transferred to the Minister, because under the somewhat peculiar provisions in respect of an endowment fund in s. 7 (10) of the Act of 1946, if the property in question is not held "by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital", it is not vested in the Minister, and, therefore, comes within s. 60. In the case of the trust deed, the property is held on trust for a number of charities including this hospital, and, therefore, it does not fall within s. 7 (10), and is dealt with by s. 60, if it is within that section. Section 60 continues:

" . . . and the terms of the trust instrument authorise or require the trustees, whether immediately or in the future, to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies, the trust instrument shall be construed as authorising or, as the case may be, requiring the trustees to apply the trust property, to the like extent and at the like times, for the purpose of making payments, whether of capital or income—(a) in the case of a hospital designated as a teaching hospital or included in a group of hospitals so designated, to the board of governors of that teaching hospital; (b) in the case of any other hospital, to the regional hospital board for the area in which the hospital is situated or to the hospital management committee for the hospital or for the group of hospitals in which it is comprised. (2) Any sums paid as aforesaid to any such board or committee shall, so far as practicable, be applied by them for the purposes specified in the trust instrument."

It has been argued that the result of this section is to prevent any gift over from the hospital for which the property was held from taking effect, and, therefore, that the provisions of the settlement of 1905 are overridden by the provisions of this section. It would be a very strong thing, I may observe in the first place, for an Act of Parliament to provide that a condition of defeasance on certain events shall not take effect, and if an Act of Parliament is so intended to operate, one would expect, and, indeed, require, to find express words having that result, but I do not think that it is the intention of this section to do anything of that kind. The object of the section is simply to provide that the funds applicable to a hospital shall continue to be so applicable after the operation of the National Health Service Act, 1946, and provides for the body which takes the place of the former hospital (in whichever class it may fall) continuing the services in question. Consequently, it has no operation where, in the event of the hospital, for instance, becoming amalgamated, the trust no longer requires or authorises the property to be applied for the purposes of that hospital at all. It seems to me, in consequence, that s. 60 has no operation whatever in the circumstances of this case as regards the London Hospital.

A I return to the provisions of the settlement of 1905. It is to be observed that in the event of amalgamation, amongst other things, certain trusts are to come into operation. The discretionary trust created in the trustees enables them to apply the income of the share which the charity formerly obtained before amalgamation either to the same charity in its amalgamated situation, or to some other charity which is within the purposes of the settlement, or it may be applied—this is, of course, the fatal provision—not only for the purposes of charity, benevolence, the amelioration of human suffering, and the advancement of knowledge, but for such other objects or purposes of charity as the trustees think fit. It is, therefore, a trust which is not only for charitable purposes, but quite definitely (in view of the number of decisions of the court culminating in Ministry of Health v. Simpson (1) also for non-charitable purposes. The trustees have liberty to apply the income either to charity or not to charity, and in those circumstances the trust is not effective under the rules of our law. It may be it is void for uncertainty, but it seems to me also, in the events that have happened in this case, it is void under the rules against perpetuities.

B
C It was argued that the trust was saved by the final words of cl. 8, viz.: “as the trustees shall, in their opinion, consider to be most in accordance with the original desire and intention of the settlor.” Now the trustees, in my opinion, can only discover what the original desire and intention of the settlor was by looking at the recitals to the settlement. We find at the very beginning that the settlor enumerates the purposes which he has in mind, viz., “charity and benevolence and the advancement of knowledge especially in aid of human suffering.” So he has enumerated three purposes, any one of which is the purpose which he wishes to advance, and one of those purposes is “benevolence”. Benevolence is not a charitable purpose. So that reference back under the final provision of cl. 8 carries the matter no further at all.

D
E In some cases, a gift to a charitable purpose is limited in time, and in others a perpetual charitable purpose may be cut short by a defeasance provision contained in the trusts. It seems to me that, notwithstanding the words, “subject as hereinafter mentioned,” in cl. 4, the trusts which are contained in cl. 4 of the settlement are unlimited in time so far as that clause is concerned, and cl. 8, as it seems to me, contains what is plainly a defeasance clause, cutting short the trusts which would under the provisions of cl. 4 continue indefinitely. Therefore, there is a trust which may come into being in favour of a non-charitable purpose, amongst others, which need not come into being within the time allowed in the rule against perpetuities. Therefore, the trust is void under the rule against perpetuities, as was held in Re Peel's Release (2). The result of the defeasance clause being inoperative by virtue of the rule against perpetuities is that the original trust remains unimpaired, which was also the case in Re Peel's Release (2).

F
G Consequently, in the present case the original trust in respect of the share of the income payable to the London Hospital remains unaffected under the provisions of cl. 8, and continues in favour of the purpose for which it was intended, and, therefore, operates in favour of the purposes of the body at present carrying on the medical teaching work at the London Hospital.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Bircham & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Hanbury, Whitting & Ingle; Farrer & Co.; E. F. Turner & Sons; Boyce, Evans & Sheppard; and Farman, Daniell & Co. (for various defendants); Treasury Solicitor.

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re HAYES' WILL TRUSTS. DOBIE AND OTHERS v. BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE NATIONAL HOSPITAL AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), October 16, 20, 21, 22, 1953.]

National Health Service—Hospital—Legacy to hospital—Discretion to trustees to divert gift if impracticable or inequitable in consequence of amalgamation—Effect of National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81).

By his will dated Sept. 28, 1938, a testator, who died on Nov. 13, 1940, bequeathed £80,000 to his trustees on trust for his wife during widowhood and subject thereto he directed that the legacy should fall into his residuary estate. He devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to his trustees on the usual trusts for sale and conversion, gave administrative directions as to the payments to be made thereout, and directed his trustees to divide the residue among such of twenty-nine charitable institutions which he named (and which included hospitals which were affected by the National Health Service Act, 1946), as should be in existence at his death, but so that any sum or property which under the terms of his will should fall into the residue after his death should be divided equally between such of the said institutions as should be in existence at the date when the same fell in. By the next following clause of his will, cl. 11, the testator provided: "And I expressly declare that my trustees may if they in their uncontrolled discretion think fit exclude any one or more of such institutions from sharing in the residuary trust funds or in any sum or property falling into the residuary trust funds under the terms of this my will or any codicil hereto after my death if in the opinion of my trustees it shall be impracticable or inequitable that such institution or institutions should so share in consequence of such institution or institutions having before my death or before such sum or property falls in as aforesaid as the case may be become amalgamated with some other institution or institutions with power for my trustees at their absolute discretion in the case of any such amalgamation to pay or hand over the share of the residuary trust funds or of such sum or property falling in as aforesaid by this my will given to any institution to the institution or institutions with which the same shall have become amalgamated." On Mar. 19, 1949, the testator's widow died without having re-married. The trustees wished to exercise their power under cl. 11 to exclude hospitals taken over by the State under the National Health Service Act, 1946.

HELD: no amalgamation had occurred by virtue of the National Health Service Act, 1946, so as to render it "impracticable" or "inequitable" that any hospital taken over by the State should benefit, and, therefore, the trustees had no power under cl. 11 to exclude those hospitals from participation.

FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 333.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Walker's Settlement, [1935] Ch. 567; 104 L.J.Ch. 274; 153 L.T. 66; Digest Supp.
- (2) Wall v. London & Northern Assets Corpn., [1898] 2 Ch. 469; 67 L.J.Ch. 596; 79 L.T. 249; 10 Digest 1019, 7076.
- (3) Re Bawden's Settlement, ante, p. 1235.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (inter alia) whether the institutions or any of them, named in cl. 10 of the will of George Whitley Hayes, deceased, were on the death of the testator's widow in existence within the meaning of cl. 10 of the will and whether on the death of the testator's widow all or any and if so which of them had become amalgamated with some other institution or institutions within the meaning of cl. 11 of the testator's will.

By his will dated Sept. 28, 1938, George Whitley Hayes bequeathed £80,000 free of duty to his trustees on trust to pay the income therefrom to his wife, Eva Geraldine Hayes, during widowhood, and directed that subject thereto the legacy should sink into and form part of the testator's residuary estate. By cl. 10 the testator bequeathed his residue on trust to be divided and distributed between such of twenty-nine institutions, which the testator named, as should be in existence at his death but so that any sum or property which under the will fell into the residuary trust funds should be divided equally between such of the institutions as should be in existence at the date when the same fell in. By cl. 11, the trustees were given an uncontrolled discretion to exclude any one or more of such institutions from participation if, in the opinion of the trustees, it should be "impracticable or inequitable" that such institution or institutions should so share in consequence of having become "amalgamated with some other institution or institutions" in which case the trustees had absolute discretion to pay the share given under the will to the institution with which the same should have become amalgamated. On Nov. 13, 1940, the testator died and on Mar. 19, 1949, his widow died without having re-married. VAISEY, J., held that all the named charitable institutions were in existence at the date of the testator's death and at the date of the death of his widow, and the further question arose as to those charitable institutions which were hospitals whether, having regard especially to the National Health Service Act, 1946, any or all of them had become amalgamated with some other institution or institutions within the meaning of cl. 11 of the will of the testator.

After the summons was issued, two of the three trustees of the will died.

Harold Christie, Q.C., and Droop for the sole surviving trustee.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and H. E. Francis, J. G. Strangman, Q.C., and McMullen, Peter Foster, Winterbotham, J. A. Brightman, V. M. C. Pennington, and F. B. Marsh, for various charitable institutions.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

VAISEY, J.: This is a summons raising questions on the true construction of the will of the late Mr. George Whitley Hayes, which is dated Sept. 28, 1938. The date is important, and I emphasise it. The testator died on Nov. 13, 1940, and on Feb. 25, 1941, his will was proved in the Chester District Registry. The estate was a very large one, the net value being approximately £207,000. The testator appointed as his trustees three persons, Mr. Douglas Dobie, a solicitor of Chester, his (the testator's) nephew, William Warburton Hayes, and his cousin, John Higson Hayes, and they are defined in the will by the description "my trustees". The will was proved by those three executors and trustees, but only one of them is now alive, viz., Mr. John Higson Hayes, the sole surviving plaintiff in these proceedings. On Feb. 10, 1953, Mr. Dobie, the solicitor, died, being then aged ninety-one years, and Mr. William Warburton Hayes died a month afterwards, i.e., on Mar. 11, 1953, as the result of a motoring accident.

By his will, the testator bequeathed to his trustees £80,000, free of duty.

"Upon trust that they shall invest the same in any of the investments authorised by law for the investment of trust funds with liberty to vary the investments thereof from time to time and shall stand possessed of the said sum of £80,000 and the investments for the time being representing the same (hereinafter called 'the wife's trust legacy') upon the trusts following that is to say upon trust that my trustees shall during the life of my wife and so long as she remains my widow at their absolute discretion pay or apply the whole or any part of the income of the wife's trust legacy or if they shall from time to time think fit any part of the capital thereof to or for the maintenance and personal support or benefit of my wife . . . and subject to the foregoing trust the wife's trust legacy or such part thereof as shall not be applied under the foregoing trust and so much of the income thereof as in the opinion of my trustees shall not be required for the purposes aforesaid shall sink into and form part of my residuary estate."

The testator's wife survived the testator and died on Mar. 19, 1949, without having re-married.

By cl. 10 of his will the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate not by the will otherwise disposed of

"unto my trustees upon trust that my trustees shall . . . sell call in and convert into money the same or such parts thereof as shall not consist of money and shall with and out of the moneys produced by such sale calling in and conversion and with and out of my ready money pay my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and pay or retain the legacies bequeathed by this my will . . . and shall stand possessed of the residue of the said moneys and of any part of my estate retained unconverted and of the investments for the time being representing the same (hereinafter called 'the residuary trust funds') In trust to divide and distribute the same equally between and amongst such of the charitable or other institutions hereinafter named as shall be in existence at my death but so that any sum or property which under the terms of this my will or any codicil hereto falls into the residuary trust funds after my death shall be divided equally between such of the said institutions as shall be in existence at the date when the same falls in as aforesaid . . ."

Then the testator names twenty-nine charitable institutions. I think there can be no doubt that every one of them is a charitable institution, although the testator described them as being "charitable or other institutions". The testator declared that the receipts of the treasurers of the said institutions should be sufficient discharges to his trustees.

The wife being dead, the question was raised whether these twenty-nine institutions were in existence at the testator's death and the widow's death. I have answered that question in the affirmative, so far as it is necessary to answer it. Now we come to a clause of an extremely ambiguous nature, cl. 11. It is almost impossible to ascertain what the testator had in his mind when he wrote it. As the testator died in 1938, he cannot have had in his mind the National Health Service Act, 1946. The arguments in the case have turned almost exclusively on the effect of that Act, but the operations which were carried out by the National Health Service Act, 1946, were not regarded as imminent in 1938, and, in fact, I doubt whether they were discussed at all. The National Health Service Act, 1946, was largely prompted by, and originated from, what is known as the Beveridge Report, which resulted from an inquiry which took place during the war of 1939-45. The will provides by cl. 11:

"And I expressly declare that my trustees may if they in their uncontrolled discretion think fit exclude any one or more of such institutions from sharing in the residuary trust funds or in any sum or property falling into the residuary trust funds under the terms of this my will or any codicil hereto after my death if in the opinion of my trustees it shall be impracticable or inequitable that such institution or institutions should so share in consequence of such institution or institutions having before my death or before such sum or property falls in as aforesaid as the case may be become amalgamated with some other institution or institutions with power for my trustees at their absolute discretion in the case of any such amalgamation to pay or hand over the share of the residuary trust funds or of such sum or property falling in as aforesaid by this my will given to any institution to the institution or institutions with which the same shall have become amalgamated."

Then he repeats:

"And I declare that the receipt of the treasurer or other proper officer of any such institution shall be a good and sufficient discharge to my trustees."

I think the words "of any such institution" must mean some institution with which the first-named institution shall be amalgamated.

A When the words of this clause are examined, they seem to me to be not far short of unintelligible. The trustees have to form an "opinion" that the sharing of a particular institution in the testator's residue is either impracticable or inequitable. What does "impracticable" mean? It means that something cannot be done. I looked at the OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY and I do not think it throws very much light on the question. I looked at the well known CHAMBERS' TWENTIETH CENTURY DICTIONARY, and "impracticable" is defined as: "Not able to be done; unmanageable; stubborn". "Unmanageable" and "stubborn" do not come in here, so we are left with "not able to be done". What does "inequitable" mean? Again I refer to the latter dictionary, and the only definition given for that word is: "Unfair; unjust". In this court the word "equitable" is a word of the highest importance. The word "inequitable", which is the contrary of it, is that against which this court, by its ancient constitution, and, I hope, by its application of legal principles, is bound to strive. The trustees here have to form an opinion that something is "impracticable", i.e., it cannot be done, or is "inequitable", in the sense of being unfair or unjust. It is difficult to see how they can ever form such an opinion, because they cannot simply say: "We think this is impracticable" and snap their fingers at the court, saying that they have arrived at that agreement and that it is not for the court to cross-examine them on it. It is difficult also to see how they can form the opinion that anything is unjust or unfair, and that it is not for the court to ask them why. I think there has to be some ground or reason in the matter, and the preliminary is that the trustees should form an opinion that the participation of a particular charitable institution would be either impossible, or that such participation would be unjust and unfair. But, furthermore, it has to be impracticable or inequitable in consequence of an institution, having before the death or before the property falls in, become amalgamated with another institution or institutions. The trustees have to take the view that the institution has become amalgamated, and that the result is to make it either impracticable or inequitable that it should share in the testator's estate.

F The whole of the argument has centred round the National Health Service Act, 1946, and it is said that the status of the hospitals which are among these twenty-nine charities has been so changed by way of amalgamation, that it is no longer possible and no longer fair that the hospitals should share in the testator's estate. Very little argument was addressed to me on practicability, but a great deal of argument was addressed to me on the question of want of equity.

G It has been held in certain cases* to which I need not refer that a hospital affected by the Act is still a charity, and is still capable of being benefited as a charity. I cannot see how, disregarding all the other difficulties of cl. 11, it could possibly be inequitable, i.e., unfair or unjust, for an executor to assist in the carrying out of the statutory obligations. Occasionally—perhaps all too rarely—wealthy testators have bequeathed their fortunes to the relief of the National Debt, and I cannot see how anybody could say that such a gift is inequitable. I should have thought that it is praiseworthy and perfectly fair and just, according to the ordinary usage of the English language, and a nationalised hospital is just as much a charity and an object of bounty as it was before it was nationalised. If the testator had said: "In the event of an institution having before my death been taken over by the State, or become nationalised", or something of that kind, a very different position would have arisen. But I cannot see how a man accustomed to the use of the English language, and applying his mind to this as a matter of serious consideration, could possibly say that any kind of amalgamation effected by the National Health Service Act, 1946, has made it either "impracticable" or "inequitable" that a nationalised hospital should share in the testator's bounty. The gift under cl. 10 is clear, and cl. 11 purports to stultify certain parts of it, by giving to the trustees the power of excluding a named charity from the testator's bounty. Unless I can be reasonably certain as to the meaning of cl. 11, I ought to leave the preceding gift unqualified. My view is that there has been no amalgamation of such a kind as to produce consequences of impracticability or inequity, and I think that is an end of the case.

* See, for instance, Re Frere, [1950] 2 All E.R. 513; Re Little, p. 852 ante.

I now turn to a very curious situation which arises in this case. These trustees were, one would have thought, entrusted with the most embarrassing, invidious and difficult task, but they are not only submitting to carrying it out if the court thought fit, but they are, with a very great amount of vigour and pertinacity, pressing me to say that this power is vested in them, or was vested in them, and is now vested in the sole survivor. They explain in an affidavit that they are anxious to have what I have described as this embarrassing, invidious and difficult task laid on them, because they would wish to exercise that power of exclusion in respect of any of the institutions which have been taken over by the State. They say that they take up that position because they are satisfied that the testator would have wished them to do so. How they can know that at this time of day, I do not know. The testator cannot have said anything in his lifetime to the effect that if there were a national health service, he would require his trustees to take that course, but these trustees are saying that they are "satisfied", not merely that they are inclined to think, that he would have wished them to do it.

I do not think that that is a proper consideration, except, possibly, as one of a number of considerations, which ought to influence the trustees if they have that power. Realising that, the trustees, in a later affidavit, say, in reference to the first affidavit:

"We were at the date of that affidavit and are of opinion that it will be inequitable that any institution which at the death of the testator's widow had become amalgamated with another or others in circumstances in which on and from the amalgamation the amalgamated institution became maintainable by the State should share in the legacy of £80,000 which the testator bequeathed to be divided equally between institutions which at the date of his said will and death relied on voluntary contributions for their support. We are, however, advised that whether the effect of the National Health Service Act, 1946, on all or any of the institutions referred to in para. 1 of the originating summons herein is such as to make the discretionary power of exclusion conferred by cl. 11 exercisable as regards such institutions or any of them is a question of law depending on the construction of the testator's will and the effect of the provisions of the said Act upon such institutions respectively."

So they realise that they have given a very strange reason for wanting to exercise this power, viz., because they are satisfied that the testator would have wished it. They now put it on a different ground, viz., that they do not like the idea of money going to the nationalised hospitals, and that they want to exclude them as far as they can. It was suggested to me—and I must say that I was somewhat influenced by it—that having regard to the reasons which they have given, the disclosure which they have made as to their mental state, and considering this very important and fiduciary power, if power it is, they ought to be, or the survivor ought to be, in some way controlled and that he should not simply be allowed to say: "I know the testator would have wished it, and I approve also, so I cut all these hospitals out". At any rate, as I think they have no such power, and the clause is not one which operates at all, it is not necessary for me to say any more about that. I have throughout this case been a little surprised that the trustees should have actively pressed to be entrusted with this difficult task, and I am very glad to feel myself, not entitled, but obliged, to relieve them of any embarrassment in that regard.

We have had, of course, to consider the meaning of the word "amalgamation". The meaning of that word has been considered in Re Walker's Settlement (1) in which ROMER, L.J., quotes the definition found in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 11th ed., at p. 487. ROMER, L.J., says ([1935] Ch. 583):

"It is a definition which, so far as it is a definition, I should like to adopt as my own; it is there stated as follows: 'The word "amalgamation" has no definite legal meaning. It contemplates a state of things under which two companies are so joined as to form a third entity, or one company is absorbed into and blended with another company'."

That is further emphasised by a quotation (ibid., 580) by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., of a statement of CHITTY, L.J., who said in Wall v. London & Northern Assets Corpn. (2) ([1898] 2 Ch. 481):

"I agree that the term has no fixed meaning in point of law. You have to see how the term is used in the particular document that has to be construed."

One has to see how the word "amalgamation" was used in this particular document, and, as I have pointed out, it has to be an amalgamation of such a character as to have the consequence of raising a case of impracticability and inequity. In my judgment, in this context, there has been no amalgamation either under the National Health Service Act, 1946, or in any other manner so as to have that consequence.

A decision of DANCKWERTS, J., in Re Bawden's Settlement (3), was brought to my attention. DANCKWERTS, J., had to consider this question of amalgamation, and the relevant words were:

"In case at any time hereafter any of the charities and institutions . . . shall attempt to alienate charge or anticipate its share or proportion of the annual income of the trust fund or shall cease to exist or shall become amalgamated with or absorbed in any other charity or institution . . .", then certain consequences might follow. I have read the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J., and also the actual order which was made. If I had had to construe words so unqualified as those in Re Bawden's Settlement (3), I should, undoubtedly, without hesitation have followed that decision. But the words which I have to construe are very different, and I do not think that Re Bawden's Settlement (3) has helped me.

Apart from the National Health Service Act, 1946, I have also considered a private Act called the Queen Elizabeth Hospital for Children Act, 1942 (5 & 6 Geo. 6, c. vii). Under that Act, certain hospitals were amalgamated, but my conclusion is that neither under the National Health Service Act, 1946, nor under that private Act has there been, or was there at the date of the death of the testator's widow, which is the relevant date, any amalgamation in the sense envisaged in cl. 11 in the case of any of the institutions mentioned in cl. 10.

Declaration that none of the institutions named in cl. 10 of the will had become amalgamated with any other institution within the meaning of cl. 11, and that, accordingly, there was no power in the surviving plaintiff to exclude any of the said institutions from sharing in the legacy.

Solicitors: Rider, Heaton, Meredith & Mills, agents for Brown, Dobie & Rogers, Chester (for the trustee); Linklaters & Paines; Waterhouse & Co.; Farrer & Co.; Trower, Still & Keeling; Boyce, Evans & Sheppard; and Hanbury, Whitting & Ingle (for the defendants); Treasury Solicitor.

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

ROBERTS v. ROBERTS.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Collingwood, J.), October 22, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance order—Discharge—Evidence of matters available at original hearing—Admissibility—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 7.

On Nov. 14, 1950, the wife obtained an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949. No allegation was then made by the husband that the wife had committed adultery. The husband now applied under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 7, for the discharge of that order on the ground that the wife had committed adultery. In support of his application the husband stated that when he went home after demobilisation in 1945 he saw and heard certain things as a result of which he was satisfied that the wife had been living in the matrimonial home with a certain man; that since Nov. 14, 1950, the man had continued to live in the same house as the wife; and that on an occasion since Nov. 14, 1950, the husband had accused the wife, in the presence of a witness, of living with, and being kept by, this man, and the wife, as she now admitted, had stood by and not denied this. It was contended by the wife that, by s. 7, the act of adultery on which the husband sought to rely could be proved only by evidence of matters which had occurred since Nov. 14, 1950.

HELD: although the words "upon fresh evidence" appeared in the first part of s. 7, they did not appear in, and were not to be read into, the second part of s. 7 under which the husband's application was made; accordingly, the husband's evidence of matters which had occurred prior to the original hearing, although not given at that hearing, was, nevertheless, admissible on the application to discharge the original order; on the facts the husband had proved his case; and, since the second part of s. 7 was mandatory in its terms, the order of Nov. 14, 1950, would be discharged.

Ramsdale v. Ramsdale (1945) (173 L.T. 393), applied.

AS TO THE DISCHARGE ON PROOF OF ADULTERY OF AN ORDER MADE UNDER THE SUMMARY JURISDICTION (SEPARATION AND MAINTENANCE) ACTS, 1895 to 1949, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 841, para. 1343; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 724-726, Nos. 6922-6932.

FOR THE SUMMARY JURISDICTION (MARRIED WOMEN) ACT, 1895, s. 7, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 852.

Case referred to:

- (1) Ramsdale v. Ramsdale, (1945), 173 L.T. 393; 109 J.P. 239; 27 Digest, Replacement, 725, 6931.

APPEAL by the wife against an order of the Liverpool city justices dated Feb. 2, 1953.

On Nov. 14, 1950, the justices made an order in favour of the wife under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, on the ground that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her. On Feb. 2, 1953, on the husband's application, the justices found that the wife had committed adultery and by virtue of s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, they discharged the order of Nov. 14, 1950. The wife appealed.

Nance for the wife.

Pain for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: It is clear that at the time of the making of the original order on Nov. 14, 1950, the husband had knowledge of his wife's association with a particular man. It is clear, also, that he believed that that knowledge was sufficient to prove adultery, and that he did not raise that issue at the time of the making of the order. If he had done so, and if the justices had found that the association with this man was and had been an adulterous association, they would have had no jurisdiction to make the order in favour of the wife, because the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 6, provides that:

A "No orders shall be made under this Act on the application of a married woman if it shall be proved that such married woman has committed an act of adultery: Provided that the husband has not condoned, or connived at, or by his wilful neglect or misconduct condoned to such act of adultery."

B In other words, on Nov. 14, 1950, the husband stood by and allowed the order to be made without raising that issue. Manifestly, if, after that, he had applied for leave to appeal out of time against that order, he would have been confronted by that very difficulty, that he had stood by. It is not necessary to decide what would have happened. He is to be assumed, for the purposes of this case, to have known all that it was relevant for him to know at the time the original order was made.

C The present application is made under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 7. There are two parts of that section. The first provides that the court in which the original order was made,

D "... may, on the application of the married woman or of her husband, and upon cause being shown upon fresh evidence to the satisfaction of the court at any time, alter, vary, or discharge any [order made under the Act], and may upon any such application . . . increase or diminish the amount of any weekly payment ordered to be made . . ."

E provided that the limit, which is now £5, is not exceeded. By the Money Payments (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935, s. 9, in dealing solely with increase or diminution of the amount of a weekly payment, the words "upon fresh evidence", with their well-known significance, are no longer to apply. But those words continue to apply to any other attempt under s. 7 of the Act of 1895 to alter, vary, or discharge any order; and they mean, as has been said repeatedly, evidence of something which has happened since the former hearing, or has come to the knowledge of the party applying since the hearing, and could not by reasonable means have come to his knowledge before that time. In contrast with that part of the section, the concluding words of the section, under which this present application is made, read as follows:

F "If any married woman upon whose application an order shall have been made under this Act or the Acts mentioned in the schedule hereto . . . shall voluntarily resume cohabitation with her husband, or shall commit an act of adultery, such order shall upon proof thereof be discharged."

G In the first part of that section the jurisdiction of the justices is discretionary and permissive, whereas, in the second part, with which we are concerned, the making of the order of discharge is mandatory if either of two things is proved to have happened—either that since the making of the order the wife has resumed cohabitation with her husband, or that since the making of the order she has committed an act of adultery. It is plain that the act of adultery referred to must be one which has been committed since the making of the order, because it relates to the discharge of an order "which shall have been made" on the application of a wife.

H In this case the evidence adduced before the justices in support of the charge that the wife has, since the making of the order, committed an act of adultery, begins with the association between the wife and the man mentioned, of which the husband knew before the order was made on Nov. 14, 1950. His case was that when he was demobilised in 1945 and went home, he found a state of things prevailing which satisfied him that his wife was living in the matrimonial home with the man mentioned, and, without going into unnecessary detail, he gave evidence of circumstances tending to show that that was so. That evidence, which, as I have said, was available at the time of the first hearing, was given on the application to discharge the original order, but it was supplemented by the fact that from 1945 to that day the man in question had continued to live in the same house as the wife in circumstances which gave ample opportunity of indulging a guilty affection, if that existed between them. That part of the story could not have been told at the time of the first hearing, for it then lay in the future; but it was to the association as a whole that the husband asked the justices to look in deciding whether, within a short time of the hearing, even, it may be, on the night before the hearing, adultery was being committed by his wife with a man for whom it was alleged she had had a guilty affection even before the husband came home from the war in 1945. Further, the wife admitted that she had only obtained the order of Nov. 14, 1950, at the instance of the National Assistance Board, because she was drawing national assistance.

Since the making of that order she had tried to enforce payment by the husband of arrears, and on that occasion the husband had made some remark to her, in the presence of a nephew who was also living in the same house as the wife, that she had "a nerve" to try to enforce orders against him when she was living with, and being kept by, this other man. The evidence is, and it has been accepted, that she made no protest against that remark, and that the nephew said something to the effect that it was no business of his. In other words, for what it was worth, and in the circumstances, I think it was worth something. She stood by when, as she admitted to the justices, she knew that her husband was accusing her of continuing an adulterous association with this man, and made no attempt to deny it. We are faced with the argument that because the words "upon fresh evidence", with the implication which has been attached to them, are used in the first part of s. 7, they must be read and imported into the latter part of the section, with which we are dealing. We have asked in vain for any authority for that proposition. None has been forthcoming, in spite of the careful argument which has been addressed to us by counsel for the wife. Moreover, I doubt whether the draftsman would have been artistic if he had actually put the words into the second part of the section, because the very acts with which he is dealing (resuming cohabitation, and committing adultery, after an order), must, in the nature of things, have happened since the making of the order. What is really argued is that, the act of adultery on which it is sought to rely being itself a fresh act, it can only be proved by evidence of matters which have occurred since the making of the order. I am unable to accept that proposition, which, in my opinion, flies in the face of an authority by which we are bound: Ramsdale v. Ramsdale (1) (173 L.T. 393) where "[the wife] applied to the justices for an order on the ground of . . . her husband having deserted her, and an order was made in her favour on Mar. 11, 1942. In 1945 [the husband] applied to the justices to discharge the order, on the ground that since it was made [the wife] had been guilty of adultery. This charge was based, first on the suggestion that she was conducting, and indeed continuing, an adulterous association with a named man . . . Held, (1) it was clear that what the justices had to deal with was the question: Ay or no, had adultery been committed since the date of the making of the order? But that did not mean, and should not be taken to mean, that that excluded evidence of the nature of the association between [the wife] and the man named before the making of the order . . ."

That part of the headnote is taken from my own judgment (ibid., 394). In my opinion, a short passage from the judgment of WALLINGTON, J., puts the matter, if I may say so, so neatly, and in a way which so completely covers the case with which we are dealing, that I adopt it as part of my judgment in the present case. He said (ibid., 395):

A " . . . I do think it is desirable that emphasis should be placed upon the impossibility of dealing with a case of this kind, where the inference of adultery, if it is to be drawn at all, must depend upon proof of inclination and opportunity . . . unless the whole of the story is told almost from beginning to end. It is quite conceivable that you might have a case in which the whole of the evidence of inclination is founded upon facts that took place before the original hearing, and the whole of the evidence of opportunity is founded upon facts that are proved to have taken place after the original hearing, so that you get one half of the case before and the other half after the original hearing. Therefore it is obvious in a case of that sort that if you only have evidence of the facts that have taken place after the original hearing you could not hope to make out a proper case . . . "

B Although it is true that in this case there is some evidence of a guilty affection after the original hearing, and some evidence of opportunity before the original hearing, that passage, in my opinion, is decisive of the issue in this case. I think this appeal fails, and should be dismissed. ●

C COLLINGWOOD, J.: I agree. The issue here under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 7, is whether adultery has been committed since the order—not on any specific occasion, but at any time since D the order. Direct evidence of such adultery is not required in this more than in any other case. The question is: Can the commission of adultery be inferred from circumstances which lead to it, by fair inference, as a necessary conclusion? Those circumstances must include a large number of matters—familiarity, suspicious conduct, admissions and the like. But the inquiry covers the whole association between the wife and the particular man, as forming E the background against which the significance of their acts is to be judged. In my opinion, the order of the court does not and cannot be taken to create an oblivion of all that has gone before, and that is what we have been asked to say. In my opinion, this case is covered by Ramsdale v. Ramsdale (1). The quotation from the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P. (173 L.T. 394) and the part of the judgment (ibid., 395) of WALLINGTON, J., to which my Lord has F referred, entirely cover the facts in this case. I would only add that I share the difficulty of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in importing the requirement of fresh evidence into the final part of s. 7 of the Act of 1895 in regard to matters which, ex hypothesi, cannot take place until after the making of the order. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

G Solicitors: Dubovie, Freeman & Co., agents for A. D. Abrahamson & Co., Liverpool (for the wife); Helder, Roberts, Giles & Co., agents for John A. Behn, Twyford & Reece, Liverpool (for the husband).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re TIMSON (deceased). HARPER AND OTHERS v. TIMSON
AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), October 28, 29, 1953.]

Administration of Estates—Real estate—Liability for payment of legacies—Intention of testatrix—Gifts by will of pecuniary legacies and their gift to daughter of real estate and residue of personal estate (after “payment thereof” of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and death and legacy duties)—Substituted gift, by codicil, to daughter’s sons in event of daughter predeceasing testatrix—Real and personal estate treated in codicil as single entity—Daughter surviving testatrix—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (c. 23), s. 34 (3), sched. I, Part II, para. 2.

By her will, dated May 31, 1949, the testatrix appointed executors and trustees, and, after making bequests of specific articles and giving a number of pecuniary legacies, all free of duty, she declared: “I devise all my real estate and bequeath the residue of my personal estate unto my trustees upon trust (after payment thereof of my just debts funeral and testamentary expenses death and legacy duties) for my daughter . . .” By a codicil, dated Nov. 30, 1951, the testatrix declared that, in the event of the daughter predeceasing her, “I devise my . . . real estate and bequeath the residue of my personal estate unto my trustees” on trust for sale and conversion “and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of such sale calling in and conversion and of my ready money in trust after payment thereof of my just debts funeral and testamentary expenses death and legacy duties to divide the residue thereof equally between” the daughter’s two sons. The testatrix died on July 16, 1952. The daughter survived her. After the funeral expenses and debts had been paid and the specific legacies handed over, the assets, apart from the real estate, were insufficient to pay the pecuniary legacies. The daughter claimed that the legacies were payable only out of the personal estate and that the real estate passed to her intact.

HELD: by the codicil the testatrix showed that she regarded her estate as a single indivisible entity, and, therefore, she could not have intended in the will to keep the real estate as a separate item from the personalty; accordingly, in considering the payment of the pecuniary legacies she did not contemplate any differentiation between the realty and the personalty, nor did she contemplate that the real estate should go intact to the daughter; and, therefore, the pecuniary legacies were payable out of the whole estate, both real and personal.

Re Rowe ([1941] 2 All E.R. 330), distinguished.

AS TO LIABILITY OF REAL ESTATE FOR PAYMENT OF LEGACIES, see HALSBURY, Halsham Edn., Vol. 14, pp. 384-386, paras. 713-717; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 23, pp. 496, 497, Nos. 5621-5639.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Rowe, [1941] 2 All E.R. 330; [1941] Ch. 343; 110 L.J.Ch. 145; 165 L.T. 76; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Greville v. Broune, (1859), 7 H.L. Cas. 689; 34 L.T.O.S. 8; 11 E.R. 275; 44 Digest 576, 3942.
- (3) Withers v. Kennedy, (1833), 2 My. & K. 607; 3 L.J.Ch. 29; 39 E.R. 1076.
- (4) Re Thompson, [1936] 2 All E.R. 141; [1936] Ch. 676; 105 L.J.Ch. 289; 155 L.T. 474; Digest Supp.
- (5) Re Ridley, [1950] 2 All E.R. 1; [1950] Ch. 415; 2nd Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will of the testatrix, Amy Ellen Timson, were payable exclusively out of her personal estate or whether they were also payable out of her real estate.

The testatrix, after giving, free of duty, pecuniary legacies which amounted to about £300, devised and bequeathed all her real estate and the residue of her personal estate on trust ("after payment thereof" of her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and death and legacy duties) for her daughter, Mrs. Tait. After payment of the debts and funeral expenses, the assets, apart from the real property, were insufficient to pay the legacies. The daughter contended that she was entitled to the real property and that the legacies were payable only out of the personal estate.

Teague for the trustees.

A D. A. Shirley for the pecuniary legatees.

J. W. Mills for the daughter, the residuary legatee.

VAISEY, J.: This case raises a short, but not easy, question of construction. The testatrix, Mrs. Amy Ellen Timson, made her will on May 31, 1949, and thereby she appointed two persons, who are the plaintiffs in this action, to be executors and trustees. She then bequeathed, free of duty, certain specific legacies (e.g., a watch, a tea service, and pictures) and, also free of duty, a number of pecuniary legacies, mainly to grandchildren. She also bequeathed free of duty to a grand-daughter one hundred shares in a company. Then comes the final clause of the will, which is in these terms:

C "I devise all my real estate and bequeath the residue of my personal estate unto my trustees upon trust (after payment thereof of my just debts funeral and testamentary expenses death and legacy duties) for my daughter . . . Margaret Amy Lawson Tait for her own absolute use and benefit."

D By a codicil dated Nov. 30, 1951, the testatrix recited what she had done by the final clause of her will, quoting it with literal accuracy. She then declared:

E "... should my daughter . . . predecease me then I devise my said real estate and bequeath the residue of my personal estate unto my trustees upon trust—[for sale and conversion]—and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of such sale calling in and conversion and of my ready money in trust after payment thereof of my just debts funeral and testamentary expenses death and legacy duties to divide the residue thereof equally between Sandy Lawson Tait and James Lawson Tait the sons of my daughter . . . as tenants in common."

In all other respects she confirmed her will.

F The testatrix died on July 16, 1952, and her will was proved on Mar. 20, 1953. The daughter, the residuary legatee, survived the testatrix, so that the codicil was unnecessary and had no effect, but, in my judgment, it is material as throwing some light on the meaning of the will. The funeral expenses and debts of the testatrix have been paid, and the specific legacies bequeathed by her will have been handed over. The assets of the testatrix after those operations consist of the sum of £223 18s. 9d. cash, some household furniture and effects valued at £168 12s., and, in addition, real property, viz., a house, of the value of about £1,800. Unfortunately, the assets are insufficient, without resorting to the proceeds of the sale of the house, to pay the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will. The trustees were advised that the proceeds of the house should be resorted to for the purpose of paying the legacies. The daughter claimed that the legacies were payable only out of the testatrix's personal estate and that she was entitled to the real property, i.e., the house. She refused to withdraw her claim, and so the matter comes before me for decision.

H The daughter was justified, of course, in seeking the decision of the court in regard to her rights, and she has raised a question not without difficulty. The difficulty, I think, arises chiefly, if not exclusively, from a decision of FARWELL, J., in Re Rowe (1). In that case a testator by his will, after giving certain pecuniary legacies, directed as follows: "I devise all my real estate and bequeath all the residue of my personal estate" to two named persons "in equal shares". Those words are similar to the words in the case which is before me, except that in Re Rowe (1) there was no direction "to pay thereout"—whatever that may mean—the just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and death and legacy duties of the testatrix. FARWELL, J., held that the law in force before 1926 in regard to the payment of pecuniary legacies out of real estate had not been altered by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 34 (3), and sched. I, Part II, para. 2, and that, accordingly, as the testator had not made the residue a mixed fund or given his real and personal estate as one mass, so as to bring into operation the rule in Greville v. Browne (2), the pecuniary legacies were payable only out of the personality. At first sight Re Rowe (1) seemed to me to be so near the present case that I should be rash in not following it. Far be it from me to say that the decision in Re Rowe (1) is incorrect, and I do not think it is necessary for me to say that; but it has been criticised and, indeed, doubted. I need not refer to the doubts or the manner in which they were expressed. It suffices to say that the case is not one which has been universally approved, and the disapproval to which it has given rise is largely due to the unwillingness of those who administer and interpret the law to go back to the old history which was generally thought to have become obsolete owing to the passing of the various property Acts of 1925.

I need not refer to many of the other cases which were cited to me. In Withers v. Kennedy (3) a testator, after a specific bequest of part of his personal estate, devised and bequeathed all his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates, and all the residue of his personal estate and effects, after payment of his just debts and funeral expenses, to trustees, their heirs, executors, and administrators, on certain trusts. SIR JOHN LEACH, M.R., held that the real estate was charged with the payment of debts. In his short judgment, he based his conclusion, I think, largely on the fact that the leasehold properties were combined with freehold. That circumstance was regarded as sufficient, in that case, to charge the debts on the real estate. In Re Thompson (4) CLAUSON, J., held that the law in force before the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, as regards the primary fund for payment of legacies as between the personal and real estate, had not been altered by s. 34 (3) and sched. I, Part II, to the Act, that the personal estate must be treated as primarily liable, and that recourse would not be made to the real estate until the personal estate had been exhausted. In Re Ridley (5) HARMAN, J., held that there was enough in the will in question to alter the order of application of assets laid down by s. 34 (3) and sched. I, Part II, to the Act of 1925, as it showed an intention that the realty should not be resorted to for the payment of legacies and testamentary expenses until the personality was exhausted. It must be remembered that s. 34 (3) of the Act of 1925 is subject to the provisions contained in a will, which may displace the order of application of assets for which the sub-section provides in the normal case.

I confess that the decision in Re Rowe (1) has given me a good deal of anxiety. At one time I thought that I should be obliged to follow it, but, in my view, that case can be distinguished, if to distinguish it is necessary, by the circumstance that the testatrix, by her codicil, has shown that she regarded her estate as a single indivisible entity. She uses, it is true, the same words in the codicil as in the will, viz., "I devise my . . . real estate and bequeath the residue of my personal estate", but she gives the property on trust for sale and on trust to divide the proceeds between the beneficiaries who are there named, the two sons of her daughter. It seems to me that it is almost incredible to regard the testatrix as having been careful, on the one hand, to keep the real estate in existence as a separate item when she was leaving it to her daughter, and, on the other hand, to throw it in and make it one fund with the personality when she was dealing with the substituted provisions for the daughter's sons, and I am inclined to the view that she never contemplated any differentiation between her realty and personality when she was considering the payment of the pecuniary legacies. Whether "thereout", in the phrase "after payment thereout" refers only to the residue of the personalty, or whether it refers to the realty and the personalty, is difficult for me to say as a matter of certainty, but I am inclined to think that, after the gift of both types of property, the word "thereout" refers to both and not to the one, i.e., it refers to the real estate and the personal estate, and not merely to the residue of the personal estate. It may be said that, in the list of payments to be made "thereout", she says nothing about legacies.

- A Whether she thought that the residue of her personal estate meant the residue of the personal estate less the pecuniary legacies, I do not know, but I am inclined to think that the general scheme of the will indicates an intention on the part of the testatrix that the legacies have to be paid somehow. I do not think that she ever contemplated that the real estate should go intact to the daughter, and I think that the advice which the trustees were given as regards the proper way of administering the estate was, after all, correct. Accordingly, I must declare that the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will are payable out of the whole estate, both real and personal, of the testatrix, along with the other expenses of administration, including the costs and expenses of the trustees, an expression which will cover all their proper charges, and the costs of the defendants to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

- C Order accordingly.
Solicitors: Peachey & Co., agents for Darnell & Price, Northampton (for the trustees and pecuniary legatees); Jaques & Co. (for the residuary legatee).
[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

D NOTE.

STARKIE v. STARKIE.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Collingwood, J.), October 30, 1953.]

- E Justices—Husband and wife—Appeal—Failure of justices to supply to High Court statement of reasons for their decision—Questions directed to justices—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 71 (3).

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES RULES, 1950, r. 71 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 10, p. 231.

- F Case referred to:
(1) Sullivan v. Sullivan, [1947] P. 50; 111 J.P. 27; 27 Digest, Replacement, 734, 7023.

APPEAL by the husband against an order of the justices for the Cockermouth petty sessional division of Cumberland, dated Aug. 10, 1953.

- G On July 24, 1953, the wife issued a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, alleging that the husband had deserted her on July 20, 1953, and that he had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her and the infant child of the marriage from the same date. On Aug. 10, 1953, the justices dismissed the charge of desertion, but found proved the charge of wilful neglect to maintain, and made an order in favour of the wife. The husband appealed.

- H Sneade for the husband.
D. R. Ellison for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: When the justices were, in due course, asked to give the reasons for their decision, their clerk sent the following statement:

"I hereby certify that the reason given by the [justices] for their decision in this matter on Aug. 10, 1953, was that the [husband] had neglected to maintain the complainant and child."

This is tantamount to saying: "We find wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife and child proved because we find that he has wilfully neglected them." This forces me to speak plainly, not, I regret to say, for the first time during the present sittings of this court, though this is by far the most glaring instance of what I meant in Sullivan v. Sullivan (1) (to which I refer the justices and their clerk), where I said ([1947] P. 51) that justices

"... are entitled to make the order, or decline to make the order, without giving reasons, but they are bound to give this court, in the event of an appeal, a proper and sufficient statement of the reasons upon which their decision was based."

I went on to say, in what I hope were unmistakable terms, that the failure to do so was a defiance of this court and a dereliction of duty. I also said (ibid., 52):

"... I wish to say quite plainly that if this court is treated in this way again after this warning, it may be necessary for us to consider what powers we have to ensure that the parties are not put to unnecessary expense owing to dereliction of duty on the part of justices' clerks."

I will set out the questions to which we require a full answer before we decide this appeal. They are as follow:

"(i) In respect of the first parting (from about Aug. 31, 1952, to July 11, 1953) did the justices accept the evidence of the husband in cross-examination by the wife's solicitor that he agreed to pay maintenance, and, if so, at what rate per week if the wife was (a) working or (b) not working, respectively ?

"(ii) Did the justices accept the evidence of both the husband and the wife that the husband paid maintenance at the rate of £4 10s. per week between the resumption of cohabitation on July 11, 1953, and July 20, 1953, the date of the present parting ?

"(iii) On what grounds was the wife's complaint of desertion in respect of the present separation dismissed ? (a) What did the justices find was the nature of this parting, and on what evidence did they base their finding ? (b) If the justices found that the parting was consensual, did they find that there was any agreement (i) expressed, or (ii) implied, that the husband should pay maintenance for the support of the wife and/or the child ? (c) If so, how much ? Note (which applies to the whole question) : A full statement of the grounds for this answer is required. (d) After the parting on July 20, 1953, did the husband pay the wife any maintenance in respect of herself and/or the child, and, if so, how much respectively ? (e) On what ground was the wife's complaint of July 24, 1953, that on and after July 20, 1953, the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her and her infant child held to be proved ? Note: Repeat the note to question (iii)."

From these questions it will be understood that the combination of (i)—the dismissal of the complaint of desertion—with (ii)—a finding of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance—raises issues which require careful consideration. We have no reason at present to believe that they have received any consideration at all. From the fact that both sides in this appeal were assisted it follows that a certain unnecessary expenditure of public money has resulted owing to the defiance of this court by the justices and their clerk in the respects that I have mentioned. On the return of the answers to these questions the justices will be given the opportunity, if they wish, to be heard by counsel on the question what, if any, order we have power to make regarding this waste of costs.

COLLINGWOOD, J.: I agree.

Solicitors: Beachcroft & Co., agents for Curwen & Co., Workington (for the husband); Speechly, Mumford & Craig, agents for Paisley, Falcon & Highet, Workington (for the wife).

A.T.H.

CULLINANE v. BRITISH "REMA" MANUFACTURING CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.),
October 23, 26, 27, 1953.]

Warranty—Breach—Damages—Sale of machine—Breach of warranty of performance—Option of buyer to claim capital loss or loss of profit.

Costs—Payment into court—Claim and counterclaim—Award on claim more than payment in—Award reduced by set-off to less than payment in—Discretion of court—No costs after payment in—R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 6.

A The defendants sold to the plaintiff for £6,578 a clay pulverising and drying plant, warranting that the plant would be capable of producing dry clay powder at the rate of six tons per hour. The plant supplied to the plaintiff complied with the specification, but it produced powder at the rate of only two tons per hour, and it was, therefore, commercially useless to the plaintiff. The plaintiff now claimed damages for breach of warranty, and computed the damage suffered as (i) the loss of capital, being the difference between the cost of the plant, buildings to house it, and ancillary plant, and their estimated break-up value, (ii) interest on gross capital expenditure, and (iii) loss of profit for three years, arrived at by allowing running costs and expenses and also depreciation at ten per cent. per annum of the original capital outlay (the estimated life of the plant being ten years), and a sum for interest on capital. The defendants counterclaimed £1,078, the balance of the purchase price, and paid £10,000 into court. At the trial the plaintiff was awarded under (i) (£7,370 1s. 5d., under (ii) £1,608 4s. 9d., and under (iii) £8,913 1s., making a total of £17,891 7s. 2d., from which amount £1,078 on the counterclaim was deducted, making a total award of £16,813 7s. 2d. On appeal by the defendants,

D HELD: (i) (MORRIS, L.J., dissenting) where a person obtained a machine which was mechanically in accordance with the order given, but was unable to perform a particular function which it was warranted to perform, he might adopt one of two courses—he might either recover the capital cost incurred, less anything obtained by disposing of the material that he got, or make his claim on the basis of the profit he had lost because the machine fell short in its warranted performance; by stating that his claim for lost profit was limited to three years, and, in computing the profit, making due allowance for depreciation, the plaintiff did not become entitled to claim both loss of capital and loss of profit; and, therefore, he was only entitled to recover the sums awarded under (ii) and (iii), totalling £10,521 5s. 9d.

E (ii) in the circumstances the fair order was that no costs should be paid by either party after the date of payment into court.

AS TO THE MEASURE OF DAMAGES IN CONTRACT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 121-133, paras. 151-170; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 17, pp. 130-135, Nos. 380-412.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 997; [1949] 2 K.B. 528; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Hadley v. Baxendale, (1854), 9 Exch. 341; 23 L.J.Ex. 179; 23 L.T.O.S. 69; 156 E.R. 145; 17 Digest 93, 101.

H APPEAL by the defendants from an order of His Honour J. D. CASSWELL, Q.C., Official Referee, dated Apr. 1, 1953.

The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of warranty on the sale of a clay drying and pulverising plant. In his statement of claim he alleged:

"(1) By a contract made in the year 1947 the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiff and the plaintiff agreed to purchase a pulverising and drying plant at a price of £5,460, the defendants reserving the right to make an additional charge if their costs were increased from date of quotation to date of dispatch, as a result of which an additional charge was in fact made of £1,118 . . . (3) By the said contract the defendants expressly or alternatively impliedly warranted and agreed that the said plant should be capable of handling the plaintiff's clay known as Wareham Ball clay containing up to twenty per cent. to twenty-two per cent. moisture, the said clay to be cut, dried and ground so as to produce a dry clay powder containing approximately two per cent. final moisture at the rate of six tons per hour."

It was, further, alleged that the plant was delivered on or about Apr. 1, 1950, that the plant did not produce a dry clay powder at the rate of six tons per hour, that the defendants thereby were in breach of the warranty, and that the plaintiff had in consequence suffered damage, particulars of which were set out as follows:

Particulars of Damage

- A. Cost of buildings erected and work done by the plaintiff to house, support, accommodate, and generally be ancillary to the plant supplied by the defendants

Total cost	...	...	...	...	£4,559	1s.	5d.
Subtract estimated break-up value of buildings	...	...	...	...	£2,000	0s.	0d.
					£2,559 1s. 5d.

- B. Cost of plant supplied by the defendants £6,578 0s. 0d.

Subtract estimated residual value of the plant	...	...	...	...	£3,289	0s.	0d.
					£3,289 0s. 0d.

- C. Cost of associated and ancillary plant and charges—

[Items] Total cost	...	...	...	...	£3,343	0s.	0d.
Subtract estimated residual value of plant	...	...	...	...	£1,671	0s.	0d.
					£1,672 0s. 0d.

- D. Interest on capital at four per cent. from Apr. 1, 1950, to Dec. 15, 1951 (and continuing until settlement [of claim for damages])

A.	...	...	...	...	£4,559	0s.	0d.
B.	...	...	...	...	£6,578	0s.	0d.
C.	...	...	...	...	£3,343	0s.	0d.
					£14,480 0s. 0d.

- Subtract* interest at four per cent. for the same period on the balance of the purchase price

...	...	...	...	£1,078	0s.	0d.
-----	-----	-----	-----	--------	-----	-----

£13,402 0s. 0d.

On which interest is £915 16s. 0d.

E. Loss of profit.

(a) Per annum.

Receipts from warranted output of six tons per hour on a forty-seven hour week: 14,664 tons per annum at £1 17s. 6d. per ton £27,495 0s. 0d.

Subtract

Depreciation at ten per cent. and maintenance at five per cent. on plant and buildings (on £14,480)...

£2,172 0s. 0d.

Running costs £6,433 2s. 10d.

Office expenses £1,030 0s. 0d.

Interest on capital £579 4s. 0d.

£10,214 6s. 10d.

Estimated net profit per annum ... £17,280 13s. 2d.

(b) From Apr. 1, 1950, to Dec. 15, 1951 and continuing £29,521 2s. 6d.

£37,956 19s. 11d.

Subtract balance of the purchase price of the plant outstanding and due from the plaintiff to the defendants...

£1,078 0s. 0d.

£36,878 19s. 11d.

In reply to a request for further and better particulars, the plaintiff stated, inter alia, that under E. (b) the words "and continuing" covered the period from Dec. 15, 1951, to the date of the trial of the action.

By their defence the defendants denied the allegations in para. 3 of the statement of claim, paid £10,000 into court, and, inter alia, alleged that the plaintiff had failed to mitigate the damage in that he had failed to take steps to procure other plant. By way of set-off and counterclaim the defendants pleaded that there was due and owing to them from the plaintiff the sum of £1,078 the balance of the purchase price, and they counterclaimed £1,078, alternatively, as damages.

On Oct. 24, 1952, it was ordered that the action be heard by His Honour J. D. CASSWELL, Q.C., official referee. In January, 1953, the defendants paid £10,000 into court. On Apr. 1, 1953, the official referee found that the plaintiff was entitled to the following sums:

Under A., £2,559 1s. 5d.; under B., £3,289 0s. 0d.; under C., £1,522 0s. 0d.; under D. (calculated to Apr. 1, 1953) £1,608 4s. 9d.; and under E., £8,913 1s. 0d.—Total, £17,891 7s. 2d. Less sum counterclaimed by defendants, £1,078 0s. 0d.—£16,813 7s. 2d.

The official referee gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for £16,813 7s. 2d. and awarded him five-sixths of the costs of the action. The defendants appealed, and the plaintiff cross-appealed asking that the estimation of damages for loss of profit be carried forward to the date of judgment on the appeal.

Wilson, Q.C., Megaw, Q.C., and Summerskill for the defendants.
Raeburn, Q.C., and E. V. Falk for the plaintiff.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal relates only to the proper measure of the damages which flow from what has been found to be a breach of warranty in regard to certain plant manufactured by the defendants and supplied to the plaintiff. It is, in my judgment, important to have clearly in mind the nature of the contract and, particularly, of the warranty. The plant, as I understand, was built according to a detailed specification and there is no doubt that as supplied it strictly conformed with the specification. Unfortunately, however, as the official referee found, it did not satisfy the warranty, because the machine, although capable of handling the plaintiff's clay and of cutting, drying and grinding it so as to produce a dry clay powder, was not capable of producing it at the rate of six tons per hour, and the difference in rate, commercially speaking, was the difference between a profitable and an unprofitable commercial venture. A

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the particulars of damage and continued:] It is, I think, obvious that in respect of plant for which the purchase price was £6,578 and which was to be used in an enterprise which seems (from my reading of the learned official referee's judgment) to have been of a speculative character, the sum of £36,878 19s. 11d. was a large sum to claim as damages for loss of profit, and the total amount awarded turned out to be considerably less, namely, £16,813 7s. 2d. That reduction is attributable almost entirely to a reduction of the claim for loss of profit under E., the award for which amounted to £8,913 1s. Summarising the award, it is made up of the three items under A., B. and C., representing loss of capital, together amounting to £7,370 1s. 5d.; the sum of interest on the gross capital expenditure (£1,608 4s. 9d.); and the loss of profit (£8,913 1s.), there being deducted the unpaid balance of the purchase price of £1,078. B C

The argument of the defendants in this court has been that the award involves giving damages twice to the plaintiff. The machine was made precisely according to the specification. It was delivered and is now in the plaintiff's possession and is in fact, I understand, working, though it does not perform its productive function in the way that was warranted. The principle on which damages for breach of contract are awarded has been many times stated and was carefully considered by ASQUITH, L.J., in delivering the judgment of this court in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (1). The passages from that judgment which we have read are expository of the original principle laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (2) as follows (9 Exch. 354): D

"Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it." E F

It is, in this case, plain that to the knowledge of the defendants this machine was required to perform a particular function as shown by the warranty given. There is, therefore, no doubt that the plaintiff is entitled to rely on the second part of the passage I have read and to claim

"damages . . . such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach." G

In other words, the plaintiff would not be confined in this case to what might be called the natural result of a machine which turned out to be worth less than the purchase price which had been paid for it.

Some reference has been made to the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, but, to my mind, that Act, which put into statutory form the principles which had long been established, does not for present purposes add anything to what I have already stated from my citation from Hadley v. Baxendale (2). It is, however, perhaps right that I should notice that the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 53, is directed particularly to the remedy for breach of warranty, and provides: H

"(2) The measure of damages for breach of warranty is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting, in the ordinary course of events, from the breach of warranty. (3) In the case of breach of warranty of quality such loss is prima facie the difference between the value of the goods at the time of delivery to the buyer and the value they would have had if they had answered to the warranty."

A I have read those two sub-sections, but I do not think they assist, or qualify, the general statement which may be applied here, that the plaintiff, who got a machine which in the event failed to live up to the performance warranted, should be put in the same position (so far as money can do it) as he would have been in if the machine had been as warranted.

B It is plain from the statement of claim that the plaintiff was alleging entitlement on his part to the sum total of the capital loss he had suffered by having laid out £14,480, and finding himself with material which was worth only £6,960, and also to the loss of the profit which this machine, if it had been as warranted, would have brought him during its mechanical life. It is fair to say that in making his computation of damages for loss of profit he did deduct from the annual sum a figure of ten per cent. of the total original capital outlay in respect of depreciation. It appears from the finding of the official referee that the machine would have continued to perform its mechanical functions for a period of ten years; so that, if there had been clay to grind and markets in which the ground clay could have been sold, it would have brought emoluments to the plaintiff for that period. I base that statement on the passage of the judgment where the learned official referee says:

D "If the plant had been as warranted Mr. [D.] gave its probable life as ten years. I find that it was within the contemplation of the defendants that this plant would be used, not as a museum piece but as a means for making a profit by the sale of its products. If the plant had been as warranted, the plaintiff's intention was to use it for its life, or for so long as it could provide profit. At the end of that time it would be useless."

E It seems to me, as a matter of principle, that the claim for damages, as pleaded, was not sustainable, in so far as the plaintiff sought to recover both the whole of his original capital loss and also the whole of the profit which he would have made. That, I think, as a proposition is self-evident, because a claim for loss of profits could only be founded on the footing that the capital expenditure had been incurred. As I have said, however, there was a deduction in respect of depreciation at ten per cent., and, if the life of the plant is taken at ten years, it follows that, during the period of ten years in which profits must be assumed to have been earned, the whole of the capital cost would have been written off. In other words, if the estimation of damages under head E. had been carried on for the whole period of ten years, the effect of these considerable calculations would have been that A. plus B. plus C., having been elaborately set out, would have all been deducted again in the course of calculating E.

G As a matter of principle again, it seems to me that a person who has obtained a machine such as the plaintiff here obtained, which was mechanically in exact accordance with the order given, but was unable to perform a particular function which it was warranted to perform, may adopt one of two courses. He may, when he discovers its incapacity and that it is not what he wanted and is useless to him, claim to recover the capital cost he has incurred less anything he can obtain by disposing of the material that he got. A claim of that kind puts the plaintiff in the same position as though he had never made the contract at all. H He is, in other words, back where he started, and, if it were shown that the profit-earning capacity was, in fact, very small, the plaintiff would probably elect so to base his claim. Alternatively, he may, where the warranty in question relates to performance, make his claim on the basis of the profit he has lost, because the machine as delivered fell short in its performance of that which it was warranted to do. If he chooses to base his claim on that footing, depreciation has nothing whatever to do with it.

During the course of the argument many analogies were taken, and I find assistance from the simple agricultural analogy of the cow. For example, A. sells to B. a cow for £100, and warrants that for its next five lactations it will produce milk at the rate of four gallons a day and it is discovered that the cow's performance is at the rate, not of four gallons, but one gallon a day, and that a one-gallon-a-day cow is worth not £100 but £10. The buyer might then elect either to claim the difference between the £100 that he had paid for a four-gallon-a-day cow and £10, the true value of the one-gallon-a-day cow, and recover the difference, £90, which puts him in the same position as if he had intended to buy what in fact he bought. Alternatively, he might say: "I keep this cow and I shall sue you for the loss I have suffered because her performance was not as warranted. I am getting, not four gallons, but one gallon a day, and, therefore, I am losing what I would have made on the sales (less necessary expenditure) of an extra thousand gallons a year". If the latter course is chosen, then, as I have indicated, it seems to me that the depreciated or depreciating value of the cow has nothing whatever to do with the claim. So much, I think, is conceded, and it has, therefore, seemed to us that it would be impossible to combine in this case a claim for the capital loss and a claim for the total loss of profit, just as it would be impossible to recover both the £90, being the capital loss on the cow and the full amount of the loss due to the shortage of milk.

In the course of these proceedings an event occurred which has given rise, as I think, to the whole difficulty in the case. The particulars of damage, E. (b), read:

"From Apr. 1, 1950, to Dec. 15, 1951, and continuing."

The defendants asked the plaintiff to give particulars of the words "and continuing". By that request the defendants were asking the plaintiff to state for what period of time he was alleging and intending to prove loss of profit. The actual words of the request are of importance. Particulars were sought

"of the words 'and continuing', stating precisely what period is referred to and the amount of loss of profit (if any) claimed in respect of such period."

To that the plaintiff answered:

"'And continuing' is the period from Dec. 15, 1951, to the date of trial of this action."

That, as it seems to me, was a clear and unequivocal statement by the plaintiff that, so far as his claim was based on loss of profit, he was only claiming loss of profit up to the date of the trial and did not propose to claim or to seek to prove loss of profit beyond that date. The effect of that statement in the particulars left the statement of claim as a claim for the full amount of the capital loss (arrived at by setting out in each case the total sum actually spent and deducting from it the estimated break-up or residual value of the buildings and plant, which I suppose was to be taken at the date of the statement of claim), plus a claim for loss of profit, but, subject to this qualification, that in the computation for loss of profit there remained in the statement of claim the item of depreciation at ten per cent. per annum on the original capital cost.

At the trial, the defendants sought to show that this enterprise was one foredoomed to failure from the start, and that the plaintiff never could have made any profit by pulverising his clay and trying to sell it. That attempt to disprove the claim for loss of profit failed. The learned official referee said this:

"Having carefully considered the evidence, and giving due allowance, I hope, to commercial contingencies, I estimate that during the first year, at the beginning of which the plaintiff had no orders and during which teething troubles would be expected, the plaintiff could have sold two thousand tons, during the second year five thousands tons, and during the third year six thousand tons. These obviously must be very largely in the nature of guesses, but, if I have over-estimated them, it must be remembered that I am giving the plaintiff no damages for loss of profit after the end of three years . . . In respect of each year I have deducted the interest charge on the capital, but not depreciation."

A It is not, I think, open to doubt that to allow, in addition to the total capital loss, the total profit less appropriate revenue charges, is not justified, for in the absence, at any rate, of any allowance for depreciation the learned official referee seems to have given the full amount of profit on the footing that the capital expenditure had been incurred and at the same time given the plaintiff the full amount of the loss of capital so as to indemnify him for having incurred it.

B I have been unable to see how, in estimating the profits in a case of this kind, depreciation comes into the picture. I have already given my reasons for that view. As the matter has developed the point may be briefly stated. The plaintiff formulated his claim showing the capital he had lost or thrown away so that, if he recovered it, he would be in the same position as though he had never bought this machine at all, and he also showed what he claimed to be the profit he would have made, not on the footing that he had not bought the machine, but on the footing that he had bought it and that the machine had been in accordance with its warranted performance. When asked for particulars he said as regards C the latter claim that he only proposed to prove damages for three years, for reasons which, no doubt, were good to him. Counsel for the defendants, when opening the appeal, argued that the inevitable inference to be drawn from the statement in the particulars and from passages in the judgment which I have D read was that, although this machine was mechanically capable of operating for ten years, what he called its commercial life was limited to three years—in other words, that this enterprise could not in any circumstances have been a profitable commercial venture for more than three years. If that be right, there would be nothing left to argue about, but I have been unable to accept that view. In my judgment, there is no basis for supposing that the learned official referee E thought or found, expressly or impliedly, that three years was the limit of this enterprise. But it does not seem to me that that conclusion affects the validity of the defendants' argument. Whatever might have been the length of time during which this enterprise could have been carried on profitably, the plaintiff chose to limit his claim in that respect to three years. I agree with counsel for F the plaintiff that the actual figures, which show a crescendo for the first three years, are not easily consistent with the view (in the mind of the learned official referee) that at the end of the three years the sales would have stopped altogether. On the other hand, the whole enterprise was obviously speculative, a fact which is, I think, reflected in the words which I have already read, where the official referee said

G "if I have over-estimated them [the profits for the first three years] it must be remembered that I am giving the plaintiff no damages for loss of profit after the end of three years," words which lead me to think that the referee may well have supposed that the total profit that would have been made on the enterprise was probably not much different from that which he awarded.

H But, whatever be the answer to these problems, I come back to the same point, namely, that the plaintiff can choose either to claim on the basis that he had wasted capital and that he ought to be put in the position he would have been in if he had never bought this machine, or to say: "I have got the machine. What I am claiming is the loss I have suffered because its performance falls short of that which was warranted, and, therefore, I have not made the profitable sales which I would have made, and I claim, accordingly, the loss of resultant profits". The second alternative being the larger, he is entitled to choose that, but, in my judgment, he should be limited to it. He is not, in my judgment, by stating that his claim for lost profit is limited to three years, able to claim (as he admittedly could not claim if he had not placed the limitation on the profit) both for loss of capital and for loss of profit. It is said that he may do so provided that in the computation of profits he makes due allowance for depreciation, but, in my judgment (as I have already stated), depreciation has nothing to do with the profit lost as a consequence of the breach of warranty, and the effect of so reducing the profit would appear to be that the plaintiff first recovers for loss of capital and then has to bring into account against the profit, part of what he has recovered for loss of capital. A

On the question whether the plaintiff could have claimed for loss of profit up to the date of the hearing and then an additional sum because he was at that date left with a machine less valuable than, as warranted, it should have been, I do not say any more than that the plaintiff has not so claimed. Had he done so, the second part of the claim would appear to be no more than a method of computing profit for the possible profit-earning period after the date of the hearing. B

The result will be that from the figures which I have mentioned the first three items [A., B. and C.] ought, as it seems to me, to be omitted. Otherwise I think that the plaintiff is claiming damages, in effect twice over. The total amount of damages proved which the plaintiff is entitled to recover consists of £8,913 ls. under E., to which must be added the item of interest under D., since that has been deducted in calculating the £8,913 ls. The sum total of those figures is £10,521 5s. 9d. As I have already stated, however, the total price of the machine remains unpaid to the extent of £1,078. A question arises (on which we have not yet heard argument) whether that should be treated as proper to be set off against the £10,521 5s. 9d. so as to reduce the amount for which the plaintiff can get judgment to £9,443 5s. 9d., or whether the £1,078 is more properly a subject of counterclaim—with the result, I take it, that the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment for £10,521, the defendants being entitled to judgment for £1,078. That, however, I will leave over until we have heard further discussion. C D

There was, in addition to the appeal, a cross-appeal on the part of the plaintiff asking that the estimation of damages for loss of profit should be carried forward to the date of the judgment in this court, on the ground that the appeal had, so to say, postponed the date of judgment in the action. I am unable to apprehend that claim or to give effect to it. I have already said that the plaintiff (for reasons good, bad or indifferent) limited his claim in respect of profit to a claim up to the date of judgment in the action (which was Apr. 1, 1953), and having so limited his claim he must, I think, be bound by it. I only add that, if the period were extended, I have no possible means available on which I could estimate any further loss of profit. In my judgment, therefore, the appeal succeeds, the sum for damages being reduced by the elimination of the three items, A., B., and C.; and the cross-appeal should be dismissed. E F

JENKINS, L.J.: The general principle applicable to the case is, I apprehend, this. The plant having been supplied in contemplation by both parties that it should be used by the plaintiff in the commercial production of pulverised clay, the case is one in which the plaintiff can claim as damages for the breach of warranty the loss of the profit he can show that he would have made if the plant had been as warranted. Where damages are awarded on that basis the object in view (as, indeed, in any other assessment of damages) is to put the plaintiff in the same position (so far as money can put him in the same position) as if the contract had been duly complied with or the subject-matter of the contract had conformed to any warranty given. It follows that in such a case, while, no doubt, the plaintiff can at his option claim damages based on the difference between the value to him of the article as actually supplied and the contract price of the article, he cannot claim both that amount, representing his G H capital expenditure thrown away by reason of the breach, and also the full amount of the profit he can show that he would have made in the event of the article answering the warranty. In considering loss of profit he must be placed in the same position as if the article had been as warranted. On that hypothesis, the full contract price would have to be paid, and all other expenditure necessary for the article to be used for the contemplated purpose would have to be incurred before any profit could be earned at all. Therefore, where the claim is based on

A loss of profit it must be calculated either by estimating the difference between the contract price of the article and the value of the article as supplied, and allowing the amount claimed for loss of profit only in so far as it is in excess of that amount, or, more simply, by letting the capital expenditure lie where it falls and computing the amount of loss of profit. In certain circumstances, it may be to the plaintiff's advantage to claim on the basis of the difference between the contract price and

B the value of the article, because it may be that in some instances that would give him a larger sum than any sum he could prove as representing loss of profit. Where the loss of profit is the larger sum, then the plaintiff, of course, will elect to take that, but he cannot have both.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the particulars of damage and continued:] It will be observed that the mode of formulating the particulars of damage adopted in

C the statement of claim was to take the course (contrary to the principle I have endeavoured to state) of allowing the plaintiff damages in respect of his capital expenditure thrown away and, in addition, his estimated loss of profit. But as against that it is to be noted that in computing his loss of profit he allowed depreciation at ten per cent. on his capital expenditure. It follows that if the loss of profit were to be estimated with respect to a period of ten or more years,

D the items separately claimed in respect of capital expenditure and allowed by the official referee would have been in substance wiped out.

Counsel for the plaintiff did not, as I understand him, quarrel with the general principle which I have endeavoured to state, but his argument was of this nature. He accepted the position that, if the loss of profit was to be calculated over a

E period of ten years (that being the period accepted by the official referee as the probable life of the plant), it would be wrong to give the plaintiff both the full amount of the loss of profit estimated over the whole of that period and also the amounts claimed as capital expenditure thrown away. But, he says, the period for the purpose of calculating the loss of profit was in fact limited to three years, and he says that was only three-tenths of the estimated life of the plant. Therefore, in his contention, the plaintiff will not have received all the damages

F to which he is entitled unless he receives something on account of the capital expenditure thrown away. At the end of the three years, says counsel, assuming a life of the plant of ten years, the plant, if the warranty had been complied with, would have been a plant still capable of operating for another seven years at a profit, and, if profits for that period of seven years had been estimated and added to the profits for the first three years, all would have been well, but, as it is, the

G plaintiff gains profits for three years only and nothing to compensate him for his loss of profit thereafter. Counsel for the plaintiff put it, I think, that that loss of profit could be properly allowed for by leaving in the calculation of damages the whole of the capital thrown away, though he was, I think, disposed to concede that as against that it would be right to allow the defendants depreciation at

H ten per cent. on that capital expenditure for the period of three years to which the estimate of profit extended. I find myself unable to accept that contention. As a matter of pleading the plaintiff in the first instance claimed for loss of profit without limit as to time, and on that footing included the additional sum representing loss of capital expenditure thrown away, though at the same time allowing the ten per cent. depreciation which I have mentioned. When asked, by the request for particulars, in respect of what period the loss of profit was claimed, the plaintiff answered, in effect, that he claimed damages in the way of loss of profit only for the period down to the date of judgment. That being so, it seems to me that the plaintiff must be bound by his pleading and cannot now go back and say: "I wish to claim a further amount representing the profits for the residue of the life of the plant". The particulars of damage being in that form and limited in that way, I think the only possible course is to proceed on the footing that the only damages in the way of loss of profit either alleged or proved consist of the loss of profit for the period of three years down to the date of the judgment.

The learned official referee, in his judgment, said:

"If the plant had been as warranted, the plaintiff's intention was to use it for its life, or for so long as it could provide profit. At the end of that time it would be useless, and in order to ascertain what profit he would have made from it there would have to be deducted from the aggregate of his net profit the original price of the plant, unless this had already been written off against his gross profits as depreciation."

Although the thought, perhaps, is not so clearly expressed as it might have been, those words suggest that at that point in his judgment the learned official referee recognised that the plaintiff cannot claim the whole of his capital expenditure thrown away in addition to the whole of his loss of profit, but, if he claims capital expenditure thrown away, can claim loss of profit only in so far as it exceeds the amount claimed under the heading of capital expenditure. He continues:

"But if the plaintiff recovers the cost to him of the plant less its residuary value he has recovered his initial outlay, but none of the profit which he would have made from it and which would have formed part of the value of the plant to him. He cannot hope to replace that plant except at a considerable expense and without having to wait for a period of at least fourteen or fifteen months. Counsel for the plaintiff has stated that he is content to ask for merely the estimated net profit from Apr. 1, 1950, until repayment or judgment."

Then the learned official referee expressed his conclusion as to the profits which the plaintiff could have earned during the three years down to the date of judgment; and he goes on to say, as regards the estimated output or sales of two thousand tons in the first year, five thousand tons in the second year and six thousand tons in the third year,

"These obviously must be very largely in the nature of guesses, but if I have over-estimated them it must be remembered that I am giving the plaintiff no damages for loss of profit after the end of three years."

Then he says, with regard to the estimated loss of profits:

"In respect of each year I have deducted the interest charge on the capital, but not depreciation."

From those passages it seems to me to be reasonably plain that the official referee, in allowing, as he did, the loss of capital expenditure in addition to loss of profit, calculated without any figure for depreciation, was not doing that as a special method of dealing with the matter by reason of the fact that the claim for loss of profit was limited to three years. He was treating the three-years figure as representing the whole of the loss of profit, and even on that basis was allowing the claim in respect of capital expenditure. Further, it is to be observed that he says in the passage to which I have already referred:

"These obviously must be very largely in the nature of guesses, but if I have over-estimated them it must be remembered that I am giving the plaintiff no damages for loss of profit after the end of three years."

That seems to me to suggest that his estimate of the profits year by year might well have been more conservative if a longer period than three years had been taken. It is, to my mind, impossible for this court now to proceed on any other basis. Estimates which were "very largely in the nature of guesses" in relation to the first three years would, to my mind, become even more speculative when an attempt was made to carry the calculation on to a point of time as distant as ten years from the delivery of the plant. If a loss of profit for ten years had been claimed and sought to be established before the learned official referee, it is impossible to say at what additional figure he would have been likely to arrive. We have no material on which it is possible to reach any conclusion as to that. It may be that the defendants would have succeeded in bringing the additional figure down to an inconsiderable sum. It may be that the plaintiff might have been able to justify a considerable addition. It is impossible to say what the result might have been. Accordingly, in my view, having regard to the state of the pleadings, this case must be dealt with on the footing that the only loss of profit claimed was the profit for the three years down to the date of judgment, which the learned official referee estimated at £8,913 1s., and, that being, for this purpose, the full amount of the claim for loss of profit, in my view, the learned official referee erred in allowing the plaintiff, in addition to that sum, the items of capital expenditure under A., B., and C. By so doing he was giving the plaintiff his damages twice over so far as the amounts allowed in respect of capital expenditure were concerned.

Accordingly, in my view, this appeal should be allowed and the damages should be reduced to the two items consisting of the interest dealt with under D., £1,608 4s. 9d. and the loss of profit under E., £8,913 1s. The charge for interest is, in my view, proper to be allowed, because a contra allowance of interest on the same sum, as I understand it, was made in the calculation of the loss of profit. Accordingly, in my view, the judgment in the plaintiff's favour should be reduced to the total of those two sums and the appeal should be allowed to that extent. As to the unpaid balance of purchase money, it remains to consider whether that should be dealt with as a set-off or as a judgment in favour of the defendants on their counterclaim. There was a cross-appeal by the plaintiff in which he asked that the loss of profit might be computed over an extended period which was to end with the conclusion of the present appeal. In my view, that is an application to which it is quite impossible for this court to accede, and, accordingly, I think the cross-appeal should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: In this case I have not found myself agreeing in their entirety with the conclusions which have been reached by my Lords. I need hardly say that it is with diffidence that I venture to express a divergent opinion, but to the extent to which my conclusions differ from those reached by my Lords I feel that it is my duty to express them.

There are one or two passages in the judgment of the learned official referee which serve to illumine some of the difficult problems with which we are confronted. There is no doubt that the machine was delivered in March of 1950. Some time elapsed thereafter in endeavours on the part of the defendants to put the machine into the working condition that they had promised. The time that passed was wasted from the point of view of the plaintiff as time within which he could as a business man have earned profits as he desired to do. The learned official referee said in his judgment:

"The plant was finally erected in March, 1950. It never produced the warranted amount of powder, and the defendants introduced various modifications and additions in an endeavour to fulfil their contractual obligations. Mr. [B.], a very senior engineer of the defendants with considerable technical experience, visited the plaintiffs on four occasions: first, when it was commissioned, for ten days; again in April and May, 1950, for thirteen days; in July and August for eleven days; and, finally, in August, 1951, when he stayed about ten days. Other representatives of the defendants were there also. They were quite unable to make the plant produce more than about two tons per hour output. I find as a fact that the plant is incapable of producing more than about one-third of the warranted output when using the plaintiff's clay."

I imagine that the defendants were very disappointed with the performance, and there is every reason to think (and the passage that I have quoted illustrates it) that they made genuine and honest endeavours to try to get the plant into satisfactory working condition. But, unhappily, they failed: and so time passed. A When it came to the litigation which ensued, the defendants said to the plaintiff: "Well, even if we had delivered to you a plant that was in compliance with the warranty we gave, nevertheless the whole thing would have been useless to you; it would have been a white elephant, for you could not have made any profits." That sort of contention on the part of a seller who has unhappily B been unable to comply with a warranty that he has given never meets with a very enthusiastic reception from the purchaser of the machine. But that matter was litigated, and, no doubt, a good deal of the time during the hearing was occupied in a careful ascertainment of the facts. The learned official referee came to the conclusion that that submission on the part of the defendants failed. He said:

"Counsel for the defendants contended that even if the plant had been of the quality warranted the plaintiff could not have found an economic market for his output, that the plant would have been a 'white elephant' in his keeping, that he made a mistake in ever thinking that he could procure an adequate market, and that the plant would, in any case, have been valueless and the plaintiff cannot recover any but nominal damages." C

The learned official referee considered the evidence as to the markets that would be available for the plaintiff, and he expressed his conclusion as follows: D

"The plaintiff said that he had supposed that his main sales would be to the rubber industry. In this he was mistaken. However, there is obviously an extensive use for pulverised clay by foundries, makers of vitreous enamelling, welding and pottery, and in my judgment the possibility is that the plaintiff could have made a useful addition to his income with the products of the plant if it had been equal to warranty; it would not have been a white elephant. It is to be noticed that Mr. [D.] himself agreed that if the plant had been as warranted it would have been worth the price charged . . . The plaintiff says that the plant is useless for the purpose for which it was required, he cannot run it except at a loss, and this is not seriously challenged." E F

In addition to the matters to which I have already referred the defendants took another point. They said that the plaintiff ought to have mitigated his loss. That submission was not successful. In his judgment the official referee said:

"Finally, it has been suggested that the plaintiff could and should have purchased other machinery in order to mitigate his damage. I think that this would have been quite unreasonable. To obtain a product at the rate warranted he would have had to purchase, as I have said, more than two attritor plants, and would have incurred all the expense of dismantling and removing the defendants' plant, of adapting and probably enlarging his building to accommodate the substituted machinery, and of installing it. Moreover, the defendants were suggesting that they could bring his machine up to the warranted standard even as late as autumn, 1951. He could not have hoped to substitute other machines before the end of 1952, even if by then." G H

The learned official referee had already said:

"He cannot hope to replace that plant except at a considerable expense and without having to wait for a period of at least fourteen or fifteen months".

A It seems to me that the basis on which the pleader for the plaintiff pleaded the damage in this case was permissible and logical. Supposing that a machine cost £10,000 and had a life of ten years, and supposing it were found that there would be net profits of £2,000 a year. At the end of ten years with fulfilment of the warranty the purchaser would have received £20,000, and allowing for the £10,000 he had spent in buying the machine he would be £10,000 to the good. Supposing the machine is delivered to him and supposing he pays £10,000 for it and supposing it is found to be entirely valueless, the purchaser might say: "Well, I am claiming simply my profits, £20,000". But it seems to me that he could alternatively say this: "Out of £2,000 each year I would have allocated B £1,000 each year over the ten years to pay for the plant, and so my net profit would be £1,000 a year. Instead of claiming £20,000 I claim back the £10,000 I have paid for the plant, which is valueless, and I claim the profits that I would have made, £1,000 a year over ten years, £10,000". In either way of statement, the amount of the claim is the same. It seems to me that what was done in the statement of claim here was to put the matter in that latter way. It was pleaded on behalf of the plaintiff that by reason of the breach of warranty the plaintiff C was out of pocket. He had spent sums for the plant and for accessory plant and for buildings. He says: "I want those sums back, less, of course, the present scrap value of what I have got, and in addition I want the profits that I would have made, namely, my net profits, out of the profits that I would have received each year. I make an allocation of one-tenth and making that allowance I arrive at my net profits". It seems to me that that is a permissible and a D logical way of approaching the matter if the claim is so formulated.

Under the heading "loss of profit" in the particulars of damage in the present case there was a subtraction of depreciation at ten per cent. per annum. There came the time when the plaintiff, being asked for particulars, limited his claim. It was, in the first place, a claim for what he had spent less the scrap value of what he still had, together with net profits for the whole period which was covered E by the words "and continuing". Being asked for particulars, he limited his claim as regards the item of profits to the period to the trial of the action. As events turned out, that proved to be a period of almost precisely three years from the date of the delivery of the plant. The claim being so limited, it seems to me that when computing profits, if they are being given in addition to what the plaintiff has lost, it would be right to follow the pattern of the statement of claim and F make a deduction each year (the life of the plant being ten years) of ten per cent. from the net profits, as was originally done in the statement of claim. Counsel for the defendants has submitted, as being his minimum submission, that in any event there should be such a deduction from the damages as awarded. To that extent I for my part would accede to his submission. I would say that G the damages as awarded should be reduced by three times £1,448 (being ten per cent. depreciation on the value of plant on a building of £14,480) which I think makes a deduction of £4,344. But if such a reduction is made, then, in my judgment, the result is logical and the resultant figure correct. As it seems to me, it was reasonable for the plaintiff to have limited his claim as regards profits in the way he did. There would have come a time when it would have had to be recognised as a matter of reality that the plant was no good and that the whole H project with that plant was a fiasco. Time had passed which was unproductive and that time was irretrievably lost. That being so, I should have thought it was rational for the plaintiff to say: "Well, then I limit my claim for loss of profit". He would have to do his best to mitigate his loss. The defendants themselves said that the plaintiff had not done enough to mitigate his loss. The plaintiff would have to see what alternative steps he could take to make such profit in business as he had hoped to make as a result of a satisfaction by the defendants of the warranty that they gave in regard to the machine that they had sold. Hence I think that it was reasonable to limit the claim.

Then counsel for the defendants presents a formidable submission. He says: "If profits are claimed in that way, it should have been proved that there would have been profits during the remaining seven years of the life of this plant", and he submits that the limitation by the plaintiff of his claim to a period of three years has brought about the result that the plaintiff has not proved profits beyond three years and cannot say that there would have been profits beyond the three years. I have not felt myself able to accede to that part of counsel's submissions. It does not seem to me that it was implicit in the limitation recorded by the delivery of particulars, nor by what was said by counsel for the plaintiff at the hearing, that the plaintiff was saying: "Not only do I limit my claim to a period of three years, but I state that profits would not have been made thereafter and I acknowledge that it ought not to be open to anyone to say that profits would be made thereafter". It seems to me that the whole tenor of the judgment of the learned official referee was that the plaintiff would have made profitable use of this machine had the warranty been satisfied, and would have made it over the period of the life of the machine. The contention that the whole thing would have been a "white elephant" and that there would have been no markets failed. The learned official referee took the view that it was shown to him that there would have been demands for the product. The figures at which he arrived showed a crescendo. They showed better results as the second year succeeded the first and the third the second. It seems to me that it would be unreal to think (following counsel for the defendants' submission) that, at the end of three years, profits would fade away, that after the rising tide there would be an evaporation and that nothing would be there. Indeed, I read the sentence from the judgment of the learned official referee:

"These obviously must be very largely in the nature of guesses, but if I have over-estimated them it must be remembered that I am giving the plaintiff no damages for loss of profit after the end of three years", as meaning, not that there would not be profits at the end of three years, but that there would be profits, but that no claim for them was made. I take the view that it was almost implicit in the success of the plaintiff in defeating the attack on his claim in regard to profits that it was shown that the profits were not such that they would disappear at the end of the period in regard to which the plaintiff limited them. For those reasons I think that the basis of the claim that was pleaded set out a reasonable way to state the claim for damages. The plaintiff at the end of a period found that it was wasted time, and he said: "I want in the first place to avoid being out of pocket, and I want just to make good my loss: that is the first thing". But he says: "In addition, as I cannot start again for some time, I want what I have actually lost, that is to say, what would have come to my pocket by way of profits during that period". I think that that amount should be the amount of the net profit after making the appropriate allocation (or whatever word is used, and the word "depreciation" may not be a happy one) that would have been made year by year so as to wipe out the purchase price of the article. I, therefore, think that with that important modification of the view and the figure reached by the learned official referee, the appropriate basis of damages would be established. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to the sum awarded by the official referee less £4,344.

I do not desire to add anything with regard to the cross-appeal. For the reasons SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has stated, I do not feel that the cross-appeal can succeed.

The plaintiff submitted that the defendants had no right to set off the liquidated amount of the counterclaim against unlimited damages awarded in the action, that the award was, therefore, more than the sum paid into court and that the order as to costs below should not be disturbed. The defendants contended that there should be a set-off, thereby reducing the award below the sum in court, and that they were entitled to the costs of the action since the date of payment in.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: The question now arises in regard to costs because there was a payment into court in January, 1953, of a sum of £10,000. The nature of the claim was one for damages for breach of warranty, an unliquidated sum, and by the defence there was a claim to set off, or, alternatively, A a counterclaim for, the unpaid balance of the purchase price, £1,078. I do not forget that in the particulars of the damage in the statement of claim, there appears at the end the item "Subtract balance of the purchase price . . . £1,078". I am prepared to assume (without deciding) that the cross-claim (to use a negative term) of the defendants was a proper subject-matter of equitable set-off. But that does not necessarily decide this matter since costs are B always in the discretion of the court. The considerable argument which we have heard has, to my mind, shown a degree of ambiguity as to the effect of the payment in, illustrated, for example, by the questions: What would have been the position if the plaintiff had taken out the £10,000? Would the defendants then necessarily have been prevented from pursuing their counterclaim? That is one C matter for consideration. Another is the general nature of the case as it was fought. It lasted, we are told, some thirteen days before the official referee, and a great part of that time must have been occupied by the defendants' contention that the plaintiff was under an illusion in thinking that this business of pulverising and selling the clay would ever have been a profitable commercial enterprise in any circumstances. Bearing all those considerations in mind, I think that the D fair result is to say that the plaintiff recovers his costs (of the claim and counter-claim) to the extent ordered by the official referee up to the date of payment into court, but that thereafter there should be no costs of the trial on either side. The defendants must be entitled to their costs of this appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

E MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Judgment varied by substituting £10,521 5s. 9d. for £16,813 7s. 2d. Judgment for defendants on counterclaim for £1,078.

Solicitors: Herbert Smith & Co., agents for Parker, Warskett & Chapman, Sheffield (for the appellants); Kimbers, Williams, Sweetland & Stinson, agents for Humphries, Kirk & Miller, Wareham, Dorset (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at Law.]

STARKOWSKI (by his next friend) v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND OTHERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), June 30, July 1, 2, 6, 7, November 12, 1953.]

Conflict of Laws—Legitimation—Validity of Austrian marriage—Retrospective effect of Austrian legislation—Determination according to Austrian law—Legitimacy Act, 1926 (c. 60), s. 1 (1).

On May 19, 1945, H. went through a ceremony of marriage in Austria with R. according to the rites of the Roman Catholic faith. At that time the German Marriage Law of 1938, which required that a marriage, to be valid, must be contracted before the civil authorities, was still in force. On June 26, 1945, an order was published by the provisional government of Austria, to take effect on June 30, 1945, by s. 3 (1) of which: "Marriages which were solemnized during the period from Apr. 1, 1945, to the coming into force of this law before incompetent lay authorities or before ministers of a recognized church or religious community have the effect of a marriage solemnized at a register office in accordance with . . . the Marriage Law of . . . 1938, as from the day of solemnization, as soon as they have been registered in the Family Book kept by the register office." In July, 1945, R. and H. left Austria for Italy, and in the autumn of 1946 they came to England, where they lived together as man and wife until 1947, when they separated. Subsequently, H. met M., and on Mar. 27, 1949, she gave birth to C., the petitioner, of whom M. was the father. On July 18, 1949, the ceremony of marriage between R. and H. of May 19, 1945, was registered in accordance with the order of June 26, 1945, of the Austrian provisional government. On Feb. 11, 1950, H. went through a form of marriage with M. at a register office, he being a bachelor and domiciled in England. C. petitioned for a declaration that M. and H. were lawfully married and that he, C., was rendered legitimate by and from the date of such marriage.

HELD: a foreign validating Act with retroactive effect dealing with the form of marriage, with consequential effect on the status of persons domiciled outside the legislating country, was a law concerning the formality of marriage and not a law affecting status and the registration required to render the marriage in Austria valid was an administrative act, not necessarily dependent on the will of the parties; the principle applicable was that the validity of marriage, as regards formalities, was governed by the lex loci celebrationis, and, therefore, although the ceremony of May 19, 1945, between H. and R. was originally invalid, it became a valid marriage under Austrian law as from the date of solemnization when it was registered in July, 1949; accordingly, at the time of the second ceremony in February, 1950, H. was a married woman whose husband was still alive, her marriage with M. was invalid, and C. was not entitled to a declaration of legitimacy.

Lynch v. Paraguay Provisional Government (1871) (L.R. 2 P. & D. 268), distinguished.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL ([1952] 2 All E.R. 616), affirmed.

AS TO THE LAW GOVERNING THE VALIDITY OF MARRIAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, pp. 285-288, paras. 341, 342; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. II, pp. 458-462, Nos. 927-952.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Berthiaume v. Dastous, [1930] A.C. 79; 99 L.J.P.C. 66; 142 L.T. 54; Digest Supp.
- (2) Luna v. Godin, 10 Chumet (1881), 621.

- (3) Doe d. Breakey v. Breakey, (1845), 2 U.C.R. 349; 27 Digest, Replacement, 66, 142.
- (4) Salvesen (or Von Lorang) v. Austrian Property Administrator, [1927] A.C. 641; 96 L.J.P.C. 105; 137 L.T. 571; Digest Supp.
- (5) Lynch v. Paraguay Provisional Government, (1871), L.R. 2 P. & D. 268; 40 L.J.P. & M. 81; 25 L.T. 164; 35 J.P. 761; 11 Digest, Replacement, 394, 513.
- A (6) Re Luck, [1940] 3 All E.R. 307; [1940] Ch. 864; 109 L.J.Ch. 380; 164 L.T. 172; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the petitioner from an order of the Court of Appeal (SOMERVELL, DENNING and ROMER, L.J.J.), dated July 30, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 616, affirming an order of BARNARD, J., dated Feb. 18, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 495, on a petition for a declaration of legitimacy under the

B Legitimacy Act, 1926, s. 1 (1), and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 17 (1). The Court of Appeal held that the principle that a marriage valid according to the lex loci celebrationis was valid everywhere applied even though that law was not the law of the domicile, and was not confined to a marriage which was valid according to the lex at the date of the ceremony, but extended to a marriage which was invalid at that date but was validated retrospectively C by subsequent legislation; that under the order of June 26, 1945, the ceremony between H. and R., although originally invalid, became a valid marriage under Austrian law as from the date of solemnization when it was registered in July, 1949, and, even if, at the date of the second ceremony on Feb. 11, 1950, H. had acquired an English domicile, on that date she was a married woman whose husband was still alive; and, therefore, her marriage with M. was invalid, and D the petitioner was not entitled to the declaration he sought.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and Dobry for the appellant.

Simon, Q.C., and Colin Duncan for the Attorney-General.

The House took time for consideration.

Nov. 12. The following opinions were read.

E LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinions which will be delivered by my noble and learned friends, LORDS TUCKER and COHEN, and I agree with them. The marriage ceremony which took place in Austria on May 19, 1945, was clearly F validated by the laws of that country before Feb. 11, 1950, when the appellant's mother went through a form of marriage with his father in Croydon. For the reasons given by my noble and learned friends, the appellant's mother must be regarded as having been already a married woman when the latter event took place, and this appeal must be dismissed.

I express no opinion as to the results which might have followed if the ceremony at Croydon had taken place before the order of the Austrian provisional G government had come into force, or before the ceremony in Austria had been registered in accordance with that order.

H LORD REID: My Lords, the appellant was born in London in 1949. His parents went through a ceremony of marriage at Croydon in 1950 and the appellant, by his next friend, now seeks a declaration that that marriage was valid and that he was legitimated by it. The question is whether that marriage was valid, and that depends on whether a previous marriage of the appellant's mother, Henrica, to the respondent, Urbanski, is to be regarded by the law of England as valid. In 1945 Henrica and Urbanski were domiciled in Poland and resident in Austria. Henrica was pregnant by Urbanski and they wished to marry. During the German occupation the law of Austria had been changed so as to require a civil marriage. There was some difficulty about arranging a civil marriage and the priest at Kitzbushel, where they then were, refused to marry them. But when the Germans were driven out there was much confusion and the priest agreed to marry them. They were married in a Roman Catholic church on May 19, 1945. It is admitted that that was not then a legally valid marriage. On June 30, 1945, a new law came into force in Austria making civil marriage unnecessary: with regard to a religious marriage which had already been solemnized without a civil marriage it provided for the priest sending particulars to the civil registry and enacted that such a marriage should be valid as from the day of solemnization as soon as it had been registered in the civil registry. Owing to some oversight the priest at Kitzbuehel failed to forward particulars until 1949, but on July 18, 1949, the marriage was duly registered. It is admitted that before this date the law of Austria would not have regarded the parties as married, but that after this date the law of Austria would have regarded them as married and as having been validly married on May 19, 1945.

Before 1949 the parties had become domiciled in England. It was really not disputed that, if the question of their status had arisen when they first became domiciled here, neither the law of Austria nor the law of England could have regarded them as legally married, and it was not maintained that the law of Poland is relevant in this case. The question to be determined is whether the law of England can give effect to the retrospective Austrian legislation, and the present case appears to me to be indistinguishable from a simple case where two English people domiciled here go through a ceremony of marriage in another country which is invalid in form and return to this country, and then retrospective legislation is enacted in that country which validates the marriage in that country as from the date of its celebration. If the Attorney-General is right, then it is possible for foreign legislation to alter the status of English people who were neither domiciled, resident nor present in the foreign country when the legislation was passed, nor at any time thereafter. It is certainly unusual that foreign legislation should have that effect whether it purports to be retrospective or not, but I do not think that it can be laid down as a universal rule that it can never have that effect, and, therefore, it is necessary to consider more closely the circumstances of cases like the present case.

It has long been settled that the formal validity of a marriage must be determined by the law of the place where the marriage was celebrated. But if there has been retrospective legislation there, then a further question arises: Are we to take the law of that place as it was when the marriage was celebrated, or are we to inquire what the law of that place now is with regard to the formal validity of that marriage? This question does not appear to have arisen for decision in England. There are many cases in which there have been statements of high authority of the general principle and of its application in various circumstances, but I do not think it helpful to analyse these statements of the law. I can find nothing to indicate that the present question was even in contemplation in any of these cases, and, at best, one could only make a speculative inference from words used as to what their author might have thought if he had had to consider the present question. Some other authorities were cited, but they do not appear to me to carry one very far. To my mind, the best way of approaching this question is to consider the consequences of a decision in either sense. The circumstances are such that no decision can avoid creating some possible hard cases, but if a decision in one sense will, on the whole, lead to much more just and reasonable results, that appears to me to be a strong argument in its favour. Cases calling for retrospective legislation have frequently occurred in England. The common case is that some fact has been discovered which shows that marriages celebrated in particular circumstances were invalid: sometimes many marriages extending over a long period were involved, but no one had suspected that these marriages were other than valid. It was then thought proper to pass legislation which had the effect of validating these marriages ab initio. If that had not been done there would have been great confusion and, in many cases, great injustice. It can be assumed that some of the marriages involved were between persons domiciled in other countries, and similar cases may well have occurred abroad. Persons domiciled in England may have been married in another country by ceremonies apparently valid but later discovered to be invalid, and retrospective legislation may then have been passed in that country. If people have lived, and acted, and brought up families, in the reasonable belief that they were married, it is highly desirable that the law should recognise some practical way of neutralising a belated and fortuitous discovery that their marriage was formally invalid. But if retrospective legislation in the country where the marriage was celebrated is to be of no avail to persons domiciled outside that country, it will seldom be possible for the country of their domicile to afford any remedy. If validating legislation is passed soon after the cause of the invalidity has been discovered, it is not easy to see how any practical difficulties or hardships can result from it. But serious difficulties could arise if there were a long interval between the discovery of the invalidity and the remedial legislation. If the spouses are still living together when the invalidity is discovered, they can avoid most of the difficulties by re-marrying. But if they have separated they would be in the position of knowing that they are, for the moment, unmarried, but are liable at any time to become married against their wishes by retrospective legislation. It was argued that we should only recognise foreign retrospective legislation if the spouses in some way consented to its operation, but that argument is based on a misapprehension of what such retrospective legislation sets out to do. It has no concern with the state of affairs at the time when it is enacted: its purpose is to validate the original ceremony, and, if there was then the necessary consent to marry, that is all that matters. Then it was argued that no valid consent was given in this case at the ceremony in 1945 because the wife Henrica knew that the ceremony was insufficient to constitute a legal marriage; but it is not proved that the husband Urbanski also knew that, and the wife cannot be heard to say that her consent freely given in church was not a consent to marry. I need not consider what the position would be if both parties knew at the time that the ceremony was insufficient in law. It was suggested in argument that the law of England might recognise foreign retrospective legislation subject to certain qualifications or exceptions. For example, it was said that if one of the parties had entered into another marriage before the retrospective legislation took effect, then a different rule should apply; and it was suggested that if an English court of competent jurisdiction had decided that either party was unmarried, then subsequent retrospective foreign legislation should not affect that decision. It would not be proper to attempt to decide such questions in advance, but I shall assume for the purpose of the present argument that such exceptions would not be made and that a person who knew that his marriage abroad was invalid for want of form might be left in complete uncertainty if the circumstances were such as to make it at all reasonable to suppose that validating legislation might be passed. If that is so, there is at first sight compelling force in the appellant's argument that a person ought at any time to be able to find out with certainty whether he or she is married or not, and that the law of England ought not to recognise a principle which may result in a person being for the moment unmarried in law but knowing that he is liable to become married retrospectively. If there were any substantial likelihood of this happening I would be inclined to agree, but one must look at realities. I find it difficult to suppose that in any country there would be substantial delay in deciding whether to legislate retrospectively once the reason for the invalidity had come to light, and I cannot think that anyone who had discovered that his marriage was formally invalid would for long be in any real doubt whether there was to be remedial legislation. In the present case, remedial legislation was promptly enacted and this could have been discovered and, indeed, may have been known to the parties: it was only by a mischance that the necessary executive action in Austria was delayed for four years.

Accordingly, in my opinion, the balance of justice and convenience is clearly in favour of recognising the validity of such retrospective legislation (subject, it may be, to some exceptions) and the objections to doing so are not substantial and are not founded on any compelling principle. Once it is settled that the formal validity of a marriage is to be determined by reference to the law of the place of celebration, there is no compelling reason why the reference should not be to that law as it is when the question arises for decision. I, therefore, agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, by a petition under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, and s. 17 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, the infant appellant, suing by his mother as his next friend, sought a declaration that his mother and one Starkowski were lawfully married on Feb. 11, 1950, at the register office of Croydon in the county of Surrey, and that by this marriage he became legitimated as from the date of the said marriage. The Attorney-General was made respondent to the proceedings and Starkowski and one Urbanski and Barbara Urbanska were parties cited. The petitioner and parties cited are of Polish nationality, and, for convenience, they were referred to in the courts below by the anglicised versions of their christian names. The infant petitioner was called Christopher, his mother Henrica, and his father, one of the parties cited, Michael. The other parties cited were called Richard and Barbara. I shall, accordingly, continue to refer to them by these names.

The facts are conveniently set out in the judgment of BARNARD, J., as follows. Henrica and Richard were born in Cracow in Poland and lived there until the autumn of 1944, when they moved to Kitzbuehel in Austria. Henrica was then pregnant. They were both Roman Catholics and anxious to be married in a church by a priest. Owing to the German occupation of Austria there were difficulties in their way, but eventually, on May 19, 1945, they went through a ceremony of marriage according to the rites of their church in the parish church at Kitzbuehel. On June 12, 1945, Barbara, the third party cited, the child of that union, was born. On June 16, 1945, she was registered as an illegitimate child, but on July 16, 1945, was baptised as legitimate. Richard and Henrica lived together as man and wife until 1947, when they separated. In July, 1945, they had left Austria with Barbara for Italy, and in the autumn of 1946 they arrived in England. Towards the end of 1947, or early in 1948, Henrica met Michael, and on Mar. 27, 1949, she gave birth to the petitioner, Christopher, of whom Michael was the father. On Feb. 11, 1950, Henrica went through a form of marriage with Michael at the register office in Croydon, he being a bachelor and having by that time acquired an English domicile. The trial judge has found as a fact that, assuming she was a feme sole when she came to England, Henrica had also by that time acquired a domicile in this country. The learned judge accepted the evidence of three expert witnesses to the effect that, by the German marriage law which was still in force at Kitzbuehel on May 19, 1945, the religious ceremony which Richard and Henrica went through on that date did not constitute a valid legal marriage. On Apr. 27, 1945, Austria had been liberated, but by an order of the provisional government published on May 1, 1945, although certain of the German laws were repealed, the marriage law was for the time being confirmed. On June 26, 1945, the Austrian provisional government published Order No. 31 to come into force on June 30, 1945. The relevant sections are as follows:

"Section 3 (1): Marriages which were solemnized during the period from Apr. 1, 1945, to the coming into force of this law before incompetent lay authorities or before ministers of a recognised church or religious community have the effect of a marriage solemnized at a register office in accordance with ss. 15 et seq. of the Marriage Law of July 6, 1938*, as from the day of solemnization, as soon as they have been registered in the Family Book kept by the register office. (2) The offices in which such marriages have been solemnized shall forward without delay to the register office which would have been competent to solemnize the marriage at the time of its solemnization in respect of the bridegroom, true copies of the entries made in the marriage register showing exactly the words, figures and letters . . . Section 5 (1): The register offices are to enter in their register the occurrences affecting personal status communicated to them in accordance with s. 3 and s. 4."

Section 4 is a section dealing with the registration of births and deaths. For reasons which were not explained the ceremony of May 19, 1945, was not registered in accordance with s. 3 and s. 5 until July 18, 1949. Accordingly, the question for decision was whether, immediately before the ceremony at Croydon on Feb. 11, 1950, Henrica was, or was not, already validly married to Richard according to private international law as applied by the courts of this country. BARNARD, J., answered this question in the affirmative, rejected the petition of the petitioner, and declared that the marriage solemnized on Feb. 11, 1950, was not a valid marriage, and that the petitioner, Christopher, born on Mar. 27, 1949, was not legitimated for the purpose of the Legitimacy Act, 1926. This decision was confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Counsel for the Attorney-General, in supporting the judgments of the courts below, submitted that the case was governed by the well-established rule of private international law that, so far as formalities are concerned, the validity of marriage is governed by the lex loci celebrationis, and he cited the well-known passage to this effect in the speech of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in Berthiaume v. Dastous (1) ([1930] A.C. 83), and other authorities to the like effect. Counsel for the appellant did not dispute this principle, but contended that an equally well-established rule of private international law was applicable to the facts in this case, viz., that the courts of one country will not recognise the extra-territorial effect of a foreign statute on the status of a person not domiciled in, or the subject of, the legislating state. The problem is whether a foreign validating Act with retroactive effect dealing with the form of marriage, but with consequential effect on the status of persons domiciled outside the legislating country, should be treated as a law concerning the formality of marriage or as a law affecting status.

My Lords, at one time I felt some doubts whether, on its special facts, this case did, in truth, involve a conflict between these two principles, having regard to the fact that at the date of the coming into force of the validating order of June 26, 1945, Henrica and Richard were still resident within the jurisdiction of the country where they had gone through the marriage ceremony, and the registration of the marriage was merely an administrative act which should have been carried out immediately after the ceremony but which happened to have been delayed until the parties had left and acquired a fresh domicile elsewhere. On consideration, however, I have reached the conclusion that the date of registration is the material date in this connection and that the position is the same as if Order 31, having immediate retroactive effect without the necessity for registration, had been enacted on July 18, 1949. Which, then, of these two conflicting principles should your Lordships—in the absence of authority—apply to this case? Whichever is chosen must inevitably result in hardship to one or other of the children whose legitimacy is in question.

My Lords, I feel little doubt that it is the former that should prevail and be regarded as an exception to the latter, or rather, perhaps, that the latter should be interpreted as referring to laws directly affecting status as distinct from those which deal with form and only have indirect or consequential effect on status. What influences me most in reaching this conclusion is that there is no field of legislation which has been so fruitful of retrospective validating legislation in this country as that of marriages invalid for lack of some requisite formality. Your Lordships were referred to more than fifty of such statutes between 1780 and 1939. Seventeen of these Acts deal exclusively with marriages outside the United Kingdom in territories, or portions of territory, regarded for certain purposes as notionally British soil, and generally apply only where one or both of the parties is a British subject, but the remainder deal with marriages in the United Kingdom and in no single instance is the validity made to depend on the domicile of the parties at the date of marriage or at the date of the Act. The legislature of this country has clearly assumed competence to pass legislation validating informal marriages contracted here irrespective of domicile or nationality. It would seem to be in accord with comity and with principle that our courts should recognise the validity of similar foreign laws dealing with an aspect of marriage, viz., formality, which has always been recognised as governed by the lex loci celebrationis. There are other reasons for accepting this view, the most cogent of which are, I think, as follows: (i) Since a marriage, even if valid by the law of domicile, is regarded as invalid if not in conformity with the law of the place of celebration, it would seem illogical if this same law cannot retrospectively cure the invalidity. (ii) The legislature of the place of celebration is more likely to be cognisant of the informality, and, accordingly, more likely to afford the necessary statutory relief.

* German Official Gazette, I, p. 807.

A number of authorities were cited in argument and several of them are referred to in the judgments of the courts below. None really deals with the problem which now arises for decision for the first time. It is, however, satisfactory to find that in the case of Luna v. Godin (2), the French courts accepted the principle of private international law which BARNARD, J., and the Court of Appeal considered applicable. It would not, I think, be right to found too much on the language of ROBINSON, C.J., in the Canadian case of Doe d. Breakey v. Breakey (3), because he was, in fact, dealing with an imperial statute which was binding on him, but he did say (2 U.C.R. 357):

"Now, if none of the exceptions in the statute prevent its applying for the purposes of this action, and if the marriage were by that Act made valid in Ireland merely, it follows that we must treat it here as having been a valid marriage at the time it was solemnized; for it is the lex loci that must govern."

There is also a sentence in the speech of VISCOUNT HALDANE in Salvesen (or Von Lorang) v. Austrian Property Administrator (4), which seems to be in accord with the view I have endeavoured to express. That case decided that when the parties to a marriage are domiciled in a foreign country a decree of nullity of marriage pronounced by a competent court of that country will, in the absence of fraud or collusion, be recognised as binding and conclusive by the courts of England and Scotland unless it offends against British notions of substantial justice. In the course of his speech to this effect VISCOUNT HALDANE said ([1927] A.C. 651):

"No later French law which would apply nor any circumstances had cured the invalidity thus brought about."

With regard to the case of Lynch v. Paraguay Provisional Government (5), where it was held that succession to property in England of a deceased foreigner is governed by the law of the place of his domicile at the time of his death, and that no subsequent retrospective legislation would be recognised as affecting the distribution of his personal property in England, I agree with the observation of BARNARD, J., that that case decided that the relevant date was the time of death, whereas in the present case the relevant date is that of the second ceremony and that, consequently, the decision is one which would have been of more assistance to the petitioner if the second ceremony had preceded the registration of the first marriage. Re Luck (6) was a case where the Court of Appeal, by a majority, held that, as the father of an illegitimate child, born in California, had not acquired a domicile of choice in California at the date of the child's birth, a declaration of adoption, after he acquired domicile, which, by Californian law, was effective to legitimate the child as from birth, could not be recognised by the courts in this country. In that case it was not disputed that the law of domicile had to be applied, but the question was whether domicile at the date of the child's birth or domicile at the date of the declaration of adoption was to be looked at. In the course of the majority judgment, however, there are passages in which SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., and LUXMOORE, L.J., assume that no provision of foreign law will be recognised here as effective to change the status of a person not domiciled in the foreign country at the time, except, perhaps, where the law of the country in which such person is domiciled would itself recognise such foreign law. This language was used with reference to laws expressly directed to the alteration of status, and the court was not concerned to express any view as to the indirect effect on status of foreign law dealing with the formalities of marriage which have always been recognised as being within the province of foreign law. I do not, therefore, consider that any real assistance is to be derived from that case.

It was further contended by the appellant that in any event there was no evidence that Henrica had consented to the registration of the marriage and insufficient evidence that she had consented to marry in that she knew that the ceremony was invalid by Austrian law. So far as registration is concerned, this being a mere administrative requirement in no way dependent on the will of the parties, it is clear that want of consent on her part is immaterial. As to consent to the marriage, the learned trial judge has made no finding, but it is to be observed that, although there was evidence that the parties knew that such a ceremony was invalid prior to the liberation of Austria, it is by no means clear that they were aware that, after the liberation, which had taken place before the marriage, such a ceremony was still invalid. But, in any event, in my opinion, it would be impossible to hold that there is such an absence of consent as to vitiate the marriage where the parties have gone through a form of marriage in accordance with the rites of the Roman Catholic church with the intention of creating a union binding on them in the eyes of the church to which they belong.

I do not consider it necessary or desirable to express any opinion as to whether it follows from this decision that the result would necessarily be the same if the parties had acquired a domicile here and contracted a marriage valid by the law of this country before the passing of the foreign validating statute.

For the reasons stated above and those contained in the judgment of BARNARD, J., and the Court of Appeal, I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading, in print, the opinion of my noble friend, LORD TUCKER. I agree in general with his reasoning, and, in particular, with his analysis of the authorities, none of which seems to me to be helpful in relation to the facts of this case. I desire to add nothing under the last head, and only a few sentences on the more general issue.

This House has strongly affirmed the principle "locus regit actum": Berthiaume v. Dastous (1) ([1930] A.C. 83). Where two persons, neither of them domiciled in country A, enter into a ceremony or formalities which, according to the laws of that country, constitute a valid marriage, the law of England will recognise that marriage as valid. I can see no material distinction in this regard between the observance, as between the parties, of formalities which suffice to make a marriage valid ab initio according to the local law and of formalities which are not so sufficient but the insufficiency of which is (almost immediately in this case) repaired by a validating Act of country A's legislature. Here, the marriage ceremony took place in Austria in May, 1945, and the validating Act was passed in June, taking effect from the thirtieth of that month. True, it contained a provision that the validation should not be complete until the irregular marriage was entered in a certain register and that there was a delay of four years in so entering it. But before the second ceremony of marriage was performed, the triple complex (ceremony, validation, and registration) was complete in relation to the first marriage, and the parties were validly married. The registration was, in my view, a mere ministerial act, not necessarily dependent on the will of the parties—a mere by-product or corollary of what happened in 1945, to which year it may not unreasonably be related back. But whether its actual date is taken as decisive, or whether it can be antedated notionally by four years, the fact remains that all three of the requirements necessary to validate the first marriage had been fulfilled before the marriage ceremony of 1950 was solemnized. The question what was the precise matrimonial status of the parties between 1945 and the date of registration (1949) is by no means easy, but it does not arise on the facts of the present case. There is no rule of English private international law which precisely covers the facts of this case. The appellant suggested that retrospective validating Acts were repugnant to English public policy, and that English public policy was a factor to which weight should be attributed in moulding the rules of English private international law, or in adapting them to new combinations of fact. I would not demur to the second of these propositions, but the history of our domestic legislation seems to me destructive of the first. The table of validating English statutes produced by the respondents seemed to me decisive on this point. Validating Acts may, of course, result in some hard cases, often with the object of obviating a larger body of hard cases. Nevertheless, our legislature has endured and indulged them on a very large scale, and the argument so far as based on public policy would seem to be ill founded.

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD COHEN: My Lords, the question for your decision was correctly and succinctly stated by BARNARD, J., as follows ([1952] 1 All E.R. 501):

“ Were both parties [to the marriage which was celebrated at Croydon] free to marry on Feb. 11, 1950 ? ”

It was common ground between the parties before your Lordships that the correct answer to this question depends on the further question whether the ceremony of marriage celebrated in the parish church at Kitzbuehel on May 19, 1945, was a valid form of marriage, and that this further question must be determined by the law of Austria. The appellant contended that the law of Austria to be applied is the law as it stood on May 19, 1945, whereas counsel for the Attorney-General argued that the law applicable was that law as amended down to Feb. 11, 1950.

The general principle that the validity of a marriage as regards form is governed by the lex loci celebrationis is not in dispute, and counsel for the Attorney-General took us through a number of cases in England and Scotland in which that principle has been stated in terms wide enough to support his contention that the question must be answered as the courts of the place of celebration would have answered it on the date at which it became material to determine the question (in this case Feb. 11, 1950), but in none of the cases was the attention of the court or of this House directed to the particular point which your Lordships have to decide. I do not, therefore, find it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any of those authorities except Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (4). In that case it became necessary to determine the validity of a decree of nullity granted in 1924 by a German court in regard to a marriage celebrated in Paris in the year 1897 between an Austrian citizen and a British subject then domiciled in Scotland. At the time of the decree the parties were clearly domiciled at Wiesbaden in Germany. The evidence established that the parties had not, in 1897, complied with the requirements of French law as to residence and publication, and the German court, acting on the principle locus regit actum, declared the marriage null and void. VISCOUNT HALDANE, in setting out the facts, said ([1927] A.C. 651):

“The [German] court satisfied itself that the marriage had been constituted neither in accordance with the conditions required by French law nor in accordance with those required by the law of the domicile. No later French law which would apply nor any circumstances had cured the invalidity thus brought about.”

A The italics are mine. Counsel for the Attorney-General submitted, I think correctly, that the reference to “later French law” would have been irrelevant had VISCOUNT HALDANE not thought that a later French law retrospectively validating the defective ceremony would have altered the position. Counsel for the appellant pointed out that even if this is the correct
B inference to be drawn from VISCOUNT HALDANE’S speech, it is in the nature of dictum, and they emphasised the inconveniences which would arise from the acceptance of the argument of counsel for the Attorney-General. Thus, an Englishman who had been through a defective ceremony abroad would never know whether he was married or single. If, relying on the ceremony being invalid, he entered in England into a marriage undoubtedly
C valid at the time it was celebrated, he might find doubts cast on this marriage if subsequent to the date thereof a decree similar to Order No. 31 in the present case were passed in the country where the original ceremony took place declaring it to be a valid form of marriage as from the date of solemnization. That difficulty does not arise in the present case, and I do not propose to express an opinion as to how the doubts ought in such a case to be resolved. I would observe,
D however, that other difficulties would arise from the acceptance of the arguments for the appellant. The parties to the marriage abroad might live and die in ignorance that there was any doubt as to the validity of the marriage ceremony. Yet, unless those doubts could be removed by a validating law passed in the country where the ceremony took place, the courts of this country might be bound to hold that the children of the marriage were illegitimate. Counsel for
E the appellant argued that recognition in the courts of this country of the validity of an Act passed by the Parliament of the place of celebration retrospectively validating a defective ceremony would infringe the principle that the law of the domicile regulates essentials as distinct from forms, since such retroactive legislation might have the effect of altering the status of a person from single to married. This argument at first attracted me, but on consideration I do not see
F that it gives any greater power to the foreign law to affect status than is necessarily involved in the principle locus regit actum. Moreover, the law favours the validity of marriage and Parliament in this country has never hesitated to pass retroactive legislation to cure defects in form. Your Lordships’ attention was called to a large number of such statutes an instance of which was the Greek Marriage Act, 1884. As counsel for the Attorney-General pointed out,
G the legislature of the place of celebration is more likely than the legislature of the place of domicile to become cognisant of informality and more likely, therefore, to grant the necessary statutory relief.

I must refer to two cases on which counsel for the appellant particularly relied. The first was Lynch v. Paraguay Provisional Government (5). In that case a domiciled Paraguayan died in Paraguay leaving personal property in England.
H After his death, but before a grant was made in England, a decree of the government of Paraguay purported to confiscate all his property wherever situate. The government of Paraguay opposed the grant of probate in England to the person who was universal legatee at the date of death, but LORD PENZANCE, in delivering judgment, pointed out the inconvenience and injustice which might arise from any other conclusion than that which he proceeded to state and, in the absence of authority to the contrary, held himself bound, in deciding who was entitled to a grant, to have regard only to the law of the place of domicile as that law existed at the time of death. The subject-matter with which LORD PENZANCE was dealing is, however, so remote from the question before your Lordships that I cannot regard his observations as throwing any light on the present case, especially when I remember that under the law of England probate of a will when granted relates back to the date of death. In Re Luck (6) the question at issue was whether a child, illegitimate by the law of England at the date of its birth, of a person domiciled in England at that date would be recognised, by the law of England, as the legitimate child of that person if he was subsequently legitimated by adoption according to the law of California, in which State the father had by then acquired domicile. The Court of Appeal, applying the principle adopted by English courts in regard to legitimation by subsequent marriage, held that by the law of the father's domicile at the date of the son's birth, the relationship was immutably that of putative father and illegitimate child and nothing thereafter could change it. LUXMOORE, L.J., delivering the judgment of himself and SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., posed this question ([1940] 3 All E.R. 316):

"Will the English courts recognise the power of Californian law retrospectively to affect the status of a person in respect of a period when that status was subject to the law of England . . . ?"

LUXMOORE, L.J., went on to say that, having regard to the view which he and SIR WILFRID GREENE took on the broader issues of the case, it was unnecessary to answer this question. Counsel for the appellant, however, submitted that it is clear from the judgment that they would have answered it in the negative. I do not find it necessary to consider whether counsel is right or whether the answer he suggests that the Court of Appeal would have given to the question is correct, for in Re Luck (6) their Lordships were dealing with an issue which was admittedly governed by the law of the domicile, whereas your Lordships have to deal with a question which the law of the domicile refers to the law of the place of celebration.

In my opinion, therefore, there is no reported case which supports the arguments advanced on behalf of the appellant. On the other side, there is the dictum of VISCOUNT HALDANE in Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (4), to which I have already referred, and of ROBINSON, C.J., in Doe d. Breakey v. Breakey (3) (2 U.C.R. 357), to which both BARNARD, J., and SOMERVELL, L.J., refer. These support the view expressed by SOMERVELL, L.J., with which I respectfully agree, that ([1952] 2 All E.R. 619):

"Legislative Acts of the kind in question are passed to remedy what has been done in good faith, but which turns out not to have achieved the result which the parties intended" and that there is (ibid.)

"... no reason why those who were at the time, or later became, domiciled elsewhere [than in the country where the marriage was celebrated] should be impliedly excepted from its provisions."

For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal, and would add that the fact that a similar conclusion was reached by the French courts in Luna v. Godin (2) suggests that the orders of the courts below are in accordance with a generally accepted principle of private international law.

Like my noble and learned friends, LORDS MORTON OF HENRYTON and TUCKER, I express no opinion as to the consequences which might have ensued if the ceremony at Croydon had taken place before the order of the Austrian provisional government had come into force, or before the ceremony in Austria had been registered pursuant to that order.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: George & George (for the appellant); Treasury Solicitor.

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

GOUGH v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), October 15, 16, 19, November 4, 1953.]

Child—Negligence—Allurement—Tramway track used by public and children—Slow-moving trucks—Child riding on buffers.

Licensee—Negligence—Child—Trap—Tramway track used by public and children—Slow-moving truck—Child riding on buffers.

A

The defendants used a tramway track which they owned to haul trucks up a slope at about six miles an hour. The track was unfenced and without warning signs except one at the foot of the slope, and no one accompanied the trucks and no one was on duty on the track during the upward or downward journey. The track ran near to houses and the public crossed it inter alia to go to allotments and to swimming-baths, and children played on the land and the track, to the knowledge of, and without objection by, the defendants. With the knowledge of the defendants but without their permission, children made a practice of riding on the buffers of the trucks. The plaintiff, a boy of six and a half years, who had been forbidden by his father to ride on the trucks, but who, though warned by his father of it, was found to have been not of sufficient age to have appreciated the danger, slipped while jumping off a truck on which he was riding and was injured.

B

C

HELD: (i) the plaintiff was a licensee on the land under a general licence not limited to crossing the line for specific purposes and he did not become a trespasser by riding on the truck

D

Lynch v. Nurdin (1841) (1 Q.B. 29) and dictum of DU PARCQ, L.J., in Holdman v. Hamlyn ([1943] 2 All E.R. 141), applied; Addie (R.) & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck ([1929] A.C. 358) and Hardy v. Central London Ry. Co. ([1920] 3 K.B. 459), distinguished.

E

(ii) the slow-moving trucks were to the knowledge of the defendants an allurement to children and they were a trap for the plaintiff, notwithstanding that he had been warned of the danger and forbidden to ride on the trucks, since he did not appreciate the real danger involved; and riding on the trucks was something children might have been expected to do.

(iii) the defendants were, therefore, under a duty to take reasonable care to prevent injury to the children and, having failed in that duty, were liable to the plaintiff for negligence. ✓

F

AS TO THE DEGREE OF CARE REQUIRED TOWARDS CHILDREN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, p. 584, para. 836; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 69, 70, Nos. 441-453.

AS TO WHO IS A LICENSEE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, p. 609, para. 859; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 45, 46, Nos. 282-287.

Cases referred to:

G

(1) Latham v. Johnson (R.) & Nephew, Ltd., [1913] 1 K.B. 398; 82 L.J.K.B. 258; 108 L.T. 4; 77 J.P. 137; 36 Digest 38, 223.

(2) Scott v. Shepherd, (1773), 2 Wm. Bl. 892 (96 E.R. 525); 3 Wils. 403; 36 Digest 17, 78.

(3) Bird v. Holbrook, (1828), 4 Bing. 628; 6 L.J.O.S.C.P. 146; 130 E.R. 911; 36 Digest 94, 629.

H

(4) Lynch v. Nurdin, (1841), 1 Q.B. 29; 10 L.J.Q.B. 73; 5 J.P. 319; 113 E.R. 1041; 36 Digest 24, 118.

(5) Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor, [1922] 1 A.C. 44; 91 L.J.P.C. 49; 126 L.T. 262; 86 J.P. 89; 36 Digest 70, 453.

(6) Liddle v. North Riding of Yorkshire County Council, [1934] 2 K.B. 101; 103 L.J.K.B. 527; 151 L.T. 202; 98 J.P. 319; Digest Supp.

(7) Hardy v. Central London Ry. Co., [1920] 3 K.B. 459; 89 L.J.K.B. 1187; 124 L.T. 136; 36 Digest 71, 457.

- (8) Holdman v. Hamlyn, [1943] 2 All E.R. 137; [1943] K.B. 664; 113 L.J.K.B. 7; 169 L.T. 85; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) Cooke v. Midland & Great Western Ry. of Ireland, [1909] A.C. 229; 78 L.J.P.C. 76; 100 L.T. 626; 36 Digest 70, 450.
- (10) Addie (R.) & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck, [1929] A.C. 358; 98 L.J.P.C. 119; 140 L.T. 650; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendants against an order of FINNEMORE, J., at Cardiff Assizes, dated Mar. 31, 1953, awarding damages to the plaintiff in an action for damages for negligence.

The defendants were the owners of a tramway track on land which the public used and children played on without objection by the defendants. The plaintiff was injured through riding on a slow-moving truck on the track, following the practice of children which was known to the defendants, though not permitted by them. It was contended for the plaintiff that he was a licensee on the land, that the slow-moving trucks were an allurements to children and a trap, and that the defendants were negligent in not taking sufficient steps to prevent injury to children. The defendants contended that the plaintiff was a trespasser; that, if he was a licensee, he was a licensee only for the limited purpose of crossing the track and became a trespasser by riding on the truck; and that the slow-moving trucks were not a trap for the plaintiff since his father had warned him of the danger and forbidden him to ride on the trucks.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and W. N. Francis for the defendants.

H. Edmund Davies, Q.C., and A. T. Davies for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 4. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The Albion Colliery at Cilfynydd in South Wales is owned and worked by the National Coal Board, who were the defendants in this case. Waste from the colliery is taken up to a pit by means of what is called the tramway, which is about one thousand yards long. Eight trucks or trams are drawn up by an engine which is at the top of the slope. That happens, perhaps, twenty-four times a day. No one accompanies the trucks nor is anyone on duty on the track when the upward or the downward journey is being made.

Cilfynydd is a small mining village, and there are houses on both sides of the lower part of the track. There is no fence of any kind. Those who live in the neighbourhood, and maybe others, are allowed to pass over the track to get from one part to another. I take this passage from the evidence of the colliery manager, Mr. Williams. Counsel for the plaintiff asked the witness:

"Q.—It is within your knowledge, is it not, that grown-ups were frequently in the habit of crossing the tramlines? A.—Oh, yes. Q.—And to that you would raise no objection, of course? A.—None at all. Q.—And I suppose, in the same way, there were places where they would not cross at right-angles, but, being on the road, would walk along for a short while and then go over to the other side? A.—Yes, that has been done. Q.—And to that you take no objection? A.—No, I never have. Q.—And your attitude in regard to children would be exactly the same, if they did merely that? A.—If they did merely that. Q.—Yes. And it is a fact, is it not, that not only adults, but children, did that sort of thing in quite large numbers? A.—It was a common practice to walk, yes."

The infant plaintiff, Gerwyn Evan Gough, met with a serious accident on the track on the morning of Saturday, Dec. 2, 1950. He was then six years of age. He lived with his parents at 8, Mary Street, some eighty or one hundred yards away. He and another boy from the street went up the incline on to the track. There was a journey of trucks going up, and they jumped on, the plaintiff towards the back and the other boy on the first truck. When a little later the plaintiff jumped off he slipped and fell. His right leg was caught, and it was later amputated above the knee, leaving a short stump. It would appear from the evidence that this was by no means the first time that he had jumped on a truck, but that he was following a practice pursued by other boys. He said that he had never been stopped by anyone. It is clear, however, that the practice was not permitted by the colliery officials, though it may be questionable as to whether they had adopted any proper or sufficient means to stop a practice of which they knew. The plaintiff himself said that he knew that it was wrong to ride on the trams, that he had been told by his father and his mother not to do so, and that his father would have hit him if he had known that he was riding on them.

The plaintiff, through his father, his next friend, brought this action against the defendants alleging that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendants. The defendants denied negligence. They did not plead contributory negligence in view of the boy's age, but they pleaded that:

"The dangers of the said journeys of trams were obvious and the plaintiff knew or ought to have known of them."

The action was heard by FINNEMORE, J., at Cardiff on Mar. 16, 17 and 18, 1953, and on Mar. 31 he gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff and awarded him £4,000 damages. The defendants appeal to this court.

It is desirable that I should say a little more as to the facts. The speed of the journey of trucks is only about six miles an hour. When the colliery was in the hands of the Albion Colliery Co., there was a man riding on one of the trucks as they went up and down. That was considered a dangerous practice, and it was discontinued a good number of years ago. The Powell Duffryn Co., who were the immediate predecessors of the defendants, had a maintenance man working on the line when the journeys were made. That course has not been followed since the defendants took control, and, according to the evidence of the boy's father: "You very rarely see a man there now."

There were at least three paths across the track. Witnesses pointed out the danger arising from the road and the danger from the moving trucks. One witness, Mr. Peter Jones, a retired colliery worker, said that he thought it was dangerous for children to play on the track at all. When asked if he thought it was dangerous for him to be on the track, he gave the significant answer: "Well, I knew more than them, like, did I not?" He said he had seen children playing about there and jumping on the journeys, and that he had told them to go away. It had happened for many years past, and more since there had been no rider. Another witness, Mr. E. J. Rees, said that he used the track to go to places such as the graveyard, the public-house, or for a walk. He was asked:

"Is it a common thing for the tramline to be used by grown-ups?"

A.—Yes. About twelve months ago a whole party of them went from the chapel. The youth of the Sunday School go there. It is not private at all there, you see. We can go there, and nobody says anything. Q.—You have never been checked, I gather from your last answer? A.—I have never been checked at all. Q.—Have you ever heard any others being checked? A.—No, not at all. Q.—What about children? A.—Well, it is a funny thing; a dangerous place like that, and yet they will play there. Q.—What steps, if any, have you seen being taken when children have been playing there? A.—Well I have seen the chaps sending them from there. But they go for the time being, and then back they come again. Q.—What chaps have you seen doing that? A.—Mr. Jones. We would all congregate where the drive goes up to the manager's house, we go there and talk. Q.—You were saying that chaps had sent them away. What chaps are you speaking of now? A.—The men at the bottom of the street, you know."

I should say that point is close to the pit and is at the bottom of the hill. Then he was asked:

"Q.—Could you name some men? A.—Peter Jones is one, who has given evidence today. We have a talk down there, and the journey is just above our heads. Q.—When you say ‘down there’, do you mean Mary Street? A.—Yes. Q.—And you say the journey is—— A.—Just above our heads. Q.—And if you saw children up there on the incline, what would you do? A.—Well, I would chase them away. Q.—Merely because they were on the incline, or because the journey might be approaching? A.—Well, if a full journey is down on top of the pit, the rope does swing up and down and out, and all that is dangerous. Q.—Even though the journey be not then in sight, the fact that the rope is moving, or might be moving, up and down would render the place dangerous, in your view? A.—Yes.”

The witness was cross-examined by counsel for the defendants, and I think I ought to read these questions and answers:

“Q.—As I understand it, Mr. Rees, you are saying that the presence of children on this tram track at all would, in your view, be dangerous? A.—Oh, yes. Q.—And you would tell them to get away? A.—I have told them many times. Q.—Many times? A.—Many times. Q.—And not only you, but other people down in the town? A.—Yes, the mothers, and the people that are there. I have heard the women shouting many times. Q.—You mean it has been for many years an almost constant battle, as it were, between the children and the parents, and people like yourself, to keep them off? A.—When there was a man on the journey going up the tip, the children would be afraid of him. Q.—What time are you talking about now? A.—A few years ago now, when the old Albion company was there. Q.—That is many years ago, is it not? A.—Up to 1930. Q.—Were you a boy there then? A.—A boy? Q.—Were you, shall we say a young man, there at the time yourself? I do not know how old you are. A.—I am fifty. Q.—I am so sorry. Were you actually born in this place? A.—In Cilfynydd, yes. Q.—Did you, by any chance, as a boy ever play about on that track? A.—Not when I was a boy. I did not do it at all. Because of my hand I could not jump on the journey. I was there, though, with them. (FINNEMORE, J.): Other boys were jumping on the journeys, were they? A.—Yes, my Lord. I was afraid of my hand. (Counsel): It is an old practice, as one can well imagine. (FINNEMORE, J.): As you got older, did you ever tell boys not to do it because it was dangerous? A.—Well, I have grown up now. Q.—Did they take any notice of you if you told them? A.—Yes, the boys would go away and then come back again. Q.—They took notice while you were there? A.—Yes. (Counsel, resuming cross-examination): And then did it again when your back was turned, I suppose? A.—Yes. Q.—Is it right that practically everybody in Cilfynydd has told these children not to go on the track except colliery officials? A.—Dozens of people walk there. Q.—Not by any chance have you seen a colliery official shouting to them or telling them to get off? A.—Yes; when the empty journey comes down, it comes down into the gulley, the back lane, of Mary Street. The boys then go up on the top and put the journey on the rails. Q.—But have you never heard anybody at the colliery, not a single soul, the whole time of your recollection, ever tell the children not to do what you warned them not to do? A.—If I go back years to the Albion Colliery Co., there was a man cleaning the road there. He was there continually. Q.—The road is sometimes cleaned now, is it not, from time to time? It is dealt with from the maintenance point of view? A.—Well, not like it was then. That man was permanently on there. Q.—But there is somebody who does it now from time to time? A.—Oh, I expect so, yes.”

I have referred to this evidence in order to show the value of having someone on or near the track when the trucks were in motion. There is no doubt about the danger to children. It was well known that they used the track, and the fact that they sometimes jumped on the slowly moving trucks was well known. Mr. Oliver, an assistant at the washeries, who was called on behalf of the defendants, said that the practice of jumping on to the journeys had gone on for eighteen to twenty years, and he used these words: "Since I have been there there has always been someone jumping on the journeys." He had been employed at the colliery for forty-three years, and had at one time been traffic foreman. Mr. Williams, the manager, said that he had had reports of boys jumping on the journeys, though he had not seen it himself.

FINNEMORE, J., in the course of his judgment, said:

"There were no warning signs except one right at the bottom near the village, and I think it is common ground now that people frequently crossed this line, and children frequently crossed this line. It was a short cut to the swimming-baths, it was a way of going to certain allotments, and in addition, children played either near the line on colliery property, or actually over the line itself. In addition to these matters it appears to be true that, at all events, not so infrequently as to be a rarity, boys used to yield to the temptation of getting a ride on this tramway by standing on the buffers of one or other of the trams, often, indeed, on the buffers of two trams, one foot on each. It was whilst taking a ride of this kind that the plaintiff unfortunately fell when he was getting off, so that his right leg came under the wheel of one of the trams, with the disastrous consequences which are now fully known."

The learned judge referred to the evidence of a number of witnesses as to use of the track, and added:

"Mr. Williams, who struck me as being a perfectly frank and honest witness, the present manager, who has been there since 1949, actually put the matter beyond any dispute, because he said that it was quite a common practice to walk across the line. He knew adults frequently crossed the line and he took no objection to that, nor did he take any objection to children crossing the line if that was all that they did. I do not think it is suggested in this case—anyhow I am not satisfied—that the children were allowed to ride on the buffers of the trams without complaint. But what this all comes to for them is this, that this boy quite plainly on the evidence—it was not really disputed by counsel for the defendants at the end—was a licensee as far as going on to the colliery property and over the lines was concerned. No effort was ever made to prevent that. There was no fencing, there was no warning, and, as I have already pointed out, Mr. Williams said on the whole he did not object to it. It is quite obvious that no one had really objected to it for many years past."

Counsel for the defendants submitted that, even if the plaintiff was a licensee when he was on the track, and for the purpose of crossing the track, he became a trespasser immediately he stepped on a truck, and that, in those circumstances, the defendants were not responsible in damages. He submitted that the defendants owed no duty to the plaintiff. The difficulty of cases of this kind is well recognised. In Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (1) HAMILTON, L.J., said ([1913] 1 K.B. 413):

"Children's cases are always troublesome. English law has been very ready to find remedies for their injuries. Scotch law has been less indulgent." Then the learned lord justice referred to certain authorities and added (ibid.):

"They are the commonest cases of the general rule, which is as old as Scott v. Shepherd (2), that a person who, in neglect of ordinary care, places or leaves his property in a condition which may be dangerous to another may be answerable for the resulting injury, even though but for the intervening act of a third person or of the plaintiff himself (Bird v. Holbrook (3); Lynch v. Nurdin (4)) that injury would not have occurred. Children acting in the wantonness of infancy and adults acting on the impulse of personal peril may be and often are only links in a chain of causation extending from such initial negligence to the subsequent injury. No doubt each intervener is a causa sine qua non, but unless the intervention is a fresh, independent cause, the person guilty of the original negligence will still be the effective cause, if he ought reasonably to have anticipated such interventions and to have foreseen that if they occurred the result would be that his negligence would lead to mischief."

The learned lord justice went on to say (ibid., 415):

"Two other terms must be alluded to—a 'trap' and 'attraction' or 'allurement'. A trap is a figure of speech, not a formula. It involves the idea of concealment and surprise of an appearance of safety under circumstances cloaking a reality of danger. Owners and occupiers alike expose licensees and visitors to traps on their premises at their peril, but a trap is a relative term. In the case of an infant, there are moral as well as physical traps. There may accordingly be a duty towards infants not merely not to dig pitfalls for them, but not to lead them into temptation. 'Allurements', too, is a vague word. It may refer only to the circumstances under which the injured child has entered the close. Here it is hard to see how infantile temptations can give rights, however much they may excuse peccadilloes. A child will be a trespasser still, if he goes on private ground without leave or right, however natural it may have been for him to do so. On the other hand, the allurement may arise after he has entered with leave or as of right. Then the presence in a frequented place of some object of attraction, tempting him to meddle where he ought to abstain, may well constitute a trap, and in the case of a child too young to be capable of contributory negligence it may impose full liability on the owner or occupier, if he ought, as a reasonable man, to have anticipated the presence of the child and the attractiveness and peril of the object. Finally, what objects which attract infants to their hurt are traps even to them? Not all objects with which children hurt themselves simpliciter. A child can get into mischief and hurt itself with anything if it is young enough. In some cases the answer may rest with the jury, but it must be matter of law to say whether a given object can be a trap in the double sense of being fascinating and fatal. No strict answer has been, or perhaps ever will be, given to the question, but I am convinced that a heap of paving stones in broad daylight in a private close cannot so combine the properties of temptation and retribution as to be properly called a trap."

Part of the last passage was repeated by LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE in Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor (5) ([1922] 1 A.C. 63), and LORD SUMNER in the last case said (ibid., 67):

"Where a question as to the care to be used arises between persons using as of right the place, where they respectively act, infancy as such is no more a status conferring right, or a root of title imposing obligations on others to respect it, than infirmity or imbecility; but a measure of care appropriate to the inability or disability of those who are immature or feeble in mind or body is due from others, who know of or ought to anticipate the presence of such persons within the scope and hazard of their own operations."

Now, this child was on the track with the tacit permission of the defendants. At the time of the accident he was doing something which he might be expected to do and which, from the history, the defendants might have anticipated he, or any other boy, would probably do. The slowly moving trucks were an attraction to boys. Boys knew they ought not to get on them, but can it be said that this boy appreciated the risk he was running? He was not asked a question on that.

In Liddle v. North Riding of Yorkshire County Council (6) SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1934] 2 K.B. 112):

"In my opinion, to make the landowner liable for injury to a child on his land, it must be proved that he expressly or impliedly invited children on to his land, and either did an act which caused damage with knowledge that it might injure the children, or knowingly permitted the existence on his land of a hidden danger or trap. The invitation might be implied from knowledge that children frequented the land without interference. For obvious dangers, such as unguarded water, natural or artificial, he will not be liable."

A I do not think that any help is given by the decision in Hardy v. Central London Ry. Co. (7), for in that case it was held that the boy was fully aware that he was a trespasser in the booking hall. The submission of counsel for the defendants that the plaintiff became a trespasser when he got on the truck appears to me to be answered by a passage from the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., in Holdman v. Hamlyn (8) where he said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 141, 142):

B "It was indeed argued that the infant plaintiff was a trespasser. The truth is, however, that he was an invitee, at any rate down to the moment when the threshing machine proved an irresistible temptation. If the boy strayed beyond the strict limit imposed by the terms of the invitation, it was because of the failure of the defendant's agent to guard him against a dangerous allurement; and if he can properly be called a trespasser at all, the trespass was a natural and probable result of the negligence of the defendant's agent. A defendant who has lured an invitee into a forbidden area cannot thereafter treat him as a trespasser."

C An examination of the authorities leads me to the conclusion that, if an occupier allows children of tender years on his land, and if he has thereon something which is, to his knowledge, attractive to them and which is dangerous, he must take reasonable care to protect them from the danger. Warning may be sufficient in some cases, though not in all. What is reasonable care depends on a number of circumstances, among which are: (i) the nature of the land and the position and nature of the dangerous object; (ii) the knowledge of the occupier; and D (iii) the age of the children. Of these the last, perhaps, presents the most difficulty. E A child may know that he ought not to do something. It does not follow that he appreciates the danger or likely consequence of his doing that which he ought not to do. The plaintiff was considered to be too young to be guilty of contributory negligence, and I do not think that it ought to be held that he appreciated the danger of that which he did in the absence of any question directed to that point. The defendants might have forbidden the use of the track to persons F generally or to children. They might have fenced the track, or they might have had someone on or about the lower part of the track, where there are houses, when the tramway was in motion. They did none of these things. There is evidence that on some occasions children were chased away. Whether that was sufficient in the circumstances is a question of fact.

G The position is summarised in WINFIELD ON THE LAW OF TORT, 5th ed., p. 587, in this way:

"An occupier must take reasonable care to see that children, of whose presence he knows or ought to know or to anticipate and who are too young to appreciate the danger of some attractive object under his control and within his knowledge, are protected against injury from that danger either H by warning which is intelligible to them or by some other means."

I agree with that statement of the law. FINNEMORE, J., said that he could think of

"few things more likely to tempt small boys than a slow-moving set of trams on which a boy can get for a little distance a pleasant and unusual ride. From time immemorial boys have always been anxious to get rides, and it has always been a very real allurement to them."

His judgment shows that he did not consider that the defendants had taken the steps which they ought to have taken, and, further, that the plaintiff did not appreciate the real danger of what he was doing. Those were questions of fact for the judge, and this court ought not to interfere with his findings on them. Moreover, they were amply warranted on the evidence, and I agree with them. I am in favour of dismissing the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: In this case the defendants appeal against a decision of FINNEMORE, J., given at the Glamorgan Winter Assizes at Cardiff on Mar. 31 of this year. The plaintiff in this action was a boy who was six years of age when he met with the injuries which were the subject of the action. He sued the defendants through his father as next friend, claiming damages for the injuries he had sustained, as he alleged, through the negligence of the defendants. The defendants denied that they were negligent, and did not plead contributory negligence on the part of the boy. FINNEMORE, J., considered his judgment and found for the plaintiff, awarding him the sum of £4,000. A B

On the morning of Saturday, Dec. 2, 1950, the infant plaintiff went on to the land owned and occupied by the defendants at the Albion Colliery in South Wales. On that land was a tramway, about one thousand yards long, which ran up a steep incline, and it was used by the defendants for the purpose of removing rubbish to the top of the incline, where the rubbish was discharged from the trams on to a dump. From the photographs which were shown to us, and from the evidence, it would appear that the tramway is not guarded in any way, and the evidence also showed that, when the trams are in motion, they are unattended by any servant of the defendants, whatever may have been the practice in former years. The trams are drawn up the incline by an engine placed at the top of the incline, and they travel quite slowly, about six miles per hour, and about twenty-four journeys are made in one day. The infant plaintiff climbed on to one of the trams when it was in motion on this Saturday morning, and in the act of jumping off he slipped in some way, and his right leg was run over, injuring him so much that his leg had to be amputated above the knee. The boy lived with his father in a small village quite near to the land on which the defendants' tramway was used, and the home of the plaintiff was about eighty to one hundred yards away, though the nearest house to the land of the defendants was only about five yards away. There were no warning signs except one at the bottom of the incline. C D E

The evidence clearly established that, for a considerable time past, men, women and children entered on the land of the defendants and crossed and re-crossed the tramway, to the knowledge of the defendants. There was evidence, too, that children played near the tramway and on the tramway. Further, there was evidence that, on occasions, children actually rode on the trams when the trams were on a journey, sometimes standing on the buffers of the trams, though Mr. Ronald Williams, the manager of the colliery, said that, whenever it had been reported to him that children had been seen riding on the buffers, instructions had been given by him to the servants of the defendants in these words, to "get after these boys if they were riding." F G

It became quite clear, as the case progressed, that the infant plaintiff on the Saturday of the accident was in the position of a licensee on the defendants' land, and a licensee to cross and re-cross the tramway. Counsel for the defendants said, however, that one important feature of the case distinguished it, on the facts, from the reported cases on the subject of the position of children and the duties of occupiers of land, and that was that the boy had been warned by his father not to ride on the trams, and also had been told many times of the danger of so doing. But the father also said that he did not know whether his son was old enough to appreciate the danger of which he had been warned. The infant plaintiff told counsel for the defendants that he knew it was wrong to ride on the trams, because his father had told him not to do it, and his father would have hit him had he known of his disobedience. Counsel for the defendants, therefore, submitted that, even if the infant plaintiff was a licensee on the land in the H limited sense for which he contended, he was not a licensee to ride on the trams, and, the moment that he climbed on to the trams to take the forbidden ride, he was in fact and in law a trespasser and was there at his own peril, and that the defendants were not liable to him for the injuries he had sustained.

The issue raised by counsel is to be decided, I think, on the facts of the particular case. The evidence may show that an occupier of land is well aware that young children habitually come on to his land for one purpose or another, and that he tacitly allows them so to come, and takes no step whatever to forbid them or to remove them. He may know, or should know, that on his land there is some particular object that, in the ordinary course of things, will be a great attraction to children. He may know, or should know, that some of the children that come on to his land are much too young to appreciate that the attractive object may have dangers for young children. And if these things are proved in evidence, his duty is to take suitable precautions to prevent injury to the children in those circumstances, and to protect them against the danger which they are too young to appreciate. But everything turns on the particular facts of each case.

In Cooke v. Midland & Great Western Ry. of Ireland (9) the facts showed that the child was not a trespasser, but at least a licensee, and in that case not merely a licensee as to the land on which the turntable stood, but also as to the turntable itself, and that the turntable was properly described as a trap. But in R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (10) a child of four was killed by being crushed in the terminal wheel of a haulage system belonging to a colliery company. That wheel was attractive and dangerous to children, and was in a field belonging to the defendants that was inadequately fenced, which field the defendants knew was used by the children as a playground. The child had been warned by his father not to go near the field or the wheel. The child was held to be a trespasser and the defendants were not liable. But the ground of that decision emphasises what, I think, is the quite vital distinction between that case and the present one, for in the words of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN ([1929] A.C. 372):

“ . . . when a proprietor protests and goes on protesting, turning away people when he meets them, as he did here, and giving no countenance in anything that he does to their presence there, then I think no court has a right to say that permission must be implied.”

In the present case FINNEMORE, J., says:

“ But what this all comes to for them is this: that this boy quite plainly on the evidence—it was not really disputed by counsel for the defendants at the end—was a licensee as far as going on to the colliery property and over the lines was concerned. No effort was ever made to prevent that. There was no fencing, there was no warning, and as I have already pointed out, Mr. Williams said that on the whole he did not object to it. It is quite obvious that no one had really objected to it for many years past.”

Similarly, in Hardy v. Central London Ry. Co. (7), the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the learned trial judge, who had based his decision on the ground that the boy in question was a licensee, by holding that the boy who was injured on the moving staircase at Liverpool Street station, which staircase could be reached from the booking hall which was open to the street, was a trespasser. Both BANKES, L.J., and WARRINGTON, L.J., came to the conclusion, on the facts proved in the case, that the boy was not only a trespasser on the moving staircase, but that he was a trespasser in the booking hall itself.

Now, if the infant plaintiff in the present case was a licensee on the land of the defendants where this tramway ran, as FINNEMORE, J., found, and as the evidence plainly indicates, and if this tramway with its slowly moving trucks was an attractive thing to children, as he also found, and as the evidence plainly indicates, then I do not think that the plaintiff's claim can be disposed of by saying that the moment the boy went on to the trucks he was a trespasser. The duty of the defendants in the circumstances disclosed by the evidence has been made quite plain by many authorities. Counsel for the plaintiff stated it in his second submission before us in these words:

"The defendants' duty accordingly was not to have on the land a concealed danger or trap."

He further submitted that whether a trap exists or not depends on the facts of the particular case, and that these slowly moving trams were in fact a trap for this boy on the facts of this case.

I do not think it is possible to dispute these four conclusions that arise from the evidence: (a) The plaintiff was plainly a licensee on the defendants' land which contained the tramway and the trucks. (b) The slowly moving trams were an obvious allurement to young boys, and the plaintiff was at least a licensee to cross and re-cross the tramways. (c) From the evidence, the defendants knew that it was such an allurement, because they knew that boys were in the habit of climbing on to the trucks and stealing rides. (d) When the trams were in motion the allurement was dangerous to young boys.

Now, although the boy had been forbidden by his father to ride on the trams, and had been warned of the danger and was conscious of his disobedience, the learned judge found that he did not appreciate the danger of what he was doing, and if that finding can be supported, then the slowly moving trams became a concealed danger to the boy, and, therefore, properly described as a trap. Counsel for the defendants submitted that, when the boy knew that he was being disobedient to his father's warning of danger, it followed that the boy must have had knowledge of some danger. I do not think myself that it follows by any means. He may have known that he was being disobedient to his father's warning without appreciating the danger involved in disobedience. That, I think, is the view of FINNEMORE, J., in his use of the word "real":

"The boy . . . was not, in my opinion, of a sufficient age to appreciate the real danger of what he was doing . . ."

In the judgment of FINNEMORE, J., there are three important passages which seem to me to contain the essence of the whole matter, and with those passages I most respectfully agree. The first is this:

"From time immemorial boys have always been anxious to get rides and it has always been a very real allurement to them. Now that means that, if this moving tramway was an allurement to boys, and particularly to this little boy of six and a half, a danger which he would not properly appreciate, and which would tempt him to use it in a way that was likely to be dangerous to him, it was the duty of the defendants to do something about it. One thing they might have done—I dare say they will do it in future—would be to stop anybody, whether children or adults, going over this line at all, whether by fencing it or by putting up notices, or having someone on duty from time to time to stop it, or some other way. I do not know. But they must do something to see that the children whom they allow to go near to, and on to, their tramway line are protected against this dangerous allurement of a slow-moving tramway of trucks."

The second passage is this, speaking of the duty of the occupier of land:

"What he must not do to a licensee is to put a trap on his land, and a trap, for the purpose of a child, means something which is dangerous but very tempting and attractive which is likely to lead him into danger while on the land which he has entered, at all events, with the tacit permission, if not the express permission, of the owner. And I think that if the child, as I find he was in this case, was a licensee over the whole of that land through which the tram track ran, he did not cease to be a licensee when he succumbed to the very temptation against which he ought to have been protected, that is, the moving of the tramway."

Then the final passage is:

A "Having considered all these matters, I am of the opinion that the law as argued by counsel for the plaintiff is the right law, that, if a child is a licensee on the land, the allurements which are on the land must be protected in some way, and the boy does not become, for the purposes of this doctrine, a trespasser as soon as he meddles with the very machine against which he ought in fact to be protected. Nor do I think it makes any difference that the boy had been told by his father that he should not ride on those trucks, and that he would get into trouble at home if he was found doing it. B Forbidden fruit is not less tempting than when permissible: in fact it is often more tempting, and a boy of six and a half, although he knew he had been told by his father not to ride on the trucks, was not, in my opinion, of a sufficient age to appreciate the real danger of what he was doing, and I think he was extremely likely to succumb to the temptation which, so to speak, was flaunted in front of him by this slow-moving tramway over the property which he was in fact allowed to use, together with other children C and other people, by the defendants."

As I have said, I think those three passages from the judgment of FINNEMORE, J., contain the essence of this matter so far as this particular case is concerned. I think that the learned judge stated the law correctly. The questions of fact were carefully considered by him after seeing the witnesses, D and, in particular, the infant plaintiff himself, and he has stated his findings quite clearly. I see no ground on which his judgment can be effectively assailed, and I am of the opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of FINNEMORE, J., made on Mar. 31, 1953, by which he awarded to a small boy damages against the defendants for the loss of his leg. The accident happened on Dec. 2, 1950, at E the Cilfynydd Colliery in the county of Glamorgan, when the boy was riding on the buffers of a tram used to haul refuse from the colliery for disposal at the top of a hill. He fell under the wheel of one of the trams and was injured. The line on which the trams ran was about one thousand yards long, unguarded and unfenced. There were houses close to it. There were no warning signs except one at the bottom near the village, and people, including children, frequently F crossed the line. It was a short cut to the swimming-baths, it was a way of going to some allotments, and children played on or near the line. The learned judge found that the child was a licensee on the land when he was injured, and that the journey of trams on which the child rode was a concealed danger or trap for children of the age of the plaintiff, since it was an allurements to them the dangers of which they could not properly appreciate. He, accordingly, awarded damages.

G The case for the defendants is put in various ways. First, it is said that the child was a trespasser from the moment he set foot on the land. Secondly, it is contended that even if he was a licensee on the land, including the lines on which the trams ran, he became a trespasser as soon as he climbed on the journey of trams. In the third place, it is said that, even if he were a licensee, yet, on the facts of this case, there was no trap or concealed danger, and he cannot recover.

H The first argument is directed against the learned judge's finding that he was ever a licensee upon the land. It is said that the evidence only shows that there was a licence to cross the lines for the purpose of going to the allotments, the swimming-baths, or, possibly, for certain other specific purposes. The licence, it is argued, must be limited in extent and cannot be construed as covering playing on the lines, still less climbing on a moving journey of trams, a practice which was never tolerated by the defendants or their predecessors, the colliery companies who had formerly occupied the land. It is said that the intention with which the plaintiff went on the lines must be considered, and that the learned judge ought to have found on the evidence that, having gone on the line to play, he was a trespasser ab initio and never became a licensee.

In support of this proposition reliance was placed on a decision of this court in Hardy v. Central London Ry. Co. (7). There a small boy was injured on a moving staircase at Liverpool Street station, which led from the booking-hall to the underground platforms. The trial judge held that he was unable to distinguish the case from the well-known case of Cooke v. Midland & Great Western Ry. of Ireland (9) and that the child was a licensee. The defendants knew that children were in the habit of frequenting the station, and he came to the conclusion that they were there with the licence of the defendants because they did not take steps to exclude children from their property; that the moving staircase was an allurement to children; and that the defendants were negligent in not protecting the machinery at the place where the accident happened. This court reversed the trial judge's finding of a licence and held that the child was a trespasser. In that case the evidence clearly showed that children were warned off whenever they were seen playing on the moving staircase. BANKES, L.J., came to the conclusion that they were all fully aware of the fact that they had no right to be, and no licence to be, where they were. He added that an elder boy, in whose charge the plaintiff was, appeared to have been fully aware that he was a trespasser in the booking hall from which the escalator led, and that the plaintiff was probably old enough to be aware of the fact also, since a policeman had driven the children away on several occasions. WARRINGTON, L.J., in his judgment used these words ([1920] 3 K.B. 470):

"I think the plaintiff was not a licensee or invitee, but a mere trespasser.

I think on the evidence that the defendants cannot be said to have permitted children to resort to the booking office as a playground or for any purpose not connected with the use of their railway."

That case, it is said, shows that the children were only found to be trespassers because they resorted to the station as a playground and not as intending travellers. It is said, applying the ratio of Hardy's case (7) to the case now to be decided, that the child who was injured by falling off the tram came on to the land to play and not for the licensed purpose of crossing the line to get to one or other of the destinations mentioned. Hence he was a trespasser ab initio and cannot recover damages. This argument will not, I think, prevail in the state in which the evidence in this case stands. The licence to go on the land was a general one, as found by the learned judge, and not one limited to crossing the line for specific purposes, and I think that the evidence justifies his finding. He referred specifically to the evidence of Mr. Paget, who said he had crossed the lines for years to reach the allotments, that any amount of adults used the line, and that he frequently saw children playing on the line and had never seen anyone send them away. There was other evidence tending to the same effect. I think, therefore, that the learned judge's finding that the child who was injured was a licensee on the land should be upheld and that this case is legitimately distinguishable upon its facts from Hardy's case (7), where the children were aware at all material times that they were trespassers on the land in question.

This brings me to the second point, which was that the children, being licensees on the land, were never licensees on the journey of trams, for the evidence shows that they were never allowed to ride on the trams without complaint. Hence they were trespassers on the trams if not on the land. I find this contention unsupported by authority and inconsistent with relevant authority. Some negative support for the proposition is said to be found in the leading case of Cooke v. Midland & Great Western Ry. of Ireland (9), because from that case it appears that the child who was injured was treated as a licensee, not only on the land of the railway company on which the turntable which brought about his injury stood, but also on the turntable itself. Ergo, it is said, if the child had not been a licensee on the turntable, he would not have recovered damages.

A I agree with the learned judge, who dealt with this argument by saying that such a contention destroys the whole doctrine of allurement to children. Once the child is a licensee on the land, the question of trespassing on an object on the land does not, in my opinion, arise. The trap or concealed danger will often be an object on the land, but I cannot conceive that the licence to go on the land is to be taken to exclude the thing which, being an allurement to children, is a concealed danger for them. The contention of the defendants to this effect runs counter to the decision in such cases as Lynch v. Nurdin (4), from which all the cases on allurement to children descend. It will be remembered that in that case the injured child was unlawfully on a vehicle on a public highway. This fact was no defence to the person who had left it there, as the vehicle in question was itself an attraction to children and dangerous. LORD ATKINSON in Cooke v. Midland & Great Western Ry. of Ireland (9) in dealing with the principle involved in the cases from Lynch v. Nurdin (4) downwards, pointed out that owners of such vehicles would be liable in damages for injuries sustained by juvenile intermeddlers even though the injured person in any particular case be a trespasser on the vehicle or machine at the moment the accident occurred.

C The last point made by the defendants, viz., that here there was no trap or concealed danger, because the child had been specifically warned of the danger and knew that he would be punished by his parents if he rode on the trams was, I think, effectively answered by the trial judge, who said that, although the child had been told by his father not to ride on the trams, he was not, in his opinion, of a sufficient age to appreciate the real danger of what he was doing. In another passage in his judgment the learned judge referred to "a danger which he could not properly appreciate". Counsel for the defendants contended that the child knowing it wrong to act as he did and that he would be punished was sufficient. I do not agree. Once the child is lawfully on the land and the allurement is there, it is the knowledge of the danger, not of the error of his conduct, that is material. D To this counsel replied that, if that were so, the learned judge, by using the adjective "real" before the word "danger" in one place, and the adverb "properly" before the words "appreciate the danger" in another, must be taken to have found that some appreciation of the danger was present in the boy's mind. I cannot accept this argument. The essence of the allurement cases, where young children are concerned, is that they do not appreciate the risks which they run, and it is impracticable in a particular case to analyse minutely the degree of appreciation of the danger.

E F In my opinion, the finding of the learned judge on this point does not relieve the defendants of liability, and is consistent with the evidence of the child's father, who admitted giving the warning of the danger to his child. When asked if the boy knew that it was dangerous and wrong he replied: "I could not answer for that. Being his age, I could not say whether he was of the age to understand." G In my opinion, therefore, the learned judge was entitled to come to the conclusion that this slow-moving journey of trams travelling across the land was not only an allurement to children, but was also a concealed danger or trap in the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

H Solicitors: Donald H. Haslam, agent for W. H. F. Barklam, Cardiff (for the defendants); Theodore Goddard & Co., agents for Morgan, Bruce & Nicholas, Pontypridd (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

CHINA v. HARROW URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.),
October 13, 14, November 6, 1953.]

Limitation of Action—Distress for rates—Application for warrant more than six years after demand—“Action”—“Date on which cause of action accrued”—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 2 (1) (d), s. 31 (1).

Rates—Distress warrant—Application more than six years after demand—Statutory bar to proceedings—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 2 (1) (d), s. 31 (1).

When dealing with an application to issue a distress warrant in respect of arrears of general rates, the justices are acting, not ministerially, but judicially: dicta of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., and LORD WRIGHT in Potts v. Hickman ([1940] 4 All E.R. 495 and 506), applied; and, therefore, the application is a “proceeding in a court of law”, within the definition of “action” in s. 31 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, and comes within s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act, which is intended to apply to all money claims made in a court. As the word “action”, as used in the Act, is intended to embrace proceedings which are not actions in the ordinary sense, “cause of action”, in s. 2 (1), should be read as “cause of proceeding”. The cause of the proceedings in respect of arrears of rate accrues when the ratepayer fails to pay on demand a rate duly made and published in respect of which he has been assessed, and, therefore, the period of six years in which the proceedings must be taken, under s. 2 (1) (d), runs from the demand of the rate, and a distress warrant cannot be issued after that period has expired.

AS TO DISTRESS FOR RATES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 27, pp. 526-528, paras. 976, 977; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 18, pp. 402-404, Nos. 1428-1444, and Vol. 38, pp. 628, 629, Nos. 1470-1485.

FOR THE LIMITATION ACT, 1939, s. 2 (1) (d), and s. 31 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 1160, 1192.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Potts v. Hickman, [1940] 4 All E.R. 491; [1941] A.C. 212; 110 L.J.K.B. 101; 164 L.T. 346; 105 J.P. 26; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Danby v. Watson, (1877), 46 L.J.M.C. 179; 36 L.T. 412; 41 J.P. 406; 18 Digest 420, 1590.
- (3) Liverpool Corp. v. Hope, [1938] 1 All E.R. 492; [1938] 1 K.B. 751; 107 L.J.K.B. 694; 158 L.T. 215; 102 J.P. 205; Digest Supp.
- (4) Lloyd v. Heathcote, (1820), 2 Brod. & Bing. 388 (129 E.R. 1017); 5 Moore, C.P. 129; 4 Digest 83, 748.
- (5) Re McGreavy, [1950] 1 All E.R. 442; [1950] Ch. 269; 114 J.P. 185; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Davis v. Burrell, (1851), 10 C.B. 821; 17 L.T.O.S. 51; 138 E.R. 325; 31 Digest, Replacement, 517, 6397.
- (7) Mackie v. Fox, (1911), 105 L.T. 523; 75 J.P. 470; 25 Digest 331, 329.
- (8) R. v. Price, (1880), 5 Q.B.D. 300; 49 L.J.M.C. 49; 42 L.T. 439; 44 J.P. 248; 18 Digest 398, 1392.
- (9) Sweetman v. Guest, (1868), L.R. 3 Q.B. 262; 37 L.J.M.C. 59; 18 L.T. 52; 32 J.P. 212; 18 Digest 430, 1671.
- (10) R. v. St. Edmundsbury & Ipswich Diocese (Chancellor). Ex p. White, [1946] 2 All E.R. 604; [1947] K.B. 263; 175 L.T. 483; affd. C.A., [1947] 2 All E.R. 170; [1948] 1 K.B. 195; 177 L.T. 488; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (11) Roberts v. Battersea Metropolitan Borough, (1914), 110 L.T. 566; 78 J.P. 265; 38 Digest 119, 861.
- (12) R. v. Benn & Church, (1795), 6 Term Rep. 198; 101 E.R. 509; 18 Digest 403, 1431.

(13) Harper v. Carr, (1797), 7 Term Rep. 270; 101 E.R. 1070; 18 Digest 398, 1390.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

On Mar. 18, 1953, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Wealdstone, a complaint was preferred by the respondents, Harrow Urban District Council, that the appellant, Denis Percival China, being a person duly rated and assessed by the general rate for the respondents' rating area, was in arrear in the sum of £31 4s. 1d., which he neglected or refused to pay.

The following facts were found. The respondents were a rating authority for the purposes of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. The general rate for the year 1940/41 was duly made and published. The appellant was rated for the half year ending Sept. 30, 1940, in the sum of £8 9s. 2d. in respect of premises then occupied by him at 7, Warple Close, Harrow. At the time he was in arrear in the sum of £26 15s. 4d. in respect of general rates for previous half years. On July 5, 1940, he ceased to be liable for future rates in respect of the premises, and, therefore, instead of being liable for £8 9s. 2d. for the half year ending Sept. 30, 1940, he was liable only for £4 8s. 9d. in respect of his occupation of the premises from Apr. 1 to July 5, 1940. For various reasons, including the fact that the appellant was thereafter engaged on war service and, after that, the respondents had no knowledge of his whereabouts, no further action was taken to recover the sum due, viz., £31 4s. 1d., until Feb. 11, 1953. On that date a further demand for payment of the sum was made on the appellant, but he neglected and refused to pay it. A summons to appear before the justices was duly issued and served on him.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the general rate was a sum recoverable by virtue of an enactment, within the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (d), which under s. 2 (1) (d), it was not recoverable after the expiration of six years from the publication of the rate, and that, therefore, the application for the issue of a distress warrant must fail. The respondents contended that the duties of the justices on an application for the issue of a distress warrant in respect of arrears of rates were ministerial, and that, therefore, the Act of 1939 did not apply, as the definition of "action" in s. 31 (1) of the Act was "any proceeding in a court of law" and, in the circumstances, the justices were not acting as a court of law. The justices were of opinion, having regard to Potts v. Hickman (1), that their duties when dealing with applications for the recovery of rates were judicial, but, having regard to Danby v. Watson (2) and Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope (3), they were of opinion that the recovery of the general rate was not by "action", within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1939, and that the position remained as it was before 1939 with no limitation of time on the recovery of the general rate. Accordingly, on May 27, 1953, they issued a distress warrant for the sum of £31 4s. 1d. and costs.

Aron Owen for the appellant, the ratepayer.

Squibb for the respondents, the rating authority.

Curr. adv. vult.

Nov. 6. The following judgments were read.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated by justices for the county of Middlesex, and it raises the short and interesting question whether the Limitation Act, 1939, applies to proceedings for the recovery of rates. The facts are that in April, 1940, the ratepayer was in arrear in respect of rates for previous years to the amount of £26 15s. 4d., and he became liable for a proportion of a further half year's rates amounting to £4 8s. 9d. in respect of his occupancy of the rated hereditament between Apr. 1 and July 5, 1940, when he ceased to be the occupier. No action was taken by the rating authority against the ratepayer at the time, as he was then on war service, or for some time after that, as they did not know where he was living. The Case goes on to say that, on Feb. 11, 1953, having ascertained his whereabouts, the rating authority made a further demand for payment, from which I assume the court was satisfied that previous demands had been made, as in the ordinary course of things they would have been. No point was made that demands had not been made, and on Mar. 18, the rating authority preferred a complaint against the ratepayer with a view to obtaining a distress warrant, which was granted. It, therefore, appears that the rating authority were seeking, and have obtained, a warrant for arrears all accruing more than six years ago, and some, at least, fourteen or, perhaps, fifteen years ago.

The question whether there is any period of limitation for the recovery of rates is entirely destitute of authority, which, perhaps, is not surprising. It is hardly likely that any local authority has ever before sought to take proceedings after such a length of time, and it must, I think, be conceded that before July 1, 1940, when the Limitation Act, 1939, came into force, it could not have been argued that there was a period of limitation. The Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. 1, c. 16) sets out in terms [in s. 3] the various personal actions to which it applies. They are actions on the case, other than for slander, actions of account, trespass quare clausum fregit, debt, detinue and replevin, for all of which six years is the period named, and actions for assault, other cases of trespass to the person, and slander, for which shorter periods are named. Proceedings for the recovery of rates have always been regarded as a class apart. It is settled that no action lies for their recovery, and that the only method is that laid down in the Poor Relief Act, 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2), s. 2, namely, by application to justices for a distress warrant: see Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope (3). None the less, arrears of rates are a debt, and one must not confuse the debt with the remedy: see Lloyd v. Heathcote (4) and Re McGreavy (5). The remedy of distress is only a special procedure for dealing with defaulting ratepayers. Other matters which have been decided with reference to these proceedings are that a demand is a necessary preliminary to the application for a warrant (Davis v. Burrell (6)), and that, though the time limit of six months within which proceedings must be taken before courts of summary jurisdiction [under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 11] applies to such proceedings for the recovery of civil debts as those courts can entertain (Mackie v. Fox (7)), this limitation does not apply to those for the recovery of rates: see R. v. Price (8).

As I have already said, it would have been impossible to contend that the Limitation Act, 1623, applied to this class of proceeding and the court has now to determine for the first time whether the Act of 1939 has applied a period of limitation. Not only is there no authority on this question but there is no communis opinio among text writers. The learned editors of FARADAY ON RATING, 5th ed., at p. 330, are of opinion that the Act does apply, while the equally learned editors of RYDE ON RATING, 9th ed., at p. 812, express a contrary opinion, though, if I may so, the cases they cite in support of their opinion do not really assist. All they show is that rates may be recovered after the year for which they have been made. I, therefore, turn to the provisions of the Act of 1939. Section 2 (1) enacts

“The following actions shall not be brought after the expiration of six years from the date on which the cause of action accrued . . .”

Among those enumerated are:

“(d) actions to recover any sum recoverable by virtue of any enactment, other than a penalty or forfeiture or sum by way of penalty or forfeiture.”

If that sub-section stood alone, it is clear that, as no action lies for the recovery of rates (Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope (3)), it would follow that it has no application. It is unnecessary to burden this judgment by referring to the numerous decisions as to the meaning of “action”, as, for the purposes of the Act, the word is defined by s. 31 (1) as including “any proceeding in a court of law, including an ecclesiastical court”, unless the context otherwise requires. It is not, in my opinion, open to doubt that an application for a distress warrant is a proceeding in a court of law. The dicta of COCKBURN, C.J., in Sweetman v. Guest (9) and R. v.

Price (6), that justices are, in such a matter, acting ministerially, and not judicially, has not been followed. In Potts v. Hickman (1) VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., said ([1940] 4 All E.R. 495) that "justices, when granting a distress warrant for rates, are proceeding judicially." LORD WRIGHT said (ibid., 506) that an order for a warrant of distress was made in a judicial proceeding, and (ibid., 508) that the dictum of COCKBURN, C.J., in R. v. Price (8), could not be supported as a statement of the general law. He added (ibid.):

A "Even if the party summoned has no valid objection which he can raise to being rated because the facts are clear, the justice still acts judicially in making the particular order of distress, even though no other course is open to him judicially."

B The cases show that the rate itself constitutes an order to pay, though, as I have already said, they also lay down that proceedings to enforce payment cannot be commenced until there has been a demand and subsequent default. On the hearing of the application proof is required of the service of the summons, that the rate was duly made and published, that the person named was assessed at the sum mentioned, and that it has been demanded and not paid [: see Distress for Rates Act, 1849, s. 5, s. 8, and schedule, Form C1]. Various defences are open
C to the person summoned which it is unnecessary to detail. In my opinion, therefore, it is clear that there is here a "proceeding in a court of law." Does, therefore, the context require a different interpretation so that this particular proceeding does not come within the definition in s. 31 (1) of the Act of 1939? Counsel for the rating authority submitted that some limitation must be placed on the wide words of the definition. He said that they could not include, for D instance, criminal proceedings. That is true, but criminal cases, clearly, do not fall within s. 2 which refers to proceedings for the recovery of money, nor within any other section of the Act. The penalties excluded by the section are, in my opinion, those for which what is known as a penal action can be brought. But the words of the definition show that it is intended to bring within the scope of the section proceedings to which the term "action" would be inapplicable.

E The main argument of counsel for the rating authority was that the limitation imposed by s. 2 (1) runs from the date of the accrual of the cause of action, and he contended that, as no action lies for rates, there could be no cause of action. But, if the word "action" is to embrace proceedings which are not actions in the true sense, it seems to me that for "cause of action" must be read "cause of proceeding", and the cause of the proceeding in this case is the failure to pay on demand.

F I would, accordingly, hold that time runs from the demand. I have already pointed out that, as the Case refers to the "further demand" in February, 1953, that implies that earlier demands were made though proceedings were not taken, and from the other facts found in the Case those demands must have been made not later than July, 1940. There is no special form of demand that must be served before proceedings for recovery can be taken. The common form

G which is sent to every ratepayer each half year is all that is required. Limitation of actions is imposed by positive law and courts can only refuse to enforce claims on the ground of lapse of time if there is an appropriate provision to be found in the Act, but I see no good reason for unduly limiting words which can apply to a particular case as courts always lean against stale claims. The Act of 1939 is not merely a consolidating statute. Its title shows it to be one consolidat-

H ing and amending the law, and, in my opinion, the very wide terms of the definition of "action" in s. 31 (1) show that s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act was intended to apply to all money claims made in a court. This view, I think, is to some extent strengthened by the inclusion of ecclesiastical courts in the definition section [s. 31 (1)]. The Limitation Act, 1623, made no reference to those courts, and, while I make no pretence to be familiar with the suits that can be brought in them, I cannot find that they ever dealt with any of the actions mentioned in that Act except slander. Section 30 to s. 33 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, now repealed [by s. 34 (4) of, and the schedule to, the Act of 1939], dealt with actions relating to the right of presentation to a benefice and those provisions re-appear in s. 14 of the Act of 1939. The actions which would come within that section would, normally at least, be dealt with in the temporal courts, though it may be that some questions relating to rights of presentation could still be dealt with by means of the practically obsolete ecclesiastical suit of duplex querela. I hesitate to express any opinion on such matters because temporal judges are not required to be learned in ecclesiastical law. That was one of the reasons given in R. v. St Edmundsbury & Ipswich Diocese (Chancellor). Ex p. White (10) why certiorari does not lie to those courts though prohibition may. But when I find reference both to ecclesiastical courts and to all classes of arbitration in the present Act [see s. 27], it leads me to think that the legislature meant to bring every class of litigation, before whatever tribunal it might come, within the ambit of the statute. While appreciating the careful consideration given to the case by the justices, I would allow the appeal.

SELLERS, J.: In this Special Case the question has been raised, apparently for the first time in the courts, whether the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (d), apply to proceedings brought in a court of summary jurisdiction for the issue of a distress warrant for the recovery of rates. Proceedings after six years to recover rates by distress must have been rare, if they have previously been taken at all after so long delay, but there would seem to be no trace in any of the authorities of any time limit which could have been relied on prior to the Act of 1939.

The main question which arises is whether the definition of "action" in s. 31 (1) of the Act of 1939 can be applied to s. 2 (1). Section 31 (1) is as follows:

"In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . 'action' includes any proceeding in a court of law, including an ecclesiastical court."

It was submitted on behalf of the rating authority that the context in s. 2 (1) did require that some restriction should be put on the words "any proceeding in a court of law" because the sub-section makes the time of limitation run from the date "on which the cause of action accrued", and, it was said, this was inappropriate to the procedure by which, and by which alone, rates can be recovered. But while, in the case of rates, it cannot be said that there is a cause of action (Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope (3)), there does arise a cause of proceeding in a court of law. If the appropriate proceedings are taken to enforce a debt for rates, the hearing is a judicial proceeding, and not (as the rating authority, apparently, submitted before the justices) a ministerial matter: see Potts v. Hickman (1). In such a judicial proceeding, matters have to be proved by the applicant and issues may be raised by a person so summoned before the court. The elements for constituting a proceeding in a court of law are present. In Roberts v. Battersea Metropolitan Borough (11) BUCKLEY, L.J., said (110 L.T. 568):

" 'Proceeding' would be a word with a larger meaning than 'action'.

Every action is a 'proceeding', but it is not possible to say that every proceeding is an action."

The definition in the Act of 1939 was, obviously, intended to enlarge the more normal meaning of "action", and I do not think the context of s. 2 (1) does require that the definition of "action" should not be applied to it. If the definition is applied, then the sub-section should be read to provide that the following proceedings in a court of law shall not be brought after the expiration of six years from the date on which the cause of proceedings in a court of law accrued, that is to say, (d) proceedings in a court of law to recover any sum recoverable by virtue of any enactment. That interpretation seems to me to be in harmony with the context, not repugnant to it. In Davis v. Burrell (6) JERVIS, C.J., said (10 C.B. 826):

"When a rate is duly made and published, it is the duty of the parties assessed to seek out the collector and to pay it . . . The statute 43 Eliz. [c. 2] requires a personal demand before the rate can be distrained for. That shows that a demand would otherwise be unnecessary."

A The cause of the proceedings, therefore, for a rate might be said to arise when the rate is duly made and published and is not paid, but a demand as a matter of procedure has always been necessary before the recovery of the rate could be enforced. In respect of a general rate, the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 7 (1), requires that information with respect to a number of matters shall be included in the demand note on which the general rate is levied. As proceedings cannot be taken until such a demand note has been given and the demand has not been met, I think the cause of the proceedings for a rate should be held to be the failure to pay on demand and, if I am right that s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1939 can be applied to the proceedings for a distress warrant, the period of six years in which the proceedings must be taken would run from the time of the demand of the rate in question. I agree that the justices came to an incorrect decision in law, and I would allow the appeal.

B HAVERS, J., stated the facts and continued: The case raises a novel and difficult question, whether the Limitation Act, 1939, applies to proceedings for the issue of a distress warrant for the recovery of rates. Section 2 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, provides that certain actions, which are therein specified, "shall not be brought after the expiration of six years from the date on which the cause of action accrued . . ." They include, in s. 2 (1) (d):

"actions to recover any sum recoverable by virtue of any enactment, other than a penalty or forfeiture or sum by way of penalty or forfeiture."

D The ratepayer contended unsuccessfully before the justices that proceedings by a rating authority before the justices for the issue of a distress warrant for arrears of general rates are an action to recover a sum recoverable by virtue of an enactment, within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1939. The rating authority contended that, inasmuch as no action lies for the recovery of rates (Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope (3)), there can be no cause of action or accrual of a cause of action within the meaning of s. 2 (1). They also contended that the justices were acting ministerially, and not judicially, in ordering the issue of a distress warrant.

E In s. 31 (1) of the Act of 1939 "action" is defined as follows:

"In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . 'action' includes any proceeding in a court of law, including an ecclesiastical court."

F It is, therefore, necessary to examine the nature of rates and the means for recovering the sums assessed. The foundation of the liability to pay rates is to be found in the Poor Relief Act, 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2). By s. 2 of that Act provision is made for the making of a poor rate and for the recovery of rates which are unpaid by the issue of a warrant for distress. The Act of 1601 does not contain a provision requiring the alleged offender to be first summoned before the justices, and for a great many years it was not the law that such a summons was necessary. G However, by the end of the eighteenth century, as a result of the decisions in R. v. Benn & Church (12) and Harper v. Carr (13), it was settled that a summons should precede a warrant of distress, as is now laid down by statute: see Distress for Rates Act, 1849, s. 5. Since 1601 a number of statutes have been passed dealing with rating which, I think, it is not necessary to consider. It is sufficient to say that since 1601 down to the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, no statute has ever provided the local authority with any remedy for the non-payment of rates other than the remedy by distress. The Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 2, which makes provision for the making of "the general rate", provides, by sub-s. H (3), that:

" . . . every general rate . . . shall be made, levied and collected, and shall be recoverable, in the same manner in which at the commencement of this Act the poor rate may be made, levied, collected and recovered, and all the enactments relating to the poor rate which are in force at the commencement of this Act . . . shall . . . apply to the general rate."

Section 4 (1) provides that every rate made by a rating authority shall be deemed to be made on the date on which it is approved by the authority. Section 6 requires publication of the rate within the time and in the manner therein prescribed. Section 7 (1) provides that information on certain matters shall be included in the demand note on which the general rate is levied. A general rate, therefore, is not a common law liability, but is a creature of statute, and the only remedy for enforcing it is the statutory remedy by distress.

The form of the distress warrant, which was set out in the schedule to the Distress for Rates Act, 1849, indicates the various matters which have to be proved by the rating authority and found by the justices before they can issue a distress warrant. There are also various matters which it is open to the person summoned to raise by way of objection. At one time the view was held that in such proceedings the justices were acting ministerially and not judicially: see Sweetman v. Guest (9) and R. v. Price (8). However, since Potts v. Hickman (1), it cannot, in my opinion, now be successfully contended that an order for a warrant of distress is not made in a judicial proceeding or that justices are not acting judicially in making an order. In my opinion, an application for a distress warrant is a proceeding in a court of law. Is there any compelling reason why the context should require that these particular proceedings should not be included within the definition? In my opinion, it is clear that proceedings for the recovery of rates do not fall within the category of personal actions mentioned in s. 3 of the Limitation Act, 1623, or within any other Limitation Act which was in force prior to the Act of 1939. It is, perhaps, somewhat surprising that, if it was intended to make a change in the law for the first time since 1601 by imposing a limitation of time on proceedings for the recovery of rates, clearer language, specifically referring to rates, should not have been used in s. 2 of the Limitation Act, 1939. The Act of 1939 is, however, an amending as well as a consolidating Act, and, as the language used in s. 2 (1) (d) and s. 31 (1) is apt to cover an application to justices for the issue of a distress warrant for arrears of rates, I see no good reason why such proceedings should be excluded. My view is strengthened by a comparison between the definition of "action" in s. 225 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and in s. 31 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. In the former, "action" means "a civil proceeding commenced by writ or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rules of court, but does not include a criminal proceeding by the Crown."

The wide words of the definition in the Limitation Act, 1939, show that it was intended to bring within the ambit of s. 2 proceedings to which the term "action" would not normally be appropriate.

It remains to consider the meaning of "cause of action", if "action" is to be considered as including proceedings for the recovery of rates. If the word "action" is to embrace proceedings which are not actions in the ordinary sense, "cause of action" should, in my view, be read as "cause of proceeding". The cause of the proceedings, in my opinion, accrues when a ratepayer fails to pay on demand a rate duly made and published in respect of which he has been assessed, and the period of six years in which the proceedings must be taken would run from the failure to pay on demand. In my opinion, the justices came to an incorrect decision on the question of law, and I would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Eric H. Davis & Co. (for the ratepayer); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for D. H. Pritchard, clerk to Harrow Urban District Council (for the rating authority).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

TITHE REDEMPTION COMMISSION v. RUNCORN URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), October 30, 1953.]

Tithe and Tithe Rentcharge—“Owner” of land—Highway authority—Liability to bear apportioned part of redemption annuity in respect of land occupied by highway—Tithe Act, 1936 (c. 43), s. 10 (1), s. 17 (1)—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 7 (1) (as amended by the Law of Property Act, 1926 (c. 11), s. 7 and schedule).

Highway—Highway authority—Ownership of land—Liability to apportion part of tithe redemption annuity—Tithe Act, 1936 (c. 43), s. 10 (1), s. 17 (1)—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 7 (1) (as amended by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926 (c. 11), s. 7 and schedule).

The Highway Acts constitute a “similar statute” within the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 7 (1), and, therefore, notwithstanding that a highway authority owns the land over which a highway runs only so far as is necessary for it to carry out its duties, the highway authority, by virtue of that subsection, holds the land for an estate in fee simple absolute in possession, and is an “owner of land” within the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 17 (1) (a), liable under s. 10 (1) of the latter Act to bear an apportioned share of the tithe redemption annuity payable in respect of land of which the highway forms part.

AS TO TITHE REDEMPTION ANNUITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 11, pp. 893, 894, paras. 1600-1602.

FOR THE TITHE ACT, 1936, s. 10 and s. 17, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 304, 314.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Tunbridge Wells Corpn. v. Baird, [1896] A.C. 434; 65 L.J.Q.B. 451; 74 L.T. 385; 60 J.P. 788; 26 Digest 330, 618.
- (2) Foley's Charity Trustees v. Dudley Corpn., [1910] 1 K.B. 317; 79 L.J.K.B. 410; 102 L.T. 1; 74 J.P. 41; 26 Digest 324, 581.
- (3) Rolls v. St. George The Martyr, Southwark, Vestry, (1880), 14 Ch.D. 785; 49 L.J.Ch. 691; 43 L.T. 140; 44 J.P. 680; 26 Digest 330, 627.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (i) whether, on the true construction of the Tithe Act, 1936, and in particular of s. 17 (1) thereof, a highway authority in whom by any statute a highway has become vested is an owner of such highway within the meaning of the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 17: and, if so, (ii) whether, in making an apportionment under the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 10, of a tithe redemption annuity charged in respect of such highway, the plaintiffs, the Tithe Redemption Commission, ought to apportion the amount so charged between such highway and the land abutting on such highway.

The tithes in the parish of Weston, in the county of Chester, were commuted under the Tithe Acts in 1847 and the tithe apportionment, confirmed on Aug. 27, 1847, apportioned a tithe rentcharge of £1 3s. 11d. on a certain tithe area. When the tithe rentcharge was extinguished by the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 1, an annuity of £1 1s. 11d., calculated in accordance with s. 3 (2) of that Act, became charged in respect of that tithe area. No question arose as to the amount of this annuity which had hitherto been paid by Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd., the second defendant, as owners of the whole of the tithe area except such interest as the highway authority had in the highways existing on the tithe area.

Formerly the parish of Weston lay within the rural district of Runcorn, and on Jan. 7, 1930, the council confirmed a resolution declaring certain private streets in the tithe area to be public highways repairable by the inhabitants at large under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, s. 19, then in force in the rural district of Runcorn. Under the Local Government Act, 1929, s. 30 (1), the Chester County Council became the highway authority from Apr. 1, 1930, of highways in rural districts of the county, and by s. 29 (1) and (2) such highways became county roads "vested" in the county council. In 1936 the County of Chester Review Order, 1936, was made by the Minister of Health under the Local Government Act, 1929, s. 46, whereby the parish of Weston was transferred from the Runcorn Rural District to the Runcorn Urban District and the relevant highways were vested in the Runcorn Urban District Council. The question arose whether the Runcorn Urban District Council, as highway authority, was the "owner" of these highways within the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 17 (1), and, if so, whether the annuity payable ought to be apportioned.

W. F. Waite for the plaintiffs, the Tithe Redemption Commission.

R. E. Megarry for the defendants, the Runcorn Urban District Council, the highway authority.

R. L. Stone for the defendants, Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd., owners of the tithe area except as to the interest of the highway authority.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The question that I have to decide arises in regard to the apportionment of the tithe redemption annuities which the Tithe Redemption Commission, formed under the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 4, have to apportion under s. 10 of that Act. Tithe rentcharge was abolished by s. 1 of the Act of 1936, tithe redemption annuity being substituted by s. 3 of that Act, recoverable by the Crown and constituting a debt of the landowner. Section 10 of the Act provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the commission shall, in every case in which they ascertain that an annuity is charged in respect of land in the ownership of two or more owners, apportion the annuity as between the several parts of the land that are in different ownership in such manner as appears to the commission to be just and equitable . . ."

The important definition of the word "owner" is to be found in s. 17 (1) of the Act:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, the person who is to be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be the owner of land shall be—(a) the estate owner in respect of the fee simple thereof, unless it is subject to a long lease at a rent less than a rackrent . . ."

The sub-section then deals with the case of leaseholds, with which I need not trouble. In sub-s. (3) it is provided that

"'estate owner' has the same meaning as in the Law of Property Act, 1925, so, however, that in relation to such an agreement as aforesaid [i.e., an agreement for a lease or underlease where the right to have the lease or underlease is subsisting] that expression means the person entitled to have vested in him the legal term agreed to be created."

So we are driven to the Law of Property Act, 1925. The definition section, s. 205, contains a definition of "estate owner" which one might almost have thought was intended as a joke. Section 205 (1) (v) provides: "'Estate owner' means the owner of a legal estate . . .". That does not carry one very much further. I must also refer to s. 205 (1) (ix), which defines "land" in a manner which indicates that there may be ownership of land divided from the surface ownership. I do not think I need read the definition of "land", which is of some length, and is not particularly helpful in resolving the question which I have to decide. It is clear from the definition that "land" may include a portion of the land, either including the surface or divided from the surface.

The real question which I have to decide is whether the highway authority in the present case is an estate owner, i.e., the owner of a legal estate. There is a great deal of case and statute law on the subject of highways and the position of highway authorities. The position of a highway authority is well settled and there is really no dispute about it. The highway authority does not hold the whole of the soil on which the highway is found, i.e., down to the centre of the earth, nor the whole area above the surface. Tunbridge Wells Corpn. v. Baird (1) illustrates that very well. The position of the highway authority is simply that it owns the surface of the land and so much of the land below the surface, and so much of the area above the surface, as may be necessary for the highway authority to carry out its duties in respect of highways. It was held in Tunbridge Wells Corpn. v. Baird (1) that a highway authority has not sufficient ownership in the soil below the highway to enable it to construct lavatories in that portion of the land. On the other hand, it was held in Foley's Charity Trustees v. Dudley Corpn. (2) that a highway authority had such ownership as to be made liable as terre tenant for the payment of a rentcharge issuing out of the land which included the site of the highway. It has, however, been correctly pointed out by counsel for the highway authority in the present case that that case is not conclusive of the position of a highway authority at the present time, because in 1910, when that case was decided, one might have a legal estate of a more limited character than the fee simple. The highway authority in that case might have been merely a life tenant or the owner for a term of years. The Law of Property Act, 1925, has reduced the kinds of legal estate which may exist to a fee simple absolute in possession and a term of years absolute, with the latter of which I am not concerned. Therefore, the question in this case is whether the ownership of the highway authority of the land in question is of such a kind as to amount to a fee simple absolute in possession, because, if it is, the highway authority is the owner of a legal estate and so the owner for the purpose of the Tithe Act, 1936.

It has been held in Rolls v. St. George the Martyr, Southwark, Vestry (3), decided in 1880, that when a highway ceases to be a highway in due course of law, i.e., by order of the justices the highway is either closed or diverted, the ownership of the land which was previously in the highway authority comes to an end. It appears, therefore, that the ownership of the highway authority of land is not necessarily for an estate in fee simple which is bound to last for ever. It is, however, an ownership which normally would last for a very long time and such ownership is only very seldom ended by the closing or diversion of the highway. It seems to me that the matter depends on the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 7 (1), which deals with a terminable estate, and (as amended by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, s. 7 and schedule) provides:

"A fee simple which, by virtue of the Lands Clauses Acts, the School Sites Acts, or any similar statute, is liable to be divested, is for the purposes of this Act a fee simple absolute, and remains liable to be divested as if this Act had not been passed, and a fee simple subject to a legal or equitable right of entry or re-entry is for the purposes of this Act a fee simple absolute."

It is argued by counsel for the highway authority that s. 7 (1) does not save the interest of the highway authority so as to make it a legal estate because the possibility of reverter in the present case is not of a kind mentioned therein. He points out that in the case of the Lands Clauses Acts and the case of the School Sites Acts there are express provisions providing that when the land ceases to be used for the purpose of a school [see, for instance, the School Sites Act, 1841, s. 2], or whatever it may be, it shall revert, for instance, to the estate of a specified person or to the adjoining tenant. The relevant conveyance does not necessarily in such case make express provision for reverter, but reverter occurs in specified circumstances by virtue of express statutory provisions. In the present case, counsel for the highway authority says that there is no express provision for reverter to be found in any of the Highway Acts and, therefore, the Highway Acts do not amount to a "similar statute" within s. 7 (1). I am not satisfied with that argument. It seems to me that the sub-section was aimed at a situation of a general kind which includes the position in regard to a highway. It seems to me that the Highway Acts are similar in that, while they do not contain an express provision for reverter, they do, as the result of the case law which has been founded on them, amount to provisions for the vesting in highway authorities of an estate determinable in the event of the land ceasing to be a highway. That is a situation of a kind intended to be covered, and covered, by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1925. That being so, in spite of the possibility of termination of the ownership of the highway authority by certain events, the highway authority has a legal estate. It would be extremely unfortunate if the highway authority had no legal estate. I feel convinced that s. 7 (1) was intended to cover the case of highway authorities as well as other persons who acquire land under statutory powers. Accordingly, I come to the conclusion that in the present case the defendants, the Runcorn Urban District Council, fall within the definition of "owner" in the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 17, and, therefore, are a person in respect of whom the apportionment should be made by the commission under s. 10 of the same Act.

[After discussion on the question of apportionment, HIS LORDSHIP said:] The plaintiffs ought to apportion the amount so charged between such highway and the land abutting on such highway and the land subjacent to any such highway if the relevant annuity be charged in respect of such several parts of the said land.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Solicitor, Tithe Redemption Commission (for the Tithe Redemption Commission); Ponsford & Devenish, agents for T. J. Lewis, clerk to Runcorn Urban District Council (for the highway authority); J. W. Ridsdale (for the defendant, Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd.).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), November 16, 1953.]

Justices—Clerk—Presence in retiring room while justices consider decision.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In three recent cases* this court has had to consider the question when, and for what purposes, it is proper for a clerk to justices to accompany them when they retire to consider their decision, or to remain in their room while the case is under consideration. It is evident from letters received both by the Lord Chancellor and myself, and from correspondence in newspapers, that there is uncertainty in the minds of magistrates on this subject and, indeed, some degree of misunderstanding as to the effect of what was said in the cases to which I have referred. They are the cases concerning the East Kerrier justices (1), the Welshpool justices (2) and the Barry justices (3). I propose, therefore, to endeavour to clear up this matter, and have the authority of the Lord Chancellor to say that he concurs in the statement I am about to make, as do all the judges who were parties to the decisions I have mentioned.

There are two questions which arise in this connection. The first is: On what matters may magistrates consult their clerk? The second, and one of equal importance, is: In what manner should they consult him?

On the first question, it is clear that they may seek his advice on questions of law, or of mixed law and fact, and also on questions regarding the practice and procedure of the court. The latter are, indeed, questions of law. There are other matters on which justices may require the assistance of their clerk and on which they are entitled to ask his advice. They may, for instance, ask him for information of the sentences which have been imposed by their bench, or by neighbouring benches, in respect of similar offences to that which they are trying. It is, indeed, most desirable that penalties for such matters as obstruction by vehicles, lack of lights and other what may be called public order offences should have some degree of uniformity. Moreover, it would be proper for the clerk himself to call the justices' attention to the fact that a question of law does, or may, arise if they do not appear to be already aware of it. It would then be for them to consider whether they wanted his further advice on that question. In no circumstances, however, may justices consult their clerk as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, so far as it is simply a question of fact, but, if a question arises as to the construction of a statute or regulation, they may consult him on whether the facts found by them constitute an offence, because that would be a question of mixed law and fact. They may also properly ask the clerk to refresh their memory as to any matter of evidence which has been given. They can take with them, or send for, any note the clerk may have taken, and if there is anything in the note which needs elucidation, or if they think something has been omitted or wrongly taken down, it would be perfectly proper for them to consult him. They must not ask his opinion as to the sentence which they ought to impose, but they may, as I have said, ask for information as to the sentences imposed for comparable offences, and they most certainly may consult him on what penalties the law allows in any particular case if they already do not know it, and on any consequential matters that may follow on conviction. One obvious instance would be with regard to certain motoring offences, whether reasons which they are prepared to give can amount to special reasons for not disqualifying a driver according to the decision of this court on that subject. They may also want to know whether it is a case in which they can require sureties for good behaviour in addition to imposing a penalty.

* (1) R. v. East Kerrier JJ. Ex p. Mundy, [1952] 2 All E.R. 144; [1952] 2 Q.B. 719; 116 J.P. 339; 3rd Digest Supp.

(2) R. v. Welshpool JJ. Ex p. Holley, ante, p. 807; 117 J.P. 511.

(3) R. v. Barry (Glamorgan) JJ. Ex p. Kashim, ante, p. 1005.

As regards the manner in which justices may consult their clerk, the court, I think, made it clear in the East Kerrier case (1) that the decision of the court must be the decision of the justices, and not that of the justices and their clerk, and that, if the clerk retires with the justices as a matter of course, it is inevitable that the impression will be given that he may influence the justices as to the decision, or sentence, or both. A clerk should not retire with his justices as a matter of course, nor should they attempt to get round the decisions to which I have referred merely by asking him in every case to retire with them, or by pretending that they require his advice on a point of law. Subject to this, it is in the discretion of the justices to ask their clerk to retire with them if, in any particular case, it has become clear that they will need his advice. If, in the course of their deliberations, they find that they need him, they can send for him. On this matter I would stress one further point, and that is, that if the clerk does retire with the justices, or is sent for by them, he should return to his place in court as soon as he is released by the justices, leaving them to complete their deliberations in his absence and come back into court in their turn. I wish to add that the rulings this court has given on the subject derive from, and are really part of, the rule so often emphasised that justice must not only be done but must manifestly appear to be done, and, if justices bear that in mind, I feel sure they will have no difficulty in loyally following the decisions of this court.

I should add that the rulings of this court do not apply to justices when exercising jurisdiction in matrimonial cases as they are then subject to the directions and control of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division.

BRAMFORD'S ROAD TRANSPORT, LTD. v. EVANS (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), October 15, 16, 1953.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Wear and tear—Balancing charge—Vehicles of road haulage company—Compulsory acquisition by British Transport Commission—“Sale” of machinery or plant—“Before the trade is discontinued”—“... a person succeeds to any trade”—Treatment of machinery or plant as if sold—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 11 (2), as substituted by Finance Act, 1926 (c. 22), s. 32 (1)—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 17 (1), s. 60 (1).

On May 9, 1949, the taxpayers ceased to carry on their trade of road haulage, when their undertaking was compulsorily acquired by the British Transport Commission under a notice of acquisition under the Transport Act, 1947. Ownership of their trade vehicles vested in the commission, all their employees were taken over, and their managing director became a district traffic assistant under the commission and a “unit” manager. The undertaking was for some months carried on as a unit before being merged completely in the commission’s undertaking. By s. 3 (4) of the Act of 1947 all the business of the commission was required to form one undertaking. The taxpayers were assessed to a balancing charge in respect of the machinery and plant comprising the vehicles under s. 17 (1) and (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1945.

HELD: (i) although not “sold” within the meaning of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945: John Hudson & Co., Ltd. v. Kirkness (ante, p. 64), applied; in view of the provisions of s. 60 (1), for the purposes of the Act the plant must be treated as if it had been sold to the commission because there had been a succession to the taxpayers’ trade within the meaning of s. 60 (1), notwithstanding its merger in the undertaking of the commission under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 3 (4): Bell v. National Provincial Bank of England ([1904] 1 K.B. 149), applied; and notwithstanding the compulsory acquisition.

(ii) “trade” in s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, meant the trade carried on by the taxpayers, and, after acquisition, by the commission, notwithstanding its loss of identity through merger in the undertaking of the commission, and the “sale” of the plant, therefore, occurred “before the trade [was] permanently discontinued” within the meaning of that enactment.

Boarland v. Madras Electric Supply Corpn. (ante, p. 467), applied.

(iii) therefore, the balancing charge was properly made.

FOR THE RULES APPLICABLE TO CASES I AND II OF SCHED. D TO THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1918, r. 11 (2), as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1), see HALSBURY’S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, p. 164; and FOR THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1945, s. 17 (1), see ibid., p. 629.

Cases referred to:

- (1) John Hudson & Co., Ltd. v. Kirkness, [1953] 2 All E.R. 64.
- (2) James Shipstone & Sons, Ltd. v. Morris, (1929), 14 Tax Cas. 413.
- (3) Reynolds, Sons & Co., Ltd. v. Ogston, (1930), 15 Tax Cas. 501.
- (4) Laycock v. Freeman, Hardy & Willis, Ltd., [1938] 4 All E.R. 609; [1939] 2 K.B. 1; 108 L.J.K.B. 270; 160 L.T. 41; 22 Tax Cas. 288; Digest H Supp.
- (5) Briton Perry Steel Co., Ltd. v. Barry, [1939] 4 All E.R. 541; 23 Tax Cas. 414; Digest Supp.
- (6) Bell v. National Provincial Bank of England, [1904] 1 K.B. 149; 73 L.J.K.B. 142; 90 L.T. 2; 68 J.P. 107; 5 Tax Cas. 1; 28 Digest 41, 211.
- (7) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. West, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Reid, 1950 S.C. 516; 31 Tax Cas. 402; 2nd Digest Supp.

(8) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Barr, [1953] T.R. 7; 46 R. & I.T. 217; 32 A.T.C. 93.

(9) Boarland v. Madras Electric Supply Corpn., [1953] 2 All E.R. 467.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax under the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 64.

The company appealed against an assessment under Case I of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the year 1949-50 in the sum of £6,330, less £197 capital allowances, in respect of a balancing charge which had been made under s. 17 (1) and (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. On May 9, 1949, the company's road haulage undertaking, including its trade vehicles, was compulsorily acquired by the British Transport Commission and became part of the commission's undertaking, and the company ceased to carry on its trade. The balancing charge was made in respect of the company's goods vehicles and trailers and was based on an aggregate figure representing the excess of the valuation of the vehicles and trailers over the expenditure thereon still unallowed at May 9, 1949, under s. 17 (3) of the Act of 1945. The company contended: (i) that, as it permanently ceased to carry on the trade of road haulage on May 9, 1949, the trade was permanently discontinued on that date within the meaning of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, irrespective of whether the commission succeeded to that trade, so that no event giving rise to a liability to a balancing charge occurred before the trade was permanently discontinued: Inland Revenue Comrs. v. West, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Reid (7); (ii) that, in the alternative, on the evidence the commission did not succeed to the trade of road haulage previously carried on by the company; (iii) that, if the effect of the notice of acquisition given under s. 44 of the Transport Act, 1947, was to merge the carrying business previously carried on by the company into a nation-wide and integrated system of public transport administered by the commission, such a merger did not constitute a succession by the commission to the company's business within the meaning of r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D; (iv) that, in the alternative, the plant, being the lorries previously the company's property, vested in the commission on May 9, 1949, by virtue of a notice of acquisition under s. 44 of the Transport Act, 1947, was not sold by the company within the meaning of s. 17 (1) (a) of the Act of 1945; and (v) that the assessment should, therefore, be discharged. For the Crown it was contended: (i) that on the evidence the trade of road haulage carried on by the company up to May 9, 1949, was not permanently discontinued on that date within the meaning of s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945 and that Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Reid (7) had no application to the case; (ii) that on the evidence the commission succeeded on May 9, 1949, within the meaning of r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, to the trade of road haulage previously carried on by the company, and that the succession was the happening of an event which did not amount to the permanent discontinuance of the trade under the last paragraph of s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945; (iii) that the company's vehicles, being plant within the meaning of s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945, were sold on May 9, 1949, to the commission within the meaning of that sub-section; (iv) that, alternatively, even if the plant was not sold by the company, under s. 60 (1) of the Act of 1945 it was required to be treated as if it had been sold to the commission as successor to the company; and (v) that, therefore, the assessment should be confirmed. The commissioners found that the company ceased to carry on the trade of road haulage on May 9, 1949, but held that Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Reid (7) was not conclusive on the question to be decided in view of the terms of the last paragraph of s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945. They found on the evidence that, after the transfer date, May 9, 1949, the company's trade went on very much as before until Sept. 30, 1949, when it was merged in a bigger unit of transport, and that the commission succeeded to the company's trade on that date and carried it on in an identifiable form thereafter. They held, therefore, that the trade was not permanently discontinued before the transfer of the assets to the commission within the meaning of s. 17 (1) of the Act. They gave no decision on whether the plant was sold within the meaning of s. 17 (1), since it was conceded by the company that, in the case of a succession such as they had found, s. 60 (1) would apply so as to require the lorries to be treated as if they had been sold to the commission as successor to the company. They, therefore, dismissed the appeal. The company appealed.

Heyworth Talbot, Q.C., and H. M. Allen for the company.

The Solicitor General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.) and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an appeal from a decision of the Special Commissioners on the assessment of the company to a balancing charge under the Income Tax Acts. According to the Case Stated, before May 9, 1949, the company

"carried on, from headquarters in Leicester, a trade or business of regular service carriers between Leicestershire, Northamptonshire, Staffordshire and intermediate counties. [It] carried goods, known in the trade as 'smalls', i.e., consignments up to three hundredweights, and 'large smalls', i.e., consignments from three hundredweights up to one ton, between four main services, viz., Leicester to Stafford; Leicester to Stoke-on-Trent; Leicester to Wolverhampton; and Leicester to Northampton. The [company] was a small private company, using only one type of transport vehicle, and contracted for the maintenance of those vehicles with one service motor engineering firm. It offered its services to all customers within the area of its operation, provided the consignment of goods for carriage was of the particular type above-mentioned, but its business was, in practice, mainly confined to specialised customers. It operated a 'door to door', twenty-four hours' service and was equipped to accept exceptional traffic.

"On May 9, 1949, the whole undertaking of [the company] was compulsorily taken over by the Transport Commission (hereinafter called 'the commission') under the provisions of the Transport Act, 1947, and on the same date [the company] ceased to carry on any trade of road haulage, or any other trade. The provisions of the Transport Act, under which this transaction was effected, are s. 39, s. 40, s. 44 and s. 45. The requisite notice of acquisition was given by the commission, and, under s. 45, ownership of the trade vehicles, previously the property of [the company], vested in the commission on May 9, 1949. The general duty of the commission, as defined by s. 3 of the Transport Act, was 'to secure or promote the provision of an efficient, adequate, economical and properly integrated system of public inland transport'.

"Accordingly, on and after May 9, 1949, the undertaking previously carried on by [the company] continued for a time very much as before. The Road Haulage Executive, in addition to acquiring [the company's] vehicles, took over its stores and all its other assets, except cash, debts, a private car and some investments. The commission also used [the company's] Leicester depot from May 9 to Sept. 1, by arrangement with Mr. C. W. Bramford [managing director of the company] who was appointed a district traffic assistant under the commission. . . . [The company's] ten lorries continued on similar services, except that two which had been engaged in work for the Goodyear Tyre Co. were, shortly after May 9, 1949, taken off that work and transferred to the Stafford district. The undertaking previously carried on by [the company] continued as a unit for a few months until Sept. 30, 1949, and the following entry appeared in the ROAD HAULAGE EXECUTIVE GAZETTEER, viz.: 'Unit E.93. Bramfords; nature of business: "Smalls," regular trunk services: Leicester/Staffordshire, Northamptonshire.' The address in the GAZETTEER, 36, Nanson Road, and the telephone number were those of the original [company's] property, but from the vesting date, May 9, 1949, vehicles other than [the company's] former lorries were supplied with fuel oil at that address, which was not the case when the business was privately operated. To officials of the Transport Commission Executive the undertaking was known as 'Unit E.93' after the vesting date, but the commission purchased for £1 the name 'Bramfords' from the company, though it never used the full name 'Bramford's Road Transport'. The name 'Bramfords' was retained for purposes of identification, for domestic purposes, and for external use and to prevent the name being used by others. The 'unit' system was for the purposes of the commission's internal accounting because there was no other framework in the early stages, although the intention from the outset was . . . to integrate the units into a group structure. The name 'Bramfords' was not used by the commission on stationery and the Road Haulage Executive's name was substituted for Bramford's Road Transport on the vehicles. All the employees of [the company] went over to the service of the commission on May 9, 1949, Mr. Charles William Bramford being engaged as unit manager in a supervisory capacity, as well as carrying out duties as traffic assistant with the Leicester-Northants office of the Road Haulage Executive.

"As from Sept. 1, 1949, the undertaking previously carried on by [the company] and, from May 9, 1949, known as Unit E.93 was merged with another concern, Bland's, which together formed a new unit, E.94. The lorries acquired from [the company] were moved from 36 Nanson Road to Frog Island, Leicester. Thereafter the Leicester to Stafford service continued to be operated, but the Leicester to Northampton service was discontinued, because another existing service undertaking had been taken over. The Leicester to Wolverhampton service continued to operate, but it was modified from one or two vehicles daily to about three weekly trips. Maintenance of the lorries ceased to be looked after by private contract, but was done for the commission at group or depot engineering establishments. The provisional valuation made by the Road Transport Executive of the goods vehicles and trailers of [the company] as at May 9, 1949, shows a figure of £13,104 (£12,750 written down value under s. 47 (1) (a) (b) of the Transport Act, 1947, plus £354 for 'better condition' under sub-s. (1) (c)). This figure appears in the 'final ascertainment' shown in exhibit B, and was an agreed figure between the commission and [the company], and arrived at vehicle by vehicle. The separate figures for each vehicle are shown in exhibit B, p. 3, and were arrived at on the basis prescribed by s. 47 of the Transport Act, 1947. There was subsequently a discussion between the two parties concerned as to the compensation payable for cessation under the provisions of s. 47 (3) of the Transport Act, 1947. The final figure of such compensation for cessation of [the company's] business was £7,459 and the total lump sum payment due by the commission to [the company] for everything taken over, including such compensation, was settled by negotiation at a sum of £20,000. The said assessment of £6,330 was based on an aggregate figure representing the excess of the said aggregate figure of £13,104 over the expenditure on such plant still unallowed as at May 9, 1949, under the provisions of s. 17 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1945."

On those facts, the commissioners came to the conclusion that there had been such a succession as was mentioned in the relevant statute, and confirmed the assessment for 1949-50 in the sum of £6,330, less £197 capital allowances, this being the figure agreed between the parties following the decision of the commissioners in principle. The question of law stated for the opinion of the High Court is:

"Whether on the foregoing evidence, and on the true construction of s. 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, a balancing charge arose on the sale by the appellant company to the commission of the plant, consisting of the said motor vehicles."

The main statutory provision with which this case is concerned is s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, which provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where, on or after the appointed day, any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or a deduction under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D has been made or allowed for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either—(a) the machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or not . . . "

or three other events which are not material for the purposes of this case,

" . . . and the event in question occurs before the trade is permanently discontinued, an allowance or charge (in this Part of this Act referred to as 'a balancing allowance' or 'a balancing charge') shall, in the circumstances mentioned in this section, be made to, or, as the case may be, on, that person for the year of assessment in his basis period for which that event occurs."

There follow two provisos which do not apply in the present case, and at the end of the sub-section some words which are extremely material:

"Any reference in this sub-section to the permanent discontinuance of a trade does not include a reference to the happening of any event which, by virtue of any of the provisions of r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, is to be treated as equivalent to the discontinuance of the trade."

By s. 68 (4), the definition section of the Act:

"Any reference in this Act to the setting up or permanent discontinuance of a trade includes, except where the contrary is expressly provided, a reference to the occurring of any event which, under any of the provisions of the Income Tax Acts, is to be treated as equivalent to the setting up or permanent discontinuance of a trade."

It seems to me that the effect of the concluding words of s. 17 is to eliminate the general provision in s. 68 (4).

As a result of the concluding words of s. 17 (1), it is necessary to refer back to the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. Rule 9 provides:

"(1) If a person charged under this schedule ceases within the year of assessment to carry on the trade, profession, or vocation in respect of which the assessment is made, and is succeeded therein by another person, the surveyor shall, within four months from Apr. 5 next after any such change, certify to the general commissioners for the division in which the assessment is made the particulars thereof, and the full name and residence of the person charged and of his successor and the date of the change, if the same be known to the surveyor. (2) On receipt of the certificate the commissioners shall cause notice to be given to the respective persons of a meeting of the commissioners to consider it, and after examination of the said persons, if they attend, or on other satisfactory proof of the facts, the commissioners shall adjust the assessment by charging the successor with a fair proportion thereof from the time of his succeeding to the trade, profession or vocation, and relieving the person originally charged from a like amount."

There is a reference to "successor" in that rule, but the case is really concerned with r. 11, which, as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1) provides:

A " (1) If at any time after Apr. 5, 1928, a change occurs in a partnership of persons engaged in any trade, profession or vocation, by reason of retirement or death, or the dissolution of the partnership as to one or more of the partners, or the admission of a new partner, in such circumstances that one or more of the persons who until that time were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation continue to be engaged therein, or a person who until that time was engaged in any trade, profession or vocation on his own account continues to be engaged in it, but as a partner in a partnership, the tax payable by the person or persons who carry on the trade, profession or vocation after that time shall, notwithstanding the change, be computed according to the profits or gains of the trade, profession or vocation during the period prescribed by the Income Tax Acts."

B Then there is a proviso which enables the persons concerned to give notice requiring a different arrangement. That paragraph is not really the one with which this case has to deal, but it was referred to as contrasting the situation in the present case with the situation where there is a change of partnership and where it is said there is some common element between the persons who carried on the business before the change and those who carried on the business after the change. Paragraph (2), as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1), is the important one:

D " (2) If at any time after the said Apr. 5 any person succeeds to any trade, profession or vocation which until that time was carried on by another person and the case is not one to which para. (1) of this rule applies, the tax payable for all years of assessment by the person succeeding as aforesaid shall be computed as if he had set up or commenced the trade, profession or vocation at that time, and the tax payable for all years of assessment by the person who until that time carried on the trade, profession or vocation shall be computed as if it had then been discontinued."

E The first question is whether there has been a sale within s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. The provisions of the Transport Act, 1947, have been considered by UPJOHN, J., in John Hudson & Co., Ltd. v. Kirkness (1). He was not concerned with the provisions with which I am concerned, the group of sections relating to the transport of goods by road, but he dealt with the acquisition of railway wagons, and it seems to me that, for the purposes of comparison, the set of sections in the Act relating to railway wagons is on very similar lines, if not precisely parallel, to the provisions relating to the acquisition of vehicles used for the transport of goods by road. In each case the effect of the Act is to vest property in the things in question in the British Transport Commission, and in subsequent provisions to provide for the assessment and payment of compensation to the previous owner. UPJOHN, J., held that the transfer of railway wagons did not constitute a sale for the purpose of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, so as to render the company liable to a balancing charge under the section. I am bound to follow that decision, and, accordingly, my first conclusion is that there has not been a sale within s. 17 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, i.e., this is not a case where machinery or plant is sold.

H That, however, is not an end of the matter, because s. 60 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, provides:

" Where, on or after the appointed day, a person succeeds to any trade, profession or vocation which until that time was carried on by another person and, by virtue of any of the provisions of r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, the trade, profession or vocation is to be treated as discontinued, any property which, immediately before the succession takes place, was in use for the purposes of the discontinued trade, profession or vocation and, without being sold, is, immediately after the succession takes place, in use for the purposes of the new trade, profession or vocation, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as if it had been sold to the successor when the succession takes place, and as if the net proceeds of that sale had been the price which that property would have fetched if sold in the open market: Provided that no initial allowance shall be made under any of the provisions of this Act by virtue of the provisions of this sub-section."

The result is that, if I come to the conclusion that there has been a succession by the British Transport Commission to the trade of the company, the provisions relating to the result of a sale of the vehicles in question which are contained in s. 17 (1) come in again for consideration so that a balancing charge may be payable.

It is necessary, therefore, first to consider whether there has been any succession in this case. The provisions of the rules to which I have referred have been the subject of a large number of decisions in the courts, and I was referred to James Shipstone & Sons, Ltd. v. Morris (2), Reynolds, Sons & Co., Ltd. v. Ogston (3), Laycock v. Freeman, Hardy & Willis, Ltd. (4) and Briton Ferry Steel Co., Ltd. v. Barry (5). The circumstances in those cases were not very similar to the facts of the present case, but certain discussions of the principles involved, it was suggested, led to the conclusion that, because, as it was said, the business of the company was no longer identifiable in the hands of the commission, but had become merged in its general undertaking, there was not a succession for the purposes of the material statutory provision.

Counsel for the company relied on s. 3 (4) of the Transport Act, 1947, which provides:

"All the business carried on by the commission, whether or not arising from undertakings or parts of undertakings vested in them by or under any provision of this Act, shall form one undertaking, and the commission shall so conduct that undertaking and, subject to the provisions of this Act, levy such fares, rates, tolls, dues and other charges, as to secure that the revenue of the commission is not less than sufficient for making provision for the meeting of charges properly chargeable to revenue, taking one year with another."

But it seems to me that the observations of the Court of Appeal and others in the cases cited do not lead to the conclusion that there has not been a succession in the present case and that the British Transport Commission has not succeeded to the company's trade. In the first place, it seems to me that the statute is not referring to the trade in the sense of the trade of the company, so that, when the company goes out of business that is an end of the matter, although the same business may be carried on by another. The provisions of r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II clearly show that the words "succeeds" and "succession" as used in the Income Tax Acts envisage the idea that, though one person may go completely out of business, the trade in question continues if it is carried on by some other person. If, therefore, the word is used in the sense which is in the minds of the legislature, the mere fact that the company or some previous owner of the business in question may have ceased to carry it on and gone out of business does not provide any ground for saying that there had not been a succession.

The matter would appear to be covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bell v. National Provincial Bank of England (6), in which the National Provincial Bank, a bank with a large capital, purchased in 1899 the business and premises and other assets of a small bank, the County of Stafford Bank, which carried on business only at Wolverhampton. The National Provincial Bank opened for the first time a branch on the premises so purchased ([1904] 1 K.B. 149):

" . . . and there carried on business with the manager and staff previously employed by the County of Stafford Bank. The profits and expenses of the business so carried on at Wolverhampton by the respondents were merged in those of their concern as a whole, and there were no means of ascertaining whether there were any profits, or the proportion of increase or decrease, if any, in the profits of the respondents' bank, which had arisen from the business purchased as aforesaid. In the three years respectively subsequent to 1899, the respondents, in computing the average of their profits under r. 1 of Case I in s. 100, sched. D, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, did not include any profits earned by the County of Stafford Bank. Additional assessments were made upon them so as to include such profits, on the ground that there had been a succession by them to the business of the County of Stafford Bank within the meaning of r. 4 applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D."

A

B It was held in the Court of Appeal:

" . . . that there had been such a succession, and therefore the additional assessments were rightly made."

That seems to me to be not far from the present case, and the decision of the Court of Appeal is one which I should apply. MATHEW, L.J., puts the matter clearly (ibid., 163):

C

" The respondents purchased the whole concern of the County of Stafford Bank, its premises, the goodwill of its business, and its assets; and they continued to carry on the business on the same premises and with the same staff and customers as before. It seems to me that such a case is within the terms of the rule. A difficulty was raised on the ground that it is impossible now to ascertain what are the profits of the Wolverhampton business taken separately. There was no difficulty in ascertaining those profits while the County of Stafford Bank still continued to exist, and I cannot see why there need be any difficulty now. It does not follow that, because the respondents have chosen to treat that business as merged in their business as a whole in the manner stated in the case, that merger can prevent the respondents from being liable under r. 4 to additional assessments. The question raised by the case appears to me to be whether there was, upon the facts as stated by the commissioners, a succession to a business within the meaning of r. 4."

D

E

It was held that there was such a succession.

That case also really disposes of the point raised by counsel for the company on s. 3 (4) of the Transport Act, 1947. As I understand it, that point was that, because the section required all the business carried on by the commission to form one undertaking, it was impossible for any individual business taken over by the commission to be identifiable any longer; it must be merged in the undertaking of the commission so that the commission could no longer be a successor in respect of it. That seems to me to be disposed of by the National Provincial Bank case (6) because the business of the County of Stafford Bank purchased by the National Provincial Bank was merged in the undertaking of the National Provincial Bank, and yet it was held that there was a succession. The fact that that method of dealing with the matter was made compulsory by the Transport Act, 1947, to my mind, does not alter the position in any way. It seems to me, therefore, that in the present case there was a succession and that the British Transport Commission succeeded to the business of the company.

G

H

The last point concerns s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945, which requires, as one of the conditions of the application of the section, that the event in question—the succession in this case—should occur before the trade is permanently discontinued. It was argued by counsel for the company that the discontinuance of the trade by the company was coincident with the succession or the sale, whatever it might be, and that consequently the terms of the section are not fulfilled. In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. West, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Reid (7), there had been a sale of the fishing boat, Girl Eileen, which on the sale had been removed from Fraserburgh, where she had been previously used, and employed in fishing from the port of Lerwick. It was held by the Court of Session that there had been a permanent discontinuance of the trade simultaneous with the sale of the vessel. LORD KEITH said (31 Tax Cas. 420):

"I have no doubt that there was here a true sale of plant within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1945. It may be said that each of the respondents sold his respective shares in the vessel and it is contended that this brings the case into the same category as the sale in the Mistress Isa by one of several co-owners of his individual shares. But the position is clearly different. The result of all the share owners combining at one time in the sale was to transfer the whole vessel to separate ownership and so far the statute, in my opinion, applies. But the nature of the transaction raises another point under the statute. By s. 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, a balancing charge only arises if the sale occurs before the trade is permanently discontinued. The contention for the Revenue is that the trade has not been permanently discontinued because the vessel sold is still engaged in trade. But it is clear in my opinion that s. 17 is looking not to the continuance of the machinery or plant in trade but to the continuance of the owner of the machinery or plant in trade. The section shows that a balancing charge or balancing payment is intended to provide a readjustment of initial allowances or wear and tear allowances made to 'a person carrying on a trade' and when reference is made to 'the trade' being permanently discontinued I have no doubt that the trade is the trade of the person to whom the other allowances had previously been made. The respondents' trade with the Girl Eileen has been permanently discontinued and it is not suggested that they are continuing to trade with any other ships. A different case might arise in the case of co-owners trading with a fleet of ships and selling one of the fleet. But that case does not arise . . ."

On the facts, that case is different from the present one, but those observations might have some application here. In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Barr (8) the facts were very similar to those of the present case ([1953] T.R. 7):

"The respondent carried on business under the name of Henry & Galt, and sold the business as a going concern, and the business continued to be carried on by the new owner. Included in the assets of the business was some machinery and plant. The Inland Revenue contended that there had been a sale of machinery and plant, and that a balancing charge could in the circumstances be made. It was contended for the respondent that the sale of the machinery and plant had not taken place before the permanent discontinuance of the business, as is required by s. 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, but had taken place simultaneously with the notional discontinuance of the business. Held, that the respondent's contention was correct, and that no balancing charge could be imposed."

The opinion was extremely short, and it is rather unsatisfactory in that it seems to have been accepted that the previous decision of the Court of Session was necessarily one to be applied to the facts in this case. LORD CARMONT said (ibid.):

"In this case, in which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are the appellants, the question is raised as to liability to a balancing charge under s. 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, and whether it arose on the sale by the respondent of the plant and machinery of a firm called Henry & Galt. I need only refer to the fact that the business was sold as a going concern to one, Thomas Reid, and that a new firm acquired the concern and is running it. The general commissioners who heard the appeal had before them the case of Inland Revenue Comrs. v. West (7), which was decided by this court in 1950. It was held in that case that no balancing charge was exigible in circumstances which the appellant, in opening his appeal before us, said he could not distinguish from the facts in the present case. Accordingly, as the case cannot be argued on the footing that West (7) is distinguishable, the judgment of the court in that case applies in such circumstances as we have now before us, and there is no alternative open to us but to answer the question put in the negative, and I so move your Lordships."

- A This matter was considered by UPJOHN, J., in Boarland v. Madras Electric Supply Corpn. (9). He pointed out that apparently the concluding words of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, had never been brought to the attention of the Court of Session in the two cases cited. He, therefore, felt at liberty to decide the matter according to his own judgment, and did not feel bound to follow the decisions of the Court of Session. It was unfortunate, perhaps, that
- B the question whether the concluding words would alter the result was apparently not argued at all strenuously on behalf of the taxpayer in that case, and not in the way in which counsel for the company has argued the matter in the present case, but it seems to me that I should apply the decision of UPJOHN, J., particularly as I consider that the conclusion he reached was right, and that the conclusion of the Court of Session is one with which I could not agree and which
- C I would not wish to apply unless compelled to follow it. Accordingly, I propose to apply the decision of UPJOHN, J., on this final point, and I hold that "trade" in the concluding words of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, means, not simply the trade of the company which would come to an end when it went out of business, but the trade carried on by it and acquired by the British Transport Commission. Therefore, the "event", i.e., the acquisition by the
- D commission, did occur before the trade was permanently discontinued, and this is a case in which the section applies, and the commissioners reached a proper conclusion. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Mawby, Barrie & Letts (for the company); Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re D. (an infant).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), October 29, 30, 1953.]

Justices—Custody—Access—Variation of order—Jurisdiction of court of summary jurisdiction where applicant resides—Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951 (c. 56), s. 1 (1)—Children Act, 1948 (c. 43), s. 53.

On Dec. 15, 1952, Eastbourne justices gave to the mother the custody of the child of the marriage, ordered the father to pay £1 a week for his maintenance, and granted the father access to the child one half day each week. In March, 1953, the father applied to Wallington justices, within whose jurisdiction he then resided, for a variation of the order of the Eastbourne justices by granting him care and control of the child for a period of seven continuous days in every ten weeks.

HELD: section 1 (1) of the Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951, gave to the court of summary jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the place in which the applicant resided at the time of the application, power to vary an order made under s. 5 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886; on the facts, the father resided within the jurisdiction of the Wallington justices; and, therefore, those justices had power to hear his application and to vary the order of the Eastbourne justices.

Semle: The jurisdiction conferred by s. 53 of the Children Act, 1948, to enforce, vary, or revoke in like manner as an affiliation order an order of a court of summary jurisdiction for the payment of money under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, is limited to that part of the order which concerns money payments, and does not extend to such a term of the order as the grant of access at specified times to the parent of an infant whose custody is given to the other parent.

Colchester v. Peck ([1926] 2 K.B. 366) and R. v. Copestake. Ex p. Wilkinson ([1927] 1 K.B. 468), applied.

Pratt v. Pratt (1927) (96 L.J.P. 123) and Markham v. Markham ([1946] 2 All E.R. 737), questioned.

FOR THE GUARDIANSHIP OF INFANTS ACT, 1886, s. 5 and s. 9, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, pp. 943, 945.

FOR THE GUARDIANSHIP AND MAINTENANCE OF INFANTS ACT, 1951, s. 1 (1), see ibid., Vol. 30, p. 188.

FOR THE CHILDREN ACT, 1948, s. 53, see ibid., Vol. 12, p. 1140.

Cases referred to:

(1) Pratt v. Pratt, (1927), 96 L.J.P. 123; 137 L.T. 491; 27 Digest, Replacement, 726, 6938.

(2) Markham v. Markham, [1946] 2 All E.R. 737; 176 L.T. 19; 111 J.P. 29; 27 Digest, Replacement, 727, 6939.

(3) Colchester v. Peck, [1926] 2 K.B. 366; 95 L.J.K.B. 1038; 135 L.T. 32; 90 J.P. 130; Digest Supp.

(4) R. v. Copestake. Ex p. Wilkinson, [1927] 1 K.B. 468; 96 L.J.K.B. 65; 136 L.T. 100; 90 J.P. 191; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the mother from a decision of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 8, 1953.

On Dec. 15, 1952, the Eastbourne justices, on the application of the mother, made an order under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, granting her the legal custody of the child of the marriage, born on Nov. 3, 1950, ordering the father to pay to the mother the sum of £1 per week for the maintenance of the child while under the age of sixteen years, and directing that the father "shall have access to the said [child] one half day in each and every week." In March, 1953, the father applied to the Wallington justices under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 3 (4), as being the court of summary jurisdiction for the place in which he was then residing, for the discharge of the Eastbourne justices' order, or for its variation, inter alia, by deleting the provision as to the access and substituting the provision that he should have the care and control of the child "for a continuous period of seven days in every ten weeks." At the hearing on Apr. 24, 1953, before the Wallington justices, the then solicitor for the wife objected to the court's jurisdiction and at the end of the case asked for an adjournment. This was refused by the justices who made an order as follows:

- A "It is adjudged that the complaint [of the father] is true and it is hereby ordered that the said order [of the Eastbourne justices] be varied as follows, that is to say, that the [father] shall have the complete care and control of the said [child] for a continuous period of seven days in every ten weeks."

The mother appealed to ROXBURGH, J., on the grounds (i) that the Wallington justices had no jurisdiction to hear the case, and (ii) that on the merits their order ought to be discharged. ROXBURGH, J., held as to (i) that he was bound by Pratt v. Pratt (1) and Markham v. Markham (2) to hold that the Wallington justices had jurisdiction, and (ii) that there was no ground on the merits for upsetting their order, and, accordingly, he dismissed the appeal. The wife now appealed.

- B
C Comyn for the mother.
M. R. Hoare for the father.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts and continued:

I do not complain that the time of the court has been taken in considering a point of jurisdiction in a difficult matter. I venture, however, to express the view that, generally speaking, this court will not encourage appeals in matters relating to the guardianship of infants. I pointed out during the argument that, if the mother succeeded, there would (so far as I can see) be nothing to prevent the father making another application to justices, either at Wallington or elsewhere, and, if the mother failed, there would be nothing to prevent her making another application to appropriate justices.

- D
E On the question of jurisdiction it is obvious that ROXBURGH, J.'s view, apart from the decided cases, would have been, on the facts and the matters put before him, contrary to the conclusion at which, by force of the authorities, he felt compelled to arrive. He, therefore, it is right to say, encouraged the appeal and expressed the hope that the matter might have the consideration of this court. I must point out, however, that, henceforth, the question which we have considered is likely to be academic, for the relevant statutory provisions on which the whole argument below turned have now been superseded or repealed. In the course of the case attention was drawn to the terms of the Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951, s. 1, and it was also observed that the Emergency Laws (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1947, sched. II, paras. 5 to 8 inclusive (and para. 6 is a most important paragraph in the present case), have been repealed by the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 132 and sched. VI: see, however, s. 53 of the Act of 1952. It is not, perhaps, to be wondered at that these various statutory changes have eluded the observation of the persons concerned in this case. They are not easy to find, and the repeal of the relevant paragraphs of sched. II to the Emergency Laws (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1947, indicates the prophetic inexactitude of the heading of that schedule, which is: "Permanent enactment of provisions of certain Defence Regulations".

- G
H I will now deal with the point of jurisdiction as considered by ROXBURGH, J., and as it has now emerged before us, for the elucidation of which we have considered the Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951. Neither that Act nor the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, was brought to the attention of ROXBURGH, J. The case as the judge considered it and the ground on which the jurisdiction of the Wallington justices was alleged to be founded was under the Children Act, 1948, s. 53, which reads:

"An order of a court of summary jurisdiction for the payment of money under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, whether made before or after the commencement of this Act, may be enforced varied or revoked in like manner as an affiliation order, and the enactments relating to affiliation orders shall apply accordingly, with the necessary modifications."

The question, as it was debated before the learned judge, was whether or not the order made by the Eastbourne justices could properly be described as

"an order of a court of summary jurisdiction for the payment of money under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886."

At first sight it does not, perhaps, appear so, since its main object was to deal with the custody of a child, but it did contain a provision for the payment of money, namely, payment by the father of 20s. per week to the mother. I would add that the reference to the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, seems not very happy since the order was in fact made, not by virtue of that Act, but by the combined effect of the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925. I do not, however, want to indulge in the unprofitable, and, I venture to think, often unfair, exercise of criticising Parliamentary draftsmen, though the extreme complexity of this case does lead me to express the hope that in these very important matters relating to children, which affect a large number of people in relatively humble circumstances, the statutory provisions will be made (as occasion offers) as simple and readily understandable as possible.

Before, however, I come to consider the validity of the argument that the order of the Eastbourne justices was an order "for the payment of money", it is necessary to see what is meant in s. 53, by the words

"An order . . . may be . . . varied . . . in like manner as an affiliation order."

To discover in what manner an affiliation order may be varied the court must refer to the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, which dealt with a variety of subjects other than affiliation; and any connection in s. 30 (3) with affiliation orders is by no means obvious. However, that sub-section, as amended by the Money Payments (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935, s. 9, s. 16, and schedule, provides:

"Any order made either before or after the commencement of this Act by a court of summary jurisdiction for the periodical payment of money may, upon cause being shown . . . to the satisfaction of the court, be revoked, revived, or varied by a subsequent order."

It will be noted that there is a similarity (though not an exact parallel) of language between that sub-section and s. 53 of the Children Act, 1948, in that both relate to an order of "a court of summary jurisdiction for the payment of money", and provide (inter alia) for means of varying such orders. The third relevant provision on this part of the case—the Emergency Laws (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1947, sched. II, para. 6, which was to be permanently enacted, but which has now been repealed, is headed: "Provisions reproducing reg. 17 (c) of Defence (Administration of Justice) Regulations, 1940," and reads:

"(1) The following provisions shall have effect as respects complaints under s. 30 (3) of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, or s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, as amended . . . for the revocation, discharge, revival, alteration or variation of an affiliation order or a maintenance order. (2) A complaint may be made to a court of summary jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the place where the complainant is for the time being, instead of to the court which made the order (hereafter in this paragraph referred to as 'the original court')."

There follow, in the next two sub-paragraphs, provisions designed to ensure (i) that the respondent to the complaint should be given due notice of an application, and (ii) to give to the original court certain powers (on information which has to be conveyed to it) to state whether it is appropriate that the original court or the court chosen by the complainant should hear the matter. I need not refer to those latter sub-paragraphs beyond stating that, since the Wallington justices were advised that their jurisdiction rested on this paragraph, they did comply with all the provisions.

It will be observed that, first, if the order in question was an order "for the payment of money", then, following the analogy directed by s. 53 of the Children Act, 1948, it would be competent for the father to apply to the court of summary jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the place where he was for the time being. The paragraph does not say "resides", but simply "is", and he must, therefore, show only that at the time he makes the application he is in a place within the jurisdiction of the court in question. It is not in doubt, and no point has been taken to the contrary, that the husband in the present case "was" at a place within the jurisdiction of the Wallington justices. He gave his address in making his application, and it is referred to in the order as 56, North Street, Carshalton, Surrey, and nobody has questioned that that was within the jurisdiction of those justices. But there remains the question: Was this an order "for the payment of money"? That it was an order containing a direction for the payment of money is not in doubt, but it was plainly not an order exclusively for the payment of money. It appears to me, I must confess, that the insertion into s. 53 of the Children Act, 1948, of the phrase "for the payment of money" should have a restrictive effect on the words which precede and follow it. It is plain that the jurisdiction conferred by the Guardianship of Infants Acts comprehends many types of order, many types of direction, other than those of mere payment of money; and treating this matter, therefore, as res integra, I should myself have formed the view that the formula indicates that the subject-matter which may be varied in such orders is that part or those parts which relate to money payments. That was plainly the view taken also by ROXBURGH, J., treating the matter as res integra. But the matter is not res integra. Until the present case no court has been asked to consider the exact meaning of an order "for the payment of money under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886", but I must briefly allude to four cases—Pratt v. Pratt (1) and Markham v. Markham (2) (which were of an analogous character, relating to maintenance payments under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895) and two which were not referred to by ROXBURGH, J., but which, since they relate to affiliation orders, seem to me to be more germane, namely, Colchester v. Peck (3) and R. v. Copestake. Ex p. Wilkinson (4).

"an order of a court of summary jurisdiction for the payment of money under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 . . . may be . . . varied . . ."

Pratt v. Pratt (1) came before a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, consisting of LORD MERRIVALE, P., and BATESON, J. That was an appeal by the husband against an order made by the Leicester city justices reviving a separation order which had been discharged on the ground of the wife's adultery. The only relevance of that case is whether or not a separation order, the main purpose of which was to provide for the parties living separate and apart, but which did contain a direction that the husband was to pay a certain sum for the wife's maintenance, was an order "for the periodical payment of money" within the terms of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 30 (3). It must be confessed that the point does not seem to have been the subject of any close examination or argument, but it is plain that the two learned judges treated the order as falling within the sub-section. The argument for the husband was opened with the statement that s. 30 (3) of the Act of 1914 was inapplicable to the case. That argument was rejected, and the case, therefore, is a direct decision on that point.

In Markham v. Markham (2) the matter was fully considered by a Divisional Court consisting of LORD MERRIMAN, P., and BYRNE, J. An order for maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, had ceased to be operative because the parties had resumed cohabitation, but the wife applied to have that order revived and also varied on the ground of persistent cruelty after the resumption of cohabitation. The question then arose: Was this order which was sought to be revived and which had contained provisions other than those of mere money payment, an order within the terms of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 30 (3)? LORD MERRIMAN, P., drew attention to the affiliation cases (Colchester v. Peck (3) and R. v. Copestake. Ex p. Wilkinson (4)), and he, like ROXBURGH, J., in the present case, indicated plainly his own view that the order could not fairly be described as an order for the periodical payment of money. LORD MERRIMAN, P., referred ([1946] 2 All E.R. 741) particularly to the language of SHEARMAN, J.* in Colchester v. Peck (3), but he came to the conclusion that, so far as the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division was concerned, he could not possibly distinguish Markham v. Markham (2) from Pratt v. Pratt (1), and must, therefore, treat the matter as one in which he was bound to hold, following Pratt v. Pratt (1), that this was an order within the terms of s. 30 (3). As I have said, we are not concerned either directly or by reference with an order for maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, as amended. Section 53 of the Children Act, 1948, refers to affiliation orders. It does not, therefore, seem to me that a court, which might otherwise be bound by the decisions in Pratt v. Pratt (1) and Markham v. Markham (2), need necessarily hold itself precluded by those two decisions.

I pass now to the two affiliation cases. Colchester v. Peck (3) came before a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division, consisting of LORD HEWART, C.J., AVORY and SHEARMAN, JJ. On the application of the mother, justices had made an order in bastardy adjudging that the appellant was the father of her illegitimate child, and had ordered him to make her a periodical payment. Subsequently the father, under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 30 (3), sought a variation or revocation of that order. The justices refused to hear the application, holding that they had no power to deal with that part of the order which adjudged the paternity, and the Divisional Court held that they were right. It is, I think, plain that, in so far as the application then made sought to revoke the previous order, the justices were held not to be given jurisdiction by s. 30 (3) by the mere circumstance that the order was at the same time an order for payment of money. SHEARMAN, J., said ([1926] 2 K.B. 373):

"I have felt great difficulty in thinking that the power conferred on the justices of revoking an order for the periodical payment of money does not include the power to deal with the question whether or not the order was justly made. But I am now satisfied that we are entitled to interpret s. 30 (3) of the Act of 1914, as intending that the justices shall only deal with the periodical payment."

In other words, it was his view, and that of the court, that the qualification in s. 30 (3) for periodical payment limited the jurisdiction (to revoke, revive or vary) to that part of an order which related to money payments. In R. v. Copestake. Ex p. Wilkinson (4), after a bastardy order had been made against the appellant by the justices in petty sessions adjudging him to be the putative father of a seven months' child, and ordering him to pay a weekly sum, he sought to obtain a revocation of the order under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 30 (3) by adducing fresh evidence to show that the child was a full-time child at birth, thus placing the act of coition two months earlier than the date alleged by the mother. The justices refused his application and the Court of Appeal held that s. 30 (3) of the Act, while giving a court of summary jurisdiction power to revoke or vary a bastardy order made by it so far as that order related to periodical payments, conferred no jurisdiction on that court to revoke the order so far as it contained an adjudication of paternity and approved the decision in Colchester v. Peck (3).

* Not SANKEY, J., as stated ([1946] 2 All E.R. 741).

A It is true, as counsel for the father pointed out, that, if you are dealing with affiliation, the only order, apart from the actual adjudication of paternity, that can be made is one for the payment of money, and he says that these two cases decided that s. 30 (3) did not entitle one to go to another court of summary jurisdiction to revoke the adjudication as regards paternity, as distinct from revoking or varying the order as to payment of money. Counsel for the father, therefore, distinguishes those two cases from the present, for here there is no question of "adjudication"—the "order" of the Eastbourne justices consists of a series of "orders" in the sense of directions relating to custody, to money payments, and to access—and he says that when the analogy of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, is applied, according to s. 53 of the Children Act, 1948, you are not limited in the same way as you are in regard to affiliation orders themselves, but that you may avail yourself of the sub-section to obtain a revocation or variation of any part of such an "order", whether it is that part strictly concerned with money payments or, as in the present case, that part dealing with access; and he cites Pratt v. Pratt (1) and Markham v. Markham (2).

B In the circumstances which will presently appear it is not strictly necessary for this court to decide this matter. It is obviously open to counsel for the father to justify his claim that the Wallington justices had jurisdiction on any ground, whether under this section (which was the one particularly invoked) or otherwise. As at present advised, I am bound to say that I cannot accept his argument. I do not wish to suggest or to state that Pratt v. Pratt (1) and Markham v. Markham (2) ought to be treated as wrongly decided. Pratt v. Pratt (1) has now stood for over a quarter of a century, and we have not considered all the detailed provisions in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and the amending statutes. There may be matters in those statutes which would give rise to different or special considerations. But so far as orders made under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, are concerned, I take the view that s. 53 of the Children Act, 1948, by including the reference to orders "for the payment of money", meant to limit the jurisdiction there conferred to that part of the order which did concern money payment, and the specific reference to affiliation orders (and Parliament must have had in mind in making that reference the interpretation contained in Colchester v. Peck (3) and R. v. Copestake. Ex p. Wilkinson (4)) leads me to conclude that that limitation ought to be observed in cases under the Guardianship of Infants Acts. It is, no doubt, true that orders for money payment are often closely intermingled with other provisions, and it may well be that the power to vary should not be so limited as to prevent a court varying, not only the money payment, but also other provisions which may fairly be treated as merely ancillary to money payment. But that consideration would not help counsel for the father in this case. That, on any view of it, there are inconveniences, so far as I can see, is inescapable, but I have felt unable to be moved by references by counsel for the father to MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES relating to the argumentum ab inconvenienti. For, if counsel is right, it seems strange that jurisdiction to vary an order as to access would depend on whether there happens to be in it an order of some sort for somebody to pay some money to somebody else.

G But I need not pursue that matter further. During the course of the argument JENKINS, L.J., drew the attention of counsel to the provisions of the Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951, s. 1. The long title of that Act opens with these words:

H "An Act to extend jurisdiction under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, to certain county courts and courts of summary jurisdiction . . ."

Section 1 (1) reads:

"Subject to the following provisions of this section, the expression 'the court', for the purposes of the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, means in England and Wales the High Court or the county court of the district, or a court of summary jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the place, in which the respondent or any of the respondents or the applicant or the infant to whom the application relates resides . . .”

Unless the effect of that sub-section is that it applies only as regards the first application and as a means (so to say) of defining what is called in the Emergency Laws (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1947, sched. II, para. 6 (2), “the original court”, it would appear that, if an application to vary is made to a court of summary jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the place where the applicant resides at the time he makes his application, that court would have jurisdiction.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that on the facts the court could and should infer that when he made his application the father was “residing”, within the common-sense meaning of that phrase, within the jurisdiction of the Wallington justices and so (subject to the point already indicated) those justices had jurisdiction by virtue of the Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951, s. 1 (1), and he continued:] By the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, s. 5, it is provided:

“The court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant . . . make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant and the right of access thereto of either parent . . . and may alter, vary, or discharge such order on the application of either parent . . .”

By s. 9:

“In the construction of this Act the expression ‘the court’ shall mean—In England the High Court or the county court of the district in which the respondent or respondents or any of them may reside . . .”

The statutory jurisdiction to make application for access, and so forth, is limited to the mother, though in s. 5 it is provided that an order to vary may be made on the application of either parent. But there is, it will be observed, no provision for money payments, and the court is limited in any case to the High Court and the county court. But I interpret s. 5 and s. 9 together (so far as relevant) in this way. For the purposes of varying an order the county court of the district in which the respondent or respondents or any of them might for the time being resided had jurisdiction. In other words, I interpret s. 5 as conferring on the appropriate court jurisdiction to vary an order—the appropriate court not being, necessarily, the “original” court, viz., the court which made the original order sought to be varied. The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, filled in, so to speak, certain of the gaps which I indicated in the jurisdiction conferred by the Act of 1886. Thus, s. 3 provided:

“(2) Where the court under [s. 5 of the Act of 1886] as so amended makes an order giving the custody of the infant to the mother, then, whether or not the mother is then residing with the father, the court may further order that the father shall pay to the mother towards the maintenance of the infant such weekly or other periodical sum as the court, having regard to the means of the father, may think reasonable . . . (4) Any order so made may, on the application either of the father or the mother of the infant, be varied or discharged by a subsequent order.”

Section 7 (1) of the Act of 1925 amends the interpretation provisions of s. 9 of the Act of 1886, thus:

“For the purposes of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, as amended by this Act, the expression ‘the court’ shall include a court of summary jurisdiction.”

There is also a power to make rules, but nothing of assistance is to be derived from the rules.

I, therefore, interpret the matter thus. Up to 1951, for the purpose of applying to vary an order, a court of summary jurisdiction, among other courts, having jurisdiction in a place where a respondent for the time being (that is, at the time of the application) resided was given jurisdiction. That would exclude the father in the present case because he was the applicant and not the respondent. But that exclusion was, in my judgment, removed by the Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951, s. 1 (1), which gives jurisdiction to the court, not only where the respondent resides, but also where the applicant resides. Reading that sub-section together with the earlier legislation to which I have referred, I am unable to construe it as being limited to "the original court" in the sense in which I have used that phrase. I think, therefore, that any court the jurisdiction of which from time to time can be invoked by the residence qualification in that sub-section has power to make a variation order contemplated by s. 5 of the Act of 1886 as amended and expanded. The result, therefore, is that inferring as a fact, as I do, the necessary residence qualification, the Wallington justices had jurisdiction, not, indeed, by virtue of s. 53 of the Children Act, 1948 (about which I express no final conclusion), but on s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1951. Accordingly, the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

MORRIS, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Haslewood, Hare, Shirley Woolmer & Co., agents for Mayo & Perkins, Eastbourne (for the mother); Warmingtons (for the father).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

S.A. MARITIME ET COMMERCIALE OF GENEVA v. ANGLO-IRANIAN OIL CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), November 5, 1953.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Construction—Charterparty for series of voyages by named ship—Clause giving owners liberty to substitute another ship—Right of owners to make more than one substitution.

A charterparty for several voyages by a named vessel provided: "Owners have the liberty of substituting a coiled vessel of similar size and position at any time before or during this charterparty and owners undertake to give charterers reasonable notice of such intention." Before the voyages commenced, the owners substituted another identical vessel for the one named in the charterparty. Before the last voyage, the substituted vessel having become inefficient, the owners proposed to substitute for it the original vessel. On the question whether the owners had the right to make the second substitution,

HELD: in considering the provision in the charterparty which permitted substitution it was necessary to examine the commercial reason for that provision, which, in the present case, was to provide a ship that would perform the voyages which the charterers wanted performed; the clause was inserted to prevent an accident to a particular ship bringing the charterparty to an end; the substitution of an identical ship could not affect adversely the position of the charterers; and, therefore, on its true construction the clause gave the owners liberty to substitute more than once, and the original substitution was not a final election that the ship then substituted should complete the charterparty.

AS TO SUBSTITUTION CLAUSE IN CHARTERPARTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 30, p. 283, note k to para. 481.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Brightman & Co. v. Bunge y Born, [1924] 2 K.B. 619; 93 L.J.K.B. 1070; 132 L.T. 188; affd. H.L. sub nom. Bunge y Born Co. v. Brightman (H.A.) & Co., [1925] A.C. 799; 94 L.J.K.B. 840; 133 L.T. 738; 41 Digest 442, 2776.

- (2) Fitzgerald v. "Lona" S.S. Owners, (1932), 148 L.T. 166; 44 Lloyd's Rep. 212; Digest Supp.

SPECIAL CASE stated by an arbitrator.

The arbitrator stated the case in the form of alternative awards depending on the construction of cl. 38 of a charterparty which provided:

"Owners have the liberty of substituting a coiled vessel of similar size and position at any time before or during this charterparty and owners undertake to give charterers reasonable notice of such intention."

The charterparty was for a series of voyages to be undertaken by a named vessel, the Driade, but before any of the voyages was undertaken, acting under cl. 38, the owners substituted an identical vessel called the Nayade. Before the last voyage was undertaken, the Nayade having become inefficient, the owners proposed to substitute the ship originally named in the charterparty—the Driade. The charterers contended that the owners had no power under the charterparty to make the second substitution, and as a result they refused to load the Driade. The point reserved by the arbitrator for the consideration of the court was whether or not, on the true construction of the charterparty, the original substitution of the Nayade for the Driade constituted a final exercise of the option to substitute conferred on the owners by the provisions of cl. 38.

Sir Robert Aske, Q.C., and B. B. W. Goodden for the owners.

Megaw, Q.C., and M. R. E. Kerr for the charterers.

DEVLIN, J.: This case raises a short point which I have heard argued tersely but fully on both sides, and it is so much a matter of impression (as these short points of construction usually are) that there would be no value in my hearing further argument on it or considering it further. It turns on the construction of a clause in a charterparty which provides for a series of consecutive voyages. The clause, No. 38, is in the following terms:

"Owners have the liberty of substituting a coiled vessel of similar size and position at any time before or during this charterparty and owners undertake to give charterers reasonable notice of such intention."

The facts, so far as they are relevant, are that the charterparty was for a named vessel, the Driade, but before any of the voyages was undertaken the owners substituted for the Driade a vessel called the Nayade, a vessel of absolutely the same dimensions and same class. They are, in fact, the umpire says, identical ships. Before the last of the voyages was undertaken, the Nayade became inefficient, and, as it appeared to the owners that she might remain inefficient for some time longer than they had originally supposed, they proposed to substitute the Driade, i.e., to go back to the ship named in the charterparty. The charterers contended that the owners had no power so to do, and treated the charterparty as repudiated.

The short point of construction is this. Does cl. 38 give a liberty which can be exercised only once—if so, then the owners exercised it at the very beginning of the charterparty—or does it give a liberty which the owners can exercise from time to time during the course of the charterparty? I do not think that the language of the clause gives any indication, on the face of it, one way or the other. I say "on the face of it" because counsel for the charterers has analysed it and he relies on certain words as supporting his construction; but there is nothing on the face of it, no clear phrase, that is a signpost to one meaning or the other. In those circumstances, I think it is right to begin, as counsel for the owners began, by inquiring what is the object of a clause of this sort.

This sort of problem does not arise, or would be much less likely to arise, in the case of the ordinary charterparty. It is most unlikely that in a charterparty for one voyage the owners would want to make more than one substitution, but here is a charterparty for a number of consecutive voyages and the question is: What is the object of providing for substitution in such a charterparty? Counsel for the owners says that one can divide these clauses into one of two types, and he concedes, I think, that if this were a clause which provided for an election, in the strict sense of the word, then his argument must fail because the law is that where a man has made his election he cannot approbate and reprobate. He cannot go back on his election and decide that, after all, he will make his choice the other way. But there is a distinction between that type of clause, counsel argues, and the type of clause which provides for alternative modes of performance. A contract may permit a party to perform the contract in one way or another way or, perhaps, in a number of ways, and he can make his choice or change his choice as he wants. Having made his choice one way on one day, he is not in any way prohibited from making a different choice on the next day. Counsel for the owners submits that this clause falls into that category, and I think that it does. He cited two cases on the way in which that sort of clause can operate in contracts of this type. In Brightman & Co. v. Bunge y Born (1), where a charterer had the option of loading wheat and maize or other sorts of grain, it was held that that was a matter for him. He had not to make his election in advance and thereby bind himself. Indeed, the matter went against him because the contract contained a prohibition of wheat and his argument was that he intended to load wheat which meant that he was prohibited from loading the cargo that he proposed to load. But the court took the view that he could load some other cargo for which the contract provided. Similarly, in Fitzgerald v. "Lona" S.S. Owners (2), there was a right, at the option of an assignee, to select one out of a number of different methods of discharge, and ROCHE, J., held that the fact that he had chosen one that had become impossible or difficult did not mean that he could not switch to another.

Those cases are decided on their own facts and I do not derive more help from them than that they are useful illustrations of the type of clause within which counsel for the owners argues this clause falls and they show the way in which such a clause works in practice. An example that counsel put was that if a man undertook to transport a client by motor car on so many days of the week within a certain period and the contract provided for the car which was to be used but reserved the right to substitute another car of similar size and make, no one would contend that because he exercised his right to use a different car on one day he would be obliged to continue using that car for the remainder of the contract period. What, I think, makes the psychological approach, if I may so put it, to a clause of this sort a little different is that, whereas on the land anybody who was undertaking to provide a car would probably merely undertake to provide a car of a particular type out of a fleet which he had, that is not a way in which it is customary, or convenient, to enter into charterparties. It is convenient to enter into charterparties by providing for a named ship and giving a liberty to substitute, but, when one examines the essence of the matter, I do not think it is really different, or it need not necessarily be different, from a contract which requires the owner to provide one of a fleet of cars. The fundamental question, as it seems to me, is, from the commercial point of view, looking at the object of the contract: Does it matter which vessel is used? If it does, then immediately there is a sound commercial reason for reading in a restriction; but if it does not, one asks oneself at once: "What is the commercial reason which could have been operating on the parties' minds for restricting the exercise of the choice to one occasion only?"

In this case the proposed substitution inflicted no inconvenience on the charterers. I think it reasonable to infer that they did not mind one way or the other whether they had the Driade or the Nayade, but freights had fallen and the result was that they could get another ship more cheaply, and, of course, they are quite entitled to say: "If you cannot fulfil the literal terms of your contract and we can get another ship more cheaply, then we shall do so. That would be your misfortune". When one looks at the commercial object of the clause one must begin by taking oneself back to the time when the contract was made and assume that both parties want the contract fulfilled. The object of the charterparty, therefore, is to provide for a ship that will, at the agreed rate, perform the voyages which the charterers want performed. The object in putting in liberty to substitute is, I should have thought, to make sure that an accident to one particular ship will not necessarily bring the charterparty to an end if the owners have at their disposal another identical ship which can do the work just as well. In form, being a liberty to the owners, it might be said to be for the benefit of the owners. It is difficult to see how it would benefit them, except in the sense that it is to their benefit, just as it is to the charterers' benefit, to implement the charterparty. The clause has to be put in the form of a liberty to the owners because one could not, commercially speaking, give the charterers the right to investigate the arrangements of the owners and say: "Well, it is a pity you cannot provide the Driade, but we do not see why you cannot provide the Nayade. What are you going to do with that for the next two or three months?" One can understand the sound commercial reasons why the liberty is kept in the hands of the owners. It may, for all that, be something which would benefit the charterers, as was shown by the two cases which I have already cited. If the Driade alone had been named and the Driade had been sunk, the charterparty would, of course, come to an end, but it might well be that the charterers in this case could say, if they so desired: "You have an option to perform the charterparty in some other way and you do not excuse yourself from further performance of the charterparty merely by saying that the named ship has been sunk. You must show also that you have no other ship available with which you can perform the charterparty." It is not, however, necessary that I should decide that point.

What I have said is, I think, enough to explain why I think that cl. 38 is fundamentally a clause inserted so that the charterparty can be kept alive in the event of an accident or something untoward happening to one particular vessel out of a series of identical vessels. I think also that it must be within the commercial object of the clause that a ship should be substituted for a comparatively short period. It will limit the right of the owners very much if, let us say, at the very beginning of the charterparty, or after one voyage, something were to happen to the named ship and they were not at liberty to substitute some other ship which was free at the moment for the next voyage until the named ship were repaired. But, on the argument of counsel for the charterers, they cannot do that. The charterers argue that the owners must make up their minds that the ship which they substitute is to be used for the whole of the rest of the charterparty period. I can see no commercial reasons for giving that construction to the clause, and one comes back in the end, where a clause gives a right to elect, to the question: Does the other party mind which way you decide? It may be he has to make his own arrangements according to the way in which you elect. In the ordinary case of an election, e.g., to buy shares by a certain date, the vendor must know where he is so that if one elects not to buy them he can put the shares on the market. He cannot permit constant changes of mind. However, there is no such reason here that could persuade the court to consider this clause as being of the election type rather than as one dealing with the method of performance. There is no commercial reason why the charterers should mind what sort of vessel they have for any particular voyage. It might be said that in that case there is no reason why the clause should provide for the giving of reasonable notice, and I observe that, in neither of the two cases to which I have referred, was there provision for notifying the other side of the way in which the charterer or assignee had made up his mind. I think that that point, if taken by itself, might be one which would point to the clause's being of the election type rather than of the other type. It might be asked why, if it is a matter of indifference to the charterer which vessel is used, does he have to be told and given reasonable notice of what is going to be done ? That provision as to reasonable notice would operate both ways, and whether there is a right to substitute once or the right to substitute twenty times the argument is still: Why should he require to have reasonable notice ? I think the answer is that it does not make any difference to the charterer what vessel is going to be substituted, or how many times it is going to be substituted, so long as he knows whether the owners are going to exercise their right or not. If, for example, in this case the Driade became inefficient, the charterers cannot know whether the Nayade will be available or not and cannot know whether the owners have some other ship which may or may not be available. They may be met with the answer: "The Driade has gone out of action and we have no other ship. So that is an end of the charterparty." The provision as to reasonable notice protects the charterers and they know whether there is to be a substitution or not. The owners cannot delay indefinitely.

B The owners must notify—as they did when the Nayade went out of action—whether they are going to seek to make a substitution or not.

Counsel for the charterers, I think rather naturally—because, in my view, there is really only one view that one can take of the commercial object of a clause of this sort—was disposed to emphasise the words themselves, and he made a number of points on them which are well worth attention. He pointed out, first,

"Owners have the liberty of substituting a coiled vessel of similar size", one asks oneself: Substituting for what ? The answer must be, substituting for the named vessel. If the parties had it in mind, and if they were drafting the clause with a lawyer's care and, if they had wanted to achieve the end which counsel for the owners contends they have achieved, they could have put in

D "substituting for the named vessel or for any vessel that is substituted therefor."

But that is the sort of thing which commercial men do not do. They do not apply themselves to that sort of detail. It is a sound point of construction provided one can accept the view that people who draft these clauses approach them with that sort of point in mind. I do not think that they do.

E Similarly, I do not think that one can lay very much emphasis or derive very much advantage from an analysis of the phrase

"at any time before or during this charterparty."

F Counsel for the charterers rightly emphasises the word "or" and says it must mean at any time before or at any time during, and that if there was meant to be more than one time they would have said: "and/or"—or words to that effect. Similarly, they could have said: "at any time or times". I do not think these points, which are sometimes of great value when one is construing a statute, are of so much value, when one is construing a commercial document. As counsel for the charterers pointed out, the phrase is quite inaccurate from the lawyer's point of view. To say that the owners had the right under the charterparty to do something "before . . . this charterparty" is legally quite inaccurate. The charterparty came into effect at once. The parties obviously mean "before the first voyage under the charterparty", or something of that sort. I think that that shows that it is not of much value trying to give a meticulous analysis of the words which the parties have used in a clause of this sort. Looking at it broadly, it seems to me that the phrase "at any time", in so far as it gives an indication one way or the other, is the sort of phrase that one uses when one wants to indicate that it can be done either once or twice, just at any time which one chooses. A commercial man does not put in "at any time or times."

H For these reasons, therefore, I think that the approach to the clause which counsel for the owners has presented is the right one and that it should be construed in the light of those considerations. Construed in the light of those considerations, I find no difficulty in holding that it is intended to allow a substitution, in effect, as often as the owners desire a substitution. It is not intended to be a clause providing for an election which once made is completely exhausted. Accordingly, I would answer the question which is addressed to me in the negative and uphold the alternative award.

Case remitted to the umpire to assess the damages.

Solicitors: Stokes & Mitcalfe (for the owners); William A. Crump & Son (for the charterers).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

BREWER STREET INVESTMENTS, LTD. v. BARCLAYS WOOLLEN CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), October 15, 16, 19, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Repair done by landlord at request of prospective tenant—Breakdown of negotiations—Fault of tenant—Work done for tenant's benefit—Liability for cost of work.

Building—Control—Licence—Licence for specific work—Extra work within licence-free limit—Necessity for further licence.

During the course of negotiations for a lease the defendants, the prospective tenants, requested the plaintiffs, the landlords, to make certain alterations to the premises before they entered into occupation, and by letter agreed to accept responsibility for the cost of the work, which proceeded. When negotiations broke down, the defendants having insisted on their being granted an option to purchase, a term to which they knew the plaintiffs would not agree, the uncompleted work of alteration was discontinued and the plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants the cost of such work.

HELD: the negotiations having broken down through the fault of the defendants, and they having agreed to accept responsibility, the defendants were liable to pay for the cost of the work; even if the blame for the breakdown of negotiations could not be placed on either side, the work had been carried out to meet the defendants' requirements and for their benefit, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The alterations ordered by the landlords, the plaintiffs, to be carried out at the request of the prospective tenants, the defendants, included the making and fitting of an extra door to a lift at a cost of £48 10s., for which work no licence had been obtained. The negotiations for a lease having broken down, the plaintiffs claimed (inter alia) the cost of the door from the defendants. The defendants argued that the work was illegal and that in any event, therefore, the plaintiffs could not recover.

HELD: the cost of the door was within the limit up to which no licence for the work was required; a sum equivalent to the licence-free amount could not be added to the limit permitted by the licence for the alterations generally; although an extra item of work might be so involved with the work within the original specification as to be covered by that rule, an extra item was prima facie outside the rule; the defendants had not discharged the onus of proving its application in relation to the door; and, therefore, they were liable to the defendants for its cost.

Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn ([1949] 1 All E.R. 616), considered.

Cases referred to:

(1) Jennings & Chapman, Ltd. v. Woodman, Matthews & Co., [1952] 2 T.L.R. 409; 3rd Digest Supp.

(2) Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn, [1949] 1 All E.R. 616; [1949] 2 K.B. 327; [1949] L.J.R. 857; 2nd Digest Supp.

(3) Muir v. James, [1953] 1 All E.R. 494; [1953] 1 Q.B. 454; 117 J.P. 126.

(4) Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper, [1941] 1 All E.R. 33; [1941] A.C. 108; 110 L.J.K.B. 131; 164 L.T. 313; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of MORRIS, L.J., sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division, dated Mar. 6, 1953.

A During the course of negotiations for a lease of certain premises, it was orally agreed that the plaintiffs should grant to the defendants a lease for a term of twenty-one years at a rent of £2,750 per annum. By letter dated Jan. 9, 1951, the defendants confirmed these terms and requested that they should be granted an option to purchase the premises in the following terms:

B “ . . . We have considered these matters [i.e., the agreed terms] carefully and would agree to take a lease at £2,750 subject to contract, the contract to include a clause to the effect that we shall have the right to purchase [the property] within sixty days of the signing thereof at the price of £40,000.”

C By letter dated Jan. 10, 1951, the plaintiffs agreed, subject to contract, the length of the term and rent of £2,750, but offered the defendants a first refusal instead of an option to purchase the property as follows:

“ . . . [we] have agreed to embody in the contract that should [we] at any time contemplate selling the property [we] will give you first refusal at an agreed figure of £40,000 for the mentioned freehold, subject to contract.”

D On Jan. 22, 1951, the defendants' surveyor wrote to the plaintiffs' surveyor requesting certain alterations to be made to the premises before the defendants took possession thereof, and by letter dated Jan. 26, the defendants agreed to accept responsibility for the cost of the work which was to be done by the plaintiffs' contractors and duly proceeded. In addition to the alterations mentioned above the defendants made a separate request for an extra door in the lift to be made, and installed by an independent contractor for the sum of £48 10s.

E On Jan. 23, 1951, the plaintiffs submitted to the defendants a draft lease incorporating as a term thereof a first refusal to the defendants to purchase the property within two years of the date of the draft. The draft was amended by the defendants, and on Feb. 6 the plaintiffs returned a copy of the draft re-amended into its original form. Negotiations between the parties broke off subsequently, the defendants being unwilling to accept a lease without an option to purchase and the plaintiffs being unwilling to grant anything more than a first refusal. The plaintiffs then discontinued the uncompleted work of alteration on the premises and sought to recover the cost of that work from the defendants in the present action. The defendants contended that their liability to pay the cost of the alterations was subject to the grant to them of a lease, or, alternatively, that the plaintiffs could not recover unless they could show that they were at all times ready and willing to grant a lease on the terms set out in their letter of Jan. 10, 1951. MORRIS, L.J., held the defendants liable and gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

H M. Waters for the plaintiffs.
Dare for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The learned judge decided that the defendants were liable and, on the claim as a whole, counsel for the defendants takes two points. He submits, first, that the contract for these alterations should be read as subject to a lease being granted. His second submission is that, assuming he is wrong on the first point, the plaintiffs could not recover unless they could show that they were at all times ready and willing to grant a lease on the terms set out in their original letter of Jan. 10, 1951, viz., the first refusal at £40,000 over the period of the lease and that the contract which they themselves submitted showed that they were not ready and willing to do that. The plaintiffs rely on the fact that the defendants did not ask them to do that, but re-inserted, in effect, a provision for an option. On the first point, which was taken in the pleadings and which the learned judge decided against the plaintiffs, I think the learned judge was plainly right. I cannot see any reason for implying into this contract a term that the defendants were to be under no liability unless there was a lease, or, in other words, that the confirmation of their responsibility should be read as subject to their entering into a lease. As was pointed out by ROMER, L.J., in the course of the argument, the whole matter of the lease being subject to contract, the defendants could have resiled without giving any reason. It seems to me, at any rate, impossible that they could have expected the plaintiffs to continue with this work on the basis that they would have to pay for alterations which the defendants wanted if the defendants entirely on their own motion decided not to go on with the transaction. That point, I think, fails.

One then approaches the question, as I think, on the basis whether any facts are shown which would entitle the defendants to say that they were not in the events which had happened liable to fulfil the responsibility which they undertook by the letter of Jan. 26. The learned judge said:

"In approaching the present case it may be useful to consider two situations just to test the matter. Supposing the work had all been done, and supposing the defendants had then said they had changed their mind and they were not going to take a lease at all. There was no binding contract, and they would have been entitled for no reason or for a bad reason to refuse to enter into a lease. It would seem strange if, in those circumstances, the defendants were not obliged to pay. Take another case: supposing the work was all done and the defendants remained willing to take a lease on the terms in principle agreed, and then supposing the plaintiffs said: 'Well, we have changed our minds: we are not going to grant you a lease', or 'We have found someone else who will pay more', it would seem strange if, in those circumstances, the defendants were obliged to pay. It seems to me that much turns on the reason why the whole of this matter came to an end, and the correspondence seems to me to show the reason was that the defendants insisted on having an option although an option had never been promised, so for that reason the whole of the negotiations came to an end. I think the basis of the promise entered into by the defendants might well have been that the plaintiffs should remain in principle agreeable, subject, of course, to contract, to grant a lease on the general lines of the letter of Jan. 10. The implied term as pleaded in this case, to which I have referred in my judgment, wholly fails. There could not have been an implied term on such a wide basis. The highest that it could be stated from the point of view of the defendants was as I have put it, viz., that the promise was on the basis of the plaintiffs' remaining of the same mind as they had revealed before the promise to pay for items of work was made. Although the plaintiffs by the first draft of their lease were seeming to depart from it, the correspondence seems to me to show that the real reason why this matter went off was that the defendants were insisting on an option."

With regard to the correspondence, counsel for the defendants criticised the statement of the learned judge in the earlier part of his judgment when he was dealing with the amendments of the draft lease and when he referred to the letter of Feb. 6, 1951, which accompanied the lease as re-amended. The judge said that that was very close to what the plaintiffs had said in the letter of

Jan. 10. I agree with counsel for the defendants that when one looks at the lease as re-amended by the plaintiffs it was not very close to what was said in their letter of Jan. 10. It was as far removed from that as was the draft originally submitted. So, with respect I will assume that the learned judge took a more favourable view of that counter-counter-offer than the document in fact justified and I will consider the course of the correspondence independently of that finding. The learned judge said:

A “Although the plaintiffs by the first draft [and also by the second draft] of their lease were seeming to depart from it the correspondence seems to me to show that the real reason why this matter went off was that the defendants were insisting on an option. They had never been promised an option. It had been made clear that no option would be given, and, therefore, on that part of the case, in my judgment, the defendants have failed to show that they have a defence to this claim.”

B I agree with that construction of the correspondence, but if one considers the matter in principle, the defendants undertook responsibility for this work at a time when they knew that either side could resile and decide not to conclude a lease. The only question of law, therefore, would be whether the events which have happened by reason of some implication entitle the defendants to raise a defence. The learned judge clearly thought that, if the matter had gone off because the plaintiffs had changed their minds or had found someone else who would pay more, the defendants would have such a defence. It is unnecessary to decide that point in this case, although I am bound to say, speaking for myself, there seems to be a strong argument for the view which the learned judge took. I think it is plain, as the learned judge found and as I hold, that it went off through the defendants' own course of conduct in adhering to the condition that they should obtain an option when it had been made clear to them that the plaintiffs were not willing to grant an option. If counsel for the defendants is right in saying that, in the alternative, the lease went off by reason of circumstances for which neither party can be held responsible, i.e., in the ordinary course of negotiation, I still consider that that would not afford a good defence to the claim in this case. I wish to guard the words I use because an earlier case [Jennings & Chapman, Ltd. v. Woodman, Matthews & Co. (1)] which came before this court shows that it is a somewhat difficult matter. Each case must be judged on its own facts and there might be a case in which the circumstances, and the benefits conferred on the landlord if the matter went off, were such that, even although it was not through the deliberate action of the landlord that the negotiations failed, the proposed tenant might still have a defence. It is an area in which one should not seek to anticipate circumstances which may arise. For these reasons, I think that on the main claim the learned judge was right and the appeal fails.

G It was then argued that there was a defence in respect of the extra door of the lift in that no licence was obtained, that that work was, therefore, illegal, and, on principles which have been applied more than once in reported cases, that the plaintiffs could not recover for it. [HIS LORDSHIP considered this argument, concluded that the defendants had not discharged the onus of proving illegality, and continued:] Counsel for the plaintiffs took a further point to which the learned judge did not refer. This sum of £48 10s. H in respect of the extra door is within what I will call the free allowance, that is the amount of work which can be done under the regulations without a licence. It was decided in Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (2) that where a licence had been granted for a certain amount on a specification and that amount had been exceeded, the builder could not claim that the amount of the free allowance should be added to the amount covered by the licence. In a later case [Muir v. James (3)] the question was raised as to the application of that principle to what I will call extras, i.e., something not in terms covered by the original specification but separately ordered. It is quite clear, to my mind, that there may be cases in which an extra may be separately ordered and may be sufficiently separable from the original work to be covered by the free allowance. It may be that, although the extra is separately ordered outside the terms of the specification, it is so involved in the specification as to fall under the principle of Dennis v. Munn (2). In my view, an extra is prima facie outside the principle of Dennis v. Munn (2) and there are no facts proved here which negative that position, the onus being on the defendants. For these reasons, in my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: This case raises questions of considerable interest. The parties were in negotiation for a lease and had agreed on many of the principal matters to be contained therein. In particular, they agreed on a term of twenty-one years at a rent of £2,750 a year, but it was all subject to contract. Neither side, therefore, was bound, but the negotiations had proceeded so far and with such mutual confidence that both parties assumed without question that a lease would be granted. The prospective tenants wanted some alterations to the premises before they went in. The plaintiffs agreed to make these alterations, and the defendants agreed to be responsible for the cost. The alterations were put in hand and a good deal of the work had been done when most unfortunately the negotiations for a lease broke down. No lease was granted, and the work on the alterations was stopped. The plaintiffs have had to pay to their own contractors the cost of those alterations up to the time when they were stopped. Now they seek to recover from the prospective tenants the moneys which they have had to pay to their own contractors. The question is whether they can do so.

It is not easy to state the legal basis of the plaintiffs' claim. Although the defendants agreed to pay the cost of the alterations, nevertheless, those alterations were never completed. The work was abandoned before it was finished. Once the negotiations for a lease broke down, both sides realised that the work must be stopped. It was a sensible course to adopt, but it means that the plaintiffs cannot sue for the price as on a completed contract, nor can they sue the defendants for damages for breach of contract, because the defendants have not been guilty of a breach. Let me give an instance. One item of the work was a lift door to be made, fixed and installed for £48 10s. At the time when the work was abandoned, the lift door had been made in the provinces, but it had not been transported to London, or fixed or installed. Nevertheless, the plaintiffs have had to pay to their contractors the full sum, presumably by way of damages, and they now seek to recover it from the prospective tenants. They clearly cannot recover on a quantum meruit as ordinarily understood. The only way they put their claim in the statement of claim on this item and the others is that it is for money paid on request. The defendants, however, in fact made no request to the plaintiffs to pay the money; their request, if any, was to pay on completion of the work, and it was not completed. In these circumstances, the proper way to formulate the claim is, in my view, on a request implied in law, or, as I would prefer to put it in these days, on a claim in restitution.

On the facts which I have stated, it is clear that the parties proceeded on a fundamental assumption—that the lease would be granted—which has proved to be wrong. The work done has been wasted and on whom is the loss to fall? The parties themselves did not envisage the situation which has emerged and did not provide for it; and we do not know what they would have provided had they envisaged it. Only the law can resolve their rights and liabilities in the new situation, either by means of implying terms, or, more simply, by asking on whom the risk should fall. That is how the court approached a similar question in Jennings & Chapman, Ltd. v. Woodman, Matthews & Co. (1), and I think we should approach the question in the same way. MORRIS, L.J., who tried the case, gave a reserved judgment in which he put the matter in a way which appeals to me. He asked himself: What was the reason that the negotiations broke down? If it were the fault of the landlords as, for instance, if they had refused to go on with the lease for no reason at all, or because they had demanded a rent higher than that which had been already agreed, then they should not be allowed to recover any part of the cost of the alterations. Even if the plaintiffs derived no benefit from the work, they should not be allowed to recover the cost from the defendants since it was by their fault that the defendants were deprived of it. On the other hand, if it were the fault of the defendants that the negotiations broke down, as, for instance, if they had sought a lower rent than that which had been agreed, then the defendants should pay the cost of the alterations up to the time when they were stopped. They promised to pay for the work, and they should not be able to break their promise through their own fault, even though the alterations were not completed. It is a very old principle laid down by LORD COKE, C.J., that a man shall not be allowed to take advantage of a condition brought about by himself. I do not think, however, that in this case it can be said that either party was really at fault. Neither party sought to alter the rent or any other matter which had been agreed. They differed on a point which had not been agreed at all. From the beginning the prospective tenant had wanted an option to purchase whereas the plaintiffs were prepared to give him only the first refusal. Each in the course of negotiations sought on this point more favourable terms—the defendants to obtain a firm option to purchase, the plaintiffs to give a first refusal of little value—but their moves in the negotiations can hardly be considered a default by one or the other.

What, then, is the position when the negotiations go off without the default of either? On whom should the risk fall? In my opinion, the prospective tenants ought to pay all the costs that have been wasted. The work was done to meet their special requirements, and prima facie it was for their benefit and not for the benefit of the plaintiffs. If and in so far as it is shown to have been of benefit to the plaintiffs, credit should be given in such sum as may be just, but subject to such credit, the defendants ought to pay the cost of the work, because in the first place they agreed to take responsibility for it. There is no finding here that the work was of any benefit to the plaintiffs and in the circumstances the defendants should, I think, pay the amount claimed.

Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that the test laid down in Jennings v. Woodman (1) was wrong. It was not right, he said, to ask whose fault it was, or on whom should the risk fall, because each side had an absolute right to withdraw from the negotiations and could not be said to be at fault in doing so. He referred to Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (4), and argued that, even if the plaintiffs demanded a higher rent and thus caused the negotiations to fail, they could still recover the cost of the alterations. I do not think that is right. Estate agents are employed on the footing that they are paid a large commission if a sale is completed but nothing if it is not. They take the risk of the transaction failing. The cases on the subject are, therefore, illustrations of the same test: On whom in all the circumstances should the risk fall? In this case I think the risk should fall on the prospective tenants and they should pay the costs of the alterations. On the question of illegality I have nothing to add to what SOMERVELL, L.J., has said. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree and there is little which I wish to add. As SOMERVELL, L.J., has pointed out, this case falls to be decided on its particular facts and circumstances. On those facts and circumstances, I hope I shall not be regarded as unsympathetic to the defendants if I say that, in my opinion, they have only themselves to blame for the judgment which was delivered against them. The truth of the matter is that they were in a great hurry to enter into occupation of these premises because the lease of their own premises was running out and owing to that haste they did things which in the normal course they would not have done. On Jan. 9 they made an offer, subject to contract, to take a lease of these premises for twenty-one years at £2,750 a year, the contract to include a clause giving them an option to purchase within sixty days for £40,000. On Jan. 10 they received a counter-offer which departed in many respects from the original offer, the principal respect being the withdrawal of the option, that being the element which subsequently caused the whole of the negotiations to break down. In those circumstances, on Jan. 23, the landlords' solicitors sent a draft lease to the defendants for approval. The option was not included in the instrument. The work was ordered, and on Jan. 24 the plaintiffs' surveyor asked for an assurance from the defendants' surveyor that they would accept the responsibility of payment for the work which was to be done. On Jan. 26 Mr. Freud on behalf of the defendants wrote the letter which SOMERVELL, L.J., has read unequivocally accepting responsibility for the cost of the work as mentioned. I am myself unable to read that letter as amounting in any sense to a conditional acceptance of responsibility. They knew what the position was in regard to the lease, they knew that this formidable difference had already arisen between themselves and the plaintiffs with regard to the option, but they wanted the work done. I am satisfied that they were prepared to risk the matter of the lease not coming to a satisfactory conclusion. If one is asked to imply something into the acceptance, for example, that the responsibility should arise or be enforceable only if a lease were to be granted, two questions suggest themselves: First, what lease (because none had been agreed)?, and, secondly, what would have been the reaction of the owners had that condition been introduced in terms? I for myself have no doubt that had the defendants said: "We want you to put this work in hand but we are only going to pay for it provided we eventually get a lease which will be agreed between us", the plaintiffs would not have had the work done at their own risk as to cost. Taking the whole of the circumstances, the dates, the urgency of the matter, the fact that the defendants themselves paid unequivocally and directly for part of the electrical work without any suggestion of their liability in that regard being conditional, I have no doubt but that in common phraseology they were "taking the risk" for their own purposes, in the hope that they would have the benefit of it if, as they hoped and expected, a lease was finally agreed and granted. As it was not settled, solely because the defendants insisted to the end on getting what they had been already told the plaintiffs were unwilling to give, viz., an option, I cannot see how they can escape responsibility by seeking to put the blame on the shoulders of the plaintiffs. It may well be that if, after this work had been done, the plaintiffs had got the benefit of it, assuming it to be work which improved the value of the property, and then they had refused to grant a lease, the defendants would not have been without remedy. That was not the position in this case. The facts, as I have stated, led to an entirely different result. I, accordingly, agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Arnold Lee & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Lucien Fior (for the defendants).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

Re W. (an infant).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), October 28, 1953.]

Court of Appeal—Custody of infant—Jurisdiction to entertain appeal from Chancery judge hearing appeals from justices—Interlocutory appeal—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (c. 27), s. 5—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 31 (1) (i).

A An appeal to the Court of Appeal lies from a decision of the Chancery judge nominated by the Lord Chancellor to determine appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction in cases relating to the custody of infants under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925. Such appeals are interlocutory, and, semble, no leave to appeal is necessary by reason of s. 31 (1) (i) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

B Case referred to:

(1) Chinchen v. Chinchen, [1950] W.N. 22; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 8, 1953, dismissing an appeal from an order made by justices as to the custody of the infant*.

Comyn for the appellant.

C C. W. Abrahams for the respondent.

JENKINS, L.J.: In opening the case counsel for the appellant very properly raised the question whether this court had jurisdiction to entertain an appeal in proceedings of this sort—that is to say, proceedings under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, initiated in a court of summary jurisdiction. He very properly did that because his researches have not disclosed any previous case in which there had been such an appeal. He referred us to the relevant provisions of the Guardianship of Infants Acts, the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and the Rules of the Supreme Court. The effect of those provisions, taken together, is such as to leave no doubt whatever in my mind that an appeal to this court does lie in such cases, and I was fortified in this conclusion by the Chief Registrar, who was able to produce an order in which a similar appeal had been entertained by this court and also assured me that within his recollection there was at least one other instance of that being done. It was not disputed on the respondent's side that this court did have jurisdiction, and it seems to me abundantly plain that it has. Accordingly, I pass from that question. In the circumstances I have not thought it necessary to refer in detail to the sections, for I think that the matter, though properly raised by counsel for the appellant, is one which really admits of no doubt.

Another preliminary point raised by counsel for the appellant was whether this case was rightly treated as an interlocutory appeal. That, again, I think, admits of no doubt as appears from the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., in Chinchen v. Chinchen (1). In that judgment the learned lord justice said ([1950] W.N. 23) that

“at the outset of the appeal a point had arisen whether the order for custody, against which the appeal was brought, was an interlocutory order and, that being so, the appeal was properly in the interlocutory list.”

He went on to express the opinion that

H “orders for custody were interlocutory orders and appeals from them were properly in the interlocutory list”, and he referred to s. 31 and s. 68 (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and the note to R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 3, concluding thus (ibid):

“A custody order did not finally dispose of the rights concerned.”

* The appeal was heard in camera, and is reported, on the points of practice decided, by direction of the court.

So that leaves no room for doubt that this is an interlocutory appeal.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Solicitors: Haslewood, Hare, Shirley Woolmer & Co., agents for E. J. Watson, Cox & Counsell, Bristol (for the appellant); Henry B. Sissmore & Co., agents for Laurence Williams & Co., Bristol (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES TRIBUNAL. Ex parte TECHNALOY, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.), October 7, 8, 1953.]

Master and Servant—Trade dispute—"Issue"—Difference as to observation of recognised terms and conditions—Industrial Disputes Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 1376), art. 9 (2).

The applicants, iron-founders, were not members of the Engineering and Allied Employers' National Federation which, in November, 1951, came to an agreement with the Confederation of Shipbuilding and Engineering Unions whereby it was agreed that they would pay certain rates of wages to members of the confederated unions. On discovering that the applicants were not paying the agreed rates to members of one of the confederated unions, that union referred the matter to the Minister of Labour, who referred it to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal for adjudication, as a "dispute". On a motion by the applicants for an order of prohibition to issue against the tribunal, HELD: the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, distinguished between "issues" and "disputes" and laid down different procedures for the consideration by the tribunal of each; the question to be determined was whether the applicants were bound by the agreement to which they were not parties, which was an "issue" within the terms of art. 9 (2) of the order; and, as the matter had been referred to the tribunal as a "dispute", the order of prohibition would go.

FOR THE INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES ORDER, 1951, see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 7, p. 166.

Case referred to:

- (1) R. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex p. Practical Banking, Ltd., [1952] 1 All E.R. 1370; [1952] 2 Q.B. 662; 3rd Digest Supp.

MOTION for an order of prohibition.

Employers moved for an order of prohibition directed to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal to prohibit them from further proceeding on a reference made to them by the Minister of Labour on Dec. 4, 1952. The particulars of the dispute were in the following terms:

"Employers: Technaloy Limited, iron-founders. Workers: Members of the Amalgamated Union of Foundry Workers of Great Britain and Ireland in the employment of the said employers. Description of the dispute: The dispute arises out of a claim made by the said workers that the company should implement the agreement between the Engineering and Allied Employers' National Federation and the Confederation of Shipbuilding and Engineering Unions dated Nov. 29, 1951, relating to wages and holidays with pay . . . The dispute was reported to the Minister on Nov. 20, 1952, by the Amalgamated Union of Foundry Workers of Great Britain and Ireland on behalf of their workers."

The tribunal heard the case and made an award on Jan. 8, 1953. That award was brought before the Divisional Court on a motion of certiorari and quashed on the grounds that it was bad on its face as the tribunal had given an increase of wages retrospectively beyond the date covered by the agreement. For the purposes of the present case it was assumed that the tribunal had power to proceed with the hearing of the reference though their first award had been declared a nullity.

- A The reference to the tribunal arose in the following circumstances. On Nov. 29, 1951, an agreement was reached in the iron-founding trade between members of the National Federation and the Confederation whereby an increase of 3d. per hour was to be granted to all members of the confederated unions by all members of the federation. Terms were also agreed for the provision and calculation of holidays. Shortly after this agreement an official of the Foundry Workers Union
- B visited the offices of the employers in the present case, and found that members of the union employed by the employers were not being paid the extra 3d. per hour. The attention of the employers was drawn to this fact. The employers were not members of the National Federation and so were not parties to the agreement of Nov. 29, 1951, and they contended that they were paying their workmen at least as much and in some cases more than other employers who were parties
- C to the agreement, even after the 3d. per hour had been added.

Beney, Q.C., and N. Lawson for the employers.

Pritt, Q.C., and D. J. Turner-Samuels for the Foundry Workers Union.

S. B. R. Cooke for the tribunal.

- LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The first
- D ground on which prohibition is sought is that there never was any dispute between the workers and the employers. Secondly, if there was anything in the nature of a dispute which, to use a neutral expression, I will call a difference, it was a difference which is described in the order as an issue and not as a dispute, the importance of that being that the machinery for hearing the matters which must be taken into account by the tribunal in dealing with an issue
- E is different from that which obtains on the hearing of a dispute.

- Dealing with the first point, all the members of the court, having read the affidavits, feel that it would be impossible to hold that in December, 1952, when the reference was made by the Minister, there was not a difference of some sort between the employers and the men who were then in their employment. Whether there is any difference today between the men who are at present
- F employed by the company and the company is an entirely different matter. But, as counsel for the trade union forcibly pointed out, assuming that there was a difference in December, 1952, when the tribunal sat, or even when the reference was made, men who had since left the employment of the employers might be entitled to claim that the wages found by the tribunal should be paid to them.

- We are, therefore, going to approach this case on the footing that in December,
- G 1952, there was a prevailing difference between the employers and some of the workmen. It is, therefore, necessary to look carefully at the terms of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, which took the place of a much wider and more comprehensive order passed in 1940. The object of these orders is the prevention of strikes. Part I of the order of 1951 is headed: "Reporting of Disputes and Issues", which seems clearly to recognise that there are two different things,
- H disputes and issues. Article 1 provides:

"Where a dispute exists in a trade or industry or section of trade or industry or in an undertaking and that dispute is reported to the Minister in accordance with this order by—(i) an organisation of employers, on behalf of employers who are parties to the dispute; (ii) an employer, where the dispute is between that employer and workers in the employment of that employer; or (iii) a trade union, on behalf of workers who are parties to the dispute . . . that dispute shall be dealt with in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this order."

Article 2 deals with the reporting of issues concerning recognised terms and conditions of employment and provides:

"Where—(a) in any trade or industry or section of trade or industry in any district terms and conditions of employment are established which have been settled by machinery of negotiation or arbitration to which the parties are organisations of employers and trade unions representative respectively of substantial proportions of the employers and workers engaged in that trade or industry or section of trade or industry in that district (hereinafter referred to as 'recognised terms and conditions'); and (b) an issue as to whether an employer in that district should observe the recognised terms and conditions (hereinafter referred to as 'an issue') is reported to the Minister in accordance with this order by an organisation of employers or a trade union; and (c) the Minister is of opinion that the organisation of employers or trade union reporting the issue habitually takes part in the settlement of terms and conditions of employment in the trade or industry or section of trade or industry concerned; that issue shall be dealt with in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this order."

When one turns to the definition article (art. 12) one finds that

"'dispute' does not include a dispute as to the employment or non-employment of any person or as to whether any person should or should not be a member of any trade union but, save as aforesaid, means any dispute between an employer and workmen in the employment of that employer connected with the terms of the employment or with the conditions of labour of any of those workmen."

One finds that

"'issue' has the meaning assigned to it in art. 2 of this order", which is no definition at all. You have to go back and see what art. 2 deals with, and the effect of that article seems to be that the disputes with which that article deals are called "issues".

Before I deal with the matter of construction, it is necessary to point out that art. 8 deals with references of disputes and how the tribunal is to deal with them. Article 9 deals with the reference of issues to the tribunal, and one of the important things—from the present point of view, the most important—is that art. 9 (2) provides:

"Where an issue has been referred by the Minister to the tribunal and the tribunal is of opinion that there are recognised terms and conditions applicable to the case and that the employer concerned is not observing those terms and conditions or terms and conditions of employment which, in the opinion of the tribunal, are not less favourable than those terms and conditions, it may by its award require the employer to observe the recognised terms and conditions or such terms and conditions of employment as may be determined by it to be not less favourable than the recognised terms and conditions."

The trade union concerned in the present case considered that it would be desirable that the employers should observe the terms that had been negotiated what I may call nationally. I think that is the same point that arose in R. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex p. Practical Banking, Ltd. (1). In that case the employers were the proprietors of a weekly newspaper known as the "Muswell Hill Record", an increase in wages had been granted to printers, or, at any rate, some persons employed in printing newspapers, and it was sought to impose on the proprietors of the "Muswell Hill Record" an obligation to pay the same rate of wages as had been paid by the Newspaper Society. But, the employers said: "We are not members of that society", and, to use a colloquialism, the trade union said: "That is just the trouble; we are asking that the terms which have been agreed by the Newspaper Society should be imposed on you, which this order gives the tribunal power to do".

A It seems to the court clear that the difference between the parties in the present case was whether the employers should obey the national terms and conditions that had been negotiated between the two big organisations. The court, therefore, cannot see how it can successfully be said that this does not fall exactly within para. (b) of art. 2. What was reported to the Minister was a question whether or not the employers should abide by, implement and perform the terms of this national agreement.

B Counsel for the trade union has argued strenuously that none the less there is a dispute. Of course there is a dispute if there is an issue. If two parties are at issue, they are at issue because they are disputing about some matter. The joinder of issue between parties to a law suit shows that there is a dispute between them, but we think that as a matter of construction this order, which refers both to disputes and issues, means to distinguish between them. For the purpose of the order certain disputes are called issues, and, if there is an issue between C the parties, it ought to be referred as an issue and art. 9 applies. The importance of it in this case is that the employers seek to say, rightly or wrongly—that is not a matter for us—"We were giving either as good terms or better terms. We were giving at any rate terms not less favourable to our workmen than they would get under the provisions of this national agreement". It will be observed that when they have that point to consider, the tribunal may find that, D although in some respects there is a difference between the nationally agreed terms and the terms under which the employees are working, taken as a whole the terms and conditions of employment are not less favourable than they would get under the national agreement. However, that is a matter for the tribunal. It appears from the affidavit of the managing director of the employers that when they were before the tribunal in January of this year, the tribunal refused to go E into the question of the amount of wages paid by the company, stating that the only question to be determined was whether or not the company should be bound by the agreement. If that was the question, it was an issue, and it ought to be determined according to the provisions of art. 9 of this order. For these reasons, as the matter was referred to the tribunal as a dispute when, in our opinion, it should have been referred to the tribunal as an issue, this order of prohibition F must go.

SELLERS, J.: I agree.

HAVERS, J.: I agree.

Order of prohibition.

Solicitors: Hardman, Phillips & Mann (for the employers); W. H. Thompson (for the trade union); Solicitor, Ministry of Labour and National Service (for the tribunal).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re BROWN (deceased). DISTRICT BANK, LTD. AND ANOTHER v. BROWN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), November 3, 4, 1953.]

Will—Forfeiture clause—Restraint on alienation—Absolute gift of property to four sons as tenants in common—Forfeiture in event of assurance or mortgage by a son to person "other than a brother or brothers of such son."

Ry his will, dated June 4, 1936, the testator, who died on Sept. 9, 1942, devised and bequeathed his "business properties" to trustees on trust for his wife during her life, and after her death on trust, until his youngest son should attain the age of twenty-one or die under that age, to divide the rents and profits thereof in equal shares between such of his four sons, whom he mentioned by name, as should be then living and the survivors and survivor of them, and, from and after the attainment by the youngest son of the age of twenty-one or his death under that age, on trust "for such of my said sons . . . as shall be then living and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common", with a substitutional clause in favour of the children of sons who failed to survive the vesting date. The testator then declared that, if any of his four sons "shall execute any assurance or mortgage whereby but for this present provision the share of my business properties or of the income thereof or any part thereof hereinbefore devised or bequeathed to him would or might become vested in or payable to any person or persons other than a brother or brothers of such son", then the share of that son in the business properties and the income thereof were to be held by the trustees on trust to pay or apply the income, at their discretion, for the benefit of the son, his wife and children, during the remainder of the son's life, and, subject thereto, on trust, as to both capital and income, for the son's children who should attain the age of twenty-one. The testator disposed of the residue of his real and personal estate. On Oct. 18, 1947, the wife died, and on Dec. 25, 1947, the youngest son attained the age of twenty-one. On the question whether the restraint on alienation was good,

HELD: as the class to whom a son might alienate consisted, at first, of only three named persons and would, in the course of time, diminish, there was, in substance, a general prohibition on alienation, which was an attempt to fetter the natural qualities of the absolute interest already given, and, therefore, the restraint was void and could be disregarded.

Attwater v. Attwater (1853) (18 Beav. 330), applied.

Re Macleay (1875) (L.R. 20 Eq. 186), distinguished.

AS TO RESTRAINT ON ALIENATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 220-224, paras. 375-377; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 447-451, Nos. 2708-2738.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Muschamp v. Bluet, (1617), J. Bridg. 132; 123 E.R. 1253; 44 Digest 448, 2713.
- (2) Doe d. Gill v. Pearson, (1805), 6 East, 173; 102 E.R. 1253; 44 Digest 450, 2727.
- (3) Re Macleay, (1875), L.R. 20 Eq. 186; 44 L.J.Ch. 441; 32 L.T. 682; 44 Digest 451, 2730.
- (4) Danyel v. Ubley, (1626), Benl. 178 (73 E.R. 1038); Lat. 134 (82 E.R. 311); sub nom. Daniel v. Ubley, W. Jo. 137 (82 E.R. 73); sub nom. Daniel v. Upton, Noy. 80 (74 E.R. 1047); 44 Digest 450, 2726.
- (5) Attwater v. Attwater, (1853), 18 Beav. 330; 23 L.J.Ch. 692; 22 L.T.O.S. 150; 52 E.R. 131; 44 Digest 450, 2728.
- (6) Jacobs v. Brett, (1875), L.R. 20 Eq. 1; 44 L.J.Ch. 377; 32 L.T. 522; 34 Digest 531, 50.

(7) Re Rosher, (1884), 26 Ch.D. 801; 53 L.J.Ch. 722; 51 L.T. 785; 44 Digest 451, 2731.

(8) Corbett v. Corbett, (1888), 14 P.D. 7; 58 L.J.P. 17; 60 L.T. 74; 44 Digest 450, 2724.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine questions arising under the will of the testator, Reginald William Southall Brown.

A By his will dated June 4, 1936, the testator appointed executors and trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and, by cl. 4, he bequeathed his business of a butcher and farmer to his wife for her life, with remainder to his four sons, Reginald William Southall Brown the younger, Harry Knight Brown, Arthur James Brown, and Geoffrey Knight Brown (referred to hereafter as "the youngest son"). By cl. 5 he devised and bequeathed the real properties referred to therein as his "business properties" to his trustees on trust for his wife during her life, and after her death

B "Upon trust until [the youngest son] attains the age of twenty-one years or dies under that age to pay and divide the net rents and profits thereof . . . subject as hereinafter appears in equal shares between such of my said sons . . . as shall be then living and the survivors and survivor of them and from and after the attainment by [the youngest son] of the age of twenty-one years or his death under that age . . . Upon trust subject as hereinafter appears for such of my said sons . . . as shall be then living and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common . . ."

C

There was then a substitutional clause in favour of the children of sons who failed to survive the vesting date, and a proviso giving the wife power to mortgage. Clause 6 of the will was as follows:

D

"I hereby declare that if any of . . . Reginald William Southall Brown the younger Harry Knight Brown Arthur James Brown or Geoffrey Knight Brown shall execute any assurance or mortgage whereby but for this present provision the share of my business properties or of the income thereof or any part thereof hereinbefore devised or bequeathed to him would or might become vested in or payable to any person or persons other than a brother or brothers of such son then I direct that the share of such son in my business properties and the income thereof shall be held by my trustees in trust to pay or apply the income during the residue of the life of such son to or for the maintenance and benefit of such son and any wife child or children of his or the maintenance and benefit of any one or more of such persons to the exclusion of the other or others in such manner and form in every respect as my trustees may (without being liable to account for the exercise of such discretion) in their absolute discretion think fit And subject thereto upon trust as to both capital and income for the children of such son who attain the age of twenty-one years and if more than one in equal shares . . ."

E

F By cl. 9 of the will the testator disposed of the residue of his real and personal estate.

G

The testator died on Sept. 9, 1942, and the wife died on Oct. 18, 1947. The youngest son attained the age of twenty-one on Dec. 25, 1947. By an assignment dated Aug. 16, 1949, one of the sons, Harry Knight Brown, assigned to the other three sons absolutely, in equal shares, as tenants in common, all his one-fourth share or interest under the will of the testator.

H

The court was asked to determine whether, on the true construction of the will and in the events which had happened, each of the three sons, Reginald William Southall Brown the younger, Arthur James Brown, and Geoffrey Knight Brown (referred to hereafter as "the sons") was now entitled (a) to one equal third share in the testator's business properties as tenant in common with the other two sons absolutely free and discharged from the provisions contained in cl. 6 of the will; or (b) to one equal third share in the properties as tenant in common subject to defeasance in the event of his executing any assurance or mortgage as specified in cl. 6; or (c) to some other and, if so, what interest in the properties.

F. B. Alcock for the plaintiffs, the trustees.

J. A. Armstrong for the first and second defendants, two of the testator's sons, and the fourth defendant, a grandson of the testator (his father being one of the trustees).

J. Willcock for the third, fifth, seventh and ninth defendants, persons beneficially interested under the will who supported the sons' claim that the restraint on alienation was bad.

R. J. S. Thompson for the sixth and eighth defendants, infant grandchildren of the testator.

HARMAN, J.: This is a point on which, it appears, the authorities give no certain guide. The point is a narrow one, and it is whether or not a restriction on alienation, appended to an absolute devise of real estate, is good. The first instinct, I think, of any equity lawyer is to say that all restraints on absolute interests which tend to negative the rights attached to those interests are abhorred by the law and disallowed. That is a general rule, stated in JARMAN ON WILLS, 8th ed., vol. 2, p. 1477, as follows: "A power of alienation is necessarily and inseparably incidental to an estate in fee". One starts, therefore, I think, with the view that anything which seeks to deprive the feoffee (so to call him) of his rights is void, but there is no doubt that some degree of restriction may be imposed. One could, for instance, under the old law, impose a prohibition against assigning in mortmain, because that was a thing which the law did not allow, but, according to the early cases, one could not do by indirect means that which one could not do directly. The feoffee must not, in substance, be prevented from alienating, while, in form, he is given a chance to do so. For instance, he will not be bound by a fetter forbidding alienation to any but one named person or to a specified person who is an undischarged bankrupt, for that would be, in substance, though not in form, an absolute bar. I think that is illustrated by Muschamp v. Bluet (1).

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and the provisions of cl. 4 and cl. 5 of the will, and continued:] It will be observed that the sons' interests in the business property are contingent until the time arrives for the vesting in possession, and that, when there is that vesting in possession, it is an absolute vesting in them as tenants in common. By reason of the modern doctrine that there cannot be undivided shares in land, when the land ceased to be settled land at the date of vesting a statutory trust for sale was imposed, and the interests of the four sons became interests in the proceeds of sale [: see Real Property Act, 1925, s. 1 (6), s. 34, and Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 36 (6)]. I think, however, that that fact can make no difference, as the principles in regard to the right of alienation apply to personalty as well as to realty. There is a residuary gift in cl. 9 of the will. The trouble in this case is caused by cl. 6. [HIS LORDSHIP read cl. 6, and continued:] That is a strange provision. If a son disposes of his interest to persons other than his brothers, there will be a kind of discretionary trust during his lifetime, and a remainder to his children, if he has any, and, if not, his share will fall into residue. If, on the other hand, a son does nothing to work a forfeiture, then he may, I suppose, leave his share of the property by will away from his children, which seems strange.

In 1949 one of the four sons assigned his share in the business properties absolutely to the other three, who now wish to know whether a forfeiture will ensue if one of them assures his share outside the magic circle. As I have said, the first instinct of any lawyer is to say that the restriction is not good, as it is inconsistent with an absolute interest in real estate (or in proceeds of sale, for that matter). But counsel for infant grandchildren of the testator was able to persuade me that there is a great deal to be said for the view that a restriction of this sort may be good, because it does not amount to a total restriction. He referred to COKE'S COMMENTARY UPON LITTLETON, Charles Butler ed., vol. 2, s. 360 and s. 361. Section 360 reads:

A "Also, if a feoffment be made upon this condition, that the feoffee shall not alien the land to any, this condition is void, because when a man is infeoffed of lands or tenements, he hath power to alien them to any person by the law. For if such a condition should be good, then the condition should oust him of all the power which the law gives him, which should be against reason, and therefore such a condition is void."

That is to say, it is repugnant to the gift. Section 361 reads:

B "But if the condition be such, that the feoffee shall not alien to such a one, naming his name, or to any of his heirs, or of the issues of such a one, etc., or the like, which conditions do not take away all power of alienation from the feoffee, etc., then such condition is good."

C That merely says that a prohibition against alienating to a certain person (or, I suppose, to certain persons) is good. The question is: To how many persons may one extend that prohibition? According to Doe d. Gill v. Pearson (2) and Re Macleay (3), one may extend it to all the world except a certain class of people, but that seems to me a curious way of reading the doctrine of COKE, which merely says that one may exclude A. or B. from the world of people to whom the feoffee may alienate.

D Doe d. Gill v. Pearson (2) is a decision of the Court of King's Bench, the judgment being given by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. In that case the testator gave certain lands to

E "my said daughters Ann and Hannah, their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; upon this special proviso and condition, that in case my said daughters Ann and Hannah Collett, or either of them, shall have no lawful issue, that then and in such case they or she having no lawful issue as aforesaid shall have no power to dispose of her share in the said estates so above given to them except to her sister or sisters, or to their children."

F Therefore, the class to whom alienation was permitted was confined to sisters and the children of sisters. That is a narrow enough class, though one does not know how large it actually was. There were five daughters, and all of them, except Ann, had children, but the report does not say how many. Ann made over her share to her husband. In an ejectment action, one of the heirs having entered on Ann's moiety after her death on the footing that there was an intestacy, LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., said (6 East 180):

G "In this case three questions have been made: first, whether the conditions annexed to the estates of Ann Collett and Hannah Collett be good in point of law? . . . As to the first, we think that the condition is good; for according to the case of Danyel v. Ubley (4), though the judges did not agree as to the effect of a devise 'to a wife, to dispose at her will and pleasure, and to give to which of her sons she pleased'; JONES, J., thinking it gave an estate for life, with a power to dispose of the reversion among the sons; the other judges, according to his report, thinking it gave her a fee simple in trust to convey to any of her sons: yet in that case it was not doubted, H but that she might have had given her a fee simple conditional to convey it to any of the sons of the devisor; and if she did not, that the heir might enter for the condition broken . . ."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., is, therefore, purporting to follow Danyel v. Ubley (4), a case which, as appears from his recital of it, would now be decided on the footing that the devisee was given a mere life estate with a power of appointment. In Doe d. Gill v. Pearson (2), therefore, the Court of King's Bench decided that a condition not to alienate except to a class consisting of four sisters and their children was good. This was a decision of the full court, of which LAWRENCE, J., was a member.

That case was considered by SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in Attwater v. Attwater (5), but he refused to follow it. In Attwater v. Attwater (5) the limitation was:

"I bequeath to Gay Thomas Attwater, jun., eldest son of my niece, the family estate at Charlton, Wilts., to become his property on attaining the age of twenty-five years, with an injunction never to sell it out of the family; but, if sold at all, it must be to one of his brothers hereafter named."

There were five brothers named in the will. SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., held that the restriction on alienation was inoperative. He said (18 Beav. 336):

"The meaning is, I think, plain, that the testator intended to impose this fetter: that if the brother will not buy, the devisee was not to be at liberty to sell the property to anyone. The question is, whether such a condition is a valid one? Notwithstanding the case of Doe d. Gill v. Pearson (2), this appears to me to be a condition repugnant to the quality of the estate given. It is obvious, that if the introduction of one person's name, as the only person to whom the property may be sold, renders such a proviso valid, a restraint on alienation may be created, as complete and perfect as if no person whatever was named; inasmuch as the name of a person, who alone is permitted to purchase, might be so selected, as to render it reasonably certain that he would not buy the property, and that the property could not be aliened at all. It appears to me also, that this is the true construction of the words used by the testator; it is, in truth, an injunction never to sell the hereditaments devised at all. The words 'out of the family', are merely descriptive of the effect of the sale, and not of the person to whom it might be sold, as is shown by the two last clauses of a similar character, relating to the devises to William and Edward Attwater, which, in referring to this clause, state that the property is not to be sold out of the family, as before specified. It is not, in my opinion, desirable to impose fresh fetters on the enjoyment of property, and it appears to me that this proviso is distinctly at variance with the rules laid down by LORD COKE (Co. Litt. 223a), and which have always been considered and treated as good law. I am of opinion, therefore, that this clause is merely inoperative."

That is a decision on a limitation exactly in pari materia to the one before me. I should feel no difficulty, I think, about following it rather than Doe d. Gill v. Pearson (2), but for the fact that, in Re Macleay (3), the great authority of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., appears to be on the other side. In that case, the devise was "to my . . . brother John . . . on the condition that he never sells it out of the family". SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (L.R. 20 Eq. 187):

"I have no doubt the family in question means her blood relations. Looking at the will, I have no doubt that there is a condition annexed to the gift in fee, and that, under the word 'property', the vendor will get the fee of the freehold manor in question, and mansion-house and lands, on the condition that he never sells it away from his blood relations. First of all, it is to be observed that the condition, good or bad, is confined within legal limits; it is applicable merely to the devisee himself, and therefore is not void on any ground of remoteness. It has been suggested, however, that it is void as being repugnant to the quality of the estate, that is to say, that you cannot restrict the right of an owner in fee of alienating in any way in which he may think fit. If that were the law, the condition would be plainly void. But, with the exception of one authority, a case decided by my immediate predecessor, I am not aware that the law has ever been laid down in that way."

After citing the passages from COKE UPON LITTLETON [s. 360 and s. 361], and referring to Muschamp v. Bluet (1), Attwater v. Attwater (5), and Jacobs v. Brett (6), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (ibid., 189):

"So that, according to the old books, SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE being to the same effect, the test is whether the condition takes away the whole power of alienation substantially: it is a question of substance, and not of mere form."

A After discussing Attwater v. Attwater (5), with a certain amount of disparagement, and Doe d. Gill v. Pearson (2), he came to the conclusion that, in the case before him, he did not think the words sufficiently restrictive to be regarded, in substance, as an absolute prohibition against alienation. His reason was that the "family" was a larger term than "sister or sisters" [in Doe d. Gill v. Pearson (2)] and that the restriction was against selling, and not against disposing. He, therefore, came to the conclusion that the limitation in the case before him was a good one.

B Re Macleay (3), therefore, supports the view put forward, in the case before me, by counsel for the infant grandchildren, but in Re Rosher (7) PEARSON, J., felt it necessary to make a most elaborate attack on SIR GEORGE JESSEL's decision. In Re Rosher (7) the decision was that, as a matter of construction, the restriction was, in effect, an absolute one, but PEARSON, J., delivered a long judgment explaining why he could not agree that Re Macleay (3) was well decided. The restriction in Re Rosher (7) was that, if the devisee wished to sell during the lifetime of the testator's widow, he should offer a property worth £15,000 to the widow at a price of £3,000. PEARSON, J., held that that, in effect, meant that the devisee could not sell during the life of the widow, because no one was going to give away £15,000 worth of property for £3,000. Although Re Rosher (7), qua its decision, does not help much, it does show the view of PEARSON, J., that Re Macleay (3) was wrongly decided.

D I do not think that I need take the law any further. I have to choose one way or the other, unless I can take the way out suggested to me by counsel for the sons, which was that the prohibition against alienation applies only during the period of contingency, i.e., the widow's lifetime and the infancy of the youngest son. It would be a comfort if I could come to that decision, but cl. 6 is a separate clause and its operation appears to end only with the death of the last surviving son, and I cannot hold that it operates only during the period of contingency. If I could, the will would read more easily. It is well known that, during a suspense of vesting—even during a suspense of vesting in possession—one may impose a bar on alienation. What one may not do is to impose a bar, if it be a general bar, after a vesting in possession. In Corbett v. Corbett (8), a decision of the Court of Appeal on appeal from the Probate Division, it was possible to limit such a prohibition to the period of contingency: see the observations of BOWEN, L.J. (14 P.D. 13). I do not feel able to take that way out, and I must face the problem.

E F G H It seems to me pertinent to remember, as counsel for the sons pointed out, that the class to whom a son may alienate begins with three for any one share, and that the prohibition goes on, not only during the lives of all the sons, but during the lives of the survivors of them, and, eventually, during the life of the survivor. Therefore, a period will be reached when there are two persons, and then only one person, and lastly no one, to whom alienation is allowed. If there is only one, that, in substance, is equivalent to none: see Muschamp v. Bluet (1) (J. Bridg. 137. If one be bad, is two good? It seems to me that, as a son may alienate only to a class of this kind, which is bound to be a diminishing class, there is, in substance, a general prohibition on alienation. In my view, it is the kind of restriction which the law views with dislike. It is exactly the same kind of condition as in Attwater v. Attwater (5), and I think that I would be at liberty to follow that case. But I do not think that I need follow any case, because the cases on the point are inconsistent with one another, and I am entitled to follow my own view. It is, however, pertinent, I think, that a number of named persons of this kind is, in essence, different from a class consisting, for instance, as in Re Macleay (3), of members of the family, which may be a large and indeterminate class and one which may increase as time goes on, whereas, if alienation is allowed only to three or four named persons, the class is bound to diminish as death takes its toll of the members. Therefore, I hold that the restriction in the present case is an attempt to fetter the natural qualities of the interest given and is void and can be disregarded.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Doyle, Devonshire & Co., agents for Abberley & Walker, Burslem, Staffs. (for all parties).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

DEEBLE v. ROBINSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), October 12, November 10, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Shop—Renewal of tenancy—Dairy business—Premises used for storage of milk bottles and refrigerator—No sales on premises—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (c. 38), s. 10 (2) (c), s. 20 (1).

The applicant carried on a retail trade as a milk roundsman, selling milk from door to door, and was the tenant of premises in which no milk was sold, but from which he conducted his business, and which included, inter alia, a shed where he stored his spare milk bottles and refrigerator, and a stable where he kept his horse and float. On an application for a new tenancy under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (2) (c), HELD (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente): in view of the definition of "shop" in s. 20 (1) of the Act, to be entitled to a new tenancy the applicant must show that a retail trade or business was carried on in the premises; the mere occupation of premises for the purpose of sales effected elsewhere was not sufficient; and, therefore, the applicant was not the occupier of a "shop" within s. 20 (1) and was not entitled to a new tenancy.

FOR THE LEASEHOLD PROPERTY (TEMPORARY PROVISIONS) ACT, 1951, s. 10 (2) and s. 20 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 30, p. 207 and p. 216.

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Pearce, (1880), 5 Q.B.D. 386; 49 L.J.M.C. 81; 37 Digest 204, 25.
- (2) Frawley (M. & F.), Ltd. v. Ve-Ri-Best Manufacturing Co., Ltd., [1953] 1 All E.R. 50; [1953] 1 Q.B. 318.
- (3) Wallace v. Dixon, [1917] 2 I.R. 236; 24 Digest 928, p.
- (4) Summers v. Roberts, [1943] 2 All E.R. 757; [1944] K.B. 106; 113 L.J.K.B. 109; 170 L.T. 130; 108 J.P. 52; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Ritz Cleaners, Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee, [1937] 2 All E.R. 368; [1937] 2 K.B. 642; 106 L.J.K.B. 398; 157 L.T. 423; 101 J.P. 307; Digest Supp.
- (6) Dennis v. Hutchinson, Trafford v. Same, [1922] 1 K.B. 693; 91 L.J.K.B. 584; 126 L.T. 669; 86 J.P. 85; 24 Digest 930, 209.

APPEAL by the applicant from an order of His Honour JUDGE CAPORN at Doncaster County Court dated June 24, 1953, by which it was ordered that the application for a new tenancy be dismissed on the ground that the applicant's dairy from which he carried on the retail trade of a milk roundsman was not a "shop" within the meaning of s. 20 (1) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951.

Drabble, Q.C., and H. S. Pears for the applicant, the tenant.

A. S. Orr and W. H. Greenwood for the respondent, the landlord.

Cur. adv. vult.

A Nov. 10. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: In these proceedings, the applicant applied for the grant of a new tenancy of certain premises on the ground that a "separate part" was occupied for the purpose of retailing milk. The application was made under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (2) (c).

B I will read the relevant parts of s. 10 :

"(1) The provisions of this Part of this Act shall have effect for enabling the occupier of a shop under a tenancy to which this section applies (hereinafter referred to as 'the expiring tenancy') to apply to the court for, and subject to the provisions of this Act to obtain, the grant of a new tenancy where apart from the next following section the expiring tenancy would come to an end immediately before the date of the commencement of this Act or within the period of two years beginning with that date, and would so come to an end by effluxion of time or by the expiration of a notice to quit given by the landlord, whether before or after the commencement of this Act. (2) This section applies to a tenancy the subject of which—(a) consists of a shop, or (b) consists of a shop and of living accommodation occupied wholly or mainly by the tenant or by a person who is employed by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop, or (c) includes a separate part which consists of a shop or which consists of a shop and of such living accommodation as is mentioned in the last foregoing paragraph . . . (4) In the case of an expiring tenancy the subject of which falls within para. (c) of sub-s. (2) of this section and not within para. (b) thereof, any new tenancy granted under this Part of this Act shall if the landlord so requires be a tenancy of the whole of the subject of the expiring tenancy, and otherwise a tenancy of the separate part consisting of the shop or consisting of the shop and of living accommodation, as the case may be."

F The applicant has a milk round, delivering to customers at their houses some seventy-five gallons a day. His premises consist of two dwelling-houses and a yard. In that yard there is a shed used for the applicant's "spare bottles, refrigerator, and other articles". This is the "separate part" primarily relied on. If the applicant is right with regard to the shed, the stable where he keeps the horse that draws the milk float might also be covered. Some six to eight pints are sold on the premises, not at the shed, but these can, in my view, be disregarded, and no reliance was placed on them. The learned judge came to the conclusion that the shed was not a shop within the meaning of the Act. The applicant was carrying on a retail trade. This trade was not carried on in the shed. The shed was used for the trade. The shed, I think, quite plainly, was not a shop in the ordinary sense of the word. It is submitted, however, that it is within the definition to be found in s. 20 (1) of the Act. The definition of a shop H in that section is as follows:

"'Shop' means premises occupied wholly for business purposes, and so occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business."

Section 20 also provides:

"'retail trade or business' has the same meaning as in the Shops Act, 1950, except that it does not include the sale of intoxicating liquor,"

The Shops Act, 1950, s. 74, provides:

" 'retail trade or business' includes the business of a barber or hairdresser, the sale of refreshments or intoxicating liquors, the business of lending books or periodicals when carried on for purposes of gain, and retail sales by auction, but does not include the sale of programmes and catalogues and other similar sales at theatres and places of amusement."

The argument is as follows. The definition of "shop", it is said, covers premises used for the purpose of retail trade although not a shop in the ordinary meaning of the word. An example would be the head office of a company running a number of retail shops. This would not be a shop in the ordinary sense, but it is said it would be "used for the purposes of a retail trade or business", and, therefore, included by the definition.

Many observations can be found in reported cases on interpretation clauses. In R. v. Pearce (1) LUSH, J., said (5 Q.B.D. 389):

"But I think an interpretation clause should be used for the purpose of interpreting words which are ambiguous or equivocal, and not so as to disturb the meaning of such as are plain."

LUSH, J., was dealing with a clause in the form "X includes". I agree with what is stated in CRAIES ON STATUTE LAW, 5th ed., p. 197, that

"... where the word defined is declared to 'mean' so and so, the definition is explanatory and prima facie restrictive."

He goes on to say that

"... where the word defined is declared to 'include' so and so, the definition is extensive."

I agree, but applying the principle laid down by LUSH, J., one would not, unless forced, even when the definition is in the form "includes", carry the extension beyond border-line or doubtful cases. Applying these observations, the form of words here is inapt to include premises which, like the shed, are plainly not shops.

Reliance was placed on the fact that in the Shops Act, 1950, s. 74,

" 'shop' includes any premises where any retail trade or business is carried on."

These latter words do not occur in the present definition. The two Acts were dealing with different subject-matters. The Shops Act, 1950, was dealing with hours and conditions of work, Sunday trading, and so on. One would have expected the definition to make clear that it applied to any premises where any retail trade was carried on. The present Act is dealing with leases. The restrictive words at the beginning of the definition limit the definition to premises wholly occupied for business purposes. I agree that the definition might have ended with some such words as "carried on therein". On the other hand, if the legislature had intended the wider meaning, I would have expected the words "whether carried on in the premises or not". The definition has to be read in the context of the Act. Section 10 (2) and s. 10 (4) of the Act of 1951 both contain the words "the retail trade or business carried on in the shop". This phrase is difficult to reconcile with a definition which makes "shop" include premises in which the retail trade or business is not carried on. There is a further consideration. It has often been laid down that plain words are necessary to establish an intention to interfere with common law or contractual rights. I do not think that the shed in question is plainly covered by the relevant sections. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: Mr. Deeble, the applicant, has a milk round. He sells milk to people at the doors of their houses. He conducts his business from a dairy building where he keeps his equipment, refrigerator, spare milk bottles, and so forth, and a stable where he keeps his horse and float. His round is in seven streets adjoining the premises. He has no shop as ordinarily understood. His lease of these premises is coming to an end, and he wants to stay there. This depends on whether the premises come within the definition of a "shop" in the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951. In s. 20 (1) Parliament has expressly ordained that in that Act the expression "shop" has this meaning:

- A "premises occupied wholly for business purposes, and so occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business."

I think that definition covers both the dairy and the stable. The trade of a milk roundsman carried on by the applicant was plainly a "retail trade" and he occupied these premises for the purposes of that trade. It seems clear to me that "the purposes of a retail trade or business" include not only the actual selling of the goods, but also the buying and storing of them, the office work, and other ancillary things necessary for the carrying on of the business.

- B "the purposes of a retail trade or business" include not only the actual selling of the goods, but also the buying and storing of them, the office work, and other ancillary things necessary for the carrying on of the business.

Counsel for the landlord conceded that the dairy was within the definition of "shop" in the Act of 1951 if that definition is literally interpreted, but he urged us to limit the statutory definition by reference to the general conception of a shop. There must, he said, be something which would popularly be considered to be a shop before the Act can apply. I do not agree with this contention. When Parliament has specifically declared what the expression "shop" means in the Act, I do not think it is open to the court to say that it means something else. Nor is it permissible to cut down its statutory meaning by reference to its popular meaning. Just as mathematicians, in order to facilitate their reasoning, frequently use one symbol to denote a complicated expression, so also Parliament,

- D in order to simplify its language, often uses one short word to denote a complex subject-matter. It saves writing it out in full every time. In such a case, whenever a question arises on the interpretation of the statute, the word is to be given its statutory meaning as if it were written out in full. It is very different, of course, when Parliament says that a familiar word is to "include" some specified thing, as in the Shops Act, 1950, s. 74, where the word "shop" includes

- E any premises where any retail trade or business is carried on, and the expression "retail trade or business" includes the business of a barber or hairdresser. In such a case, the word or expression must be given its ordinary meaning (which is not defined) and in addition it must, in relevant cases, be given the special meaning which the statute says is to be included, which I will call the "included meaning". The included meaning may be inserted out of caution, so as to make sure that it is included in the ordinary meaning, or it may be inserted as supplemental, so as to add something to the ordinary meaning. But in cases where the included meaning is not applicable or relevant, or is doubtful or ambiguous, the ordinary meaning must prevail. A good instance is M. & F. Frawley, Ltd. v. Ve-Ri-Best Manufacturing Co., Ltd. (2), where it was held that a builder's business was not within the ordinary meaning of a "retail trade or business". In the present

- F case, in relation to the word "shop" Parliament has not said that it "includes" so and so. It has said that it "means" so and so. When Parliament has been thus specific we are not at liberty to depart from it. I readily concede, however, that if the statutory definition were obscurely worded or led to patent injustice, it would be quite permissible to ignore the literal interpretation and seek a reasonable one, and it would be quite right to seek guidance from the popular meaning of the word. But in this case the literal interpretation coincides with what is just and reasonable. Let me give some illustrations. Take a case where a shopkeeper owns the shop himself but has a tenancy of a store at the back which is essential to his business. It would be a grave defect in the Act if he were not protected in regard to the store. Take next a case where a coal merchant rents an office in which he takes orders, but delivers the coal direct from the station yard to his customers. The office can hardly be called a shop in ordinary

- G case, in relation to the word "shop" Parliament has not said that it "includes" so and so. It has said that it "means" so and so. When Parliament has been thus specific we are not at liberty to depart from it. I readily concede, however, that if the statutory definition were obscurely worded or led to patent injustice, it would be quite permissible to ignore the literal interpretation and seek a reasonable one, and it would be quite right to seek guidance from the popular meaning of the word. But in this case the literal interpretation coincides with what is just and reasonable. Let me give some illustrations. Take a case where a shopkeeper owns the shop himself but has a tenancy of a store at the back which is essential to his business. It would be a grave defect in the Act if he were not protected in regard to the store. Take next a case where a coal merchant rents an office in which he takes orders, but delivers the coal direct from the station yard to his customers. The office can hardly be called a shop in ordinary

- H building where he keeps his equipment, refrigerator, spare milk bottles, and so forth, and a stable where he keeps his horse and float. His round is in seven streets adjoining the premises. He has no shop as ordinarily understood. His lease of these premises is coming to an end, and he wants to stay there. This depends on whether the premises come within the definition of a "shop" in the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951. In s. 20 (1) Parliament has expressly ordained that in that Act the expression "shop" has this meaning:

parlance, but surely he should be protected in regard to it. Take last a case where a fruiterer and greengrocer has a store in which he keeps his goods, but he does all his business by going round from door to door. He should be protected even though he has no place which would ordinarily be called a shop. These illustrations convince me that there is no reason why we should not give this statute its literal interpretation, and every reason why we should do so. In further support of the literal interpretation, I would mention that the legislature seems in this Act to have departed deliberately from the definition of "shop", which appears in all the Shops Acts, 1912 to 1950, and to have done so with the intention of bringing in cases such as those I have mentioned instead of leaving them in doubt as they were before: see Wallace v. Dixon (3), discussed in Summers v. Roberts (4). The only argument to the contrary derives from a phrase in s. 10 (2) (b) and s. 10 (4) (a) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act. Those provisions give protection to living accommodation if it is occupied by a person who is employed for the purposes of "the retail trade or business carried on in the shop."

It would look at first sight as if the draftsman in using that phrase had in mind the ordinary meaning of a shop, but I see no difficulty in giving the word "shop" in that phrase its statutory meaning. A retail trade or business does not consist merely of selling over the counter. It is carried on, not only in the selling portion of the premises, but also in the storage portion. In the present case, the retail trade is carried on "in" the dairy, even though sales are not actually made there. If Mr. Deeble himself lived in rooms over his dairy or his roundsman lived there, he would be protected in respect of the living accommodation as well as of the dairy. I see nothing in this contrary to the intention of Parliament, but everything in favour of it. It is said, however, that there is much significance in the word "in". The retail trade must, it is said, be carried on "in" the shop, not "from" it. This seems to me to give an altogether excessive emphasis to a preposition and to create an anomaly which the statutory meaning avoids. I think it is our duty to give the word "shop" in this statute the meaning which Parliament says it is to have, and not to give it a meaning of our own.

In my opinion, the dairy and the stable were each a "shop" within the Act and I would allow the appeal accordingly.

ROMER, L.J.: The argument for the applicant in this case has at least the merit of simplicity. He points to the definition of "shop" in the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 20 (1), and says that his dairy falls within it and that, therefore, he is entitled to a new tenancy in accordance with the provisions of s. 10 of the Act. The definition of "shop" in s. 20 (1) is:

"'Shop' means premises occupied wholly for business purposes, and so occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business."

To the suggestion that premises do not constitute a shop unless trade is carried on in them—and not merely from them—the applicant's answer is that the legislature's deliberate departure from the definition of "shop" contained in the Shops Act, 1950, s. 74, establishes a contrary intention. There is some force in this contention and it is (although, as SOMERVELL, L.J., has pointed out, the statutes were dealing with different subject-matters) perhaps strengthened by the fact that the definition of "retail trade or business" in the Act of 1950 is substantially and expressly preserved in the Act of 1951. Nevertheless (although the question at issue by no means depends solely, in my opinion, on the way in which "shop" is defined), there are certain considerations which tend to a narrowing of the apparent width of the definition of "shop" in s. 20. In M. & F. Frawley, Ltd. v. Ve-Ri-Best Manufacturing Co., Ltd. (2) SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 52) that:

"The general character of the word to be defined must colour the definition."

What, then, is the general character of a shop? There is, on this question, some judicial authority.

“ . . . the essential element in a shop is that people can shop in it ”

(per GREENE, L.J., in Ritz Cleaners, Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee (5) ([1937] 2 All E.R. 377).

“ Prima facie a shop is a place where goods are sold by retail and stored for sale . . . ”

(per LORD TREVETHIN, C.J., in Dennis v. Hutchinson, Trafford v. Same (6) ([1922] 1 K.B. 697).

“ It seems to be quite clear that the ordinary dictionary meaning of ‘shop’ is a place where ordinary retail selling and the serving of customers takes place . . . ”

B (per AVORY, J. (ibid., 698)). Further, in the Ve-Ri-Best case (2) JENKINS, L.J., said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 53) that the expression “retail trade” clearly connotes in its primary sense a business of selling goods to members of the public who resort to the shop or premises where the business is carried on for the purpose of making purchases. In these circumstances, one would approach any statutory definition of shop with some sort of expectation, at all events, that what GREENE, C L.J., described in the above citation as the “essential element” would not be wholly abrogated; and had it not been for the argument founded on the jettisoning of the definition in the Shops Act, 1950, I should see no reason to suppose that that element was not preserved by s. 20 of the Act of 1951.

As I have previously indicated, however, the question before us on this appeal does not, in my opinion, fall to be determined wholly according to whether the applicant's dairy does or does not come within the definition of “shop” in s. 20 (1) of the Act of 1951. That question is only a part of the broader problem which we have to decide, viz., whether the applicant has succeeded in bringing his case within s. 10 (2) (c) of the Act, for, if he has not succeeded in this endeavour, he has no claim to the new tenancy for which he is asking. The definition of “shop” in s. 20 (1) is incorporated in s. 10 (2) (c) and is, undoubtedly, an element of importance in construing the latter provision. Nevertheless, in accordance with well-established principles, the provision has to be interpreted in the light of the whole of the language used. In order to arrive at a conclusion as to the meaning and effect of s. 10 (2) (c), it tends to clarification, I think, to write it out in extenso, incorporating in express language the ingredients which appear in the provision only referentially. So written it provides as follows: “This section applies to a tenancy the subject of which includes a separate part which consists of premises occupied wholly for business purposes and so occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business (as defined in the Shops Act, 1950) or which consists of such premises as aforesaid and of living accommodation occupied wholly or mainly by the tenant or by a person who is employed by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the said premises”. Now, whatever might be the true meaning and effect of the definition of “shop” in s. 20 of the Act, if taken by itself, it appears to me that the concluding words introduce GREENE, L.J.'s “essential element” into s. 10 in no uncertain terms. The words show, in my opinion, that the draftsman was envisaging premises on which, not from which, a retail trade or business was being carried on. That this must be so is, as I think, established by considering what the position would be if the applicant had on his premises some living accommodation which was occupied by one of his roundsmen. If the applicant is right in his argument on this appeal, he could get a new tenancy of the dairy itself even though his sales were effected elsewhere. It seems plain, however, that he could not get a renewal of the living accommodation, for he would be unable to show that it was occupied by a person who was employed by him “for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop.”

The applicant's argument thus involves a somewhat remarkable anomaly, if accepted—an anomaly which would, perhaps, be even stranger if, in the circumstances supposed, the living accommodation was occupied, not by a roundsman, but by the applicant himself. On the construction, then, of s. 10 it appears to me that in order to qualify for a renewed tenancy a lessee must show that a retail trade or business is carried on in his premises, or a separate part thereof, and that the mere occupation of premises for the purpose of sales which are effected elsewhere is not enough. This view, if right, excludes the applicant's dairy from the Act—a result which is not, I think, altogether surprising, for nobody would think of describing the dairy as a shop within the ordinary acceptance of that word.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is, I think, in conformity with the decision of this court in the Ve-Ri-Best case (2). In that case the court held that the words "retail trade or business" might include the rendering of certain categories of services as well as the sale of goods. The application by the tenants for a renewal of their tenancy was, however, rejected on the ground that the services which they rendered were performed not on the demised premises but elsewhere, viz., at the homes or houses of their customers and that the demised premises, therefore, did not constitute a "shop". By parity of reasoning, where the retail trade or business consists of selling goods, the premises are not, in my opinion, a "shop" for the purposes of the Act unless the goods (at all events in the main) are sold to the customers on the premises themselves. This was, indeed, the view of JENKINS, L.J., in the Ve-Ri-Best case (2) where, in the course of his judgment, he said, ([1953] 1 All E.R. 52) with reference to s. 10 (2):

"That provision is, perhaps, indirectly relevant as showing that the Act contemplates that the retail trade or business by virtue of which the shop qualifies as such under the definition will be carried on in the shop."

I respectfully agree with that view, and, for the reasons which I have stated, I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Corbin, Greener & Cook, agents for Dawson & Burgees, Doncaster (for the applicant); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for Ernest Briggs & Co., Doncaster (for the respondent).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. PAGE.

[COURTS-MARTIAL APPEAL COURT (Lord Goddard, C.J., Havers and Glyn-Jones, JJ.), October 26, November 10, 1953.]

Court-Martial—Jurisdiction—Murder—Murder of foreign national abroad—Victim not within the Queen's peace—Army Act, s. 41.

A The appellant, a serving soldier stationed in the Suez Canal Zone, was convicted by a court-martial assembled at Fayid, Egypt, of the murder in an Egyptian village of an Egyptian national. It was contended on his behalf that the conviction could not stand because the murdered man was not within the Queen's peace, and that a court-martial could only try a case of murder if that crime came within the common law definition of murder set out in COKE'S THIRD INSTITUTE as follows: "Murder is when a man of sound memory, and of the age of discretion, unlawfully killeth within any county of the realm any reasonable creature . . . under the King's peace with malice aforethought".

B HELD: under s. 41 of the Army Act a court-martial could try a person subject to military law for any offence, wherever committed, which would be an offence against the law of England, subject only to the reservation that the section provided for the trial of a prisoner before a civil court instead of a court-martial in the special circumstances set out in the provisos to the section, and, therefore, the appellant was rightly convicted.

C Per curiam: In the MANUAL OF MILITARY LAW, 1951 ed., pp. 131, 132, it is stated that it must be proved in the case of murder that the victim was under the Queen's peace and that the army carries the Queen's peace with it wherever it goes. So far as this may appear to assert that an alien who is not at the time of the crime within Her Majesty's dominions or territories is within her peace we cannot assent to it, at least unless the territory has been effectively occupied by her forces.

D AS TO THE JURISDICTION OF THE ENGLISH CRIMINAL COURTS IN RESPECT OF CRIMES COMMITTED OUT OF ENGLAND, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 62-65, paras. 68-80.

E Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Sawyer, (1815), 2 Cal. & Kir. 101; Russ. & Ry. 294; 1 RUSSELL ON CRIMES & MISDEMEANOURS, 8th ed., 29, n.; 175 E.R. 41; 14 Digest 133, 1060.
- F (2) R. v. Serva, (1845), 2 Car. & Kir. 53; 6 State Tr. N.S. 197; 10 J.P. 134; 1 Cox C.C. 292; 175 E.R. 22; sub nom. R. v. Majavel, 6 L.T.O.S. 188; 14 Digest 140, 1125.
- (3) R. v. Helsham, (1830), 4 C. & P. 394; 172 E.R. 754; 14 Digest 133, 1061.
- G (4) R. v. Azzopardi, (1843), 1 Car. & Kir. 203 (174 E.R. 776); 2 Mood. C.C. 288 (169 E.R. 114); 6 State Tr. N.S. 21; 2 L.T.O.S. 287; 1 Cox C.C. 28; 14 Digest 133, 1062.

APPEAL against conviction of murder by a general court-martial.

H The appellant, Harry Richard Page, an acting corporal in the Royal Corps of Signals, was convicted by a general court-martial assembled at Fayid in the Suez Canal Zone of the murder of an Egyptian national in an Egyptian village. He was sentenced to death, but the confirming officer commuted the sentence to one of imprisonment. Leave to appeal against the conviction was granted by a single judge of the court on a question of law, namely, whether a court-martial had jurisdiction to try the appellant when the person killed was not within the Queen's peace. No other issue was raised in the appeal, and counsel for the appellant conceded that in like circumstances the killing would have justified a verdict of murder had the appellant been tried before an English court.

Diplock, Q.C., and J. M. Buckland for the appellant.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.) and E. Garth Moore for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 10. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant, an acting corporal in the Royal Corps of Signals, was tried and convicted by a general court-martial assembled at Fayid in the Suez Canal Zone of the murder in an Egyptian village of an Egyptian national. He was sentenced to death, and the sentence was commuted by the confirming officer to one of imprisonment. There was abundant evidence to justify the conviction, and the summing-up of the judge advocate is not open to criticism, apart from his citation of a passage in the MANUAL OF MILITARY LAW with which we deal later in this judgment. The appellant was granted leave to appeal by a single judge of this court on a question of law, namely, that the conviction could not stand for the reason that the murdered man was not within the Queen's peace. The argument submitted by counsel on his behalf was that the common law definition of murder is that stated in COKE'S THIRD INSTITUTE, c. 7, at p. 47, where he says:

"Murder is when a man of sound memory, and of the age of discretion, unlawfully killeth within any county of the realm any reasonable creature . . . under the King's peace with malice aforethought."

He contended that a court-martial could only try a case of murder if it came within this common law definition and could not try one in which recourse had to be made to statutory provisions which had made murder committed abroad triable and punishable in this country.

As will be seen hereafter the case really depends on the true construction of s. 41 of the Army Act. Considering that s. 9 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, provides that where any murder is committed by any subject of Her Majesty on land out of the United Kingdom, whether within the Queen's dominions or without, and whether the person killed is the subject of Her Majesty or not, the offence may be dealt with in all respects as if it had been committed in England in any county or place where the suspected person is apprehended or is in custody, it is not strictly necessary for the purposes of this case to consider the old law on the subject. All that it is necessary to ascertain is whether the law as now laid down in that section can be applied by a court-martial. In deference, however, to the learned and careful argument of counsel for the appellant we will deal shortly with the position as it was before that statute.

It is, no doubt, true that the general rule of English law is that offences committed by British subjects out of England are not punishable by the criminal law of this country. We need not explore the origin of this doctrine. Suffice it to say that it depends partly on the law of nations which would regard an offence committed on the soil of one nation as, at least primarily, the concern of the sovereign of that country, but one can also see the procedural difficulty which would have occurred to a medieval lawyer who would be unable to understand how the jury presentment consisting of persons taken from the vicinage could have knowledge of crimes committed abroad sufficient to present them to the sovereign's courts. It is enough to say that, certainly from the reign of Henry VIII, this rule has been subject to statutory exceptions. Crimes of the present day which can be tried in England though committed abroad are treason, homicide, bigamy, and offences against the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870. There may be others, but these instances will suffice.

The first Act which dealt with a crime committed abroad was, we believe, 33 Hen. 8, c. 23. This enabled persons charged with treason or murder to be tried in any county in whatsoever time or place within the King's dominions or without the offence was considered to be committed. It is curious that although COKE in his definition speaks of a killing within any county of the realm he makes no mention of this statute. We can find no reference in the chapter on murder to the Act or any observations as to the possibility of trying a person in this country for a murder committed abroad. In our opinion, this lends considerable force to the view which has often been advanced in arguments in cases on this subject and by some text writers that his reference to the King's peace in his definition is meant only to except from murder killing in the course of war and,

A possibly, rebellion.

That Act was considered in R. v. Sawyer (1), but a much more detailed report appears in a note to R. v. Serva (2). The prisoner there was indicted for the murder of a woman in Portugal who was said to have been "in the peace of God and our Lord the King". The argument which took place was on the sufficiency of the indictment which, it was said, should have contained an averment that both the prisoner and the victim were British subjects. The case was reserved for the consideration of the twelve judges and, in delivering their opinion, LE BLANC, J., said (2 Car. & Kir. 113):

B

C

"As to the second objection, that it is not alleged that they were British subjects, the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 23, nowhere requires that; but, taking it that the jurisdiction only extended to British subjects, the judges are of opinion that sufficient is stated on the indictment to put the other party on showing the contrary. It states the deceased to be in the peace of our Lord the King, and that the offence was against his peace . . ."

It is to be observed that they gave no opinion whether, if the deceased had not been a British subject, the conviction would have been bad, though it seems that their view was to the contrary by the reference to the statute of Henry VIII which we have quoted. It is also to be observed that in the course of the argument LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., said (ibid., 112):

D

"'Against the peace of the King' applies to the offender: it relates to his capacity to commit the crime."

E

That, of course, is entirely intelligible. Nobody would suggest that an English court could try an alien for an offence not committed on British soil.

That case was heard in 1815, and in 1828 was passed the Offences against the Person Act of that year which provided for the "trial of any of His Majesty's subjects charged in England with murder committed on land out of the United Kingdom whether within the King's dominions or without". Now, it is true that in R. v. Helsham (3), BAYLEY, J., after conferring with BOSANQUET, J., directed an allegation that the prisoner and the deceased were subjects of His Majesty to be inserted in the bill. There was no judgment as to the necessity of the allegation that the deceased was a British subject and the note of the summing-up only shows that it was left to the jury to say whether they were satisfied that the prisoner was a British-born subject. On the other hand, in 1843 in R. v. Azzopardi (4), the prisoner, a British subject being a native of Malta, murdered a Dutch woman in Smyrna. He was tried in this country and the objection was taken that the victim was a foreigner, but the conviction was affirmed. It was, no doubt, to allay any doubts that there may have been on this subject that s. 9 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, is in the wide terms to which we have already referred. It is, therefore, abundantly clear, and, indeed, counsel for the appellant admitted, that, had the appellant been brought to this country and tried here, the question as to the nationality of the victim could not have arisen. We have no doubt that when the word "murder" is found in a statute it has the meaning which has always been attached to it throughout the ages, namely, an unlawful killing with malice aforethought.

F

G

H

We turn now to s. 41 of the Army Act. It is in these terms:

"Subject to such regulations for the purpose of preventing interference with the jurisdiction of the civil courts as are in this Act after mentioned, every person who, whilst he is subject to military law, shall commit any of the offences in this section mentioned shall be deemed to be guilty of an offence against military law, and if charged under this section with any such offence (in this Act referred to as a civil offence) shall be liable to be tried by court-martial, and on conviction to be punished as follows . . .”

Then there follow in separate paragraphs five offences, treason, murder, manslaughter, treason-felony, and rape for which the punishment is prescribed. Paragraph 5 deals with any other offences which, when committed in England, are punishable by the law of England, and provides that a person subject to military law shall “be liable, whether the offence is committed in England or elsewhere, either to suffer such punishment as might be awarded to him in pursuance of this Act in respect of an act to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, or to suffer any punishment assigned for such offence by the law of England.”

There is then a proviso that a person subject to military law shall not be tried by court-martial for any one of the five specified offences committed in any place within His Majesty's dominions other than the United Kingdom and Gibraltar unless the offender was on active service or the place where the offence was committed was more than one hundred miles from any town in which he could be tried by a competent civil court. The object of this proviso, and, indeed, of the regulations as mentioned in the first part of the section, is to ensure that persons charged with these grave offences shall be tried when possible by a civil court and not by a court-martial. It is to prevent any conflict of jurisdiction between civil and military courts.

In our opinion, the plain meaning of the section is that a court-martial can try a person subject to military law for any offence, wherever committed, which would be an offence against the law of England, subject only to this, that the section provides for the trial of the prisoner before a civil court instead of court-martial in the circumstances set out in the section and regulations.

Our attention has been called to passages in the MANUAL OF MILITARY LAW, ch. 6, 1951 ed., pp. 131, 132. It is there stated that it must be proved in the case of murder that the victim was under the Queen's peace and that the army carries the Queen's peace with it wherever it goes. So far as this may appear to assert that an alien who is not at the time of the crime within Her Majesty's dominions or territories is within her peace we cannot assent to it, at least unless the territory has been effectively occupied by her forces. Nevertheless, the legislation to which we have referred enables a subject of Her Majesty to be tried and punished in the courts of this country, or, if subject to military law, by a court-martial abroad, for murder whoever the victim and wherever committed. COKE's definition of murder applies to those cases which were triable in the common law courts of his day, namely, where murder was committed within the realm, though we have already pointed out that that very learned person had, strangely enough, omitted to notice the statute of Henry VIII.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Registrar of the Courts-Martial Appeal Court (for the appellant);
Director of Army Legal Services (for the Crown).

[Reported by T. J. KELLY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

COMPANIA DE NAVIGACION ZITA, S.A. v. LOUIS DREYFUS ET COMPAGNIE.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), October 29, 30, November 9, 1953.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Lay days—Loading—Calculation of lay days.

A A charterparty provided for the calculation of lay time for loading as follows: "Cargo to be loaded and stowed free of expense to owners at an average rate of not less than 150 metric tons per available workable hatch per weather working day (Sundays and holidays excepted) provided vessel can receive at this rate . . ." The vessel in question had five holds, each served by one hatch. At the first port of loading all five hatches were available and workable and were used, but at the second port only three hatches were available and workable, holds Nos. 3 and 5 having been completed at the first port of loading, and later, only two hatches were available and workable, No. 1 hold having by then been completed. On a dispute as to the correct method of calculating the total lay time permitted by the charterparty for loading, the charterers contended that it should be calculated by dividing by one hundred and fifty the largest quantity of cargo loaded into any one of the vessel's holds. The owners contended that the lay time should be calculated by reference to the number of available and workable hatches in the vessel, e.g., so long as there were five available and workable hatches, loading should have proceeded at the average rate of seven hundred and fifty metric tons a day.

D HELD: the clause did not prescribe a method of loading, but set a standard, and the formula used produced a number of days and hours based on the quantity of cargo actually loaded; hatches not available for loading were outside the formula and a matter for separate calculation; and, therefore, the charterers' method of calculating the lay time allowed for loading was correct.

Dictum of HILL, J., in The Sandgate (1929) (99 L.J.P. 13), applied.

E AS TO TIME FOR LOADING, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 30, pp. 337, 341, paras. 519, 522; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 41, pp. 452, 453, Nos. 2836-2840.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Van Liewen v. Hollis Brothers & Co., Ltd., [1920] A.C. 239; 89 L.J.P. 86; 122 L.T. 659; 41 Digest 547, 3747.
F (2) Love & Stewart, Ltd. v. Rowtor S.S. Co., Ltd., [1916] 2 A.C. 527; 86 L.J.P.C. 1; 115 L.T. 415; 41 Digest 310, 1712.
(3) The Sandgate, (1929), 99 L.J.P. 10; affd. C.A., [1930] P. 30; 99 L.J.P. 49; 142 L.T. 356; 35 Com. Cas. 221; Digest Supp.

SPECIAL CASE stated by an umpire.

G By a charterparty dated June 25, 1952, the claimants, as owners of the steamer Corfu Island, and the respondents, as charterers, agreed that the vessel should proceed to one or two safe ports in Algeria and there load a full and complete cargo of nine thousand metric tons of barley in bulk five per cent. more or less at master's option, the charterers to supply a sufficient quantity of cargo in bags for safe stowage as required by the master, but not exceeding five per cent. of the entire cargo, such quantity to be declared in writing by the master before commencing to load. The vessel, being so loaded, was to proceed to one safe port in the United Kingdom and there deliver the cargo. Clause 5 of the charterparty provided:

"Cargo to be loaded and stowed free of expense to owners at an average rate of not less than 150 metric tons per available workable hatch per weather working day (Sundays and holidays excepted) provided vessel can receive at this rate . . .",

Clause 22 provided:

"Dispatch money at the rate of £125 per day or pro rata for part of a day is payable to the charterers for all lay time saved at loading and discharging ports."

Between July 19 and Aug. 5, 1952, the vessel loaded, under the charterparty, 7,950 metric tons of barley at Philippeville and a further fifteen hundred metric tons at Bougie. It was agreed that the lay time used at the two loading ports was eleven days, twenty hours, twenty minutes. There were no interruptions by weather. The charterers deducted from the freight due to the owners £515 8s. 11d. in respect of dispatch money due to them for lay time saved at the loading ports. The owners contended that the charterers were only entitled to £344 ls. 11d. by way of dispatch money, and claimed £171 7s. as freight due and owing to them by the charterers. The dispute between the parties was limited to the question of the correct method of calculating the total lay time permitted by the charterparty for loading. There were five cargo holds in the vessel, each served by one hatch. During the whole of the course of the loading at Philippeville each of the five hatches was available and workable, and was used. During the loading of the first nine hundred metric tons out of the fifteen hundred metric tons of barley loaded at Bougie, only three hatches were available and workable, and were used since loading into the other two holds had been completed at Philippeville. During the loading of the last six hundred metric tons of barley at Bougie only two hatches were available and workable, and were used, a further hold having been completed during the loading of the nine hundred metric tons. The largest quantity of barley loaded into any one of the vessel's five holds was 2,361·768 metric tons. The charterers contended that the lay time for loading should be calculated by dividing by one hundred and fifty the largest quantity of cargo loaded into any one of the vessel's holds, namely, 2,361·768 metric tons, thus giving a total permitted lay time of fifteen days, seventeen hours, fifty-three minutes. On this basis three days, twenty-one hours, thirty-three minutes, of permitted lay time were saved in loading, and the charterers would be entitled to £487 2s. 8d. by way of dispatch money, the difference of £28 6s. 3d. between this sum and the £515 8s. 11d. deducted from freight being due to small differences in calculating the lay time actually used at the two loading ports. The charterers admitted that the owners were entitled to the £28 6s. 3d. The owners contended that lay time for loading should be calculated by reference to the number of available and workable hatches in the vessel. As long as there were five hatches available and workable, loading should have proceeded at the average rate of seven hundred and fifty metric tons a day. When only three hatches were available and workable loading should have proceeded at the average rate of four hundred and fifty metric tons a day, and with only two hatches available and workable the average rate of loading should have been three hundred metric tons a day. Accordingly, they calculated that the permitted lay time for loading was fourteen days, fourteen hours, twenty-four minutes. On this basis, two days, eighteen hours, four minutes, of permitted lay time were saved, and the charterers would be entitled to £344 ls. 11d. only by way of dispatch money. Both parties referred to The Sandgate (3), and the charterers based their case primarily on the last part of the last sentence in the judgment of HILL, J., where he said (99 L.J.P. 13):

" . . . if he [the shipowner] took the quantity in the hold which contains the largest quantity and divided that by 125. That would give you the period in which the discharge had to be carried out, and you would then deduct Sundays and holidays ", from which there was no dissent in the Court of Appeal. The owners contended that the remarks there made were obiter, and, as a matter of mathematics, were only correct if the rate of discharging (or loading) was the same and remained constant at every hatch so long as each was available and workable. Apart from that sentence, the owners argued that the judgments in The Sandgate (3), so far as relevant, supported their case and that under cl. 5 it was the whole cargo, and not only the largest quantity of cargo in any one hold, that had to be loaded at the average rate of not less than one hundred and fifty metric tons per available working hatch per day. Neither party suggested that there was any relevant difference in meaning between "working hatch" in The Sandgate (3), and "available workable hatch" in the present case. The question of law for the decision of the court was whether, on the facts found and on the true construction of the charterparty, the charterers' method of calculating the lay time allowed for loading was correct. The umpire found that if the court should decide this question in the negative, then the charterers should pay the owners £171 7s. Alternatively, if the court should decide the question in the affirmative, then the charterers should pay the owners £28 6s. 3d.

M. R. E. Kerr for the owners.

Eustace Roskill, Q.C., and T. G. Roche for the charterers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 9. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. The charterparty in this case provides, by cl. 5, for the calculation of the lay days in the following terms:

"Cargo to be loaded and stowed free of expense to owners at an average rate of not less than 150 metric tons per available workable hatch per weather working day (Sundays and holidays excepted) provided vessel can receive at this rate . . ."

Other clauses provide in the usual way for the payment of demurrage for time lost and dispatch money for time saved. The question for determination is how, under cl. 5, the lay time should be calculated.

The other material facts are as follows. The vessel is described as carrying about 9,450 metric tons of deadweight cargo. The obligation of the charterers is to load a full and complete cargo of nine thousand metric tons of barley in bulk, five per cent. more or less in master's option, the charterers to supply a sufficient quantity of cargo in bags for safe stowage as required by the master, but not exceeding five per cent. of the entire cargo, such quantity to be declared in writing by the master before commencing to load. The vessel has five holds differing in size, the largest having a capacity of 2,361 tons.

It is well settled that, unless the charterparty otherwise provides, the charterer's obligation to load is that he must do so within a reasonable time. If the charterparty provides for loading within a fixed time, that is, within a specified number of days, it must do so in plain and unambiguous terms: Van Liewen v. Hollis Brothers & Co., Ltd. (1). The charterparty need not specify the number of lay days so long as it specifies the means by which the number can be calculated; thus, a charterparty which specifies a rate at which the loading is to be done is to be treated as a fixed lay day charter: Love & Stewart, Ltd. v. Rowtor S.S. Co., Ltd. (2) ([1916] 2 A.C. 535).

The shipowner's desire is to achieve a quick turn-round; time is money for him. The object of fixing lay days and providing for demurrage and dispatch money is to penalise dilatoriness in loading and to reward promptitude. When a number of lay days is specified, it is, no doubt, calculated on some estimate of the period within which the charterers, working diligently, should be able to load a known quantity of cargo. But it is common enough to find that, although a full and complete cargo is required, the quantity to be loaded cannot be known until it is seen how the stowage is working out; in the present case the weight of cargo may vary by at least as much as ten per cent. according to stowage factors which are in the discretion of the master. A fairer and more accurate method of fixing the lay time is, therefore, to fix a daily rate of loading. The clause in this case introduces a further refinement. Instead of providing simply for a rate per day, it provides for a rate per hatch per day. If all the holds were of equal capacity this refinement would be unnecessary. If they were loaded at the same working rate they would then all be finished simultaneously, and with five holds you might just as well say seven hundred and fifty tons per day as one hundred and fifty tons per day per hold. But if they are not of the same capacity one hold will be finished before the others. If when, say, half the holds are filled, the charterer had to carry on at the same daily rate, he would have to double the rate on each of the unfilled holds, and that would be unreasonable, if not impossible; thus, the necessity for the rate per "workable hatch".

It is common ground that the word "workable" is intended to describe the state of a hatch that can still be worked because its hold is not yet full: see The Sandgate (3). By this means the daily rate is reduced by one hundred and fifty as each hold is filled. It follows, however, that if all goes smoothly and all the hatches are "available"—i.e., there is nothing to prevent their being used—the time taken to load the ship will be the time taken to load the largest hold. So the charterers say that the calculation required by cl. 5 can be conveniently expressed by saying that you get the lay time by dividing by one hundred and fifty the largest quantity of cargo loaded in any one hold. For this they have the authority of HILL, J., in The Sandgate (3), where he says (99 L.J.P. 13):

"I suppose, worked out most accurately, you would take those several quantities [the quantity in each hold] and start with 500 and go on reducing to 375 [the rate in that case was 125 tons per working hatch per day], reducing to 250, and finally 125, but you get exactly the same result, and the shipowner would have no difficulty in doing the arithmetic, if he took the quantity in the hold which contains the largest quantity and divided that by 125. That would give you the period in which the discharge had to be carried out, and you would then deduct Sundays and holidays."

Counsel for the owners objects that HILL, J.'s simplification—or at any rate the application of it to the clause in this case—is incorrect. It is based, he says, on two assumptions, neither of which is justified by the terms of the clause. It assumes, first, that all the holds are always available, and, secondly, that they will all be loaded at the same rate at the same time. In the course of his excellent argument, counsel for the owners produced a set of figures to illustrate what would happen if either of these assumptions was vitiated. These hypothetical figures are conveniently arranged in multiples of one hundred and fifty. They show a far greater discrepancy between the capacities of the different holds than would be likely in practice, but the magnification helps to clarify the point. The figures assume a total capacity of three thousand tons divided as follows: No. 1, three hundred; No. 2, four hundred and fifty; No. 3, six hundred; No. 4, seven hundred and fifty; and No. 5, nine hundred. On these figures, it would take six days to load the largest hold, and, on the charterers' construction, that would be the lay time. But if No. 5 hold was not available for, say, the first five days, the ship could not be loaded under eleven days; nevertheless, on the charterers' formula they would have to pay demurrage for all days over six. The accuracy of the formula depends, therefore, counsel says, on an unwarrantable assumption of availability.

The other assumption which counsel says is unwarranted is that the loading of all the holds will be started simultaneously and continued uninterruptedly until they are filled. There may be sound commercial reasons why the charterers should concentrate at first on one or two holds, and there is nothing in cl. 5 to prohibit their doing so. If they were to load each day at the contract rate—i.e., at seven hundred and fifty a day, reducing by one hundred and fifty as each hold was filled—and take the holds in order from No. 1 upwards, it would be five days before they reached No. 5, so that the result would be the same as if No. 5 were unavailable for the first five days, namely, eleven days. Of course, that is an extreme example, but, says counsel, it is inevitable in ordinary working that there will not be exactly simultaneous loading; therefore, you must not assume that the holds will be loaded evenly but must ascertain how, on any given occasion, they are, in fact, loaded, and make your calculation in accordance with what actually happens and not with an impracticable assumption of what may happen. The owners' calculation on the facts of this case is set out in the case.

A There is, I think, an overwhelming objection to the owners' construction of the clause. It is that, on that construction, the number of lay days depends on the way in which the charterers choose to load the vessel. There may possibly be good reasons why they should load one hold after the other, but there may also be bad ones, and on the owners' construction there is no way of distinguishing between excusable delay and wanton delay. The charterers may adopt the method of loading hold by hold through defective organisation or indolence, or for no better reason than that they want to irritate the owners by delaying the ship, and they may thereby detain her unnecessarily for a substantial period without being liable for demurrage. That is to defeat the whole object of the clause. Counsel for the owners concedes that, under his construction, the charterers could be lacking in diligence without being made to pay for it (counsel for the charterers put forward a number of examples to illustrate this), but says that, as that is the only meaning of the words the parties have adopted, there is an end of the argument. I do not accept that. The paramount object of the clause is to penalise the charterers for wasting time and reward them for saving it, and, if the literal construction of the words permits them to waste time with impunity, I should be tempted to hold that the clause could not satisfy the test of plainness and unambiguity which the authorities lay down. But I am not driven to that conclusion, for I think that the criticisms of counsel for the owners of the charterers' construction are misconceived. The fundamental error in them is that they treat cl. 5 as if it were laying down a method of loading. If it were, it would be appropriate to suggest that it should not be construed as requiring the charterers to load each hold each day at exactly the same rate and for exactly the same time. Clause 5, in my opinion, is not prescribing a method but setting a standard; it is drawing a notional line above which there will be a bonus and below a penalty. It is as irrelevant to try to verify the standard by reference to actual experience as it would be to search for physical objects to verify the line of the equator. There is nothing in the language of cl. 5 to require the charterers to load all the hatches together any more than there is to require them to load each hold individually, or to prohibit them from taking either course. But it is reasonable to think that the standard set will be one which assumes that, as far as possible, work will go on simultaneously on all the holds, because that is the way that is most economical of the ship's time. It is unreasonable to think that the standard set would allow the charterers to load in any way they chose, because it would then give no incentive to them to choose a time-saving method. Of course, in practice, there will be hitches and an even flow will never be attained, but that is not really saying any more than that lay days are never exactly filled, and the voyage has yet to be made in which the charterer neither earns any dispatch money nor pays any demurrage.

H The criticism that the formula does not take into account the possibility that a hold will not be available is met by the answer of counsel for the charterers that it is not meant to. The formula produces a number of days and hours based on the quantity of cargo actually loaded: it takes the place of a number fixed in advance on the quantity of the cargo estimated to be loaded. Both figures are arrived at on the assumption of good weather and are equally at the mercy of such events as bad weather or the unavailability of hatches. Unavailability is, therefore, outside the formula and a matter for a separate calculation. One takes the formula figure just as one would take a specified number of lay days and make the appropriate deductions, where necessary, for Sundays and holidays and bad weather and unavailability of hatches. It is not irrelevant to observe that the unavailability must be something that matters, i.e., it must interfere with the work. If, for example, a hatch broke down after a hold had been completely loaded, it clearly would not matter. If, on the figures of counsel for the owners, No. 1 hatch broke down at the beginning for, say, four days, equally it would not matter, for it would not be long enough to prevent the loading of the hold within the standard time.

The final objection of counsel for the owners is that, if the lay time is the time it takes to fill the largest hold at the rate of one hundred and fifty tons a day, it would be simple to say so. Why does not the clause confine itself to that hold? I can certainly think of ways—particularly in relation to the effect of the non-availability provision—in which the clause might have been expressed more clearly. I do not think, however, that it could be done simply by a reference to the largest hold. If any other hold is initially unavailable, the loading of that hold and not of the largest hold may become the determining factor. It is not, therefore, a case of a simple statement being inexplicably avoided, and the fact that the charterers' meaning could have been more artistically expressed is not, in a charterparty, an argument against it. It is, as expressed, a difficult clause, as SCRUTTON, L.J., said in The Sandgate (3) (99 L.J.P. 50); but it has remained in use for over twenty years since then, and the charterers' construction gives effect to it in the terms stated by HILL, J., and in terms which, for the reasons given, I think are consistent with the nature and language of the clause.

For these reasons I answer in the affirmative the question stated in the Case and uphold the alternative award, the charterers to have the costs of the setting down and hearing of the Case.

Solicitors: Holman, Fenwick & Willan (for the owners); Richards, Butler & Co. (for the charterers).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

GRIFFITHS v. EVANS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), October 21, 22, 23, November 10, 1953.]

Solicitor—Negligence—Solicitor consulted by injured workman in respect of accident—Advice as to workmen's compensation—Failure to advise in respect of common law rights.

Workmen's Compensation—Election—Claim by workman's solicitor for compensation under Workmen's Compensation Acts—Workman not informed of common law remedy—Right to recover damages at common law—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 29 (1).

On Feb. 3, 1947, a workman, in the course of his employment, suffered injuries to his foot and leg caused by the breaking of the wire rope of a lift. Thereafter, his employers made him weekly payments of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943. In or about March or April, 1947, the workman consulted a solicitor professionally to advise him in respect of the accident. The solicitor took the view that he was being asked only to advise as to the amount of the compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943, and he subsequently claimed compensation on the basis of the partial incapacity of the workman and entered into negotiations for a lump sum payment in settlement. The workman was dissatisfied with the result of the negotiations, and consulted other solicitors. The workman now claimed that the solicitor was negligent in not advising him as to his rights at common law.

HELD (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente): it could not be said that the solicitor, being asked to advise specifically on compensation under the statutes, was negligent in not advising as to common law rights.

Per DENNING, L.J.: a claim to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943, made by a solicitor on behalf of a workman constitutes an election by the workman under s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1925 so as to preclude a claim at common law, even though the solicitor has not informed the workman of his possible alternative remedy at common law.

Medcalf v. Samuel Jones & Co., Ltd. ([1951] 1 T.L.R. 832), approved.

AS TO LIABILITY OF SOLICITORS FOR NEGLIGENCE, see HALSBURY, Halsham Edn., Vol. 31, pp. 131-139, paras. 178-183; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 42, pp. 107, 108, Nos. 1013-1028.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Selwood v. Townley Coal & Fireclay Co., Ltd., [1939] 4 All E.R. 34; [1940] 1 K.B. 180; 109 L.J.K.B. 8; 161 L.T. 323; 32 B.W.C.C. 238; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd., [1946] 1 All E.R. 98; [1946] A.C. 163; 115 L.J.K.B. 63; 174 L.T. 39; 38 B.W.C.C. 48; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Leathley v. Fowler (John) & Co., Ltd., [1946] 2 All E.R. 326; [1946] K.B. 579; 115 L.J.K.B. 424; 175 L.T. 212; 39 B.W.C.C. 86; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Medcalf v. Samuel Jones & Co., Ltd., [1951] 1 T.L.R. 832; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Reeve v. Van Den Bergh (July 10, 1950), unreported.
- (6) Hillyard v. Porn & Dunwoody, Ltd. (July 12, 1950), unreported.
- (7) Crossley v. Crouther, (1851), 9 Hare, 384; 21 L.J.Ch. 565; 18 L.T.O.S. 181; 68 E.R. 556; 42 Digest 50, 405.
- (8) Re Paine, (1912), 28 T.L.R. 201; 42 Digest 50, 408.
- (9) Re Newen, [1903] 1 Ch. 812; 72 L.J.Ch. 356; 88 L.T. 264; 42 Digest 66, 582.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., at Stafford Assizes, dated Mar. 6, 1953.

On Feb. 3, 1947, the plaintiff, who was employed as a cupola charger by Messrs. John Thompson (Wolverhampton), Ltd., suffered an accident while at work caused by the breaking of the wire rope of a lift which resulted in injury to his foot and leg. Thereafter and until July, 1947, the employers made payments of compensation to the plaintiff amounting to £2 15s. per week, under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943. In or about March or April, 1947, the plaintiff consulted the defendant, a solicitor, professionally to advise him in respect of the accident, full details of which he gave to the defendant, and told him that he was in receipt of compensation from the employers. Thereupon the defendant told the plaintiff that he was receiving the maximum amount of compensation and advised him to wait until the employers' insurance company attempted to reduce the amount. The insurance company then gave notice to terminate the compensation and the defendant claimed compensation for partial incapacity, which was duly paid over the next following three years. The defendant ultimately negotiated for a lump sum of £250, with which the plaintiff was dissatisfied. The plaintiff brought the present proceedings against the defendant, alleging that the defendant had been negligent in that it was the duty of the defendant to consider whether the plaintiff had a claim for damages at common law against his employers or whether his claim was limited to one under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943. He alleged, further, that the defendant had negligently failed to consider or advise him as to his common law rights and that as a result thereof, he had lost his right of action against the employers. The defendant in his defence denied that he had been negligent and contended that he had been asked for advice, not in respect of the accident generally, but solely as to the amount of compensation under the Acts. The judge, accepting the defendant's evidence; found that there was no negligence and gave judgment for the defendant.

Ryder Richardson, Q.C., and Garrard for the plaintiff.
Eveleigh and Popplewell for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 10. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., in which the plaintiff claimed damages for negligence against a solicitor. The learned judge found for the defendant, but assessed damages in case the Court of Appeal should reverse his decision on liability. The plaintiff appeals and submits that the learned judge was wrong on both liability and quantum.

The plaintiff worked as a cupola charger for Messrs. John Thompson (Wolverhampton), Ltd. On Feb. 3, 1947, he had an accident while at work. In his statement of claim he alleges that the accident was occasioned by the negligence or breach of statutory duty of his employers, and that is admitted for the purposes of these proceedings. I will read para. 5 which sets out his complaint against the defendant.

"In or about the months of March or April, 1947, the plaintiff consulted the defendant professionally to advise him, the plaintiff, in respect of his accident hereinbefore described and it was accordingly the duty of the defendant to consider as to whether the plaintiff had a claim for damages at common law against his said employers or whether his claim was limited to one under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943. The defendant negligently failed to consider or if he did consider negligently failed to advise the plaintiff as to his common law rights and was content that the plaintiff should receive compensation pursuant to the said Workmen's Compensation Acts."

Then it goes on to allege that he had lost his right of action. The defence was that the defendant had not been asked to advise in respect of the accident but simply as to the amount of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. This will become clearer when I refer to the defendant's evidence. The plaintiff was in hospital and his foot or leg were in plaster-of-Paris for some time and the effects of the accident continue. The employer made weekly payments, at what was calculated to be the maximum rate under the Act, from the time of the accident until July. The plaintiff's evidence was that he had asked the defendant some six weeks after the accident to take his case on. The defendant's account differs both as to the date of the first visit and the instructions he received. It is plain from the learned judge's judgment that he accepted the defendant's sworn evidence in full, which was, indeed, both as to the date and as to the instructions corroborated by the defendant's own record. The question is whether on his own evidence and record he was guilty of negligence.

The plaintiff went to see the defendant first on July 11, 1947, some five months after the accident. He was at that time, as I have stated, receiving the maximum under the Act, but had reason to believe that these payments were about to be reduced in amount. I will read the defendant's own account of the matter.

"Q.—Will you tell his Lordship what it was that Mr. Griffiths asked you to do for him? A.—Mr. Griffiths consulted me about his workmen's compensation—his weekly payment—as he was under an impression that there was going to be some reduction, or some alteration in the amount. I took details of his accident, etc., as I always did in a workmen's compensation matter, and as he has said here I told him, as he was receiving the maximum compensation, to carry on receiving that amount, and should there be any difficulty or any question arise to report to me immediately.

Q.—Did he at any time ask you to advise him generally as to his rights against his employers? A.—Never in any shape or form. The whole gist of this matter was purely the amount of his weekly payments of compensation and, a little later on, to negotiate to try to settle for a lump sum—the usual run of most workmen's compensation cases. CROOM-

A JOHNSON, J.: Did that come to anything? A.—It was unsuccessful. The limit to which I arrived with the insurance company, by way of a safe maximum, was £250, and the man, quite rightly, wanted much more. His idea was £1,000. Q.—So those broke off? A.—Yes. The matter was still proceeding when the man came one morning into my office and said could he have his papers as his union were then going to take up the matter for him, and then Messrs. Thompson's came on the scene. Counsel for the defendant: And was that in July, 1950, some three years after he first saw you? A.—Yes, I think so. The date on the letter will prove that."

Before citing some of the answers from the cross-examination I will refer to the instruction sheet. After the name of the employers these words occur:

C "Wire rope of lift broke—I came down on lift with barrow—compound fracture os calcis—Mr. Freeman at hospital—he says never be able to do this work again."

D There then followed the name of the midland employers which refers to the insurers and a reference number. Then are the words "paying comp. £2 15s." and, in capital letters, "Wait". The defendant, Mr. Evans, in advising the plaintiff to wait, of course had in mind s. 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. In fact, on July 30 a notice under s. 12 (3) was received by the plaintiff, who consulted the defendant and negotiations were carried on as to the quantum of the payment from time to time.

E It is submitted, on the part of the plaintiff, that the reference to the breaking of the rope should have put the defendant on inquiry. He should have followed up the question whether the plaintiff had not a claim under the Factories Act, 1937 or at common law and whether he had considered the matter and realised the alternative possibility. The plaintiff had not considered the matter, nor had he had any previous advice. Reliance is placed by the plaintiff on an answer given by the defendant when he said that the breaking of the rope might well indicate negligence. As to his state of mind when he was taking down the facts which appear on the instruction sheet I will read three questions and answers F in his cross-examination.

G "Counsel for the plaintiff: If this employer had been very careless, did it occur to you that the workman would have a right to common law damages? A.—At that time that proposition did not enter my mind. Q.—Why not? A.—As the man only discussed with me the question of his weekly payment of compensation and the possibility of some interference with it. Q.—But why did it not occur to you that he probably had a common law right? A.—I am telling you the fact as it was in my mind at that time. It did not come into my mind because the man was discussing with me the question of his weekly payments of compensation, and there was some possibility of some interference with those weekly payments."

H It was later suggested to him that he had considered the possibility of a claim at common law but had not pursued it believing that the acceptance of the weekly payments over some months would have precluded the plaintiff from claiming. He did not agree with that. His mind had not reached that stage.

The learned judge found that the defendant was not guilty of negligence. It is submitted that that decision was coloured by the learned judge's assumption that the plaintiff had already lost his rights at common law by accepting the payments. That, of course, was assumed to be the law over a long period, but it had ceased to be so in 1947 as a result of decisions to which I will refer in a moment. There is a passage, perhaps more than one, which indicates that the learned judge was proceeding on this basis, and this might well have coloured his finding as to negligence. In any case, however, where, as here, the defendant's evidence is accepted in full and an appellant plaintiff is prepared to argue his case on the basis that the defendant made a favourable impression on the judge, the difficulties which sometimes arise when this court is asked to reverse a finding of negligence or no negligence are absent. It is, I think, unnecessary to read the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 29, which confers the option to proceed at common law or for compensation. In Selwood v. Townley Coal & Fireclay Co., Ltd. (1) this court held that as the workman had been paid compensation known to be such under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, even although he had made no claim for compensation, he was precluded under s. 29 (1) of that Act from recovering damages from his employers at common law. In Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (2) s. 29 was considered. The workman in that case had accepted payments, without knowing of his rights at common law, over a period and this would have barred his claim at common law if Selwood's case (1) had been rightly decided. At a later period, he had come to know of the choice given to him by s. 29 (1) and with that knowledge had continued to receive the compensation until he returned to work. The House of Lords was unanimous in holding that what had happened in this latter period constituted an election. All the noble and learned Lords did, however, consider whether the receipt of payments before knowledge was sufficient or, in other words, whether Selwood's case (1) was rightly decided. VISCOUNT SIMON, LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN and LORD PORTER held that Selwood's case (1) was wrongly decided. LORD SIMONDS and LORD MACMILLAN held that it was rightly decided. In Leathley v. John Fowler & Co., Ltd. (3) it was argued before this court that Selwood's case (1) and other cases which had laid down or applied a similar principle were still good law on the ground that all the observations in the House of Lords on this topic were obiter. This court decided that as each of their Lordships had dealt with this matter this court ought to apply the opinion of the majority. Selwood's case (1) was, therefore, overruled as from that date. Leathley's case (3) was not cited to the learned judge, but I think, in considering the question of negligence, it is relevant to bear in mind the somewhat unfortunate history of judicial decisions on the application of s. 29 to the facts as they existed when the plaintiff consulted the defendant.

I have found the question of negligence a difficult one. I think the defendant, being wise after the event, may well reproach himself for not having gone outside the question put to him and made inquiries as to the accident generally. The variety of matters with which a solicitor has to have some familiarity increases annually. The case may well be on the border-line, but I am not satisfied that the plaintiff has made out a case of negligence. If such a case had been made out, counsel for the defendant submitted that no damage had resulted and that the plaintiff's employers would have had no answer under s. 29 to a claim if put forward, and which we understand may still be put forward, today. It is unnecessary for me to consider that issue. We were referred to Medcalf v. Samuel Jones & Co., Ltd. (4), a decision by LORD GODDARD, C.J., who held that an injured workman who had consulted solicitors as to his rights generally must be taken to have exercised his option under s. 29 if the solicitors claimed compensation under the Act, although they had not informed him of his possible alternative remedy at common law. In that decision the Lord Chief Justice distinguished a decision of ORMEROD, J., Reeve v. Van Den Bergh (5), in which the solicitors had been consulted as to the quantum of compensation only. We have a transcript of the judgment of ORMEROD, J., and also a decision of BARRY, J., in 1950 in Hillyard v. Porn & Dunwoody, Ltd. (6), which contains some observations which, I think, are in conflict with Medcalf's case (4). If a claim against the employers is proceeded with these cases may well become relevant to the issue and I do not, therefore, think it would be right to make any comment on them. For the reasons, I have stated I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: The duty of a solicitor depends, of course, very much on what he is employed to do. In this case the solicitor says that he was employed solely for the purpose of a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, and, therefore, he was under no duty to consider the possibility of a common law claim, whereas the workman says that he employed the solicitor to conduct his case for compensation without specifying whether it was under the Acts or not, leaving it to the solicitor to do the best he could for him and, therefore, the solicitor ought to have considered the possibility of a claim at common law. On this question of retainer, I would observe that where there is a difference between a solicitor and his client on it, the courts have said for the last hundred years or more that the word of the client is to be preferred to the word of the solicitor, or, at any rate, more weight is to be given to it: see Crossley v. Crouther (7), per SIR GEORGE J. TURNER, V.-C.; Re Paine (8), per WARRINGTON, J. The reason is plain. It is because the client is ignorant and the solicitor is, or should be, learned. If the solicitor does not take the precaution of getting a written retainer, he has only himself to thank for being at variance with his client over it and must take the consequences.

In the present case, the judge found there was no conflict on the retainer. The judge said in terms that the workman was giving the best account of these matters that he could and that he did not find anything inconsistent in the workman's evidence with the account given by the solicitor. Nor do I. I think that the two accounts come to this. The workman went to the solicitor and said: "Will you take on my case?" The solicitor said: "What have you done?" The workman said: "I have had an accident at work. The wire rope of the lift broke." He gave full details of the accident and then went on to say: "My employers' insurance company have been paying me £2 15s. compensation and I think they are going to try to reduce it". Thereupon the solicitor told him that he was receiving the maximum compensation and should wait until the insurance company made a move to reduce it. The solicitor said that it did not enter his head to consider a right to common law damages. He thereafter treated the case as solely a workman's compensation case. When the insurance company did give notice to terminate the compensation, the solicitor wrote to them saying:

"William Griffiths & John Thompson (Wolverhampton), Ltd. Mr. William Griffiths has now placed this matter in my hands and I enclose his doctor's certificate."

The solicitor thereafter claimed compensation for partial incapacity and agreed the amount of it from time to time, and it was duly paid for over three years. Eventually, the solicitor negotiated for a lump sum settlement of the workman's compensation payments at a figure of £250. These negotiations had not concluded when the workman, disappointed with the figure, went to other solicitors.

On those quite simple facts, the question is whether the solicitor did his duty by the client. In particular, ought he to have considered whether the man had a claim at common law? I am clearly of opinion that he should have done so. When a workman goes to a solicitor and tells him he has had an accident and wants the solicitor to take on the case, the very first question the solicitor ought to put to himself is this. What is the man's legal position? Every solicitor ought to know that there is all the difference in the world between a case where the employer is to blame and a case where he is not. If the employer is not to blame, the man only gets workman's compensation. If the employer is to blame, either for negligence or for breach of statutory duty, the man gets the much higher award given by the common law. I cannot think it is right for the solicitor to escape by saying: "You only consulted me about workman's compensation, not about common law damages". That attributes to the workman a legal knowledge of the difference between them. Many workmen do not in fact know the difference, and it would be most unfair to attribute such knowledge to them. This workman certainly did not. All he knew was that he was receiving weekly payments from his employers or their insurance company and that he was receiving them as compensation for his accident. It was not for him to know the difference between compensation under the Acts and compensation at common law, but it was the business of the solicitor to know it, and to know also, in those days, that the workman had an option to claim one or other which, once exercised, could not be retracted. If the workman had, indeed, known of the difference, and with that knowledge had consulted the solicitor about workmen's compensation only, pursuing that claim alone, then his conduct might itself have been an exercise by him of his option. He would have chosen for himself to receive workmen's compensation and not common law damages. But it was not suggested before us that he had any such knowledge. It was accepted by both parties that when he went to his solicitor he was ignorant of his rights and had not lost his option. The judge was in error in thinking the man had already lost his option by the mere fact of accepting payments. If this solicitor had considered, even for a moment, what were the rights of this man, he would have been bound to come to the conclusion that the man had a good claim at common law. The accident was caused by the breaking of the lift rope, which was a plain breach of the Factory Acts. But the solicitor did not consider it at all. He agreed the workman's compensation with the employers' insurance company and thought nothing about the common law.

A most critical question is: What is the effect of the solicitor's conduct? Does it mean that the man, through his solicitor, has exercised his option? Does it mean, if he should now sue his employers for damages, he would fail on the ground that he had already chosen to take workmen's compensation? There is a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., Medcalf v. Samuel Jones & Co., Ltd. (4), which goes far to show that the solicitor's action binds the man and he cannot now claim against his employers, although there are earlier decisions of two other judges which rather point to the contrary: ORMEROD, J., in Reeve v. Van Den Bergh (5), and BARRY, J., in Hillyard v. Porn & Dunwoody, Ltd. (6). This question, like so many others, depends very much on how you look at it. From the man's point of view it would seem hard that, when he did not know of his option, he should be bound by what his solicitor has done, but from the employers' point of view, it would seem that they should be entitled to assume that the solicitor had advised the man as to his rights and that he had elected to take compensation. The Lord Chief Justice in Medcalf v. Jones (4) expressed his opinion in these words ([1951] 1 T.L.R. 836):

"... when an employer has been asked formally . . . to admit a claim for compensation and has done so, surely it is not for him to ask the solicitor what advice he has given to his client and whether he has made him aware of his alternative claims . . . In my opinion, where a workman who has sought legal advice puts forward a claim through his solicitor for compensation and accepts it he cannot afterwards say that he did not know of the option which the Act of 1925 gives him and claim damages."

BARRY, J., in Hillyard v. Porn & Dunwoody (6), put the same view most cogently, although he did not give effect to it in that case, having regard to the very special facts which he had to consider. He said:

"During the course of the argument it seemed to me a most unfortunate position that a workman who consults solicitors and authorises them to conduct negotiations with his employers on his behalf should be able, after a long period of time, to say that, although he had sought legal advice, yet those whose advice he had sought had not told him of all the relevant considerations which should be present in his mind. It seems to me that if a workman can say, after he has been instructing solicitors for a long period of time, that the solicitors failed to tell him of his alternative rights, the employers are placed in a position of very grave difficulty. It is, I think, virtually impossible for them to produce evidence which might tend to contradict the workman's statement and any investigation as to the confidential discussion between a solicitor and his client seems to me to be an unfortunate matter for the court to have to undertake, irrespective of any question of privilege."

In this situation, I must say that I agree with the Lord Chief Justice. It must be remembered that, in an action by the man against his employers, the conversations between the man and his solicitor are privileged. If the man asserts that he did not know of his option, the employers cannot call the solicitor to contradict him. They cannot even ask the solicitor what advice he gave to his client. The conversations are privileged. If the law imposes on the employers such a handicap in meeting the claim, surely it will give them a corresponding relief. It will hold the man bound by everything done by his solicitor within his ostensible authority. It will assume that the solicitor has done what it is his duty to do and what any careful solicitor would do, i.e., tell the workman of his option. If the solicitor thereafter on the man's behalf makes an agreement for workman's compensation, the law will assume that he does it with the man's authority and with knowledge of his option. If it should turn out that the solicitor has not done his duty, that should not affect the employers who acted on the faith of his authority. It should be a matter to be thrashed out between the man and his solicitor, for it is only in proceedings between them that it can be thrashed out free of privilege. It has often been said that a solicitor is the agent of his client in all matters that may reasonably be expected to arise for decision in the cause: Re Newen (9). There can be no doubt that the exercise of an option is a matter that may reasonably be expected to arise for decision. The man is, therefore, bound by what the solicitor does in regard to it.

If the reasoning of the Lord Chief Justice is correct, then it follows that this man has, by his solicitor's action, been deprived of his claim against his employer. He has been deprived of well over £1,000. I reckon it at £1,290. Surely, in those circumstances, he should have a remedy against his solicitor? I realise that the solicitor's reputation is at stake. We must be very careful of that, but we should remember also that the solicitor's profession will suffer more if the members of it make mistakes which they ought not to make, and cause loss for which no remedy is given. Even if the reasoning of the Lord Chief Justice is not correct, it must at least make it very difficult for the man to succeed against his employers, at any rate in a court of first instance. I doubt whether anyone can say with certainty, short of the House of Lords, whether the Lord Chief Justice was right or wrong, and even the House of Lords may be divided on it, as they were on an analogous point in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (2). Yet all this difficulty is due to what the solicitor has done. The man is left now with a claim against his employers which is disputable, and is, indeed, disputed, instead of being undisputed, as it would otherwise have been. I do not think the man can recover the full amount from the solicitor because allowances must be made for the chance that he may still recover from the employers. We were told that his present solicitors have already issued a writ against the employers so as to save the Limitation Act, 1939, from running. I think the damages recoverable from the solicitor must be assessed by taking into account the inconvenience and expense to which he will be put in suing the employers and the risk of failure. I would assess the damages at £600 and give judgment for the man accordingly. I would allow this appeal.

ROMER, L.J.: The relevant evidence which the defendant gave at the trial with regard to the instructions which he received from the plaintiff in July, 1947, has been fully stated in the judgment which SOMERVELL, L.J., has delivered. This evidence was accepted by the learned judge and the gist of it was that the plaintiff consulted Mr. Evans, the defendant, solely with regard to the anticipated reduction in the plaintiff's weekly payments of compensation, and, later, as to a redemption of such payments, and that the plaintiff never in any shape or form asked the defendant to advise him generally as to his rights against the employers. The plaintiff's case is that the defendant was nevertheless at fault in not applying his mind to the position generally, and, in particular, in not advising the plaintiff that he had, or might have, a right of action against his employers at common law. This contention was rejected by the learned judge and the plaintiff has not persuaded me that the judge's conclusion was wrong.

The employers started to make the weekly payments to the plaintiff shortly after the accident which befell him in February, 1947. When he went to see the defendant in the following July, he was still receiving them, and, as the defendant ascertained, they were at the maximum amount to which the plaintiff was entitled by virtue of the Workmen's Compensation Acts. The plaintiff never entertained, nor in any way communicated either directly or indirectly to the defendant, any dissatisfaction with the nature or amount of these weekly payments. The only thing that troubled him was the belief that in the near future the employers were intending to diminish them. That was the problem which was weighing on his mind and which he took to the defendant for solution. The statutory provision which was relevant to this question is the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 12, and is the provision to which the defendant's mind would naturally be directed. It prescribes the circumstances in which it is permissible for weekly payments to be discontinued or reduced by employers. The section is directed to one particular aspect of the compensation legislation, but the aspect is a large one which has given rise to many reported cases and s. 12 is attended by no fewer than sixteen pages of notes in WILLIS ON THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS, 37th ed.

The problem which the plaintiff presented to the defendant came within this special and potentially difficult field of inquiry, and I cannot think that it was negligent of the defendant not to apply his mind to another, and totally different, field as well. The plaintiff had received the weekly payments for months and an agreement (albeit implied and unrecorded) was constituted between himself and his employers in such circumstances that, as the law was believed to be before the decision in Young's case (2), the option conferred by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 29, would no longer have remained open to the plaintiff. In the light of the majority of speeches in that case, the option did in fact remain open, but questions as to its existence and exercise were, as it seems to me, altogether distinct from, and unconnected with, the issue on which, and on which alone, the plaintiff sought the professional advice of the defendant. The plaintiff said in his evidence that he asked the defendant to advise him on his position generally; and, indeed, if, in fact, he had wanted general advice nothing could have been easier than for him to have asked for it. But his recollection in this respect was wrong and he did not ask for it and the defendant did not give it, and the plaintiff has not satisfied me that the defendant's omission in this respect amounted to an actionable neglect of his professional duty to the plaintiff.

Having regard to the conclusion which I have expressed on the question of negligence it is unnecessary for me to indicate an opinion as to what (if any) damages should be awarded to the plaintiff if he had established a breach of duty on the part of the defendant, and, in view of possible future events, I prefer to refrain from doing so. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: W. H. Thompson (for the plaintiff); William Charles Crocker (for the defendant).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

SMITH AND OTHERS v. CARDIFF CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.),
October 30, November 2, 3, 4, 1953.]

Practice—Parties—Representative action—Suit on behalf of “numerous persons having same interest”—Tenants of council houses—Proposal to increase rents of some tenants—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9.

A In accordance with their obligations under the Housing Act, 1936, Part V, the defendants, as local authority, provided houses to over thirteen thousand tenants under weekly tenancy agreements. On or about June 8, 1953, the defendants resolved to introduce a differential rent scheme which involved an increase of rent according to the ability to pay of each tenant having regard to his financial circumstances. Under the scheme some B tenants would have to pay an increase of 12s. 6d. per week, whilst the rents of other tenants would remain unchanged. The plaintiffs, being four tenants, and “suing on behalf of themselves and all other tenants of houses provided by the defendants under Part V of the Housing Act, 1936,” issued a writ against the defendants, claiming a declaration that the rent scheme was ultra vires and void, and an injunction to restrain the defend-C ants from carrying out the scheme. On a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ,

Held: to bring the case within the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 16,
r. 9, and to enable the action to be constituted as a representative action the plaintiffs must show that all the members of the class on whose behalf they sued had a common interest in a common subject-matter, that all had a common grievance, and that the relief was in its nature beneficial to them all; the scheme by its nature involved the affluent “subsidising” the less affluent tenants, and so, apart from those in an intermediate position, there were two distinct classes of tenants whose interests were in conflict, viz., those who would benefit by having to pay no increase and those who would have to pay the maximum increase of rent; without deciding whether or not the thirteen thousand tenants had a common interest, the relief sought was not in its nature beneficial to them all; and, therefore, R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, could not apply, but the writ would be amended by striking out the reference that the plaintiffs were suing in a representative capacity, so that they would proceed as individuals and the action be treated as a test action.

F Dictum of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Bedford (Duke) v. Ellis ([1901] A.C. 7), applied.

AS TO PERSONS SUING IN A REPRESENTATIVE CAPACITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, p. 17, para. 14; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Practice, pp. 415-420, Nos. 1131-1164.

G FOR THE HOUSING ACT, 1936, Part V, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, pp. 513-541.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Belcher v. Reading Corpn., [1949] 2 All E.R. 969; [1950] Ch. 380; 114 J.P. 21; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Morrison S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Greystoke Castle (Cargo Owners), [1946] 2 All E.R. 696; [1947] A.C. 265; [1947] L.J.R. 297; 176 L.T. 66; 2nd Digest Supp.
- H (3) Bedford (Duke) v. Ellis, [1901] A.C. 1; 70 L.J.Ch. 102; 83 L.T. 686; 33 Digest 529, 68.
- (4) Price v. Rhondda Urban Council, [1923] 2 Ch. 372; 93 L.J.Ch. 1; 88 J.P. 69; 19 Digest 604, 302.
- (5) Jones v. Cory Bros. & Co., Ltd., Thomas v. Great Mountain Collieries Co., (1921), 56 L.Jo. 302; 152 L.T.Jo. 70; Digest, Practice, 416, 1137.
- (6) Colman v. Eastern Counties Ry. Co., (1846), 10 Beav. 1; 16 L.J.Ch. 73; 8 L.T.O.S. 530; 50 E.R. 481; 38 Digest 249, 1.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs against an order of GLYN-JONES, J., sitting as vacation judge, dated Aug. 12, 1953.

The defendants, as local authority, had provided housing accommodation under the Housing Act, 1936, Part V, for over thirteen thousand tenants, all of whom held under agreements in substantially the same terms except as to rent. On or about June 8, 1953, the defendants decided to adopt a "differential rent scheme", which involved the payment by different classes of tenants of differing amounts of rent, the maximum increase to be 12s. 6d. per week in the case of a tenant in receipt of a gross income of £600 or more per annum. In furtherance of this scheme a circular dated June 26, 1953, was sent to each tenant containing a questionnaire whereby each tenant was required to give full information as to his financial circumstances—his own income and that of any members of his family residing with him, the number of lodgers or sub-tenants, and so forth—and requiring him to sign the following:

"I hereby declare that the above statement is true and correct and I understand that the giving of incorrect information herein or failure to notify any change which will affect the rent charge may be regarded as good reason for terminating the tenancy."

Each tenant was informed that, if he failed to complete the form, he would be assumed to be liable for the maximum increase of rent. After receiving this circular the tenants held meetings, formed a tenants' protection committee, and some nine thousand tenants signed a document approving the present proceedings against the defendants.

On July 22, 1953, a writ was issued by "Herbert William Smith, Trevor Spickett Roberts, John Waters, and William John Williams, (suing on behalf of themselves and all other tenants of houses provided by the defendants under Part V of the Housing Act, 1936) . . ."

against the corporation of Cardiff, claiming (i) a declaration that the decision made on or about June 8, 1953, purporting to authorise the introduction and operation of a scheme for certain specified increases of the rents payable by the tenants of council houses was ultra vires and void; (ii) an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants or agents from carrying out the scheme; and (iii) an interim injunction. The defendants entered a conditional appearance and moved to set aside the writ on the grounds, inter alia,

"(iii) That the plaintiffs have not a common interest with all other . . . tenants. (iv) That the relief sought in this action is not in its nature beneficial to all such tenants."

On Aug. 12, 1953, GLYN-JONES, J., sitting as vacation judge, ordered the writ to be set aside, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Diplock, Q.C., and Millner for the plaintiffs.

H. Edmund Davies, Q.C., and Pennant for the defendants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The defendants have applied to have the writ struck out and all proceedings stayed on the ground that the action was not properly constituted as a representative action—that is to say, that the action was not one which fell within the ambit of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, which reads:

"Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one cause or matter, one or more of such persons may sue . . . on behalf of or for the benefit of all persons so interested."

The question for our determination is whether or not this is a case in which "there are numerous persons having the same interest in one cause or matter."

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] Our attention was called to Belcher v. Reading Corpn. (1), in which tenants sought to challenge the validity

A of what the Reading Corporation had been disposed to do. The form of action there selected was a representative action and junior counsel for the plaintiffs in the present case appeared as junior counsel for the plaintiffs there. It appears from what occurred before HARMAN, J., during interlocutory proceedings that a question arose of the propriety of a representative action in such circumstances. Counsel for Reading Corporation submitted that, strictly speaking, the case did not fall within the ambit of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, but stated that the corporation were not disposed to object to the form of proceeding. It was obviously desirable that the matter that had been raised should be speedily determined. As the judge said, a representative form of action, as distinct from, or as an alternative to, a "test" action, was a convenient form of proceeding. If junior counsel for the plaintiff expected the defendants in the present case to be as accommodating as were Reading Corporation he is proved to have been mistaken.

B There is no doubt that in other branches of the work of these courts actions on behalf of a group of persons who all have similar rights are found convenient. MORRIS, L.J., in the course of the argument, asked whether it was not a fact that actions are brought in this way by the owners of cargo in a particular ship; and he has since found an example—Morrison S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Greystoke Castle (Cargo Owners) (2). The procedure in that class of litigation is, no doubt, of a special character; but I refer to it because I wish to make it plain that nothing that I say should be taken as casting any doubt on the propriety of actions of that character in cases of the kind to which MORRIS, L.J., alluded. I am bound to say that I am entirely unconvinced that there is any substance in the objection taken D in this case by the defendants. It seems to me not to matter to the defendants whether or not the form of action is as at present constituted. The plaintiffs were anxious to obtain an interim injunction. They did not succeed—and I am not surprised. In any claim for an interim injunction the problem of any undertaking as to damages, should the plaintiffs ultimately prove wrong, is likely to arise, and since we are informed that the increased rents, if brought into E operation, would be equivalent to some £45,000 per annum, it is not surprising that the plaintiffs might have been in difficulty in finding adequate security for an undertaking to indemnify the defendants if they were wrong. But I am not satisfied that the insistence of the plaintiffs on a representative form of action was material to the question of an interim injunction. It is true that if the action were simply brought by one, two or three individuals and a claim made for an F injunction, then, strictly speaking, any injunction would be limited to benefiting those individuals. On the other hand, and as a practical matter, if an injunction were granted, it would obviously be difficult for the defendants, while restrained as regards the four plaintiffs, to proceed with the scheme in respect of all the other tenants from whom they would be likely immediately to receive writs. But, from the plaintiffs' view, it is fair to say that I can G understand some reluctance on the part of an individual weekly tenant to embark alone on litigation with the defendants; for he might think that they would forthwith serve him with a notice to quit and then contend that he had no subject-matter which enabled him competently to maintain his action.

H These matters are, perhaps, by the way, though they will have a relevance when I come to deal with costs. The question, however, which we have to determine is whether this case falls within the scope of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9. One might be disposed to say that if you have thirteen thousand weekly tenants with tenancies, so far as relevant, in identical form, then the case is one which the rule would be designed to meet, on grounds at least of convenience. But, on second thoughts, taking the rule according to its own language and without for the moment considering any expositions of it in the decided cases, one cannot see how these thirteen thousand individual tenants can be said to have "the same interest in one cause or matter". The truth is that they have similar or identical interests in similar or identical matters. It is, I think, important to bear in mind the strict legal position. The document issued by the defendants speaks of increasing rents, and, as a matter of practice and of ordinary decency, the defendants would not seek to evict all their existing tenants and offer to the world at large new tenancies on the new terms. They would naturally prefer that the existing tenants should remain, offering them the continuation of their occupancy on terms of their paying increased rents. But the rents are not capable of being increased unless, first, the tenancies are determined, and then new contracts will or may come into operation. If the offer of the new contract is at a rent which afterwards it is found the defendants have no power to charge, it may be that in the result there will be no contract at all. But at the moment of the issue of the writ these thirteen thousand tenants were all weekly tenants with a right only to remain as such tenants until the council gave notice to determine those tenancies: see the Housing Act, 1936, s. 83 (1) and s. 156 (1). In actual fact, all of them have since been determined as a necessary preliminary to putting into effect the scheme, and when a tenancy has been determined, it may be said that the former tenant has no more right to continue in occupation of his house on the terms offered than any other person who may ask to be granted a tenancy according to the terms of the new scheme.

That consideration is, I think, of significance when one looks at the decided cases. In Duke of Bedford v. Ellis (3) a class of persons (there were, in fact, two or three classes, but for simplicity it will be sufficiently accurate if I treat them as one class) called "growers" (as distinct from merchants and middlemen) of vegetables and like products, was concerned, under the Covent Garden Market Act, 1828, with the rights and obligations of the Duke of Bedford as owner of the market. It was alleged that the Duke of Bedford had disregarded his obligations under the Act by which the growers as a class were given preferential rights to have certain stands and places of business in the market. It was also alleged that the tolls which the Duke of Bedford might exact from growers in respect of these places of business were limited by the statute and had in fact been exceeded by him. The writ, therefore, asked for declarations that this class had a preferential right by statute, and that the tolls exigible from this class were limited in certain respects; and the individual plaintiffs also claimed the return of the excess tolls they had individually paid. It will be observed at once that there is a distinction between that case and the present. There, a class of persons had by statute a certain preferential right, namely, a right to be offered stands in the market in priority to non-growers and other persons. The right of any individual rested on his being, but belonged to him as, a member of that class. There was only a small number of stands, so that the chance of any individual in fact getting a stand was small, but, still, the statutory right alleged was a right belonging to a class and all its members, just as under an intestacy one of the next of kin has a right to a share in the estate as being a member of a class of the next of kin.

It was, I think, in the light of those circumstances that LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1901] A.C. 7):

"If the persons named as plaintiffs are members of a class having a common interest, and if the alleged rights of the class are being denied or ignored, it does not matter in the least that the nominal plaintiffs may have been wronged or inconvenienced in their individual capacity . . . Given a common interest and a common grievance, a representative suit was in order if the relief sought was in its nature beneficial to all whom the plaintiffs proposed to represent."

That latter sentence was spoken in fact of the old Chancery practice before R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, came into operation. But I am content to take it (as counsel for the defendants was content to argue it) that the necessary qualifications in that sentence are applicable here and must here be shown to be satisfied. It must be shown, first, that all the members of the alleged class have a common interest, that all have a common grievance, and that the relief is in its nature beneficial to them all.

It is unnecessary to refer in detail to all the cases on the question: Is there here a class so that each member may be said to have the same interest in a common subject-matter? It seems, however, to me that the present case may be distinct on its facts from Price v. Rhondda Urban Council (4), where the plaintiff sued on behalf of a class, namely, married women teachers, to test the validity of a resolution of the Rhondda Urban Council that married women teachers as such would not be employed, save on terms which were disadvantageous to them as a class. Similarly, in Jones v. Cory Bros. & Co., Ltd. (5) where a plaintiff sued as a member of a class, namely, underground mine workers, alleging against the mine owner that he was not fulfilling his statutory obligations to the class of underground mine workers. There are other cases (for example, Colman v. Eastern Counties Ry. Co. (6)) which may, perhaps, go further towards making this form of procedure applicable where a number of persons may be said to have, not the same interest in one cause or matter, but, identical interests in identical causes or matters.

I have already said I am anxious that a convenient form of procedure, which in many classes of case can usefully be adopted, should not be held by this court to be inappropriate and wrong. I, therefore, without saying more, except to express my doubts on it, will assume that it could be said that all these thirteen thousand tenants have the same, in the sense of a common, interest. Still, in my judgment, GLYN-JONES, J., rightly concluded that the third qualification of LORD MACNAGHTEN'S dictum is not here fulfilled. The nature of this scheme makes it plain that the differentiation will operate so that the more affluent of the tenants will "subsidise" the less affluent. Indeed, it is pointed out that some five of the thirteen thousand will suffer no increase of rent at all. It is true that they may do so at some future date, but, of course, only if their then existing contracts are first determined; it is also true that if they fail to fill up this form, they will cease to be the over-privileged and become the under-privileged. Yet, when one does apprehend that the main characteristic of this scheme is that the more will subsidise the less affluent, it is at once apparent that there are two classes whose interests are not only not identical, but are in conflict, namely, the subsidisers and the subsidised. I agree with GLYN-JONES, J., that it would be shutting one's eyes to realities to suppose that if the plaintiffs succeeded in this action they would all continue to remain at what are called in the scheme the basic rents, and that the defendants will be so defeated that they will fail to think of some other scheme for implementing their obligations to "make ends meet". Indeed, any possible alternative scheme such as the town clerk, in his affidavit, adumbrates shows that there will be a considerable class whom the plaintiffs now purport to represent who are almost certain to be worse off, if this scheme be held invalid, than they will be under the scheme itself. But I need not, I think, pursue the matter beyond pointing out that there are, apart from those in an intermediate position, two distinct classes whose interests are in conflict—those, on the one hand, who will benefit by having no present increases and those, on the other, who will have what may be called inflated increases. I, therefore, prefer to base my conclusion that this case does not fall within the strict terms of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, on that point rather than deciding whether it fails in limine, because there is here no class of persons "having the same interest in one cause or matter."

I am bound to say that I am not sorry to reach this conclusion. It seems to me startling, if this claim to bring the case within R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, is correct, to note the consequences. An example was taken of the season ticket holders of British Railways between London and, say, Folkestone. If one individual sought to challenge the validity of some increase in the season ticket rate he could, apparently (if the plaintiffs are right), bring an action on behalf of all the season ticket holders, whether they liked it or not. The remedy, counsel for the plaintiffs says, is adequate and simple (though I doubt if it would seem so to a great many people). The person who says: "I do not want to be represented by you" can ask to be joined as a defendant. It seems to me that such a result involves a serious inroad on the ordinary individual's liberty to make his own terms as he will with some other party with whom he is under no obligation to make any contract.

The result, however, is that, in my judgment, this case is not within R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9. But it does not follow that it is right to strike out the whole of the proceedings. I repeat that I cannot see that it matters to the defendants what is the form of action—certainly now that any question of an interim injunction is out of the way. Counsel for the defendants was willing (after I had pressed him) to say that the defendants would be content, if the bracketed words were omitted from the writ, to treat this as a test action, and stated that they would not in fact seek to "victimise" the four individuals who have stood out as the champions of, at least, the nine thousand tenants who have signified their support of the action taken by the four plaintiffs. But he was willing to do that only on terms that the plaintiffs paid the whole of the defendants' costs up to date. We, therefore, have had to consider the matter and express our view on it. In the circumstances, I think that the right course is not that the writ should be struck out and all proceedings stayed. It is conceded that this court has the power and jurisdiction to order, in lieu of striking out the proceedings, that the bracketed words should be struck out, so that the action can proceed, not as a representative action, but as an action brought by four individuals against the defendants; and that, in my judgment, is what we ought to do, varying GLYN-JONES, J.'s order accordingly. Since that result is achieved not by agreement, but by direction of the court, it is not competent to impose terms on the defendants, but I have no doubt whatever that they, having a difficult task to perform under the Housing Act, 1936, and being (as counsel said) anxious to get this question determined, will not do otherwise than treat this as a test action and will not seek to defeat these four individuals by what is called victimisation. Indeed, if they did, they would not advance much, for other champions would be found (I doubt not) to spring up from the soil.

There remains the question of costs. I regret that it has been necessary in this important matter that the costs of an appeal to this court should have been incurred. Both parties took up attitudes which, no doubt, made it inevitable; and, as counsel for the defendants says, he was brought here by the plaintiffs appealing against the order of GLYN-JONES, J., striking out their writ. In the circumstances, I think there is no ground for disturbing the effect of the order as to costs which GLYN-JONES, J., made, but I do not think it right that the plaintiffs should be made now to pay the defendants' costs of this appeal. I think (and in saying this I am not to be taken as suggesting that the defendants have not acted to the best of their ability as guardians of the ratepayers' interests money) that, doing justice as best I can between these plaintiffs and the defendants, the defendants' costs of this appeal should be their costs in the action. The result will be that if the defendants win the action they will get the costs of this appeal; if, however, they lose and the plaintiffs win, then the plaintiffs will not have to pay the costs of this appeal. I, therefore, think that the order should be that in lieu of striking out the proceedings, the writ should be amended by striking out the bracketed words (making it a representative action) and that the defendants' costs of this appeal should be their costs in the action.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The argument of counsel for the plaintiffs was to the effect that the thirteen thousand tenants of the houses provided by the defendants in performance of their statutory duty under the Housing Act, 1936, constituted a class of persons having a common interest, because they each of them stood in the relationship of tenant to a common landlord, namely, the defendants, and their tenancies alike fell to be regulated by any provisions of the Housing Act, 1936, applicable to the case. He said, in effect, that the common interest of these tenants consisted in the right to remain in occupation of their respective houses at no higher rent than the defendants could lawfully charge having regard to the provisions of the Act. He said, further, that these tenants have a common grievance, in that the scheme, the validity of which is challenged in the action, purported to propose for all of them without exception some increase, either actual and immediate or contingent and future, in the amount of the rent payable by them; and, finally, inasmuch as the object of the action was to prevent the scheme being brought into effect, the action was for the benefit of all, for, if successful, it would prevent the increases, actual or potential, foreshadowed in the scheme.

A Counsel for the defendants went so far as to argue that these thirteen thousand
B tenants could not, for the purposes of any dispute, constitute a class on whose behalf a representative action could properly be brought. He founded himself on the contention that here there is not a class of persons entitled to a common right conferred on members of that class by, for example, an Act of Parliament (as in Duke of Bedford v. Ellis (3)), and there is not any common right properly so called. He said, in effect, that there was no more than an aggregate of
C individuals each bound to the defendants by a separate contract of tenancy peculiar to himself and conferring and imposing rights and obligations on him separately as an individual and not as a member of a class. I am not prepared to accede to that argument in its widest form, and I find it unnecessary (as does D SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.) for the purpose of deciding this case to determine whether or not, in any, and if so what, circumstances or for the purposes of any, and if so what, dispute a body of persons such as the tenants of the council
E houses in the present case are capable of forming a class on whose behalf a representative action can properly be brought. The only questions which it is necessary to answer for the purpose of deciding this case are whether or not these thirteen thousand tenants are a class of persons having a common interest for the purposes of this present dispute, and, if so, whether or not, for the
E purposes of this present dispute, they can be said to have a common grievance, and, if so, whether or not the relief claimed in relation to this present dispute is in its nature beneficial to all.

As counsel for the plaintiffs put the matter it has, if I may say so without offence, a specious appearance of being a case in which (on the assumption that the charge of ultra vires can be made good) all these tenants are labouring under
F a common grievance, namely, the threat of an increase, actual or potential, in the amount of the rent payable by them over and above the amount lawfully exigible. But while at this stage it is not for us to investigate the merits of the action, I apprehend that to determine whether or not the action is properly constituted as a representative action it is necessary to look into the nature of the dispute far enough to be able to see the true character of the alleged
G grievance. On doing that it immediately appears that though the grievance, for the purposes of justifying the form of the proceedings, is put as a threatened increase, actual or potential, in the amounts of all the rents, the true grievance is not that. It is not, and could not, I apprehend, be contended that the defendants have no power to increase the rents in any circumstances. The true grievance is not that rents are being increased, but that they are being increased, not on a
H uniform, but on a differential, basis, the scheme being that a tenant in receipt of a gross income at the rate of £500 per annum or over and less than £600 shall suffer an increase of 8s. 6d. a week and a tenant in receipt of a gross income at the rate of £600 per annum or over shall suffer an increase of 12s. 6d. a week, with other provisions to meet the cases of adult wage or salary earning children, any wages earned by a wife, and the presence of lodgers or sub-tenants, or of what are termed "additional families", by the increases considered appropriate in each of those contingencies, and an overriding maximum increase of 12s. 6d. per week. The objection is that instead of charging a uniform increase in rent (measured, I suppose, by reference to the estimated letting value of the house, and the necessity of charging an economic rent and of providing for increased outgoings, or other objective considerations of that nature) this scheme charges rent by reference to the purse, and as such it is said to be ultra vires. It was put by counsel for the plaintiffs that it was beyond the powers of the defendants to charge differential rents according to the means and circumstances of the tenants because the result would be that those tenants in more affluent circumstances would, in effect, by the increases in rent imposed on them be subsidising the tenants in less affluent circumstances in whose cases no increase was to be made at all.

That being the true nature of the grievance, it seems to me impossible to maintain that in this particular dispute these thirteen thousand tenants constitute a class having a common interest in any relevant sense. It seems to me impossible to maintain that they had in this dispute a common grievance or that the relief sought is beneficial to all. On the contrary, it seems to me necessarily to follow that a tenant who under this scheme qualifies for the subsidy—that is to say, a tenant whose rent is not increased—has an interest which may be diametrically opposed to that of a tenant who suffers the increase. Prima facie, it is in the interests of the subsidised tenants, who suffer no increases in rent, that this scheme should be upheld and put into operation, in order that they may enjoy the benefit of it by being allowed to remain as tenants at the old rent, and having the deficit, which the defendants are obliged so far as possible to make good, provided by other tenants whose means are such as to bring them within the range of one or other of the increases.

Therefore, while deciding nothing as to the possibility of such an aggregate of individuals as these thirteen thousand tenants constituting a class on whose behalf a representative action could properly be brought in relation to some matters, I hold that with regard to this particular matter it is impossible to say that they are such a class. I have only to add that I agree with the order SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., proposes as regards the costs of this appeal, and that the writ should not be struck out, but that leave should be given to make the appropriate amendments in order that the action may go forward as an action brought by the four named plaintiffs as individuals and not in any representative capacity.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. The writ claimed a declaration that the decision of the defendants to introduce a scheme for differential rents was beyond their powers. With the merits of the dispute we are not concerned. Nothing in the decision today affects the merits of the matter that will have to be decided. We have been concerned with a question that has arisen in a preliminary skirmish in the litigation. It concerns merely a bald point of procedure, in regard to which it has seemed to me that success does not profit and defeat does not hurt. The writ does, however, direct attention to a particular scheme, and, therefore, while the merits of the dispute which will have to be decided are not before us, we have to look at the scheme in order to see whether a representative action can properly be brought. It seems to me that a mere perusal of the scheme shows that there are many tenants who are not today and may not ever be adversely affected, so far as their rents are concerned, by this scheme. There is nothing I can add to the reasons that have already been assigned by my Lords in support of the view that the relief sought is not in its nature beneficial to all tenants. It seems to me that a mere examination of the scheme demonstrates that. Furthermore, in regard to the scheme itself, I think there is force in the submission of counsel for the defendants that it is shown that all the tenants have not a common grievance. For those reasons I think GLYN-JONES, J., came to a correct conclusion.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Wrentmore & Son, agents for Thos. John & Co., Cardiff (for the plaintiffs); Theodore Goddard & Co., agents for Sydney Tapper Jones, town clerk, Cardiff (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. ALGAR.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Glyn-Jones, JJ.), November 9, 16, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Wife—Criminal offence committed during marriage—Admissibility of wife's evidence after decree of nullity for impotence.

A husband was prosecuted for forging his wife's name to a number of cheques, thereby defrauding her bank. Before the prosecution took place, the wife had obtained a decree of nullity on the ground of the husband's impotence. She was called as a witness for the prosecution, and the husband was convicted of forgery.

HELD: a voidable marriage was regarded as valid and subsisting until it had been avoided at the suit of the aggrieved party; accordingly, a spouse who had been lawfully married, but who had subsequently obtained a decree of nullity on the ground of the other spouse's impotence, was not a competent witness against that other spouse on his or her trial for a criminal offence committed during the coverture; and, therefore, the wife's evidence was inadmissible, and the husband's conviction must be quashed.

AS TO THE COMPETENCY OF SPOUSES AS WITNESSES IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 217-221, paras. 304-307; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 450-453, Nos. 4757-4785, 4800-4805.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Monroe v. Twisleton, (1802), Peake, Add. Cas. 219; 170 E.R. 250; 22 Digest, Replacement, 413, 4451.
- (2) Doker v. Hasler, (1824), Ry. & M. 198; 171 E.R. 992; 22 Digest, Replacement, 414, 4452.
- (3) O'Connor v. Marjoribanks, (1842), 4 Man. & G. 435; 5 Scott, N.R. 394; 11 L.J.C.P. 267; 134 E.R. 179; 22 Digest, Replacement, 414, 4453.
- (4) Jones v. Jones, [1916] 2 A.C. 481; 85 L.J.K.B. 1519; 115 L.T. 432.
- (5) Shenton v. Tyler, [1939] 1 All E.R. 827; [1939] Ch. 620; 108 L.J.Ch. 256; 160 L.T. 314; 22 Digest, Replacement, 414, 4454.
- (6) Wells v. Fisher, (1831), 1 Mood. & R. 99 (174 E.R. 34); sub nom. Wells v. Fletcher, 5 C. & P. 12 (172 E.R. 855); 22 Digest, Replacement, 414, 4455.
- (7) Re Eaves, [1939] 4 All E.R. 260; [1940] Ch. 109; 109 L.J.Ch. 97; 162 L.T. 8; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Adams v. Adams, [1941] 1 All E.R. 334; [1941] 1 K.B. 536; 110 L.J.K.B. 241; 165 L.T. 15; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) De Reneville v. De Reneville, [1948] 1 All E.R. 56; [1948] P. 100; [1948] L.J.R. 1761; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL against conviction.

The facts appear in the judgment.

Buzzard for the appellant.

M. J. H. Turner for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 16. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The question for decision in this appeal is whether a spouse who has been lawfully married, but has subsequently obtained a decree of nullity on the ground of the impotence of the other, can give evidence against that other on his or her trial for alleged criminal offences committed during the coverture. There has been hitherto, as far as we are aware, no decision on the subject; the point was not taken at the trial of the appellant nor was it raised in his notice of appeal. He sought leave to appeal on grounds which had no substance, but the court, on perusing the papers, saw that the question arose and gave leave to appeal so as to have it argued and determined. Counsel for the appellant, who was not counsel below, undertook the case at the request of the court and we are indebted to him for a careful and learned argument in which all the relevant authorities have been brought to our notice.

The facts can be stated very shortly and are that the appellant married the lady, who afterwards obtained the decree, in 1934. The marriage was duly and regularly celebrated and it is not contended that there was any impediment to the parties marrying. They lived together as man and wife till some time about 1949, when the wife presented a petition on the ground of the appellant's impotence. She was a woman of some means and had a substantial bank account. During 1947-48 the appellant forged his wife's name to thirty-two cheques, thereby obtaining in fraud of the bank some £7,000. On discovering that her account had been depleted by forgeries she sued the bank in February of this year, and, after the action had proceeded for a day before LLOYD-JACOB, J., the bank submitted to judgment. The learned judge sent the papers to the Director of Public Prosecutions who prosecuted the appellant for forgery. He was convicted before HAVERS, J., at the Norfolk Summer Assizes and sentenced to five years. Meanwhile, after the forgeries were committed, and before the action against the bank was tried, the wife had petitioned for, and subsequently obtained, a decree of nullity on Mar. 21, 1950. As is well known, at least to lawyers, the judgment, or, to use the old expression of the ecclesiastical courts, the sentence, in such cases declares that the petitioner is, and always has been, free of the bonds of matrimony. The prosecution, taking the view that this was equivalent to a judgment that the petitioner never had been the wife of the appellant, accordingly called her as a witness for the prosecution. Counsel for the Crown admitted, in our opinion rightly, that, had there been a decree of divorce, she would have been incompetent as a witness, but he contended that the position was different where the decree was one of nullity which in terms related back so that she was never married. In view of this admission, in strictness it is only necessary to consider whether there is any difference between the legal effect of a decree of divorce and a decree of nullity as affecting the competence of the wife as a witness, but the case, having never before arisen, is of importance, and, as decrees of divorce and nullity are far more frequent than in former days, we think it advisable briefly to review the law on the subject. Moreover, as this is, I think, the third case which has quite recently come before this court where a wife has been called against her husband, we think it may be as well to state the law of competency both in what we may call the ordinary case as well as where divorce or nullity come into question.

At common law one spouse could not give evidence against the other except in the case of offences against the person or liberty of the other party to the marriage. In such cases a spouse is both competent and compellable. There have been a considerable number of modern statutory exceptions to this rule which allow a wife to be a competent but not a compellable witness. The Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 4 (1), deals with some of these cases, but not exhaustively. We need not set them out in detail. Suffice it to say that they are mostly offences against children and young persons, and sexual offences. In cases permitted by s. 12 and s. 16 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which give spouses the right to bring criminal proceedings for the protection of their property, it has been placed beyond doubt by the Married Women's Property Act, 1884, s. 1, that the spouses are both competent and compellable. Cases in which spouses can be admitted but not compelled to give evidence against the other are set out in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 9, pp. 218 and 219. Quite modern instances since the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, are prosecutions for bigamy (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 28 (3)) and the Infant Life (Preservation) Act, 1929. The present case comes within none of the categories. There may be cases of forgery in which a spouse could give evidence against the other if the case could be brought within the sections of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, referred to above, but we need not consider them as it was the bank that was defrauded in this case.

Now, here it should be remembered that the three statutes passed in the middle of last century to reform the law of evidence only affected civil proceedings. The Evidence Act, 1843, s. 1, removed the disqualification of a witness on account of interest or infamy, the Evidence Act, 1851, s. 2, removed the incompetence of the parties themselves, and the reform was completed by s. 1 of the Evidence Amendment Act, 1853, which allowed the spouses of the parties to give evidence. None of these statutes applied to criminal cases. So we now have to inquire whether the incompetency in a criminal case extended beyond the actual period of coverture. Monroe v. Twisleton (1), a case approved again and again, lays down in terms that a divorced wife cannot be called to testify against her husband in respect of any matters arising, or conversations that have passed, during the marriage. The same rule was applied in the case of a widow: Doker v. Hasler (2). Both of these cases were decided at nisi prius, the first by ALVANLEY, C.J., the second by BEST, C.J., afterwards LORD WYNFORD. They were approved by the Court of Common Pleas in O'Connor v. Marjoribanks (3), where the incompetence was extended to the widow's personal representatives. The reason for the rule was stated in this case both by TINDAL, C.J., and by MAULE, J., to be the necessity of preserving the confidence of the conjugal relation, and this reason for the rule has been stated in much the same terms by other judges of eminence. In O'Connor's case (3), MAULE, J., said (4 Man. & G. 445):

"A rule may be a very good rule, though the reason on which it is founded may not be applicable to every case which is governed by the rule."

As LORD SUMNER once observed in Jones v. Jones (4) ([1916] 2 A.C. 500): "Principles are like that". All these cases were cited without criticism or dissent by the Court of Appeal as recently as Shenton v. Tyler (5). These decisions were all before the three statutes to which we have just referred and we need not stay to inquire what effect they had on the doctrines laid down so far as civil proceedings are concerned. This was much discussed in Shenton v. Tyler (5), but those Acts have no application to criminal law. In a criminal case, therefore, subject to the common law and modern statutory exceptions mentioned above, a spouse remains incompetent to give evidence against the other, and the incompetence continues after divorce in respect of matters which arose during the coverture.

We have now to consider whether the same incompetency attaches after a decree of nullity. In our opinion, this depends solely on whether the marriage annulled was void or merely voidable. A marriage is void where there is bigamy, consanguinity, non-age, or where it has been celebrated contrary to the requirements of the law now collected and enacted in s. 25 to s. 49 of the Marriage Act, 1949. In those cases, the court will regard the marriage as never having taken place and no status of matrimony as ever having been conferred. Consequently, the parties never having been husband and wife, either is competent to be called against the other: Wells v. Fisher (6). The expressions to be found in some of the text-books and cases "de facto marriage" or "de facto wife" mean, in our opinion, no more than that, while the parties may have appeared to be, and even have believed that they were, husband and wife, they were not, either because there was an impediment which prevented their marriage or that the marriage was not celebrated according to law. We say nothing about the absence of true consent as it is possible that, at least for certain purposes, other questions not material to this case might arise. But impotence only makes a marriage voidable. Until it has been avoided at the suit of the aggrieved party it will be regarded by every court as valid and subsisting. The parties are husband and wife till a decree has been pronounced, and if one party dies before or without one being obtained the other is the widow or widower of the deceased. The reason why the decree is in the form which declares that the petitioner is, and always has been, free of the bonds of matrimony was, if I may be permitted to quote a judgment of my own, shown in Re Eaves (7). The old sentence of the ecclesiastical courts following the canon law has been preserved, but, in truth, neither the petitioner nor the respondent has always been free. The petitioner has always been in the position to obtain freedom, but, until the decree, the tie remains binding. Since the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case, in Adams v. Adams (8), and in De Reneville v. De Reneville (9), it is, we think, settled that the courts now regard the parties to a voidable marriage before decree to be for all purposes truly husband and wife. Unless there is a decree they will live and die as married persons with all the incidents that attach to that estate. We think it clear that the reason for the incompetency applies to these persons with force at least equal to the case of divorced persons. It would be artificial in the highest degree to apply a different rule in the two cases. It is with no disrespect that one can say that what is artificial is the old form of sentence in these cases which, in truth, perpetuates a canonical fiction. The result is that the evidence of the appellant's former wife was inadmissible, and, as it dealt with a vital point in the case, we cannot apply the proviso to s. 4 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. Accordingly, the conviction must be quashed.

A
B
C
D

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal (for the appellant); Director of Public Prosecutions (for the Crown).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BROWN v. MINISTRY OF HOUSING AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND OTHERS. FORD v. SAME.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Barry, J.), November 6, 1953.]

Compulsory Purchase—Application to quash order—Need to serve notice on statutory tenant—"Occupier"—Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946 (c. 49), sched. I, para. 3 (1) (b).

A

A statutory tenant is an "occupier" within the meaning of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, sched. I, para. 3 (1) (b). Consequently, a notice in the prescribed form must (except in so far as the confirming authority directs in a particular case that para. 3 (1) (b) shall not apply) be given of a compulsory purchase order to every statutory tenant of land comprised in the order before the order is submitted to the confirming authority under para. 1 of sched. I to the Act.

B

FOR THE ACQUISITION OF LAND (AUTHORISATION PROCEDURE) ACT, 1946, s. 1, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 3, p. 1065; and for sched. I, paras. 1-4, see ibid., pp. 1075, 1076.

C Cases referred to:

(1) Keeves v. Dean, Nunn v. Pellegrini, [1924] 1 K.B. 685; 93 L.J.K.B. 203; 130 L.T. 593; 31 Digest, Replacement, 694, 7865.

(2) Abbey v. Barnstyn, [1930] 1 K.B. 660; 99 L.J.K.B. 369; 142 L.T. 619; 94 J.P. 196; Digest Supp.

D

(3) Baker v. Turner, [1950] 1 All E.R. 834; [1950] A.C. 401; 31 Digest, Replacement, 647, 7516.

(4) Dudley & District Benefit Building Society v. Emerson, [1949] 2 All E.R. 252; [1949] Ch. 707; [1949] L.J.R. 1441; 31 Digest, Replacement, 639, 7472.

(5) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. John Dow Stuart, Ltd., [1950] 1 All E.R. 1; [1950] A.C. 149; 31 Tax Cas. 274; 2nd Digest Supp.

E

(6) West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, [1897] A.C. 647; 66 L.J.Ch. 726; 77 L.T. 284; 61 J.P. 820; 35 Digest 219, 457.

APPLICATIONS under the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, sched. I, para. 15, for orders quashing a compulsory purchase order.

The applicants were the statutory tenants of two flats in the same building, viz., 83, West Hill, Putney, in the metropolitan borough of Wandsworth. On or about Nov. 20, 1951, the borough council, by virtue of their powers under the Housing Acts, made a compulsory purchase order entitled the Metropolitan Borough of Wandsworth (Sutherland Grove) Compulsory Purchase Order, 1951, which included 81, 83, 85 and 87, West Hill, Putney. No notices were served on the applicants before the compulsory purchase order was submitted to the confirming authority. By order of the confirming authority, a public inquiry was held on Oct. 20, 1952. The applicants were unaware of the fact that the inquiry was being held and so raised no objection to the confirmation of the order. Later, as a result of the publicity given to the inquiry, the existence of the order became known to the applicants. In spite of communications addressed to the confirming authority by the applicants, the order was confirmed on May 1, 1953.

H

It was contended on behalf of the applicants that they were entitled to receive the individual notices prescribed by the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, sched. I, para. 3 (1) (b); that such notices had not been served; that they had been substantially prejudiced by the council's failure to serve such notices; and that they were entitled to have the order quashed as the requirements of the Act had not been complied with. On behalf of the respondents it was conceded that no notices had been served on the applicants and that they had been substantially prejudiced by the failure to serve such notices, but it was contended that the applicants as statutory tenants were not within the scope of para. 3 (1) (b), and that, consequently, they were not entitled to be served.

Scarman for the applicants.

J. P. Ashworth for the respondents.

BARRY, J., stated the facts and continued: The jurisdiction of the court to deal with matters of this kind arises from the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, sched. I, Part IV. Paragraph 15 (1) of sched. I reads:

"If any person aggrieved by a compulsory purchase order desires to question the validity thereof, or of any provision contained therein, on the ground that . . . any requirement of this Act or of any regulation made thereunder has not been complied with in relation to the order or certificate, he may, within six weeks from the date on which notice of the confirmation or making of the order or of the giving of the certificate is first published in accordance with the provisions of this schedule in that behalf, make an application to the High Court, and on any such application the court . . . (b) if satisfied that the authorisation granted by the compulsory purchase order is not empowered to be granted as aforesaid, or that the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced by any requirement of this schedule or of any regulation made thereunder not having been complied with, may quash the compulsory purchase order or any provision contained therein, or the certificate, either generally or in so far as it affects any property of the applicant."

The Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, standardises the procedure which is to be adopted by local authorities, amongst others, in relation to the compulsory purchase of land which the authority is authorised to purchase by some other statute. Section 1 (1) of the Act provides:

"The authorisation of any compulsory purchase of land—(a) by a local authority where, apart from this Act, power to authorise the authority to purchase land compulsorily is conferred by or under any enactment contained in a public general Act and in force immediately before the commencement of this Act, other than any enactment specified in sub-s. (4) of this section . . . shall, subject to the provisions of this and the next following section, be conferred by an order (in this Act referred to as a 'compulsory purchase order') in accordance with the provisions of sched. I to this Act (being provisions which, subject to certain adaptations, modifications and exceptions, correspond with provisions as to the authorisation of the compulsory purchase of land of the Local Government Act, 1933)."

Schedule I to the Act provides:

"1. A compulsory purchase order authorising a compulsory purchase by a local authority (hereafter in this schedule referred to as the 'acquiring authority') in a case falling within sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of this Act shall be made by the local authority and submitted to and confirmed by the authority having power under the enactment in question to authorise the purchase (hereafter in this schedule referred to as the 'confirming authority') in accordance with the following provisions of this schedule. 2. The compulsory purchase order shall be in the prescribed form and shall describe by reference to a map the land to which it applies. 3. (1) Before submitting the order to the confirming authority the acquiring authority shall . . . (b) except in so far as the confirming authority directs that this provision shall not have effect in any particular case, serve on every owner, lessee and occupier (except tenants for a month or any period less than a month) of any land comprised in the order a notice in the pre-

A scribed form stating the effect of the order and that it is about to be submitted for confirmation, and specifying the time (not being less than twenty-one days from the service of the notice) within which and the manner in which objections thereto can be made. 4. (1) If no objection is duly made by any such owner, lessee or occupier as aforesaid or if all objections so made are withdrawn, the confirming authority, upon being

B satisfied that the proper notices have been published and served, may, if the authority thinks fit, confirm the order with or without modifications. (2) If any objection duly made as aforesaid is not withdrawn, the confirming authority shall, before confirming the order, either cause a public local inquiry to be held or afford to any person by whom any objection has been duly made as aforesaid and not withdrawn an opportunity of appearing before and being heard by a person appointed by the confirming authority for the purpose, and, after considering the objection and the report of the person who held the inquiry or the person appointed as aforesaid, may confirm the order either with or without modifications. (3) If

C any person by whom an objection has been made avails himself of the opportunity of being heard, the confirming authority shall afford to the acquiring authority, and to any other persons to whom it appears to the confirming authority expedient to afford it, an opportunity of being heard on the same occasion."

The compulsory purchase order which the court is now asked to quash was made by the borough council on Nov. 20, 1951. At a later date, it was submitted to the appropriate Minister, who, I understand, was the Minister of Housing and

D Local Government, for confirmation. It is not suggested that the respondents failed in any way to comply with the requirements of para. 3 (1) (a) of sched. I to the Act. Advertisements were, as I understand it, duly published in two local papers, but those advertisements were not seen by the applicants in these two matters. It is common ground that the council did not serve on either of the two applicants the notices referred to in para. 3 (1) (b) of the schedule. In

E fact, the confirming authority, the Minister of Housing and Local Government, caused a public inquiry to be held, and that inquiry took place on Oct. 20, 1952. The applicants were unaware of the fact that this inquiry was to be held, and did not attend it or seek to raise any objection to the confirmation of this order.

As a result of the publicity given to the inquiry, the existence of the order subsequently came to the knowledge of the applicants, and communications

F were addressed to the confirming authority, but none the less the order was in fact confirmed on May 1, 1953. Both the applicants' cases now are that they were substantially prejudiced by the failure of the respondents, the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the metropolitan borough of Wandsworth, to serve on them the notice prescribed by para. 3 (1) (b) of sched. I to the Act, and so failed to comply with one of the requirements of the schedule.

G It is conceded for the purposes of this case, and, I think, very rightly conceded, by counsel for the respondents, that assuming the applicants were entitled to receive individual notices of the making of this order and its submission for confirmation to the confirming authority, they were in truth substantially prejudiced by the failure of the borough council to serve any such notice on them. That admission made only for the purposes of this case, was, I am quite satisfied,

H rightly and properly made, because there can be no doubt on the evidence that, owing to the lack of any notice of the impending public inquiry, and owing to the lack of any knowledge that the respondent council were proposing to obtain confirmation of this order, the two applicants were deprived of the opportunity of lodging objections to the confirmation and of being heard by the inspector or other officer appointed by the Minister to conduct the inquiry which was in fact held. As a result, their case and the arguments which they wished to submit to the confirming authority in an endeavour to persuade him not to confirm this order, have never been put, and, in consequence, I have no doubt that they were, indeed, substantially prejudiced, to use the words of the schedule.

Thus, the sole question for the court is: Were the applicants, who were both statutory tenants of premises falling within the Rent Restrictions Acts, either "owners, lessees or occupiers (except tenants for a month or any period less than a month)" of any land comprised in the order. The question is not an easy one to answer. It is common ground between the applicants and the respondents that the applicants, whatever else they were, were not the owners of these properties. It is now, I think, common ground that the applicants could not properly be described as the lessees of the properties, nor can it be said that they were tenants of the properties for a month or any period less than a month. The whole difference between the parties is now focussed on the proper construction of one word, namely, the word "occupier" in sub-para. (b) of para. 3 (1) of the schedule.

Counsel for the applicants, in opening his case, drew my attention to a large number of authorities which related to the true legal position of a statutory tenant under the Rent Restrictions Acts. He referred to those cases primarily in support of his submission that the applicants in this case were not tenants in the true sense, and, therefore, they could not in any proper construction of the words be regarded as tenants for a month or any period less than a month so as to fall within the exception contained in sub-para. (b) of para. 3 (1). However, the cases are of some importance as indicating what the real status of a statutory tenant, so called, should be taken to be. The conditions of statutory tenancy are described in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 15 (1). That sub-section reads:

"A tenant who by virtue of the provisions of this Act retains possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies shall, so long as he retains possession, observe and be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act, and shall be entitled to give up possession of the dwelling-house only on giving such notice as would have been required under the original contract of tenancy, or, if no notice would have been so required, on giving not less than three months' notice."

Since 1920 the courts on numerous occasions have been occupied by arguments as to the true status of a person who was at one time a contractual tenant and continues in possession of premises by virtue of the protection afforded to him against ejectment by the various Rent Restrictions Acts. I do not think that it would be of assistance to the parties if I reviewed those cases in detail. It is clear that a statutory tenant is not a tenant in any true sense of that term. That has been pointed out on several occasions by the Court of Appeal. I think it is only necessary for me to refer to a few words in the judgment of BANKES, L.J., in Keeves v. Dean, Nunn v. Pellegrini (1). BANKES, L.J., used these words ([1924] 1 K.B. 690):

"These two appeals from the Divisional Court raise a very important question under the Increase of Rent, etc. Act, 1920—namely, whether a person who has been a tenant of a dwelling-house, whose tenancy has been determined by notice to quit, but who has remained in possession against the will of his landlord, can assign his statutory position to another person. The person who so seeks to assign has come to be known as a 'statutory tenant', and I think it is a pity that that expression was ever introduced. It is really a misnomer, for he is not a tenant at all; although he cannot be turned out of possession so long as he complies with the provisions of the statute, he has no estate or interest in the premises such as a tenant has. His right is a purely personal one, and as such, unless the statute expressly authorises him to pass it on to another person, must cease the moment he parts with the possession or dies."

Similar views as to the nature of the so-called statutory tenancy have on many subsequent occasions been expressed by the Court of Appeal. It is, perhaps, worth referring to a few words used by GREER, L.J., in Abbey v. Barnstyn (2). He said ([1930] 1 K.B. 669):

A "But the term 'statutory tenant' was in the main used to describe a person enjoying the rights of an occupier in class 2. Certain modifications of the first statute were made by the Courts Emergency Powers Act [and other Acts] . . . Neither of these statutes affect the questions we have to determine in this appeal. The Act of 1920 consolidated and amended the earlier Acts and made certain amendments which are not material. It is with this Act and the Act of 1923, which provides that in certain cases the Act shall no longer apply to certain houses, that we are concerned in this appeal. In the margin to s. 15 of the consolidating Act of 1920 the words 'statutory tenancy' appear as applying to the relationship between the ex-landlord and the ex-tenant, where the latter is protected from ejection. The section itself does not use the term. It provides that so long as the tenant retaining possession by virtue of the provisions of that Act retains possession he must observe and shall be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original tenancy. The term 'statutory tenant' has been frequently criticised, but it does not seem to me to be inapt to describe the occupier, who by statute is entitled to remain in occupation after his contractual tenancy has been determined, but must remain in occupation subject to the obligations and benefits of the original contract of tenancy. The use of the word 'tenant' for such an occupier does however create some difficulty when we have to interpret the word 'tenant' when used in other parts of the Act, and in the decontrolling section of the Act of 1923."

The House of Lords has on at least one occasion approved of the general sense of the construction of the Act of 1920 which was indicated in these judgments of the Court of Appeal and other judgments to which I have not referred, and in two recent cases their Lordships have made references to this subject. In Baker v. Turner (3) LORD REID in his speech says ([1950] 1 All E.R. 853):

F "It has long been settled that the Rent Acts do not prevent an owner from terminating the tenancy of his tenant in the ordinary way: what they do is to give to a person who has been tenant a right to remain in possession after the tenancy has gone. A person with such a right is commonly called a statutory tenant, but that name, though convenient, is inaccurate. The true position of such a person was stated as long ago as 1923 by BANKES, L.J., in Keeves v. Dean (1) . . ."

Then the learned Lord cites the passage in the judgment of BANKES, L.J., to which I have already referred.

G One of the most recent pronouncements on this subject was made by the Court of Appeal in Dudley & District Benefit Building Society v. Emerson (4). In that case, SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 257):

H "Furthermore, in certain circumstances (when, for example, an effective notice to quit has been given) the contractual tenancy between A and B may come to an end, and there then is created what is known as a statutory tenancy, B remaining in possession as a 'statutory tenant' of A. It has been said in these courts that a statutory tenancy, as the phrase is commonly used, is a somewhat inapposite expression, for it confers on the so-called statutory tenant no estate or interest in the land. He cannot part with it or dispose of it, and in certain circumstances the right to possession, which is its principal feature, may pass to persons who would be quite different from the persons who would get the benefit of a contractual tenancy when a tenant dies."

On that state of the authorities as to the true position of a statutory tenant, counsel for the applicants argued that clearly a person living in premises as the statutory tenant of those premises was the occupier of the premises, and as such, under the clear wording of para. 3 (1) (b) of the schedule, entitled to service of the notice in the form prescribed by that sub-section.

Counsel for the respondents submitted that, in the circumstances of these two cases, the applicants could not properly describe themselves as occupiers of these flats. He submitted that in order to establish occupation within the meaning of para. 3 (b) of sched. I, an applicant must show first of all that he or she is in actual physical occupation of the premises. He conceded that, in both the present cases, the applicants were in physical occupation of the premises, but he said they must also show that their occupation was of a type which brought them within the true meaning of para. 3 (b). He submitted that in the context in which that word is to be found in para. 3 (b) of the schedule, "occupier" must mean some person who has some estate or interest in the property. He supported that view by references first to the immediate context in which the word "occupier" is to be found. It is to be found intimately associated with the words "owner" and "lessee", and also immediately followed by the words "except tenants for a month or any period less than a month."

He said that there the statute is referring to the various classes of persons who may be interested in land or houses, and is referring to them in descending order of importance, first the owner, then the lessee, and lastly the occupier. That occupier, said counsel for the respondents, must be someone who has some legal interest in the land which he occupies. He also supported his argument in favour of this somewhat narrow construction of the word "occupier" by reference to the provisions of Part IV of the schedule to which I have already referred. He attached particular importance, and I think rightly, to the closing words of para. 15 (1) (b) of Part IV of the schedule where the court is given power to

"... quash the compulsory purchase order or any provision contained therein, or the certificate, either generally or in so far as it affects any property of the applicant."

In view of the authorities to which I have referred, counsel for the respondents argues that neither of the applicants in this case has any property properly so called in any of the land or buildings comprised in this compulsory purchase order. They have nothing more, he says, than a mere personal right to remain in possession of parts of those properties until ordered to leave by an order of the court, which can only be made under certain conditions and in certain circumstances provided by the Rent Restrictions Acts. He says that the word "occupier" must have some restriction placed on its interpretation, otherwise it might cover any person who was on the premises for a short period, no matter in what capacity he was there. As it is a word which can be used in different senses (and he pointed out that it was used in different senses in a number of enactments, enactments relating to rent restrictions, enactments relating to rating, and in other Acts, in particular one relating to leasehold property, the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, and that "occupation" is used in a special sense under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 68CB (1)) and is susceptible of these various shades of meaning, counsel for the respondents has invited me to deal with that word as though it was an ambiguous word in the sense described by LORD REID in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. John Dow Stuart, Ltd. (5) ([1950] 1 All E.R. 19). He also relied on the principle enunciated by LORD HERSCHELL in West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society (6) ([1897] A.C. 655). By virtue of the principles there enunciated, he submitted that the court was entitled to look at the proviso to the words used, and to construe the words if they were capable of more than one meaning in the light of the proviso. Here, he says, the proviso excludes tenants for a month or any period less than a month, and that being so, he submits that the word "occupier", which immediately precedes that proviso or exception, should be read as including only persons holding such an interest in land as is in fact held by a tenant.

Again relying on the general scope of the Act as a whole, counsel for the respondents submitted that it was clear that the legislature could not have intended that a local authority minded to make and have confirmed a compulsory purchase order should be required to serve notice on a vast floating population of controlled tenants, any one of whom might, on receipt of this notice, demand a public inquiry, and, if occupiers within the meaning of the schedule, any one of them would be entitled to insist that such a public inquiry was in fact held.

Forceful though those arguments may be, I do not think that I should accept them. To my mind, it is placing a most artificial limitation on the ordinary meaning of the word "occupier" to exclude from its scope persons in the position of statutory tenants under the Rent Restrictions Acts. I need only refer to the words of GREER, L.J., in Abbey v. Barnstyn (2). Again and again in his judgment in that case GREER, L.J., used the word "occupier" to describe the position of a statutory tenant. He says ([1930] 1 K.B. 670):

"The use of the word 'tenant' for such an occupier does however create some difficulty when we have to interpret the word 'tenant' when used in other parts of the Act . . ."

Whatever criticism he and the other lords justices in that case and many other cases may have made of the word "tenant", no one has suggested, so far as I am aware (and counsel has been unable to draw my attention to any case which might even suggest) that persons living in premises—occupying them by virtue of the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts—are not occupiers of those premises in the ordinary and reasonable sense of that term. It seems to me that, if the legislature had desired to exclude statutory tenants from the province of para. 3 (1) (b) of the schedule, they would have done so in clear terms.

As counsel for the applicants has pointed out, the word "occupier" is used in conjunction with and immediately following the words "owner" and "lessee". "Occupier", no doubt, in this context includes persons occupying the premises, perhaps under agreements for leases or under short tenancies created verbally or in writing, but not under a lease. I do not think, however, that it would be right for me to construe the word "occupier" as solely referring to tenants other than lessees in the strict sense of that term, because it does appear to me that the Act makes a marked differentiation between the meaning of the word "occupier" and the meaning of the word "tenant" by the exception of tenants for a month or any period less than a month from the right to obtain a notice. It seems to me that it would have been quite simple if "occupiers" were to be used synonymously with the word "tenant" for the Act to have read "serve on any owner, lessee or tenant (except tenants for a month or any period less than a month)". However, the Act uses the two distinct separate words "occupier" and "tenant" and I am satisfied in those circumstances that "occupier" means something more or something wider than a tenant, though it includes tenants within its scope.

I asked counsel for the respondents what class of person other than tenants could be covered by the word "occupier", if that word, as he suggested, meant in this context someone who had some estate or interest in the property. With all his ingenuity, counsel for the respondents was unable to provide an answer to that question. He quite rightly said that the fact that an answer cannot be found does not necessarily mean that the word must be given the wider interpretation contended for by counsel for the applicants. I think it somewhat curious, however, that the word "occupier" should be used in this sense if it cannot include within its meaning any one but one who holds an actual estate or interest in the property.

I think that on any reasonable construction of the word "occupier", the meaning of that term must include persons occupying premises by virtue of the rights conferred on them by the Rent Restrictions Acts. I was for some time impressed by the argument of counsel for the respondents based on the use of the words "property of the applicant" in sub-para. (b) of para. 15 (1) of Part IV of sched. I. I think on the whole, and again not without some hesitation, that counsel for the applicants has provided the true solution for that difficulty. First of all he says that one must not allow a sentence of that kind, situated in a quite different part of the schedule, to influence one in the construction of what he says, and what, I think, he rightly says, is a word of the plainest possible meaning, that is to say, the word "occupier". He says that "any property" in para. 15 (1) is not used in the sense of any interest in land. The words, he says, are apt to describe the form of property which a statutory tenant does, undoubtedly, possess. It is not a form of property known to the common law, it is a creature of statute, it does not create any estate in the land or premises occupied by the statutory tenant, but none the less I think that would be a very unreal view to take if I were to hold that in no sense of that term can a statutory tenant be regarded as having a right of property conferred on him by the Rent Restrictions Acts.

I think on the whole that I should not affect what I think otherwise is the clear construction of the word "occupier" by taking any narrow view as to the meaning of the term "any property" in the latter part of the schedule. It is true that "occupier", as counsel for the applicants concedes, may have to be qualified in some sense so as to exclude a servant, a trespasser, or a squatter, or some person who has no interest, to use that word in its widest sense, in the land. I think, using the word "occupier" in its widest sense, that the Rent Restrictions Acts do confer on a protected or statutory tenant some interest in the premises which he occupies. As I say, it is an interest which is purely the creature of statute, but it is there, and it is, I am satisfied, an interest of very considerable value. It is a personal interest, it is, in some sense, a negative interest, being a right not to be removed from the premises, but none the less I think it is an interest which can properly be referred to as "any property of the applicant" in the sense in which that phrase is used in the schedule. I do not for a moment venture to inquire whether, when this Act was being drafted, Parliament had this particular problem in mind—they may have had or they may not. It is my duty to construe statutes in the ordinary and natural sense of the words which are used. Adopting that canon of construction, and not regarding this as a penal or confiscatory statute, I am satisfied that the applicants in both these cases were occupiers of these two flats at 83, West Hill, Putney, and that as such occupiers they should have had notices served on them in accordance with the provisions of para. 3 (1) (b) of sched. I to the Act of 1946. The requirements of that paragraph have not been complied with. There being admittedly substantial prejudice to the applicants, I think that I have no option but to accede to their request to quash the two orders in so far as they affect the rights of the applicants as statutory tenants of the premises in question.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Murray, Hutchins & Co. (for the applicants); Solicitor, Ministry of Health (for the respondents).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

BOWSKILL v. DAWSON AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (DEVLIN, J.), November 2, 3, 17, 1953.]

Document—Admissibility in evidence—Copy—Need to show undue delay or expense caused by production of original—Copy of statement made to police after road accident—Original statement lost—"Person interested"—Author of statement party to action for negligence—Evidence Act, 1938 (c. 28), s. 1 (2), (3).

After an accident in which a car collided with a motor cycle and then struck and damaged the rear of a stationary motor lorry the driver of the car made a statement to a police inspector and signed it. The next day a copy of that statement was made by a police sergeant, and subsequently the original was lost. The driver of the car began an action for damages for negligence against the personal representatives of the motor cyclist (who had been killed in the accident). Before trial of the action, the plaintiff died in circumstances unconnected with the accident.

HELD: (i) under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (2), a copy of an original document was admissible as evidence only if the court was satisfied "that undue delay or expense would otherwise be caused"; that sub-section was not a provision designed as a substitute for the common law rule as to secondary evidence of lost documents, and it implicitly required that the original document should be in existence; the only question which arose was whether it would cause unnecessary delay or expense to have the original produced; and so, in the circumstances of the present case the copy of the driver's statement was not admissible.

(ii) the document was also inadmissible under s. 1 (3) of the Act as being a statement made by a "person interested" when legal proceedings could be anticipated.

FOR THE EVIDENCE ACT, 1938, s. 1, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, p. 626.

ACTION for negligence.

The plaintiff, a doctor, when driving his car along the Colnbrook by-pass was involved in a collision with a motor cyclist and then ran into the back of a stationary lorry. The motor cyclist was killed. The plaintiff brought an action for damages for negligence against the administrators of the estate of the deceased motor cyclist. Shortly after the accident the plaintiff made a statement which was taken down in writing by a police inspector and signed by the plaintiff in his presence. The following day a typed copy of the statement was made by a police sergeant on a form headed: "Form No. 27 of the Buckinghamshire Constabulary". The original statement was lost and before the trial of the action the plaintiff died in circumstances unconnected with the accident. The action was continued by his executors, and at the hearing it was sought to produce in evidence the copy of the plaintiff's statement.

Marven Everett, Q.C., and Tudor Evans for the plaintiff.

Fearnley-Whittingstall, Q.C., and P. M. O'Connor for the defendants.

DEVLIN, J., stated the facts and continued: It is clear that the only way in which the copy of the statement can become evidence is by virtue of the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1) of which provides:

"In any civil proceedings where direct oral evidence of a fact would be admissible, any statement made by a person in a document and tending to establish that fact shall, on production of the original document, be admissible as evidence of that fact . . ."

if certain conditions are satisfied. That sub-section says: "production of the original document". In my judgment, these words, if they stood alone, would be sufficient to exclude the ordinary common law rule which admits secondary evidence of a lost document. It has been proved in this case that the original statement which was taken down by the police inspector and signed by the plaintiff has been lost, and that is why the copy has been tendered. It cannot be admitted merely by the common law rule as to secondary evidence of lost documents. In this sub-section the words "on production of the original document" mean that the original document itself must be produced. The statute makes admissible a document which would not, in common law, be admissible, and, therefore, its provisions must be strictly followed.

The only qualification, therefore, to the words "original document" that can be introduced must be found, not in the common law, but from the statute itself. Section 1 (2) provides:

"In any civil proceedings, the court may at any stage of the proceedings, if having regard to all the circumstances of the case it is satisfied that undue delay or expense would otherwise be caused, order that such a statement as is mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section shall be admissible as evidence . . . (b) notwithstanding that the original document is not produced, if in lieu thereof there is produced a copy of the original document or of the material part thereof certified to be a true copy in such manner as may be specified in the order or as the court may approve, as the case may be."

Counsel for the defendants argues that sub-s. (2) is not applicable in this case. The condition which is required to be satisfied before a copy can be produced is that the court should, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, be satisfied that undue delay or expense would otherwise be caused. It is not, therefore, a provision designed as a substitute for the common law rule as to secondary evidence of lost documents. It requires the court to be satisfied that undue delay or expense would otherwise be caused, and, therefore, implicitly requires that the original document is in existence, and the only question that arises is whether it would cause unnecessary delay or expense to have it produced. That is borne out by what follows in the rest of the section. The copy to be admitted must be certified to be a true copy. It looks as if the legislature had in mind the rule that where there are original documents which are kept in the custody of, for instance, a bank or a public authority, and it is inconvenient to have them brought to court, a certified copy is accepted instead.

I am bound to say that I think that it is not an altogether satisfactory ground for excluding documents. I have no reason to doubt that the copy in this case is an accurate copy and of just as much value as the original would have been. However, I think an Act of this sort must be carefully applied, and, in my judgment, the Act does not allow the admission of a copy which is produced in the way that this one has been produced in substitution for a lost document.

That really concludes the matter, but I think it is desirable that I should also deal with the second point and express my view about that. That turns on the well-known provisions of s. 1 (3), which provides that:

"Nothing in this section shall render admissible as evidence any statement made by a person interested at a time when proceedings were pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish."

Section 1 (5) permits the court to draw any reasonable inference from the form or contents of the document in which the statement is contained. Accordingly, with the consent of counsel for the defendants, I have looked at the document which counsel for the plaintiff desires to put in.

I am satisfied that, quite apart from the fact that the plaintiff admittedly knew that the motor cyclist was killed and, therefore, that there would be an inquest, it is a case in which a person in the plaintiff's position would have been likely to anticipate that civil proceedings would result. It is plain, I think, that he was personally interested. He was the driver and the owner of the car. Of course, nobody knows for certain that proceedings will result from a road collision—there might, for example, be a “knock for knock” agreement. Subject to that, it seems to me to be obvious, to take no other feature of the case, that a stationary lorry having been struck from behind by a motor car and having on the evidence been damaged, the owner of the lorry would require to be indemnified by the owner of the car. It is plain from the nature of the statement at which I have looked that the plaintiff was naturally concerned to explain how it came about that, without his fault, he drove into the back of the stationary lorry. I think the case also falls within sub-s. (3).

Accordingly, for these reasons, I exclude the statement.

Statement held inadmissible.

Solicitors: E. P. Rugg & Co. (for the plaintiff); W. Easton & Sons (for the defendants).
[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re GREAVES' WILL TRUSTS. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. ASH AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), October 14, November 12, 1953.]

Power of Appointment—Revocation—Fraudulent exercise—Special power to appoint among children and issue—Appointor having life interest in income of trust fund—Revocable appointment to children and grandchildren—Revocation with intent to further scheme for distribution of part of capital of trust fund between appointor and adult children.

By his will, dated Nov. 19, 1931, the testator, who died on Dec. 6, 1934, gave his residuary estate (referred to hereafter as “the trust fund”) to his trustee on trust to pay the income thereof to his daughter (referred to hereafter as “the appointor”) during her life, and, subject thereto, the trustee was to stand possessed of the trust fund and the income thereof on trust for all or any of the children or remoter issue of the appointor at such time and in such shares as she should by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment on trust for all the appointor's children who should attain the age of twenty-one, in equal shares. By a deed of appointment, dated May 30, 1938, in which she reserved to herself the power of revocation, the appointor directed that the trust fund was to be divided into as many equal shares as there should be (a) children of hers living at her death who should attain the age of twenty-one, or, being daughters, marry under that age, and (b) children of hers who should have predeceased her leaving children living at her death. She then directed the trustee to hold the share of each such child who survived her on protective trusts for that child during his or her life, and, subject thereto, to hold the capital and income of the share of each child on trust for that child's children at the age of twenty-one. The appointor had five children, the youngest of whom was still an infant. In 1951 the appointor and the four adult children suggested to the trustee a scheme for the distribution of part of the capital of the trust fund, the details of the scheme being as follows: (a) that the appointor should revoke the appointment of May 30, 1938, and release her power of appointment; (b) that the trustee should divide the trust fund into five equal shares and appropriate one of such shares to each of the five children; (c) that the share appropriated to each adult child should be divided between the appointor and the child actuarially, according to the respective values of their interests therein, the appointor releasing her life interest in the part to be taken by the child, and the child, by way of exchange, assigning to the appointor her reversionary interest in the part to be taken by the appointor; and (d) that, in the carrying out of the scheme, the appointor and the adult children should be separately represented both by solicitors and actuaries, and that due regard should be had to any estate duty payable in respect of the trust fund on the death of the appointor for which the trustee would be liable. With the object of carrying the scheme into effect, on Feb. 15, 1952, the appointor executed a deed whereby she revoked the appointment of May 30, 1938, and on Feb. 16, 1952, she executed a deed releasing the trust fund from the power of appointment conferred on her by the testator's will, to the intent that the trust fund should devolve according to the provisions contained in the will in default of appointment. The trustee sought the opinion of the court on the validity of the deed of revocation.

HELD: as the result of the scheme would be to benefit the appointor by putting her in possession of a large capital fund in exchange for her life interest, the scheme, notwithstanding the fact that it was beneficial to all parties, did not comply with the requirement that the donee of a power must not acquire any benefit for himself directly or indirectly: dicta of LORD WESTBURY, L.C., and LORD ST. LEONARDS in Portland (Duke) v. Topham (Lady) (1864) 11 H.L. Cas. 54, 55 and of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Vatcher v. Paull ([1915] A.C. 378), applied; a deed of revocation was subject to the doctrine of fraud on a power: Re Jones' Settlement ([1915] 1 Ch. 373), followed; and, therefore, as the deed of revocation was executed to enable the scheme to take effect, the appointment of May 30, 1938, was not effectively revoked by the deed of revocation.

AS TO FRAUDULENT APPOINTMENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 581-585, paras. 1033-1035; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 37, pp. 504-513, Nos. 972-1052.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Shirley v. Fisher, (1882), 47 L.T. 109; 37 Digest 507, 1001.
- (2) Re Jones' Settlement, [1915] 1 Ch. 373; 84 L.J.Ch. 406; 112 L.T. 1067; 37 Digest 508, 1006.
- (3) Portland (Duke) v. Topham (Lady), (1864), 11 H.L. Cas. 32; 11 E.R. 1242; sub nom. Portland (Duke) v. Topham (Lady), Bentinck (Lady) v. Topham (Lady), Bentinck (Lord) v. Topham (Lady), 34 L.J.Ch. 113; 10 L.T. 355; 37 Digest 503, 963.
- (4) Vatcher v. Paull, [1915] A.C. 372; 84 L.J.P.C. 86; 112 L.T. 737; 37 Digest 492, 865.
- (5) Re Crawshaw, [1948] 1 All E.R. 107; [1948] Ch. 123; [1948] L.J.R. 586; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Re Huish's Charity, (1870), L.R. 10 Eq. 5; 39 L.J.Ch. 499; 22 L.T. 565; 37 Digest 507, 999.
- (7) Re Merton's Settlement, [1953] 2 All E.R. 707.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether, in the circumstances in which a deed of revocation, dated Feb. 15, 1952, was executed by the defendant, Mrs. Ash, an appointment, dated May 30, 1938, whereby she exercised the power given to her by the will of the testator, Henry Greaves, was effectively revoked by the said deed of revocation with the result that, under the trusts of the will and a deed of release, which was executed by Mrs. Ash on Feb. 16, 1952, the testator's residuary estate was now held on trust for Mrs. Ash during her life and after her death for such of her children as had attained or should hereafter attain the age of twenty-one years, or marry under that age, in equal shares.

A Mrs. Ash had five children, the youngest of whom was still an infant. Under the will the income of the trust fund was to be paid to Mrs. Ash during her life. By the appointment of May 30, 1938, which was revocable, she exercised the power given to her by the will in favour of her children and grandchildren. The deed of revocation and the deed of release were executed with the intention of carrying into effect a scheme whereby, inter alia, part of the capital of the trust fund might be distributed between Mrs. Ash and the adult children.

Wigglesworth for the plaintiff, the Public Trustee.

Jopling for the first defendant, the appointor, and the second, third, fourth and fifth defendants, her adult children.

B Templeman for the sixth defendant, the appointor's infant child.

W. F. Waite for the seventh defendant, the appointor's infant grandchild.

Cur. adv. vult.

C Nov. 12. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This case raises the question whether the doctrine of frauds on powers applies to an exercise of a power of revocation contained in a revocable appointment. If that question is answered in the affirmative, there is the further question whether the revocation of an appointment in the present case, made in the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, was or was not fraudulent.

D The matter arises in the following way. Henry Greaves, the testator, made his will on Nov. 19, 1931. He appointed the Public Trustee to be the trustee and executor thereof and constituted a capital fund of residue which he defined as "the trust fund". He directed that one half of the income of the trust fund should be paid to his wife during her life—she died in 1944—and subject thereto he directed that the whole of the income of the trust fund should be held on trust for his daughter, the defendant, Mrs. Ash, during her life. Subject to those interests, he directed that his trustee should stand possessed of the trust fund and the income thereof in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of Mrs. Ash at such time and if more than one in such shares and with such provisions for maintenance, advancement and otherwise at the discretion of any persons and generally in such manner for the benefit of such children or issue or some or one of them as Mrs. Ash should by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint, with an ultimate trust in default of and subject to any such appointment for all or any of the children or child of Mrs. Ash who, being male, attained the age of twenty-one years or, being female, attained that age or married under that age, and if more than one in equal shares, subject to the usual hotchpot provision. The testator died on Dec. 6, 1934, and his will was duly proved. His estate was a large one, being sworn at a sum of upwards of £420,000.

G On May 30, 1938, Mrs. Ash executed a deed of appointment whereby she (inter alia) directed the trustee of the will to divide the trust fund into as many equal shares as there should be children of hers living at her death who, being sons, should have attained the age of twenty-one years or, being daughters, should have attained that age or have married or should marry under that age, and as there should be children of hers who should have predeceased her leaving children living at her death, and that each share should be held on the trusts following, that is to say: (a) on trust to hold the income of each share in the trust fund attributable to children who should not have predeceased her on protective trusts for the benefit of the child during his or her life; (b) subject thereto, on trust to hold the capital and income of the share of each child of Mrs. Ash living on the date of the death of the testator for all or any of the children and child of such child who, being male, should attain the age of twenty-one years or, being female, should attain that age or marry, in equal shares if more than one; and (c) subject as aforesaid, on trust to hold the capital and income of each share of every other child of Mrs. Ash for all and any of the children and child of such child born in Mrs. Ash's lifetime and who, being male, should attain the age of twenty-one years or, being female, should attain that age or marry, and for all and any of the children and child of such child as should be born after Mrs. Ash's death and who, whether males or females, should be living at, or, being females, should marry before, the expiration of twenty years from Mrs. Ash's death, if more than one in equal shares. Further, by the said deed of appointment Mrs. Ash also purported to make certain modifications in the protective trusts contained in the statute in that behalf [: see Trustee Act, 1925, s. 33]. She also reserved to herself power at any time or times thereafter by any deed or by will or codicil wholly or partially to revoke the appointment thereinbefore contained. Mrs. Ash is said never to have exercised her power of appointment among issue save by the said appointment of May 30, 1938. She was born on Jan. 30, 1897. She has been married once only, namely, to her present husband, and of that marriage there have been issue five children and no more, namely: (i) a daughter, the defendant, Elizabeth Woods, who was born on Jan. 13, 1926, and has been married once only, namely, to her present husband, and of that marriage there has been issue one child, who was born on June 10, 1951, namely, the defendant, Jane Elizabeth Woods; (ii) a daughter, the defendant, Barbara Frances Ash, born in 1927; (iii) a daughter, the defendant, Rachel Eleanor Ash, born in 1929; (iv) a daughter, the defendant, Mary Margaret Ash, born in 1930; and (v) a daughter, the defendant, Janet Ruth Ash, born on Dec. 29, 1935.

H

About two years ago, a scheme was suggested to the Public Trustee by Mrs. Ash and her adult daughters for a partial distribution of the capital of the trust fund, and particulars of the scheme were as follows: (a) that Mrs. Ash was to revoke the said appointment of May 30, 1938, and release her power of appointment among issue; (b) that the Public Trustee should divide the trust fund into five equal shares and appropriate one of such shares to each of Mrs. Ash's five children; (c) that in the case of each of the adult children the share of the trust fund appropriated to such child should be divided between Mrs. Ash and the child actuarially according to the respective values of their interests therein, Mrs. Ash releasing her life interest in the part to be taken by the child and the child, by way of exchange, assigning her reversionary interest to Mrs. Ash in the part to be taken by Mrs. Ash; and (d) that in the carrying out of such scheme Mrs. Ash, on the one hand, and her adult children, on the other hand, should be separately represented both by solicitors and actuaries, and that due regard should be had to any estate duty payable in respect of the trust fund on the death of Mrs. Ash for which the Public Trustee would be liable. The present proceedings were brought by the Public Trustee as plaintiff against Mrs. Ash, her five daughters and the infant daughter of Mrs. Woods as defendants, owing to doubt in regard to the proper answers to the questions stated in the opening words of this judgment.

Having decided to carry the scheme into effect, if possible, Mrs. Ash and her adult children have respectively entered into the following documents: (a) Mrs. Ash on Feb. 15, 1952, executed a deed whereby she revoked the appointment of May 30, 1938, and on Feb. 16, 1952, she executed a further deed releasing the trust fund from the power of appointment conferred on her by the testator's will, to the intent that the trust fund should devolve according to the provisions contained in the will of the testator in default of appointment by her; and (b) on Feb. 18, 1952, she entered into four conditional agreements for exchange (one with each of her four adult daughters), such agreements being agreements to exchange interests as proposed by the scheme as before-mentioned, but all were conditional on the outcome of the present proceedings and have, in fact, been superseded by further conditional agreements, dated May 15, 1953, to which I will presently refer. Subsequently to February, 1952, it was agreed that the scheme should not include those parts of the trust fund which consisted of rentcharges or freehold lands, and certain investments representing capital moneys arising from the sale of certain lands. The balance of the trust fund has been divided into five equal shares and the division is accepted by the Public Trustee for the purposes of the appropriations under the scheme. In the substituted conditional agreements for exchange, the respective one-fifth shares of the balance of the trust fund appropriated to the adult daughters respectively are dealt with as follows. In sched. II thereto, in each case, is set out the particulars of the share of the property appropriated to the daughter in question, and in each case Mrs. Ash and the child in question agree for the exchange of Mrs. Ash's interest in the investments in Part 2 of that schedule for the interest of the child in the investments in Part 1 of that schedule, such agreement being, in each case, conditional on the validity of the said deed of revocation being established in these proceedings. In the event of the deed of revocation being held to be invalid, questions will arise as to the extent to which the trusts declared by the said appointment intended to take effect after the death of Mrs. Ash are, if unrevoked, effective. I will refer to this later on.

It cannot be disputed that the result of the scheme, which derives from and depends on the deed of revocation, is to place Mrs. Ash in possession of large capital funds. Nor, I think, can it be doubted that the scheme is, at least, as much for the benefit of Mrs. Ash as for the benefit of her daughters. The first question, therefore, is whether the deed of revocation is of such a nature as to be liable to be invalidated under the doctrine of fraud, as that word is used in this connection. It is surprising that the authorities are so few and not altogether satisfactory. In Shirley v. Fisher (1) it would seem that BACON, V.-C., said that such a deed was not so liable. On the other hand, ASTBURY, J., in Re Jones' Settlement (2), came quite definitely to the opposite conclusion and explained Shirley v. Fisher (1) as being a case in which there was no evidence of fraud so that the pronouncements of BACON, V.-C., on the general proposition were no more than obiter. The headnote in Re Jones' Settlement (2) includes the following statement:

"Although the doctrine of fraud on a power does not apply to the release of a limited power . . . it applies to the revocation of an appointment thereunder. The donee cannot therefore revoke a previous appointment with the avowed object of obtaining a benefit by that revocation."

The judgment of ASTBURY, J., concludes with the following statement ([1915] 1 Ch. 381):

"In the present case, although there is no evidence of fraud in the ordinary sense, I still have to determine whether it is not what is called a fraud on the power for the wife to execute her fiduciary power of revocation with the avowed object of getting £890 for herself, she being neither an object of the power, nor entitled in default of appointment. There can only be one answer to that question."

In view of the plain words of ASTBURY, J., to which I have just referred, I think that I ought not to attempt to re-open the general question whether a power of revocation can be fraudulently exercised, and I propose to follow him and to say that it can. It is, undoubtedly, somewhat anomalous that the release of a power is not subject to the provisions as to fraud while the revocation of an appointment is so subject, but the whole doctrine is somewhat technical in its application. In FARWELL ON POWERS, 3rd ed., at p. 497, this sentence occurs:

"It must be borne in mind that, although the doctrine of frauds on powers does not apply to a release of a power, it does apply to a power of revocation."

Then Re Jones' Settlement (2) is cited. Remembering that Mrs. Ash is endeavouring by the scheme to put herself in possession of a large capital fund in exchange for her life interest, I turn to the classic pronouncements of the highest authorities, as, for example, Duke of Portland v. Lady Topham (3), in which LORD WESTBURY, L.C., said (11 H.L. Cas. 54):

" . . . the settled principles of the law upon this subject must be upheld, namely, that the donee, the appointor under the power, shall, at the time of the exercise of that power, and for any purpose for which it is used, act with good faith and sincerity, and with an entire and single view to the real purpose and object of the power, and not for the purpose of accomplishing or carrying into effect any bye or sinister object (I mean sinister in the sense of its being beyond the purpose and intent of the power) which he may desire to effect in the exercise of the power."

In the same leading case, LORD ST. LEONARDS observed (ibid., 55):

" A party having a power like this must fairly and honestly execute it without having any ulterior object to be accomplished. He cannot carry into execution any indirect object, or acquire any benefit for himself, directly or indirectly. It may be subject to limitations and directions, but it must be a pure, straightforward, honest dedication of the property, as property, to the person to whom he affects, or attempts, to give it in that character."

See also Vatcher v. Paull (4), in which appear ([1915] A.C. 378) the well-known words of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, who defines a fraudulent appointment as one which " has been exercised for a purpose, or with an intention, beyond the scope of or not justified by the instrument creating the power."

He also observed (ibid.) that it was enough to vitiate an appointment if the appointor's purpose and intention was to secure a benefit for himself or for some other person not an object of the power, and that, in such a case, the appointment was invalid, unless the court could clearly distinguish between the quantum of the benefit intended to be conferred on the appointee and the quantum of the benefit intended to be derived by the appointor. See also Re Crawshay (5) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 114).

I do not think that this case can be brought within the principle of Re Huish's Charity (6) or within Re Merton's Settlement (7), in which a transaction not altogether dissimilar from the present was carried out. There, however, the appointment and the scheme were not part of the same transaction, but were, as WYNN-PARRY, J., found, separate and distinct. The truth is that the scheme in the present case may well be regarded as a meritorious one, but the very fact that it is beneficial to all parties, non-objects as well as objects and including Mrs. Ash herself, makes it impossible for me to say that it complies with the requirements laid down by LORD WESTBURY, L.C., and LORD ST. LEONARDS in Duke of Portland v. Lady Topham (3) and the many other cases which illustrate the same principle. The scheme may be very good, and there may be many ways in which to carry it out, but, in my judgment, it cannot be validly effected in any manner which gives to the appointor, Mrs. Ash, many thousands of pounds of capital through and by means of her execution of a fiduciary power.

[After saying that further consideration of the question which then arose, viz., the validity of the appointment of May 30, 1938, should stand over for the present, HIS LORDSHIP said that he would make a declaration that, in the circumstances in which the deed of revocation of Feb. 15, 1952, was executed, the appointment of May 30, 1938, was not effectively revoked by the deed of revocation.]

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Woodcock, Ryland & Co., agents for Tweedale, Sons & Lees, Oldham (for the plaintiff); Vertue & Churcher (for the defendants other than the seventh defendant); Kingsford, Dorman & Co. (for the seventh defendant).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

MOORE v. NAPIER (formerly MOORE).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Collingwood, J.), October 30, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance order—Variation—Order for maintenance of wife and child—Variation of order on re-marriage of wife—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 7.

A On Mar. 8, 1950, the wife obtained a separation order whereby she was awarded £2 a week as maintenance, being £1 10s. in respect of herself and 10s. in respect of the child of the marriage, of whom she was given custody. On Oct. 17, 1951, the wife obtained a decree absolute of dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty. On Mar. 22, 1952, the wife re-married. The husband thereafter paid only 10s. a week as maintenance for the child. On July 24, 1953, the husband applied for the variation of the order "by revocation in so far as the payment to the wife . . . is concerned, on the ground that . . . the . . . wife . . . is no longer in need of maintenance". On Aug. 5, 1953, the justices varied the order by reducing the amount from £2 to £1.

C HELD: since the separation order, although it contained a provision for the maintenance of the child, was, nevertheless, an order only in favour of the wife, it was inapt to ask for variation of the order by revocation of the payment to the wife, and in the circumstances the justices were entitled to reduce the sum awarded under the original order from £2 to £1.

D FOR THE SUMMARY JURISDICTION (MARRIED WOMEN) ACT, 1895, s. 7, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 852; FOR THE MARRIED WOMEN (MAINTENANCE) ACT, 1949, s. 1, see ibid., Vol. 28, p. 736; and FOR THE MAGISTRATES' COURTS ACT, 1952, s. 76, see ibid., Vol. 32, p. 480.

APPEAL by the husband against an order of the justices for the Workington petty sessional division of Cumberland, dated Aug. 5, 1953.

E On Mar. 8, 1950, the husband was convicted summarily of an aggravated assault on the wife and on the same date the justices made a separation order on that ground in favour of the wife and awarded her the sum of £2 for maintenance, being £1 10s. in respect of herself and 10s. in respect of the child, of whom she was given the custody. The wife petitioned for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty and obtained a decree which was made absolute on Oct. 17, 1951. On Mar. 22, 1952, the wife married one Napier. The husband thereafter ceased to pay the wife £1 10s. per week, but F continued to pay her the 10s. per week in respect of the child. Under the mistaken belief that her rights had come to an end, the wife made no attempt to enforce the order. On July 24, 1953, the husband applied to the justices:

G "That the order should be varied by revocation in so far as the payment to the wife for her own maintenance is concerned, on the ground that the parties have been divorced and that the said wife has since become the wife of one Napier and is no longer in need of maintenance."

On Aug. 5, 1953, the justices reduced the amount of the order from £2 to £1 per week. The husband appealed.

H. J. I. Summerfield for the husband.

D. R. Ellison for the wife.

H LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the facts and continued: I think it is important to emphasise that the order of Mar. 8, 1950, was an order only in favour of the wife. Though the amount of £2 in all was divided between maintenance for herself personally and maintenance in respect of the child, of whom she was awarded custody, it was the wife's order. It is, therefore, in my opinion, as a matter of words, though, perhaps, not of substance, inapt to talk about varying the order by revocation of the payment to the wife. So long as the order subsists, there is no question of revocation; it is a question of variation by increasing or decreasing the sum awarded. It is true that at the time when the original order was made the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, had been passed, which had, by s. 1 (1), increased the maximum sums which respectively could be awarded for the benefit of the wife and for the benefit of a child, and, moreover, by s. 1 (2) enabled the amounts payable under then existing orders to be increased to the new maxima. The wife, however, never applied for an increase of the money in respect of the child; the only matter before the justices on the occasion with which we are dealing was the husband's application to revoke the order in respect of the payment of £1 10s. per week to the wife. Under the original order the 10s. would automatically cease to be payable on the child (who is now over thirteen) attaining the age of sixteen years. It has been argued that if the welfare and maintenance of the child had any bearing on this matter, the wife ought to have been made to take out a cross-summons and to invoke the extended powers provided by s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1949 to increase the award of maintenance payable in respect of the child, and to prolong its existence under s. 2 (2) of that Act, while at the same time reducing the maintenance payable in respect of the wife to at least a nominal sum, if not getting rid of it altogether. I am unable to see that so cumbrous a method of procedure was necessary, when all that the justices had to do was to give sensible consideration to the existing circumstances when this application came before them, viz., that there was a child of the marriage, now growing up, for whom the husband had never disclaimed responsibility, and in respect of whom he had faithfully sent 10s. a week. But if the order in respect of the wife herself were reduced to a nominal sum, the result would be, in existing circumstances, that the wife's new husband would have to bear whatever expense over 10s. a week was involved in the proper care and maintenance of this child. That, in my opinion, is the outstanding circumstance in this case. The justices reduced the sum of £1 10s. by £1, leaving unaltered the 10s. in respect of the maintenance of the child. The net result is that under her order as varied the wife, who, so far as we know, is still looking after the child, is to receive £1 a week. It is admitted that she is entitled to, at least, a nominal order on her own behalf, not less because the maintenance in respect of the child will cease in two or three years' time, and it seems to me that there is nothing excessive, in the circumstances, in leaving her in possession, for the time being, of £1 a week.

In view of some of the arguments with which we have been pressed, I think it is necessary to re-state that there is no finality about the assessment of these amounts. We were pressed with the argument that it will be hard on the husband to have it declared by this court that his former wife is entitled to at least 10s. a week as a nominal order. We are not declaring anything of the sort. We are saying that to allow her a total sum of £1 a week, in the present circumstances, is not an order with which we are prepared to interfere. We are saying nothing about how things will stand when this child reaches the age of sixteen years and that sum of 10s. ceases to be payable. It is not our business to peer into the future. In my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINGWOOD, J.: I agree. The criticism which has been offered of the justices' decision is twofold. The first relates to the amount by which this order has been varied, and it is urged that the justices' considerations, as set out in their reasons, are not to be supported by evidence. They say:

"The justices considered that though the [wife] had secured a fresh legal right to be supported, and her means had thereby increased, this increase in the circumstances of the parties generally was only sufficient to allow us to consider that a reduction of £1 a week from the amount in the original order was fair and reasonable."

It is argued that the only evidence before the justices was that of the wife, that the man to whom she is now married was able to support her, and that no figures were put before the justices as to the change in her circumstances. But it must be remembered that this was the husband's application, and, though the wife alone gave evidence, she gave evidence as his witness, and any deficiency in the evidence which she gave lies at his door. In my opinion, the "increase in the circumstances of the parties generally" includes the consideration that the original order of Mar. 8, 1950, was an order for £2 payable to the wife, and, as LORD MERRIMAN, P., has pointed out, that is an order in the wife's favour, although the amount is arrived at by an allocation of £1 10s. towards her needs and 10s. towards those of the child. The justices have decided, on the material before them, that the total of £2 should now be reduced to £1. The wife, it must be remembered, is still responsible for the care and upkeep of the child. In my opinion, it is impossible to quarrel with the justices' conclusion on that matter.

Appeal dismissed.

B Solicitors: Broughton & Co., agents for Milburn & Co., Workington (for the husband); Speechly, Mumford & Craig, agents for Paisley, Falcon & Highet, Workington (for the wife).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

C

LEWIS v. CARMARTHENSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), November 9, 10, 13, 1953.]

Schoolmaster—Negligence—Child at nursery school—Permitted to run on to highway—Injury to vehicle driver in avoiding child—Liability of education authority.

D

A child aged four years, while at a nursery school, was made ready to go out for a walk and was left by one of the mistresses with another child in a classroom. During the mistress's absence the child left the classroom and ran on the highway, causing the driver of a lorry to swerve violently to avoid him with the result that the lorry struck a telegraph post and the driver was killed. In an action for damages for negligence by the widow of the driver against the defendants, the education authority,

E

HELD: the teacher owed a duty of care, not only to the child who was permitted to stray on the highway, but also to those persons who might seek to avoid causing injury to the child and thereby themselves suffer injury; the accident to the lorry driver might well have been anticipated; the teacher was in breach of the duty she owed to him; and, therefore, the defendants were liable to the plaintiff in damages.

F

Decision of DEVLIN, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 1025), affirmed.

AS TO THE DUTY TO TAKE CARE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 568-587, paras. 823-840; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 12-21, Nos. 33-101, and Digest Supps.

G

Cases referred to:

- (1) Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young, [1942] 2 All E.R. 396; [1943] A.C. 92; 111 L.J.P.C. 97; 167 L.T. 261; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Bolton v. Stone, [1951] 1 All E.R. 1078; [1951] A.C. 850; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) King v. Phillips, [1953] 1 All E.R. 617; [1953] 1 Q.B. 429.
- (4) Lynch v. Nurdin, (1841), 1 Q.B. 29; 10 L.J.Q.B. 73; 5 J.P. 319; 113 E.R. 1041; 36 Digest 24, 118.
- (5) Haynes v. Harwood, [1934] 2 K.B. 240; 103 L.J.K.B. 410; 151 L.T. 135; affd. C.A., [1935] 1 K.B. 146; 104 L.J.K.B. 63; 152 L.T. 121; Digest Supp.

H

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of DEVLIN, J., at Carmarthenshire Winter Assizes, dated Mar. 31, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 1025.

A child aged four years, named David Morgan, was a pupil at a nursery school at Ammanford under the control and management of the defendants. The school was in a building situated behind the junior school which adjoined a busy highway known as College Street. After the morning period of lessons had come to an end on Apr. 19, 1951, between 12.15 and 12.30 p.m. the mistress who was in charge of the nursery school, a Miss Morgan, made ready David and another child to go for a walk in the town. She left them in a classroom while she went to the toilet, but outside she found a child who had fallen down and hurt itself, and she was absent from the classroom for some ten minutes while she attended to that child. During her absence David and the other child left the classroom, and David reached College Street through a gate in the school yard which opened on to a lane leading to the street. He ran into the road along which the plaintiff's husband was driving a lorry, and thereby put himself in imminent peril of death. The plaintiff's husband swerved violently to avoid the child, struck a telegraph post, and was killed. The plaintiff, in an action for damages against the defendants as education authority, alleged that the death of her husband was caused by the negligence of the defendants or their servants in allowing the child to stray into the road. DEVLIN, J., held that the defendants had been negligent through their servant, Miss Morgan, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and N. G. L. Richards for the defendants.

H. Edmund Davies, Q.C., and D. G. Jennings for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 13. SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Two related questions arise. First, was the teacher careless? Secondly, if there was carelessness or negligence at law within a certain scope, was the deceased within the scope of the reasonable contemplation of the teacher on the principle which I will not repeat but which can be found laid down, e.g., in some of the speeches of the noble and learned Lords in Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young (1). In considering the question whether the teacher, Miss Morgan, was careless or negligent, the learned judge first of all considered two matters which she, herself, had put forward as relevant to the issue. One was that, at the material time, in the yard into which this child and the other child went (it was common ground that they could open the door from the classroom into the yard) there would be children of from five to seven years old playing under the supervision of one or two mistresses. The other matter was that the door from the yard into the lane was usually kept locked. The learned judge said, and, with respect, I agree, that, had there been two teachers in the yard who could have supervised the boy had he opened the door and got out as far as that, that fact would have been relevant, and, in his view, would have been an answer to any suggestion of negligence. But that evidence was not correct. The head mistress was called and she said that the infants were at dinner until 12.30 p.m. On that point the learned judge said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 1027):

"... I find it difficult to believe that she [Miss Morgan] was ignorant of their dinner-hour or that she could really have thought that the side gate was usually kept locked."

One feels great sympathy with Miss Morgan. Even if she was (as the learned judge found) negligent, the consequences were very terrible, but I think it is clear from the judge's words that Miss Morgan did not create a wholly favourable impression on the learned judge and, so far as that was relevant to his decision, that is a matter which he could weigh and we cannot.

There is another point which I will mention. The learned judge made some complaint that Miss Rees [who was in charge of the infants on the morning in question] was not called and that he was not given more information about the injury to the child who fell down. It is a matter for counsel to decide what witnesses he shall call, but if the case had been that Miss Morgan was deflected from taking steps which she normally would have taken by a sudden emergency, that would have been relevant in applying the standard of what a reasonable person would do in the circumstances. The learned judge said:

- A "If the case had been that the child was hurt sufficiently badly to give rise to a degree of alarm that drove from Miss Morgan's mind the other calls on her, or to put her into the position of having to choose between two duties, both of which she could not adequately perform, I should have felt gravely handicapped by lack of material. But I think it emerged quite clearly from Miss Morgan's evidence that the defence was that there was nothing to prevent Miss Morgan from calling to David and the other child to come out into the play-pen, or from asking Miss Rees to keep an eye on them, or from keeping an occasional eye on them herself from the cloakroom, or at least from telling the junior children not to leave them alone."
- B

- The learned judge, who clearly found the case a difficult one, put forward three matters as affecting his mind. One was a statement by Miss Morgan herself that, although she had in her care these two children whom she was going to take out, she could not safely ask Miss Rees to attend to the hurt child because that
- C would have meant leaving the others alone in the play-pen. That, no doubt, pointed, as the learned judge said, to a very high standard of care. If the children could not have been properly left alone in the play-pen ought the two children properly to have been left in the classroom? He then refers to the fact that these two children were dressed up and expecting to go out. It is common ground that Miss Morgan—nobody criticises her for this—took the occasion of her free half-hour to take small children out into the town on an expedition which they, no doubt, very much enjoyed. It was suggested, picking out one isolated sentence in the judgment, that the learned judge had applied the wrong test, that he had asked himself whether there was anything Miss Morgan could possibly have done rather than whether she failed to do something a reasonable person in those circumstances would have done. I do not think that is right. The learned
- D judge poses the question in this form ([1953] 1 All E.R. 1027):
- E

"... the cardinal question is, therefore, whether she ought to have anticipated that two four-year olds, left in the position of David and the other child, might leave the classroom and get out into the street."

- F For the moment, I would prefer to say "leave the classroom or get into trouble or do some hurt to themselves". Having considered all the points the learned judge says (ibid., 1028):

"On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that Miss Morgan ought not to have been unmindful of these children, and that she ought to have foreseen the possibility that they might go out on their own."

- G I agree with that, but part of the second point has given me more difficulty, and I can put it in this way. Primarily, a duty of this kind is owed to the child and if in this case the children, being left alone as they were for ten minutes or possibly more, in a room of which they could open the door and from which they could walk into the yard, had gone into the yard and there damaged themselves in some foreseeable way, in my view, it would be difficult to say that that was not due to the carelessness which, on the basis on which I am at present considering it,
- H the learned judge has found. But was the street, as it were, so far off as to be outside the reasonable contemplation of the teacher? On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that it was not. We have seen photographs and a plan and it was not disputed that the door of the room where these children were left could be opened by them, small as they were, and also the gate into the lane. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, although that part of the case is on the border line, that it ought to have been contemplated that these children might get into the street. Once one comes to that conclusion then I agree with the learned judge that the deceased was clearly within the scope of the duty. A duty is owed to a child who is allowed to stray into the street, and it must, I think, also be owed to those who seek to avoid injuring a child and, in so doing, injure themselves. For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: I ask myself, what if the child had been run over? Would the school authorities have been held free from blame? Surely not. They ran a nursery school for children of three to five years of age. The mother had left her small son, who was not quite four years of age, in their charge. Somehow he reached the busy main street in the town, where he was in imminent peril. Those facts call for an explanation by the school authorities. What is the explanation put forward by them? Only this: The mistress was going to take this little boy and a little girl out with her into the town. She had prepared them for their walk when she had to leave them for ten minutes to attend to another child who was hurt. Whilst she was away for those ten minutes, the two children made their way through a door and a gate (which were both unlocked) and out into the main street. The judge thought that she need not have left these two mites by themselves for so long a time. She could have told them to go into a play-pen where there was a mistress looking after the other children, or she could have kept an occasional eye on them herself as she was only next door and could have left the door open. The judge found that she ought not to have been unmindful of these children, and I entirely agree with him. If the child himself had been run over by the lorry, I have no doubt that any jury would have found the school authorities to blame, and so would most judges of the Queen's Bench Division. At any rate, DEVLIN, J., would have so held and we ought not to interfere with his decision on this point unless we are clearly of the opinion that he was wrong: see Bolton v. Stone (2), per LORD PORTER ([1951] 1 All E.R. 1082), and per LORD NORMAND (ibid., 1083).

The child, however, was not run over, or injured at all. It was the lorry driver who, in order to avoid hitting the child, swerved, struck a telegraph pole and was killed. The question is whether that makes any difference. Does it mean that the school authorities are no longer to blame? I think not. Their fault is just the same, whether it was the boy or the man who was killed. The damage only is different. Does this difference in damage mean, then, that the school authorities need not pay compensation? If that were so, it would be a grievous state of the law. In the emergency created by this boy's presence in the road, the child might have been killed and the man saved, in which case the school authorities would have to pay damages. As it happened, the child was saved and the man killed. He died saving the school authorities from the consequences of their own fault. Can it be the law that they need pay his widow nothing? The truth is that the man's death is just as direct a consequence of their fault as the child's death would have been. They are as responsible for it as they would have been for the child's death, and the law should hold them liable. Counsel for the defendants, however, sought to say that the distinction lay in this. The school authorities, he said, owed a duty of care to the child and his mother, but no duty to the lorry driver, because injury to the child could reasonably be foreseen but not injury to the lorry driver. This argument contains, I believe, a fallacy. The duty of the school authorities is not merely a negative duty to avoid injury to the child: it is a positive duty to look after the child with reasonable care, to see that it does not go on to the road, and this is a duty which they owe not only to the child and its parents, but also to everyone in the vicinity. The reason is that a child of three is an unpredictable creature who may run into the road if given a chance, and that is a contingency that the school authorities can and should foresee. If they negligently leave the child to his own devices with the result that he is placed in imminent peril on the road, then their breach of duty is the same, no matter whether the child or someone else is injured, and they must be responsible for all injuries caused by their negligence unless they are too remote in law to be recovered: see King v. Phillips (3). As counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, it is not unlike the cases where a van-driver leaves his horse and van unattended and a mischievous child frightens it so that it runs away. The questions in such cases are, first, was the van-driver negligent? Secondly, if so, was the damage too remote?: see Lynch v. Nurdin (4) and Haynes v. Harwood (5). The question of remoteness in cases of this kind, as in the nervous shock cases, depends on foreseeability, but as GREER, L.J., said ([1935] 1 K.B. 156):

“It is not necessary to show that this particular accident and this particular damage were probable; it is sufficient if the accident is of a class that might well be anticipated . . .”

That is, I think, the case here. The accident was of a class which might well be anticipated. The damage was not too remote and I think the widow is entitled to recover. Accordingly, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I confess that I have entertained very considerable doubts, which have not been altogether resolved, as to the defendants' liability for negligence in this case. I cannot help feeling that in all the circumstances which existed at the time almost superhuman vision would have been required to enable Miss Morgan to appreciate the likelihood of the little boy David's leaving the classroom with his companion, crossing the school grounds (which were forbidden territory to them) passing through the main gate and occasioning an accident in College Street, more especially as the evidence disclosed no parallel or even similar incident having ever occurred at the school before. However, in an action such as this, an action founded on negligence in which the learned judge had the advantage of seeing the witnesses, something more than doubt is necessary to justify the appellate court, or any member thereof in interfering with the judge's finding. Only a feeling of reasonable certainty that the decision was wrong should justify such interference, and, having regard to the views which my brethren have formed and expressed on the matter, it is obvious that no such certainty can exist in my own mind. I, therefore, concur in the proposed order dismissing the appeal, but I should like to make it plain that, so far as I can see, no moral blame of any kind attaches to Miss Morgan for the tragic accident which befell the plaintiff's husband.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: A. V. Vandamm & Co., agents for Le Brasseur, Davis & Son, Newport (for the defendants); Davies, Arnold & Cooper, agents for T. Llewellyn Jones, Neath (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), November 3, 1953.]

Trust and Trustee—Trustee—Costs—Indemnity as to costs—Form of order—Trustee Act, 1925 (c. 19), s. 60.

At the sitting of the court on Nov. 3, VAISEY, J., made a reference to the Practice Direction with regard to trustees' costs: see ante, p. 1159.

In the course of his observations HIS LORDSHIP said: For years, ever since I can remember, it has been the practice on a summons by trustees for such a purpose as the construction of a will to direct that the costs of all parties should be taxed as between solicitor and client. That has continued, as I say, ever since I can remember, and has been the normal practice. It has recently been realised that, under a solicitor and client taxation, the trustees may not get the whole of what they are entitled to. A solicitor and client taxation is on a lower basis, not a higher basis, than the basis which is appropriate when trustees' costs are being dealt with. The matter arose in a very plain form in *Re Robertson, where the Public Trustee, who had his costs taxed as between solicitor and client, was disallowed the sum of £2 ls. in respect of a payment made for taking a shorthand note and for a copy of the transcript. That case came before me, and in point of fact I felt able to vary the taxing master's certificate and to allow that sum of £2 ls.

One thing is perfectly plain, and it is important that the profession should understand it. If a trustee submits to having his costs taxed as between solicitor and client, he is entitled to his costs as so taxed and nothing more. He is not entitled to take the taxing master through his bill, and then, when the taxing master disallows certain items, to go away and say: "That does not matter. I know I have wasted the taxing master's time, but I do not care about that. I do not care what he taxes off. I will help myself to whatever he has disallowed". That is wrong, and, hoping that I could help to resolve that difficulty in which trustees have found themselves, I, with the assistance of the Chief Registrar and the Chief Taxing Master and with the approval of all the judges of the Chancery Division, came to the conclusion that a form of words should be used which would give trustees more than solicitor and client costs, that is to say, give them all the costs to which they are entitled. The form of words which was adopted for that purpose is taken from s. 60 of the Trustee Act, 1925, which relates to orders appointing new trustees and is in these words:

"The court may order the costs and expenses of and incident to any application for an order appointing a new trustee, or for a vesting order, or of and incident to any such order, or any conveyance or transfer in pursuance thereof, to be raised and paid out of . . ."

the trust estate.

It is, I think, plain that those words "the costs and expenses of and incident to any application" are intended to cover the whole of the costs that the trustees were entitled to, and mean almost the same as costs on an indemnity basis, or costs as between solicitor and own client. It seemed appropriate to use the words of the statute. Any suggestion that trustees are being deprived of costs, and that this would be a more hostile taxation than there has been under the old solicitor and client taxation is absolutely wrong. The whole point of making this change was to give the trustees more, to give them a wider range, and to make sure that all costs and expenses which had been properly incurred would be allowed on the taxation. It is an attempt to get the taxation on a better, juster and higher basis than the old taxation, which, in the judgment of myself and my brother judges, did not always give the trustees that to which they were entitled.

* Re Robertson, [1949] 1 All E. R. 1042; 2nd Digest Supp.

HOUGHTON v. TRAFALGAR INSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), November 11, 1953.]

Insurance (Motor)—Exclusion clause—Liability of insurers excluded if “car conveying load in excess of that for which it was constructed”—Car carrying one person in excess of normal seating accommodation.

A The assured claimed against insurers in respect of damage to his motor car in an accident. At the time of the accident the car, which normally provided seating accommodation for five persons, two in front and three behind, contained six persons including the driver, one passenger being seated on the knees of another passenger in the back of the car. The policy under which the plaintiff claimed contained an exclusion clause in the following terms: “(d) Loss, damage, and/or liability caused or arising whilst any such car is engaged in racing, pace-making, in any reliability trials, speed testing, or is conveying any load in excess of that for which it was constructed.” The insurers contended that at the time of the accident the car was carrying a load in excess of that for which it was constructed, and, therefore, the assured was not covered by the policy.

B HELD: on its true construction cl. (d) extended only to cases where there was a weight specified in respect of the load of the vehicle, as, for instance, in the case of a lorry, and it could not be extended to cover the case of a private car in which an extra passenger was being conveyed, and, therefore, the insurers were liable on the policy.

C AS TO APPLICATION OF “ORDINARY MEANING” IN CONSTRUCTION OF INSURANCE POLICIES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 18, p. 430, para. 616.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of GORMAN, J., dated Apr. 27, 1953.

D The plaintiff, the assured, claimed against the defendants, the Trafalgar Insurance Co., Ltd., under an insurance policy, in respect of an accident which occurred on Mar. 18, 1951, as a result of which his car became a total loss. At the time of the accident the car contained six persons—the driver and one passenger in the front seats, and four passengers in the back of the car, three being seated on the back seat and one on the knees of another. The back seat could normally provide seating accommodation for three persons if the arm rest were pushed up into the back of the seat. The policy contained a group of clauses headed “Exclusions”, cl. (d) of which provided as follows:

E “Loss, damage, and/or liability caused or arising whilst any such car is engaged in racing, pace-making, in any reliability trials, speed testing, or is conveying any load in excess of that for which it was constructed.”

F The defendants denied liability under the policy, and contended that at the time of the accident the car was carrying a load in excess of that for which it was constructed. GORMAN, J., held that, on the true construction of the policy, the defendants were liable.

C. N. Shawcross, Q.C., and Humfrey Edmunds for the defendants.

P. M. O'Connor for the plaintiff.

G SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: If there is any ambiguity in cl. (d) of the exclusion clauses it will be resolved in favour of the assured. In my opinion, the words relied on, “any load in excess of that for which it was constructed”, clearly cover cases only where there is a weight specified in respect of the load of the vehicle, be it lorry or van. I agree that the earlier words in the clause are obviously applicable to an ordinary private car in respect of which there is no such specified load weight, but there was no evidence whether this was a form which was used for lorries as well as private cars. However, I do not think that is material. We have to construe the words in their ordinary meaning, and I think that they clearly cover only the cases which I have mentioned. If that be right, they cannot avail the insurers in the present case.

H

I would only add that the present suggestion that the words apply here is, to me, remarkable. I think the plainest possible words would be necessary if it were desired to exclude the insurance cover because in the back of the car there was one passenger more than seating accommodation was provided for. All sorts of obscurities and difficulties might arise. I would like to add that, if this or any other insurance company wishes to put forward a policy which will be inapplicable when an extra passenger is carried, I hope they will print that provision in red ink so that the assured will have it drawn to his particular attention. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: It would surprise most car owners to be told that, if they squeezed in one more passenger than is provided for by the ordinary seating capacity of the car, they thereby lost the benefit of their insurance policy. But that is what the insurance company contend here. They say that by reason of this exclusion clause they are under no liability. If the clause had such a meaning, I should regard it almost as a trap. I am glad to find that the clause is not capable of that extended interpretation. It is applicable only to cases where there is a specified load weight which must not be exceeded, as in the case of lorries. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. I think it would be most regrettable if a provision of this kind were held to have the force for which the insurance company contends. It would be a serious matter for a motorist involved in a collision if he were told that the circumstances which existed here excluded him from the benefit of the policy. Any clause or provision that purports to have that effect ought to be clear and unambiguous so that the motorist knows exactly where he stands. This provision is neither clear nor unambiguous. If applied to a private motor car I have not the least idea what it means. Accordingly, for that reason and the reasons which my brethren have given, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: R. I. Lewis & Co. (for the defendants); Hewitt, Woollacott & Chown (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

In the Estate of PARK. PARK v. PARK.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), October 27, 28, 29, 30, November 2, 1953.]

Marriage—Consent—Degree of soundness of mind required—Test to be applied—Capacity to understand nature of contract.

A In considering whether or not a marriage is invalid on the ground that one of the parties was of unsound mind at the time it was celebrated the test to be applied is whether he or she was capable of understanding the nature of the contract into which he or she was entering, free from the influence of morbid delusions on the subject. To ascertain the nature of the contract of marriage a person must be mentally capable of appreciating that it involves the duties and responsibilities normally attaching to marriage.

B Per BIRKETT, L.J.: The contract of marriage in its essence is one of simplicity. There can be degrees of capacity apart from soundness of mind. It is understandable that an illiterate man, perfectly sound of mind, but not of high quality, might be able to understand the contract of marriage in its simplicity, but who, coming into a sudden accession of wealth, might be quite incapable of making anything in the nature of a complicated will, but degrees of unsoundness of mind cannot have much relevance to the question whether it is shown that a person was not mentally capable of understanding the contract into which he or she had entered.

C Per HODSON, L.J. (on the question whether consent to a marriage required a lesser degree of unsoundness of mind than that required to make a valid will): In my opinion, there is no sliding scale of soundness of mind by reference to which different matters of which the law is required to take cognisance may be measured.

D Dicta of SIR JAMES NICHOLL in Browning v. Reane (1812) (2 Phillim. 70), and of SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Durham v. Durham. Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (1885) (10 P.D. 81, 95), applied.

E Decision of KARMINSKI, J. (ante, p. 408), affirmed.

AS TO CAPACITY TO MARRY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 16, pp. 564-569, paras. 843-854, and ibid., Vol. 21, pp. 286-288, paras. 492-497; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 40, 41, Nos. 168-190.

Cases referred to:

- F (1) Culross v. Park, (Dec. 1, 1949), not reported.
 (2) Boughton v. Knight, (1873), L.R. 3 P. & D. 64; 42 L.J.P. & M. 25; 28 L.T. 562; 37 J.P. 598; 33 Digest 146, 234.
 (3) M'Naghten's Case, (1843), 10 Cl. & Fin. 200; 8 E.R. 718; sub nom. McNaughton's Case, 4 State Tr. N.S. 847; 1 Car. & Kir. 130, n. (174 E.R. 744); 14 Digest 56, 229.
- G (4) Burdett v. Thompson, (1873), L.R. 3 P. & D. at p. 72.
 (5) Browning v. Reane, (1812), 2 Phillim. 69; 161 E.R. 1080; 33 Digest 137, 147.
 (6) Durham v. Durham. Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter). Cannon v. Smalley (otherwise Cannon), (1885), 10 P.D. 80; 33 Digest 138, 150.
 (7) Jackson (otherwise Macfarlane) v. Jackson, [1908] P. 308; 77 L.J.P. 147; 27 Digest, Replacement, 577, 5352.
- H (8) Forster (otherwise Street) v. Forster, (1923), 39 T.L.R. 658; 33 Digest 138, 152.
 (9) Baldwin v. Baldwin (otherwise Mann), (1919), The Times, July 30, 31.
 (10) Jemima Cole v. William Cole, (1857), 5 Sneed's Ten. Rep. 56.
 (11) Turner v. Meyers, (1808), 1 Hag. Con. 414; 161 E.R. 600; 27 Digest, Replacement, 35, 127.
 (12) Park v. Park, (1914), 1 S.L.T. 88.

APPEAL by defendant against an order of KARMINSKI, J., reported ante, p. 408, in an action in which he gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the defendant was not estopped (by statements in pleadings in earlier proceedings) from disputing the validity of the marriage of the plaintiff to the deceased, but that the ceremony of such marriage on May 30, 1949, constituted a valid and binding marriage, and pronouncing against the will of the deceased dated Mar. 1, 1948, as having been revoked by such marriage.

The deceased was a business man who had withdrawn from the day to day work of the company in which he was interested. Following the death of his wife in January, 1948, when he was seventy-seven years of age, and a stroke in May, 1948, he was in a weak physical condition, showed little interest in the details of the business, was unable to look after his financial affairs, was forgetful and untidy, and was sometimes confused and sometimes lucid. In March, 1949, he became ill, suffering some physical relapse and some degree of mental deterioration. On May 30, 1949, he married the plaintiff, and the same day he executed a will. On June 17, 1949, he died. In an action by the executors propounding the will of May 30, 1949, which was heard by PEARCE, J., and a jury, the jury on Dec. 1, 1950, found that at the date of the alleged will the deceased was not of sound mind, memory and understanding, and PEARCE, J., pronounced against that will. The plaintiff in the present action claimed as the lawful widow of the deceased to have an earlier will dated Mar. 1, 1948, pronounced against and claimed a grant of letters of administration of the deceased's estate. The defendant, a beneficiary and a residuary legatee under this will, alleged that, at the time of the ceremony of marriage on May 30, 1949, the deceased was of unsound mind and mentally incapable of appreciating the nature of the marriage contract and that there was not any consent by him to the marriage. He counterclaimed for a declaration that the alleged marriage between the plaintiff and the deceased was null and void, and that the court should pronounce in solemn form in favour of the will dated Mar. 1, 1948. KARMINSKI, J., held that consent to a marriage required a lesser degree of capacity than that required to make a will, that on May 30, 1949, the deceased was capable of understanding the nature of the contract into which he was entering, and that the marriage was valid and binding. He held, therefore, that the will dated Mar. 1, 1948, was revoked by the marriage and that the deceased died intestate. The defendant appealed.

Salmon, Q.C., and John Laty for the defendant.

Beyfus, Q.C., and Marshall-Reynolds for the plaintiff.

R. L. Barnard for the parties cited.

SINGLETON, L.J.; The deceased died on June 17, 1949. He had been a successful business man. He was head of, and owned most of the shares in, a private company which carried on the business of shipping brokers and packers. He was seventy-eight years old when he died. His first wife, to whom he had been happily married for over fifty years, died in January, 1948. There were no children. On May 25, 1948, he had a stroke which affected him seriously, and he was not able to attend to important matters of business thereafter. He recovered to some extent, but he suffered a further attack in March, 1949. On Mar. 1, 1948, he had made a will under which he had appointed two of the partners in a firm of solicitors, Mr. Culross and Mr. Trelawny, in whom he placed confidence, as executors and trustees. No one has raised any question as to his condition at that time, and it has not been suggested that he did not understand and approve of the contents of that will, complicated though its provisions were. By that will he left bequests to relatives, friends and employees and several sums to charities, and an annuity of £300 a year to a sister who has since died, and he provided, as far as possible, that his executors should be governing directors of the company for life at a salary of £350 a year plus ten per cent. of the net profits of the company to each of them. That provision, no doubt, when it was known, would not be very well received by those who are responsible for the ordinary running of the company, as, indeed, the evidence shows.

The deceased was a member of the Devonshire Club, and he used to go there for lunch and for dinner frequently. The cashier at the club was Miss Blodwen Wyn Hughes, the plaintiff. At Easter or Whitsuntide, 1949, when there were very few people in the club he commiserated with her that they should be the only two people left in London. Undoubtedly, he was lonely, and he was not well. On or about May 7, he took her for a drive to Hawkhurst, and the next day he told his chauffeur-valet: "That lady we had in the car, I am going to marry her. If she don't marry me I will commit suicide." The chauffeur said: "Well, I don't think you even know the lady yet, sir." A few days later, on May 10, there was another drive, this time to Woodcock Park, and in the hearing of the chauffeur he proposed marriage to her. There was no division between the chauffeur and those at the back of the car. The proposal was made immediately he got into the car. According to her evidence she was somewhat diffident about accepting his proposal, but on May 13 he gave her an engagement ring and £500, and the ring, it is said, was put on her finger in the presence of Mr. Culross, the solicitor. The deceased went away to Bexhill for a few days. On his return on May 26 the plaintiff took up residence in his flat. There had been discussions with the solicitor as to a settlement, and it had been decided that two thousand preferred ordinary shares in his company (worth approximately £6,000) should be settled on her, which she thought was satisfactory. She said, in the course of her evidence:

"Most of it had been discussed before. I was outside the room for about a quarter of an hour and most of the business had been discussed, and then I joined them, and as far as I could see everything was satisfactory and [the deceased] had said: 'Yes, everything is correct and done', you see. But as far as the actual figures had been concerned it had gone through before I went into the room, you see."

There is no doubt that he thought he was married to her at that time. Indeed, he thought he was married to her from May 13. That was spoken of as a delusion. The plaintiff was asked in the court below:

"There is one matter on which I want particularly to ask you. Part of your evidence has been read and it is clear from that that you said at the last trial that on occasions at any rate [the deceased] thought he had been married to you earlier than the date at which he was actually married?

A.—Yes, I did say that. Q.—Was that as a result of things that [the deceased] said—'Yes' or 'No'? A.—Yes. Q.—Will you tell my Lord what he said and on what occasions that led you to say that he thought that he was married to you earlier? A.—[The deceased] had always had in his lifetime everything he wanted, and when he gave me the ring on the 13th you see I had said: 'No, no', and then I fully made up my mind, and when I told him I had made up my mind I promised him I would never leave him whatever happened. He pointed out to me I was much younger than he was, and I said: 'When I make a promise I keep it.' On the 13th he gave me this ring and our engagement was to him and myself as sacred as a wedding, and then during that time— Q.—During which time? A.—From May 13 to my marriage. Q.—Yes, but he was away? A.—Then he went away to Bexhill and he came back one day earlier than he had said, so I took up residence in the flat and then at night time he came to my bedroom, and previous to me getting married to him I had been worried about the sex point of it."

The judge asked her the date, and she said:

"When he came back from Bexhill he came into my bedroom. Q.—At what time? What sort of time? A.—Oh, during all the night time he would come into my bedroom, and I would take him back to bed. Q.—What sort of time ? Do you mean after midnight, or after ten ? A.—We used to retire early—ten o'clock—from say ten o'clock. Q.—After you had both gone to bed ? A.—After we had both gone to bed. Q.—He came into your bedroom ? A.—He came in. He was dressed in a white bath robe which used to sort of frighten the life out of me, and then this went on during the night perhaps five or six times during the night. Q.—What did you say or what did he say ? A.—He came into the bedroom expecting me to fondle him, and I was a bit worried in my mind but I did not say anything to him that night, and that night passed. The same thing happened on the Friday night, and the same thing happened on the Saturday night, and then, of course, I locked my door and he used to rattle the door all through the night. Q.—What I have been asking you is what did he say ? A.—He did not say very much. All he wanted to do was to pet and fondle me, you see, and since we were married it was perfectly all right for you to go ahead. Q.—Is that what he said ? A.—Yes. To his way of thinking once I had said 'Yes' to his engagement it was just the same as being married."

She added it never occurred to her that he was not fit mentally to get married.

Mr. Turnbull, a director of the company, thought that the deceased understood the arrangements made for the settlement, though he did nothing except gaze vacantly, or smile vacantly, at the plaintiff, and practically took no part in the conversation at the time when the settlement was made. The settlement was executed at the solicitors' office on Saturday, May 28. On that day the deceased's condition was very bad. Mr. Turnbull thought that his affairs ought to be looked after by trustees, as he might sign something without knowing its contents.

The story of how the settlement came to be signed is given by Mr. Turnbull. He was asked:

"It is not on the question of understanding a long document, Mr. Turnbull. I am suggesting to you that on the last occasion you said that, as [the deceased] really did not know what he was doing, it was time his affairs were taken over ? A.—It is quite right, I did. Q.—Did you say that he was mentally enfeebled when he signed the settlement ? A.—Yes, he was. Q.—That was on May 28, two days before the wedding. Was he so mentally enfeebled on that day that he did not know what he was doing ? A.—On that Saturday morning, I agree. Q.—Is this a pretty fair description of what happened on that Saturday morning. Did you try to explain what you were getting him to sign ? A.—Mr. Culross did. Q.—That is to say that you were settling two thousand shares ? A.—Yes. Mr. Culross tried to get him to repeat it in words. Q.—He said 'Repeat after me, "I am settling on [the plaintiff] two thousand shares in R. & J. Park, Ltd."' ? A.—That is quite right. Q.—He tried several times to get him to repeat that ? A.—Yes. Q.—And all the poor old man said to him was 'I am giving her £4,000'. Then Mr. Culross would explain again 'No, you are not. Repeat after me "You are settling two thousand shares"' ? A.—Yes, that is quite right. Q.—And then Mr. Culross would say to him 'What are we doing' and he would say 'We are giving her the works.' Did Mr. Culross finally finish up by shrugging his shoulders and saying 'It's hopeless, let us get him to sign to get it finished ?' A.—Yes, he did. Q.—And did you agree with that ? A.—Yes. Q.—Did you think he was fit to get married on that day ? A.—No, I do not think so; not on Saturday morning, no. Q.—He was obviously hopeless on the Saturday morning ? A.—He was very bad. Q.—He was not much better on the day of the wedding mentally ? A.—Oh, yes; he was a lot better on the day of the wedding. Q.—Would it be true to say that on the day of the wedding he was not quite so bad as on the Saturday ? A.—Yes. Q.—Not quite so bad ? A.—No, not quite so bad. Q.—But still very bad ? A.—Yes, he was bad, yes. He was always bad but he was better at times than others. He used to get better as the day went on. He was always bad first thing in the morning."

Mr. Turnbull made arrangements for the wedding reception on the Monday. Meanwhile, the plaintiff had made arrangements with the registrar for the wedding to take place at the Kensington register office on Monday, May 30, at 11 a.m. On the Sunday morning the deceased was up in good time and wishing to put on his morning coat, as he thought he was going to be married that day.

A On the Monday morning he was up about 4 a.m. helping to prepare the room for the reception, according to the plaintiff's evidence. The wedding ceremony took place as arranged. The certificate shows that Mr. Culross, the solicitor, and Mr. Ernest R. Park (who was a brother or a half-brother) were the two who signed as witnesses. Several people were present, judging by the photograph, which shows the bride and bridegroom, the bride's sister, Mr. and Mrs. Culross,

B Mr. Turnbull, a director of the company, and Mr. Elsey, another director, Mr. McGrath, the chauffeur, the father and mother of Mr. Peter Park, the defendant in this suit, and the bride's mother, on the steps of the register office in Kensington.

Afterwards there was a party, and some champagne was drunk. Somewhere before a quarter to three the deceased signed a new will, which was on much the same lines as the 1948 will, with the addition of the £1,000 legacy for the plaintiff, with whom he had just gone through a form of marriage. The will was witnessed by the superintendent registrar, who was a guest at the party, and by a clerk in the firm of solicitors, Messrs. Culross & Trelawny. On June 7 the deceased complained to his doctor of his disappointment. He died on June 17.

C

Objection was raised by the plaintiff to the will of May 30, 1949—i.e., the will made on the day of the wedding—and there came about the action of Culross v. Park (1), in which the solicitors, who were executors, sought to have the validity of the 1949 will established, and the present plaintiff opposed it. Paragraph 1 of the amended defence in that suit alleges that the will was not duly executed in accordance with the statute. Paragraphs 2 and 3 are in these terms:

D

"2. The deceased, at the time the said will purports to have been executed, did not know and approve of the contents thereof. 3. At the time when the said will purports to have been executed the deceased was not of sound mind, memory and understanding."

E

Paragraph 4 alleges undue influence on the part of the solicitors and Mrs. Culross. That was found not proved, and I need say nothing with regard to it. On the substance of the case it is alleged:

F

"Under para. 2 and para. 3 the defendant says that at the time the said will purports to have been executed the deceased, who was then seventy-eight years of age, and who was subject to a stroke in the month of May, 1948, from which he only partially recovered, was physically enfeebled, he was unable without difficulty to read, the powers of his mind were impaired, his memory defective, clouded and confused, he was unable to manage his affairs and was able only with difficulty to concentrate on matters of business, and did not have and could not form a rational opinion as to the extent of his property."

G

There is also an allegation that his powers were further diminished as a result of alcohol and emotional excitement at the time when he made the will.

H Further particulars of those allegations were delivered on Oct. 26, 1950, before the case came on for trial:

"From shortly after the death of his first wife in the month of January, 1948, the deceased showed signs of general forgetfulness, lack of concentration, and of depression and in particular inability to attend to his personal financial and business affairs. He frequently contemplated suicide and on an occasion towards the end of the year 1948 did in fact attempt to commit suicide. He was forgetful of the date or day of the week. He would on occasions walk about his flat with his trousers down to his ankles, start to go out with his hat and umbrella but dressed only in his underclothes; forget to do up his buttons after going to the lavatory. He was often unable to undress himself. He would bathe or shave at 4 a.m. or 5 a.m. thinking it was 8 a.m., sit down to breakfast with lather on his face erroneously thinking he had shaved, and would leave the table in the middle of a meal to go and clean his teeth. He once picked up a cushion thinking it was his overcoat and tried to put it on. On Sunday, May 29, 1949, the day before his wedding to the [plaintiff], the deceased demanded to have his tail coat as he insisted he was being married that day; and on the following day, being his wedding day, believing that he had been married on the previous Thursday, he thought he had an engagement to take a Mr. Ludlow to lunch but on realising that it was in fact his wedding day he said: 'Blow Mr. Ludlow, he can wait'. He would have difficulty in reading. He was unable to understand the contents of documents put before him, although explained in detail, and his habitual response when asked for a decision thereon, or on other business matters, was: 'Well I'll leave it to you entirely.' On Mar. 1, 1948, the deceased executed a will but subsequently said that he did not really know what bequests he had made therein except that he thought he had created a trust . . . He would forget to pay for drinks he ordered in public places and when paying would proffer an excessive amount (not due to lack of change) or would let people help themselves from his wallet or write a cheque for him. He would hide money and forget where he had put it; he would think he had money in his wallet when in fact it was empty."

Those were some of the allegations made in that case by the plaintiff in the suit now before the court, as to the condition of the man she married, and they cover the date of the marriage. On May 4, 1950, Mr. Peter Park, a nephew of the half-blood of the defendant in this case, was added as a co-plaintiff with the solicitors. The case set up by the amended defence and in the particulars which I have read was supported by the evidence of the plaintiff and other witnesses. The hearing was before PEARCE, J., and a jury in November and December, 1950. The judge put questions to the jury, of which two answers were:

"Q.—Do you find that the [deceased] did know and approve of the contents of that will? A.—No. Q.—Do you find that the [deceased] was of sound mind, memory and understanding at the time of the execution of the will? A.—No."

The onus was on those putting forward the will. The answer to the first of those questions would have been enough, but the further question was put on the plea put forward in the defence, and the answer to it means that the jury found that the deceased at about a quarter to three was not of sound mind, memory and understanding, or, at least, the jury, on the evidence, were not satisfied that he was. So it was said by the present defendant that, if the old gentleman was not of sound mind, memory and understanding on May 30, he was not fit to be married and that the marriage was not valid. There followed this action, which was commenced on May 17, 1951, and in which the plaintiff claimed

"as the lawful widow and relict and one of the persons entitled in the event of an intestacy to share in the estate of [the deceased] late of Garden House, Cornwall Gardens, Kensington, in the county of London who died on June 17, 1949, to have a pretended will of the said deceased dated Mar. 1, 1948, pronounced against and to have a grant of letters of administration of the estate of the said deceased."

If she succeeds the marriage revoked the 1948 will and there is an intestacy. The solicitors have fallen out of the picture. No one interested under the will remains in the proceedings except the defendant, and he defended as, and is appealing as, an assisted person.

One can well appreciate the difficulties of Messrs. Culross and Trelawny and others who were interested under both wills. They sought to propound the 1949 will. The jury decided against that. It would be difficult for Mr. Culross now to say that the deceased was not fit to get married on the same day. No one suggested at the time that he was not fit to get married. The defendant in these proceedings gave evidence in the first case in support of the will. He did not give evidence in this action. The hearing of this action took place before
A KARMINSKI, J., in May of this year, and on June 12 he gave his considered judgment by which he held that the deceased could, and did, understand the nature of the contract into which he was entering, and that the ceremony of marriage was valid. The defendant appeals to this court against that judgment.

It was submitted by counsel for the defendant that the judge approached the case on the wrong basis. He put before the court these propositions. In order
B to make a valid marriage (i) the parties must understand the nature of the marriage contract; (ii) the parties must understand the rights and responsibilities which marriage entails; (iii) each party must be able to take care of his or her person and property; (iv) it is not enough that the party appreciates that he is taking part in a marriage ceremony or that he should be able merely to follow the words of the ceremony; if he lacks that which is involved under heads (i),
C (ii) and (iii) the marriage is invalid. His junior counsel, who followed, put the case in this way. No doubt the deceased intended to marry the lady. A person of unsound mind may form such an intention. The question for consideration is whether he sanely comprehended the nature of the marriage contract.

It was further submitted that the case ought not to be left in the way in which it stands. There is the verdict of a jury that the deceased was of unsound mind
D on May 30, and the judgment of a judge that he was fit to make a will on the same day, and there was no evidence of any change in the condition of the deceased between the time of the marriage ceremony and the making of the will; and it was claimed that, if the defendant was not entitled to succeed, at least there ought to be a new trial.

Counsel for the plaintiff agreed that, on the evidence given in the court below, there was nothing to show any difference in the state of the deceased's mental
E condition between 11 a.m. and 2.45 p.m. He submitted that the judgment of KARMINSKI, J., was right on the evidence and that this court ought not to interfere. He said that, as a matter of law, KARMINSKI, J., ought not to have paid any attention to the fact of the jury's finding of incapacity, and that this court ought not to have regard to the jury's verdict. At a later stage he withdrew F from that proposition to some extent.

It seems to me impossible for the judge in this case to close his eyes to the findings of the jury in the earlier case. He is not bound by them. He must make up his mind on the evidence given before him. At the same time, much of the evidence given before the jury was read on this trial, and, in particular, a considerable part of the evidence of the present plaintiff herself.

Besides the evidence referred to by the judge (ante, pp. 409, 410, 415), there
G are some passages in the transcript of the evidence to which I ought to refer. The first witness called for the defendant, on whom the onus lay in this suit, was Dr. Jenner Hoskin, a heart specialist, who gave evidence that he had been called in to see the deceased in consultation on two occasions after the deceased's first stroke. He described the deceased's condition on June 8, a few days after H the stroke, in this way:

"I was called in by Dr. Urwick of Knightsbridge, I think one morning, and he was then suffering from weakness of the left side of the body and face. His speech was not then affected. On examination I found he had a large heart, high blood pressure, hardened arteries, and I think there was also, as a matter of fact, a large liver. I do not know what the cause of that was . . . but he was very difficult to get to rouse and did not seem to take any interest in things. I occasionally got him to answer questions but his mind soon seemed to drift off and really one made the examination without very much co-operation from him . . . When I saw him then he was mentally confused. I have got in my notes that his mental condition was inclined to wander. I took an electrocardiograph at the time and that also showed signs of degenerative changes of the heart, and with that the heart rhythm was completely irregular, a condition known as auricular fibrillation. (Counsel for the defendant): Was his circulatory system sound or not ? A.—No, he had hardened arteries which I think must have been the cause of his stroke—hardened, narrowed arteries . . . Q.—Would the effect of this disease on the reasoning or understanding depend on the progress which the disease had made? A.—The progress is—— Yes, it would, but the disease is not, as a rule—— it is a slow, continuous progress, the disease itself, taking a great number of years, but, of course, having a stroke would have an extra sudden bad effect on the circulation.”

The physician saw the deceased again on July 25, 1948, and his note was:

“ ‘Mentality impaired; he was placid, vacant, no memory, no interest, gets intelligent about past events.’ . . . one was very doubtful that his mental condition would improve to any extent.”

He was asked:

“To what did you attribute his mental condition on July 25 ? A.—I attributed it to the condition which caused his stroke, the arterio-sclerosis affecting the brain vessels. Q.—In your opinion was he able to form any balanced judgment about anything ? A.—I did not think so.”

Later, he described his condition, and he used the word “gaga”. Clearly, he said, he was not fit to get married at that time. He did not see him afterwards. The witness had been asked to read a transcript of the evidence given by the plaintiff in these proceedings, given on the hearing before PEARCE, J., and a jury. He had done that, and he was asked this question:

“Assuming that what the [plaintiff] said was accurate and that he did and said and was in the state she describes in May, 1949, would you say that his condition was any better or the same or worse than it was when you saw him on July 25 ? A.—Reading the transcript of what I heard this morning, I should certainly not expect to find any improvement in that mental condition.”

He said in cross-examination:

“There is no doubt about it that, when this type of heart with arterial disease begins to fail, then one of the things which shows itself the earliest is impairment of mental faculties. On the other hand, when that heart is failing and you get it to improve the circulation then mental faculties very often become normal.”

Then he said it was the worst type of case. In reply to another question he said as regards July 25:

“Yes, but I was not very impressed by him the second time, as I mentioned I think I have just read that mentally poor, placid, vacant, no memory, no interest. That is the second time I saw him in July.”

It is quite clear from the answers which the witness gave that the deceased was suffering from a disease which is normally progressive. His mental condition was such that he was not fit for anything at that time, and the doctor did not expect there would be much improvement mentally. None the less, there was some improvement, as the evidence showed.

The witness, Lady Greer, and her late husband had been friends of the deceased and his late wife for about fifty years. Lady Greer was a widow, and after the deceased's wife died she spent a good deal of time with him comforting him. After the deceased's stroke, when he was able to move about, she used to go for drives with him, and she would go to see him quite often. She was asked:

"After his stroke, how often were you used to see him between the date of his stroke and the date of his re-marriage? A.—Practically every day until about ten days before his marriage. I used to go away with him week-ends.

A Q.—Did you visit him at his flat? A.—Yes, every evening, and sometimes he would telephone me during the day. (KARMINSKI, J.): I do not know where he lived. (Counsel for the defendant): Where was that? A.—Cornwall Gardens. Q.—In Kensington? A.—Yes, near Gloucester Road Station. Q.—I want you to tell my Lord, if you will, what you noticed about his mental condition during the period from the date of his stroke until the last time you saw him before his re-marriage? A.—Well, he seemed gradually to get more dazed and confused. He would sit a long time in a chair just staring vacantly and very often mistook me for his wife and called me Beatrice, by her name, and there was some excuse for that because she was small and dark, but there again I could get him to be quite alert if I spoke about the old days to him. Q.—For how long? A.—He seemed to gradually get worse, you know. At times he had longer lapses of seeming to be confused and worried and not understanding things. With money he was terribly careless. He would bring out his wallet and hand it to a waiter and say: 'Take what you want', but I must say they never took advantage of him. Q.—That was not very like his former self? A.—No, but he was always very generous. Q.—Was he able to understand, in the ordinary sense, when you were talking to him? Did he follow what you were saying? A.—He might at the start, but when I finished I would say: 'What do you think', and he would say: 'What were you saying'?, as if he had not understood what I was talking about."

Lady Greer said that he was lonely. He had asked her if she would contemplate marrying him. She said: No. They were both too old. She was asked:

E "What can you tell my Lord about his condition? Was he in a fit state to get married? A.—No, definitely not. (Counsel for the plaintiff): Is she an expert? (The witness): He was not in a fit state, even when he made those suggestions to me, and, of course, after that he wanted companionship. He wanted somebody to be there always with him to look after him."

She was asked in cross-examination:

F "It is quite clear, is it not, that from August onwards, in the course of the year, he improved? A.—At times, yes, he decidedly seemed better. Q.—And taking the general picture, there was a fairly steady improvement in the autumn of 1948? A.—I never thought he improved to that extent. Q.—I did not mention any particular event. There was a fairly steady improvement during that autumn? A.—I do not think so."

G She had known the deceased for many years, and that was her opinion.

Another witness, Mr. Starkey, an employee at the block of flats at which the deceased lived, used to see the deceased often before the stroke. Then he did not see him for a while, and later he saw him from time to time. He was asked:

H "And after his stroke what do you say about him then? A.—Well, I did not have a lot to say to him because I did not see him so frequent. But when I see him, which was generally with the chauffeur, where I used to pass the time of the day he used to look at you vacant, seemed to be penetrating right through you as if he did not understand a word or anything like that. Q.—Did he seem to know you after that? A.—Did not know me, not as I know sort of previous ways of conversation, he treated me like a stranger. Q.—After the stroke did he have any more of these chats with you that you have described ? A.—Not the chats in general. He used to come down and stand and spoke."

The witness demonstrated how this poor old man stood. He was asked about his appearance and he said he was shrivelled up and his clothes seemed to hang on him like a coat-hanger. He was asked:

"And at these occasions you saw him or said 'Good morning' to him, whatever it was, what was the expression of his face, can you describe it ? A.—Well—vacant. He seemed to me as if—well, he could not hear me, he would kind of stand there and look me up and weigh me up and down, and that was all there was to it."

He said in cross-examination that the deceased's appearance got worse as time went on, and another answer he gave to counsel for the plaintiff was:

"Well, he would not stand and talk. I would say: 'Good morning, sir', try and force a bit of conversation. He used to stand and look at me dumbfounded. Q.—He looked at you and walked past without saying anything ? A.—He would stand while the chauffeur made all preparations to get the car ready. He would stand there just like a little child."

When re-examined he was asked:

"Is there anything you observed in his manner when you saw him on those occasions ? A.—Well, he seemed—how can I express myself—well, put it plain speaking, if my father had acted similar to what I saw [the deceased] I should certainly think that my father should have some attention for his head, because he did not seem to me—may be I was wrong, but that was my impression. (KARMINSKI, J.): You would have done what ? A.—I would have certainly taken him somewhere to see what was the matter with him. (Counsel for the defendant): He said: 'to see about his head.' (The witness): He did not appear to me—well, normal. That is the only way I can put it."

I have referred to the evidence of three witnesses who supported the case of the defendant that the deceased was not in a fit condition to get married on May 30, 1949. But, perhaps, the strongest evidence on that came from the plaintiff herself. Her evidence given on the first trial was read at the second, and some parts of it were read to this court. At the time she gave this evidence she was, of course, seeking to upset the will, which was made a few hours after she had married the deceased, and this is how she described the condition of the man with whom she had gone through a ceremony of marriage. She was asked:

"You have given the members of the jury one or two instances as to powers of application. So far as ordinary normal conversation was concerned, what would you say as to his ability to carry on ordinary normal conversation ? A.—He could carry on a conversation, start a conversation for about five minutes, and then, as I have said before, it was just like as if a blind was suddenly pulled down and he would not know any more. He spoke about a gramophone he had had in 1912, that he had won at golf. Sometimes he was all right, but never entered into conversation. You could not make him understand what you were talking about. Q.—You say sometimes he was all right ? A.—Yes. You would start a conversation with him. Then you would ask him what you were talking about and he would not know what you were talking about. Q.—With things like what day of the week it was, and that sort of thing, how was he ? A.—He had not any idea at all, because he thought we were married the Thursday before May 30. On the morning we were getting married, he was going to have lunch with Mr. Ludlow at the club. Q.—Was he able to read his letters and read the papers and so forth ? A.—No."

Later she was asked:

"Between the marriage and the date of [the deceased's] death, were you asking him frequently what your financial position was going to be under the will ? A.—I did not ask him at all. Q.—Never once ? A.—No. What I was asking him about was to have a wage, as I said, or a dress allowance, because I had only had my £500. I had nothing else at all; and everyone is entitled to a wage or, as I said, a dress allowance. Even the ordinary workman is entitled to that. Q.—Did you tell [the deceased] that ? A.—Yes, I did tell [the deceased] that. He could not understand what I was trying to get at. Q.—Could not understand it ? A.—No, he could not understand that he had to keep me after he got married."

And a later answer:

" [The deceased] had no idea of money at all, because that is how I first got interested in [the deceased]."

B She said with regard to the question about a dress allowance:

" When I did mention it to him, he said : ' Well, we will have to see Charles '. Everything that happened was ' We will have to see Charles '. In the end, I was calling him Charles. During that, there was an appointment made for that reason with Mr. Turnbull, Mr. Elsey and Mr. Culross, for the dress allowance to be brought up."

C It would appear from those answers that the deceased was not even capable of arranging that she should have pocket money or pin money. He was going to the solicitors and to his co-directors. She was asked:

" Had you any doubt at any time that [the deceased] was not perfectly fit to execute that codicil if he had wanted to ? A.—No, because he did not ever do anything with business. He could not read. He could not understand."

Later in her evidence she said:

" [The deceased] thought I was married to him on May 13 when I came out of Mr. Culross's office. Q.—What ? A.—[The deceased] thought he was married all the time. Q.—Are you really saying [the deceased] thought he was married when you left Mr. Culross's office on the 13th ? A.—Yes, he did. Q.—And had entertained the delusion he was married ever since ? A.—Yes, [the deceased] had asked me to marry him on the 10th and he could not take no for an answer. It was just an obsession with him. He did not know why I was sitting in the desk working at the Devonshire Club. F He could not understand why I was still working after he asked me to marry him and I had to point out that there were waiters walking around listening to what he was saying. Q.—I do not want to catch you at all. I want to be perfectly fair to you. You have said that on May 13 [the deceased] thought that he was already married to you ? A.—Yes. Q.—Do you mean that ? A.—Yes, I do. I had to be on duty at twelve o'clock and I could not make him understand I had to go back to the club to start work. G Q.—So that at all times between then and the date that you were actually married [the deceased] must have believed that you were his wife ? A.—Yes. Q.—There is no doubt about that ? A.—He did believe it; he could not understand anything different."

H She described how on the wedding morning he had been up since four o'clock and she spent time helping him to dress. That is some of the evidence given by the present plaintiff in the earlier proceedings. The judge said he accepted the evidence of Lady Greer, and he accepted the evidence of the staff porter at the block of flats. He described the plaintiff as a thoroughly unsatisfactory witness. He said he was clear that he ought not to accept her evidence given on the second trial where it differed from that given on the first trial. He did not say how much of her evidence he accepted in fact.

If this evidence of those three witnesses, and the evidence of the plaintiff herself who had gone through a form of marriage with the deceased were accepted, and if it stood alone, one would think there would be every reason for saying that the deceased was not mentally fit to be married on May 30, 1949. It is necessary, however, to look at another side of the picture. Mr. McGrath, the chauffeur-valet, had been with the deceased for many years. He was called as a witness on behalf of the defendant in these proceedings. He said he had had to dress and undress the deceased after his stroke. He spoke of an attempt at suicide, and of his condition and habits. In cross-examination he said that after August, 1948, the deceased began to take an interest in things again. He took him to Lord's and watched cricket. He was asked:

"And when you drove him back from Lords would he discuss the cricket that had taken place intelligently? A.—Well to tell you the truth not a lot, because we used to get two cushions and like all the old gentlemen he used to go to sleep; and then I used to get the car and go home."

He heard the deceased propose marriage immediately he got into the car on the occasion of the second drive on May 10, and he said how the deceased brightened up at the mention of the name of the plaintiff. He was asked:

"What was the state of the deceased on the day of the wedding?

A.—Well, when I got there he was talking about the marriage, talking about the buttonhole, and I asked him if he wanted to get married in tails or a morning jacket, and he said on an occasion like that he wanted to have his tails. Then, just before we left for the church, he told me to fetch Mr. Turnbull in to the bedroom and there was three glasses and he poured us out a drop of his brandy each for his health, and then he went over to a photograph of our Mrs. Park, that is Mrs. Beatrice, and said: 'To the most beautiful girl in the world', and he said: 'Whatever happens, nobody will ever take your place.'"

That was a striking incident, and it would appear that at that moment, at least, the old gentleman realised that he was contemplating marriage. He was speaking, apparently, to the photograph of his wife, and he said: "Whatever happens, nobody will ever take your place."

Mr. McGrath was asked this further question:

"And you were present at the actual ceremony, were you? A.—Yes. He gave me the wedding ring and wanted me to be best man. Well, I went to the register office and Mr. Elsey was there and being the director I thought it would be nice for him so I asked Mr. Elsey if he would have the ring. I said: '[The deceased] wants me to but I would sooner it would be you', and Mr. Elsey gave it to [the deceased] at the wedding. Q.—During the ceremony did [the deceased] appear to perform his part intelligently? A.—Yes, I was surprised really the way he carried on because I thought, you know, he would have broken down a bit. Q.—That the excitement was too much for him? A.—Too much. Q.—But it was not? A.—No. And he went over and signed the book—well, I was not with him, I stood at the back. He done that all off his own bat. Q.—Have you any doubt at all that he understood precisely that he was marrying the [plaintiff]? A.—He definitely did know. I mean he had been talking about it for a very long while that he wanted to get married, and I think if [the plaintiff] had not married him he would have married somebody else. He wanted to get married, he wanted companionship. He just used to say that he was fed up and lonely; used to tell me I was better off than him—'You have got a wife and family and I have got nobody.'"

Then a further question:

"You never at any time had any doubt at all, did you, that he realised that he wanted to marry [the plaintiff], that he was going to marry [the plaintiff] and that he married [the plaintiff] ? A.—That was his ambition and he was trying, and he got his way like he did in everything.”

Mr. Turnbull, the co-director, gave evidence in support of the plaintiff's case. He described the condition of the deceased after his stroke. He was asked :

A “As a matter of fact, thereafter were you ever able really to get him to take any serious interest in the business itself ? A.—No. He more or less lost interest in the business side of it altogether. Q.—Did you try to get him to take an interest in the business ? A.—Yes, we gave him some figures. The turnover has gone up or profits are a little better and he would just say ‘Good’ or ‘Jolly good’ or something like that. Q.—It does not show any great lack of intelligence. He never said ‘Bad’ when you told him that profits had gone up ? A.—No, but I expect he might have said : ‘Why have they gone up, what extra business have you been doing’ . Q.—He was just content ? A.—Yes. Q.—Was there another phrase he used a lot when you tried to get decisions from him ? A.—Yes, he would say : ‘I leave it to you.’ ”

B Mr. Turnbull described how, when the question of the settlement arose, the deceased had told him he was going to get married and how Mr. Culross rang up C Mr. Turnbull to go and see him and to take details of the deceased's income. There was a discussion then as to what the settlement should be. As far as one sees from the evidence, though on the day the decision was come to the deceased was more intelligent than he was on other days, it was really a combination of the solicitor and the director who arranged what the plaintiff was to have by way of settlement. She was quite satisfied with the amount which had been D fixed, and he, Mr. Turnbull, was satisfied that the deceased understood that the settlement was £300 a year. He was asked later :

E “What do you say as to his apparent state of mind, according to whether he was interested in a matter or uninterested in a matter ? A.—He used to have a vacant stare on him and not answer at all if he was not absorbing it, but if he was taking it in he would nod his head, or smile, or say : ‘Very good, I leave it to you’ , or something like that. Q.—At any rate, you, with your long knowledge, thought you could tell when he was being intelligent and understanding, and when not taking anything in ? A.—Yes, I think I could. Q.—On what occasions did you see the [deceased] with regard to his marriage ? There was that interview at the solicitors' office. Were there a number of interviews at the solicitors' office before marriage ? F A.—No, I do not think so, not until the Saturday. There were two interviews with Mr. Culross. Q.—At which you were with Mr. Culross but neither [the plaintiff] nor [the deceased] ? A.—That is right. Q.—Did you have any further conversation with [the deceased] elsewhere about his approaching marriage ? A.—Yes. He asked me to ‘Phone Mrs. Leonard Park and request her to remove herself and whatever stuff she had from the flat.’ He G also instructed me ——— Q.—He gave a reason for that, did he ? A.—Yes, he gave as a reason for that that he was going to get married and he wanted them out of the flat to make room for his new wife. I confirmed that to Mrs. Leonard Park on May 19, requesting her to leave the flat by May 27 in accordance with the request made by [the deceased].”

H Mr. Turnbull was asked at the end of his evidence-in-chief :

“Have you any doubt at all as to his understanding precisely that he was getting married that morning ? A.—None at all.”

When he was cross-examined a different picture was presented. I have referred to that part of his evidence which dealt with the settlement which was executed on the Saturday, and with the condition of the deceased on the Saturday, and though the witness said he was better on the Monday he still said he was very bad on the Monday. There is something running through this case which shows that those who had managed the business were not anxious for the 1949 will or for the 1948 will to stand, for under each the solicitors, Messrs. Culross & Trelawny, were given complete control, and I can well understand that the directors of the company would not like that.

Then there was the evidence of Dr. Urwick, the regular medical attendant. He said that the deceased had a paralytic stroke due to a clot on the brain which affected one side of the body. He was never the same man again. He was inclined to be confused at times, and at other times he would be quite lucid. The deceased told the doctor in May, 1949, that he had met someone he would like to take as a companion, and he told him then that he was thinking of marrying. Dr. Urwick strongly advised him against it, and he said:

"I did not know he was actually going to [be married] . . . He was quite adamant that he was going to marry and he did not say when."

The doctor did not think it was to be in the near future. He said the deceased was certainly a happier man after he met the plaintiff and seemed less depressed. One never quite knew how one would find him, but he thought he would be capable of making a simple will as distinct from making a complicated will. There was no doubt of the serious condition in which he was. Counsel for the plaintiff asked him:

"The time you advised him against marrying was the last time you saw him before the marriage? A.—I did not know he was going to get married. I knew he intended it but I never heard of it until it had actually taken place. Q.—When you saw him on June 7 did he say anything then in regard to his marriage? A.—Yes. He said he had been disappointed it had not been consummated and he told me what he intended [the plaintiff] to have. Q.—Did he say anything about the rooms? A.—Yes. He said she would not share the same room with him and he was disappointed. He also told me what he intended leaving her."

Later the plaintiff was asked about that :

"Did you arrange with [the deceased] before going through the ceremony of marriage that there were to be no physical relations after marriage? A.—Must I answer 'Yes' or 'No'? Q.—I should like you to answer 'Yes' or 'No' and then add any explanation you care to give? A.—My answer is 'No', but if I may carry on that was the reason why I had advice from Mr. Culross regarding a man so much more—many more years—my senior, and in my own mind as men, or even my own sex, get older I am worried about their personal hygiene and just what happens, and that was my main reason for asking other people's advice. (KARMINSKI, J.): What I want to know is, did you discuss this with your husband before marriage, or did not you? A.—Yes. I discussed it with him and all he said to me: 'All I want—I am so desperately lonely and unhappy I do not care. I just want you and only you', and he was perfectly satisfied that the companionship was all he wanted. (Counsel for the defendant): I am not criticising you, I am trying to get at the facts. Did you tell him that you were not in love with him? A.—I was not in love with him, I told him frankly. Q.—And did you tell him that accordingly you would not be prepared to agree to any sort of physical relationship? A.—I told him that, until I got to know him better, I would prefer things to remain as they were on that basis, and if he was prepared to do that so was I. It was my greatest worry."

On June 7, as I have said, the deceased complained to his doctor that he was disappointed.

There was evidence from a member of the club to which the deceased belonged, a member who did not know him very well, but who described the deceased as compos mentis as far as he could see, and there was another witness, the daughter-in-law of that member, a young married woman, Mrs. Vernon Smith, who lived with her husband at the Royal Oak Hotel at Hawkhurst, which they kept. The deceased and the plaintiff went down to lunch there one day. She said that the deceased appeared to be just a normal gentleman. She had some conversation with the plaintiff, who, she said, told her she felt very sorry for the deceased; he had had a stroke; he was very lonely; the only thing she did wonder about was that she hoped people would not think that she was a gold-digger.

A

B

The superintendent registrar in evidence said he thought the deceased was quite normal. He repeated the words and appeared to him to be normal. We are told that the ceremony in the register office does not involve the asking of and answering of questions. It is merely a case of repeating what is said by the superintendent registrar. The superintendent registrar said the deceased played his part quite well, and he had no reason to regard him as other than quite capable mentally. The superintendent registrar afterwards went to the party at the flat and he was a witness to the will of May 30, 1949, which has been held not to be a valid will.

C

There is no doubt that there was evidence on both sides, both ways. It is most admirably dealt with in the judgment of KARMINSKI, J., to which I have referred. What is striking is that, so far as the evidence shows, no one ever suggested before the deceased died that he was mentally unfit to marry. Relations, a brother and his wife, and the solicitor and his wife were present at the wedding, and they appear in the photograph. Directors were present, too. It would be difficult for Mr. Culross to say the deceased was not fit to get married when he, Mr. Culross, drew up the settlement which was executed on May 28, and also had drafted the will which was signed on May 30. There were numerous relations, but not one of them raised any question at the time, so far as we know from the evidence.

D

KARMINSKI, J., in his judgment, said (ante, p. 413):

E

“I think there is force in the argument of counsel for the plaintiff, and I approach the facts of this case on the basis that a lesser degree of capacity is required to consent to a marriage than in the making of a will.”

That appears to have been based on a passage or passages in the judgment of SIR JAMES HANNEN, in Boughton v. Knight (2), a will case, in which he said in his direction to a jury (L.R. 3 P. & D. 71):

F

“Some years ago the question of what amount of mental capacity was required to make a man responsible for crime was considered in M’Naghten’s Case (3). No doubt the question is treated somewhat differently in a criminal suit to what it is here (the difference I will explain presently); but there is, as you will easily see, an analogy between the cases which will be of use to us in considering the points before us. TINDAL, C.J., in expressing the opinion of all the judges, said—‘In all cases every man is to be presumed to be sane until the contrary is proved, and it must be clearly proved, that at the time of committing or executing the act the party was labouring under such defect of reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing; or if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong.’ That, in my opinion, affords as nearly as possible a general formula which is applicable in all cases in which the question arises, not exactly, perhaps, in the terms I have read, but to the extent I will explain to you. It is essential, to constitute responsibility for crime, that a man shall understand the nature and quality of the thing he is doing, or that he shall be able to distinguish in the act he is doing right from wrong.

G

H

Now a very small degree of intelligence is sufficient to enable a man to judge of the quality and nature of the act, and whether he is doing right or wrong, when he kills another man; accordingly he is responsible for the crime committed if he possesses that amount of intelligence. And so in reference to all other concerns of life,—was the man at the time the act was done of sufficient capacity to understand the nature of the act? Take the question of marriage. It is always left in precisely the same terms as I have to suggest in this case. If the validity of a marriage be disputed on the ground that one or other of the parties was of unsound mind, the question will be, was he or she capable of understanding the nature of the contract which he or she had entered into. The same will occur in regard to contracts of selling and buying. Again, take the case suggested by counsel, of a man, who, being confined in a lunatic asylum, is called upon to give evidence. First, the judge will have to consider, was he capable of understanding the nature and character of the act that he was called upon to do, when he was sworn to speak the truth? Was he capable of understanding the nature of the obligation imposed upon him by that oath? If so, then he was of sufficient capacity to give evidence as a witness. But, gentlemen, whatever degree of mental soundness is required for any one of these things,—responsibility for crime, capacity to marry, capacity to contract, capacity to give evidence as a witness—I must tell you, without fear of contradiction, that the highest degree of all, if degrees there be, is required in order to constitute capacity to make a testamentary disposition. And you will easily see why. Because it involves a larger and wider survey of facts and things than any one of those matters to which I have drawn your attention."

In a later case, Burdett v. Thompson (4), SIR JAMES HANNEN, in directing a jury, said (ibid., 73n.):

"It has been erroneously supposed that I said that it requires a greater degree of soundness of mind to make a will than to do any other act. I never said, and I never meant to say so. What I have said, and I repeat it, is, that if you are at liberty to draw distinctions between various degrees of soundness of mind, then, whatever is the highest degree of soundness is required to make a will. That is very different from the proposition that it requires a higher degree of soundness of mind to make a will than to do anything else."

I do not think that any good purpose is served by seeking to draw any such distinction, nor do I believe that there is one. If a man's mental condition is such that he is not capable of making a simple will: "I leave all of which I stand possessed to my wife", or, "I give and bequeath all my property of whatever nature equally between my children", most people would consider that he is not in a fit condition to enter into a contract of marriage. Further considerations may well arise when a complicated testamentary document is propounded, and it must not be overlooked that in such a case there is the question whether the testator knew and approved the contents of the will.

In Browning v. Reane (5) administration of the effects of a wife was refused to the husband on the ground that his marriage had been illegally contracted and nullity of marriage was established. In that case SIR JOHN NICHOLL said (2 Phillim. 70):

"Here then the law, and the good sense of the law, are clearly laid down; want of reason must, of course, invalidate a contract, and the most important contract of life, the very essence of which is consent. It is not material whether the want of consent arises from idiocy or lunacy, or from both combined: nor does it seem necessary, in this case, to enter into any disquisition of what is idiocy, and what is lunacy; complete idiocy, total fatuity from the birth, rarely occurs; a much more common case is mental weakness and imbecility, increased as a person grows up and advances in age, from various supervening causes, so as to produce unsoundness of mind. Objects of this sort have occurred to the observation of most people. If the incapacity be such, arising from either or both causes, that the party is incapable of understanding the nature of the contract itself, and incapable, from mental imbecility, to take care of his or her own person and property, such an individual cannot dispose of her person and property by the matrimonial contract, any more than by any other contract. The exact line of separation between reason and incapacity may be difficult to be found and marked out in the abstract; though it may not be difficult, in most cases, to decide upon the result of the circumstances; and this appears to be a case of that description, the circumstances being such as to leave no doubt upon my mind."

It will be observed that SIR JOHN NICHOLL put as a test

"and incapable, from mental imbecility, to take care of his or her own person and property."

It must depend, of course, on the degree of mental imbecility. A person may be slovenly or wildly extravagant, but still capable of entering into a contract of marriage.

In Durham v. Durham (6) the petitioner sought a declaration of nullity of his marriage on the ground that, at the time of the celebration of the marriage, his wife was of unsound mind and incapable of contracting marriage. SIR

JAMES HANNEN, P., said (10 P.D. 81):

"All the authorities bearing on the subject have been brought to my notice, but I do not think it necessary to review them, as I am of opinion that every case of this kind must be decided upon its own facts. Nor do I consider that it would be useful to borrow from my predecessors, or to attempt myself to form any exact definition of what constitutes soundness of mind. I accept for the purposes of this case the definition which has been substantially agreed upon by the counsel to whom I have to express my obligations for the very able assistance they have given me, namely, a capacity to understand the nature of the contract, and the duties and responsibilities which it creates. It is to be observed, however, that this only conceals for a moment the difficulties of the inquiry, for I have still to determine the meaning to be attached to the word 'understand'. If I were to attempt to analyse this expression, I should encounter the same difficulties at some other stage of the investigation with reference to some other phrase, and I should still have to determine, on a review of the whole facts, whether the respondent came up to the standard of sanity which I must fix in my own mind, though I may not be able to express it. I may say this much in the outset, that it appears to me that the contract of marriage is a very simple one, which does not require a high degree of intelligence to comprehend. It is an engagement between a man and woman to live together, and love one another as husband and wife, to the exclusion of all others. This is expanded in the promises of the marriage ceremony by words having reference to the natural relations which spring from that engagement, such as protection on the part of the man, and submission on the part of the woman. I agree with the Solicitor-General, that a mere comprehension of the words of the promises exchanged is not sufficient. The mind of one of the parties may be capable of understanding the language used, but may yet be affected by such delusions, or other symptoms of insanity, as may satisfy the tribunal that there was not a real appreciation of the engagement apparently entered into."

In Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (6) SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., said (ibid., 95):

"The question which I have to determine is not whether she was aware that she was going through the ceremony of marriage, but whether she was capable of understanding the nature of the contract she was entering into, free from the influence of morbid delusions upon the subject."

In Jackson (otherwise Macfarlane) v. Jackson (7) BARGRAVE DEANE, J. ([1908] P. 310) adopted what SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., had said in Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (6), and he added (ibid.):

"Those words are short, concise, and clear, and I think I may fairly use them in applying my mind to the particular facts of the present case."

In 1923 SIR HENRY DUKE, P., heard the case of Forster (otherwise Street) v. Forster (8), in which the wife sought a decree of nullity on the ground of unsoundness of mind. There was no appearance on behalf of the husband, and counsel for the wife asked (39 T.L.R. 659):

"Assume that for three weeks before the ceremony he had been drinking large quantities of whiskey, was he, on Feb. 8, 1923, in your opinion, in a condition to understand all the consequences of matrimony. (The President): Did you ever know anybody who was in a condition to understand all the consequences of matrimony? (The witness): No, my Lord."

That shows something of the difficulty of formulating the right test. The President in that case, in the course of his judgment granting the declaration prayed, said (ibid., 661):

"The mind of one of the parties may be capable of understanding the language used, but may yet be affected by such delusions, or other symptoms of insanity, as may satisfy the tribunal that there was not a real appreciation of the engagement apparently entered into. Now that the respondent knew that he had proposed marriage and the effect of the ceremony and its primary consequences I cannot doubt, but whether his mind at the time was in such a condition that he appreciated and understood the effect of the ceremony is more doubtful. The evidence of members of his family has satisfied me that he was not normal, and that there have been in the past recurrent periods during which he behaved in an unaccountable way after consuming large quantities of alcohol. I have had before me, too, a number of mental specialists, who tell me on their responsibility, and indeed on their oath, that there were with the respondent recurrent periods in which he was the victim of what are called 'grandiose delusions'. If I had believed that the petitioner had been imposed upon by a rascal—as I was at one time much inclined to believe—I must have refused her the relief which she sought. But I have come to the conclusion that at the end of January and the beginning of February the respondent really held the deluded belief that he was an officer holding a responsible and trusted command, and that he suffered from delusions as to his own persona, as to his position in the world, and as to his capacity to perform any of the obligations which he undertook—delusions which rendered his life at that time an unreal thing. On that finding I hold that he was mentally incapable of entering into the contract of marriage and I pronounce a decree nisi of nullity of marriage."

The President had been referred to the decision of SHEARMAN, J., in Baldwin v. Baldwin (otherwise Mann) (9), in which the judge had held that the husband had not the judgment necessary to enter into a contract of marriage.

Counsel for the defendant referred to Jemima Cole v. William Cole (10), of which the headnote reads (5 Sneed's Ten. Rep. 56):

"1. Marriage—Voidable for insanity. Marriage is a civil contract, and may be avoided like any other contract, for want of sufficient mental capacity in the parties. If the mind is unsound at the time, it is incapable of consent, and that is an essential element in all contracts. 2. Same—Same. It is a general rule that those who have not the regular use of their understanding sufficient to deal with discretion in the common affairs of life, or the weakness being so considerable as to amount to derangement, are incapable of contracting a valid marriage. Bishop's Mar. & Div., s. 117.

3. Same—Same—Practice—Proof of Insanity. In an application to annul a marriage, on the ground of the insanity of one of the parties at the time thereof, the proof of such insanity must be clear and unquestionable."

In the opinion of the court delivered by CARUTHERS, J., there is the following passage (ibid., 59):

A "Marriage, by our law, is a civil contract, and may be avoided, like any other contract, for want of sufficient mental capacity in the parties. If the mind is unsound at the time, it is incapable of consent, and that is an essential element in all contracts. In the dark ages, when there was thought to be something sacred and mysterious in the matrimonial relation, and its civil was almost obliterated by its spiritual character, the marriage of persons of unsound mind was held valid. BLACKSTONE, in his 'COMMENTARIES',
B vol. 2, pp. 438, 439, says this was 'a strange determination, since consent is absolutely requisite to matrimony, and neither idiots nor lunatics are capable of consenting to anything'. The test question in all such cases is whether the party is capable of making any binding contract. The identity of the doctrine that unsoundness of mind vitiates this as well as all other contracts is well established. But every consideration of policy and humanity
C admonishes us that a contract so essentially connected with the peace and happiness of individuals and families, and the well-being of society, should not be annulled on this or any other ground, not clearly made out. The consequences, in many cases, would be most deplorable. The rights of property would be unsettled and the peace of families destroyed, to say nothing about the effects upon the innocent offspring. The annulment of other contracts would only affect property; but this would do that, and more—it would tell upon the happiness, character, and peace of the parties. The appalling character of these consequences is well calculated to impress the courts with the solemn duty of requiring a clear case for the application of the general principle to this delicate and important contract. It is, however, only a civil contract, and must stand or fall by the usual tests
E applicable to contracts. It is not every unsoundness that will avoid a contract. The degree necessary to produce this effect is fixed by the law, and must be made out by proof. All persons of lawful age are presumed to be capable of contracting, until the contrary is made to appear. So, sanity is presumed, and if the contrary is alleged, it must be proved by the party imputing it. If a state of permanent insanity is once shown, the F burden of proof shifts, and a lucid interval must be proved by the other side. But the rule is different in a case of temporary insanity, depending on some exciting cause not in perpetual action. The general rule is, 'that those who have not the regular use of their understanding, sufficient to deal with discretion in the common affairs of life, or the weakness being so considerable as to amount to derangement, are incapable of contracting a valid marriage, or making any other binding contract.' Bishop on Mar. & Div., s. 177. SIR JOHN NICHOLL, in Browning v. Reane (5), says (2 Phillim. 70): 'If the incapacity be such . . . that the party is incapable of understanding the nature of the contract itself, and incapable, from mental imbecility, to take care of his or her own person and property, such an individual cannot dispose of her person and property by the matrimonial contract, any more than by any other contract.' It is difficult to describe any exact, palpable
H line between legal capacity and incapacity. Perhaps this is impracticable, as an abstract thing, in reference to the ability to make a valid contract, as insanity subsists in various degrees, and the line of separation between it and mere imbecility is often faint and imperceptible. The general test is the fitness of the person to be trusted with the management of himself and his own concerns. Such a person has a disposing, contracting mind, although it may be in a degree impaired."

The question, I think, is this. Was the deceased on the morning of May 30, 1949, capable of understanding the nature of the contract into which he was entering, or was his mental condition such that he was incapable of understanding it? In order to ascertain the nature of the contract of marriage a man must be mentally capable of appreciating that it involves the responsibilities normally attaching to marriage. Without that degree of mentality, it cannot be said that he understands the nature of the contract. That is the test I would apply, and my reading of the judgment of KARMINSKI, J. (ante, p. 415), satisfies me that he put to himself the right question. He had to make up his mind on the evidence given before him. He was not content to rest his decision on any question of onus of proof. He said (ibid.):

"I have come to the conclusion that he could and did understand the nature of the contract he was entering into, and I find that the ceremony of marriage in fact performed on May 30, 1949, between the deceased and the plaintiff constituted a valid and binding marriage between them."

This court ought not to interfere with that finding. Nor do I think that we ought to order a new trial, though I do not pretend I regard the case with a satisfactory feeling. The question of fitness to marry might have been raised in the first action, i.e., on the hearing before PEARCE, J., and a jury. Learned counsel agreed that it could have been set up in the reply or by an amendment of the claim. If that had been raised, the jury would have had to decide not only the question of fitness to make a will, but also the question of fitness to marry. It would have been more fitting and more satisfactory if both issues had been determined at the same time and by the same jury. In the circumstances, I do not think we ought to prolong this litigation, and, in my view, the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion and agree with the conclusions which my Lord has already stated. The comparatively simple issue before this court was this. Was KARMINSKI, J., right on the facts and in law in deciding as he did that the marriage which took place on May 30, 1949, between the deceased and the plaintiff was a valid and binding marriage in that the deceased at the time of the celebration of the marriage, or the ceremony of marriage, could, and did, understand the nature of the contract he was entering into? That was a most difficult issue to determine, and the difficulty arose largely because of the extraordinary circumstances surrounding the marriage ceremony at the register office at Kensington. In the present action the plaintiff claimed as the lawful widow of the deceased to have a will of Mar. 1, 1948, pronounced against, and to have a grant to her of letters of administration of the estate of the deceased. The defendant, who was the principal residuary legatee under that will of Mar. 1, 1948, in which the plaintiff had no interest whatever, claimed that at the time of the marriage on May 30, 1949, the deceased was of unsound mind and mentally incapable of appreciating the nature of the contract of marriage he was entering into, and that in those circumstances the marriage was invalid.

I mention that because in the pleadings the defendant set out at considerable length what is called the substance of the case, the facts in which differed in some degree, but in essence did not differ at all, from the substance of the case set out in an earlier action. The startling fact is that the will of May 30, 1949, which was the day of the marriage, had been pronounced against at the instance of the plaintiff after a verdict by a jury that the deceased was not of sound mind, memory and understanding, at the time he executed it. The substance of the case the plaintiff there put forward is essentially the substance of the case the defendant put forward in this action, and that has naturally constituted a very serious difficulty. Counsel for the defendant repeated many times that, if there is a finding by a jury that on the day of the wedding at three o'clock in the afternoon

A man was not of sound mind, memory and understanding, how is it possible to say that at eleven o'clock that morning he was perfectly all right, and he suggested that it was inconceivable that this court would give judicial blessing to that kind of thing. The evidence which convinced the jury in 1950 that the deceased was not of sound mind, memory and understanding was largely supplied by the present plaintiff herself, and it consisted of a long record of very strange and eccentric behaviour on many occasions before the actual ceremony of marriage, e.g., his belief that he was already married to the plaintiff on May 13. That was the difficulty in the case since most people would say that, if a man was in fact of unsound mind, memory and understanding at three o'clock on the day of his wedding, it would not require much to show that at eleven o'clock on that day he was not fit to be married.

Another startling difficulty was that on May 28, two days before the wedding, when the marriage settlement had to be executed, and the preferred ordinary shares were to be settled on the plaintiff, really by common consent, the deceased was utterly incapable of understanding what was happening, and the solicitor and the director of his company were quite unable to make him understand what he was doing. Mr. Culross put it in this way:

“Q.—I think the actual document which incorporated that arrangement [about the deferred ordinary shares] was executed on the Saturday morning before the marriage, was it not? A.—Yes. Q.—At the flat? A.—Yes. Q.—What did you think at the time he actually executed it? A.—At the time he actually executed it I did think he was very bad. He was in a very bad state that morning. We could not get him to repeat what he was doing at all. Q.—Mr. Culross the solicitor was present? A.—Yes, Mr. Culross was present. Q.—And Mr. Culross sought to explain it to him? A.—Yes, he sought to explain it to him and tried to get him to repeat what he was doing, but he would keep repeating something entirely different. Q.—At any rate, you did not think that at the time he executed the document on that Saturday morning he really understood it? A.—No, at that moment, no.”

It is an amazing thing that, two days before this old man of seventy-eight is married, when asked to execute a settlement of certain shares he was utterly incapable even of repeating the words, and when words were put to him he repeated something entirely different.

The evidence detailed by my Lord presented the deceased on the day of his marriage as an old man of seventy-eight, quite senile, suffering from disease, incapable, in the true sense, of looking after himself continuously, and subject to periods such as the one on May 28 when he simply did not know what he was doing, and it is not to be wondered at that Dr. Urwick, his regular medical attendant, strongly advised against the marriage. The question is whether at the time of the ceremony the deceased was mentally capable of understanding the nature of the contract of marriage in the sense indicated by my Lord, so that the marriage could be regarded as valid.

Counsel for the plaintiff, who represented her in the proceedings before PEARCE, J., and a jury, and before KARMINSKI, J., in this case, submitted that there was in fact no inconsistency between the cases he presented on the two occasions. He said that his submission to PEARCE, J., and the jury in Culross v. Park (1) was that the deceased was not fit to make a particular will, while, in the second case (ante, p. 408), it was that the deceased, although not fit to make that particular will, which was of rather a complicated nature, was fit to enter into the contract of marriage. He harmonised the two contentions by submitting that the difficulties could be removed if the exact nature of the illness from which the deceased suffered was fully understood. As I understand it, his argument was that the deceased did not suffer from any disease of the mind as those words are usually employed. There was no suggestion that he thought himself to be other than he was. There was no confusion of identity or any matter of that kind. There was in fact no disease of the mind in the ordinary sense at all. On the evidence of the medical men the position was really this. Here was a man of seventy-eight, who admittedly suffered from arteriosclerosis (which I understand to be something more than the mere hardening of the arteries), from hardened arteries, and also from a weakened heart, and the combination of those things was such that there were times when the heart was unable to supply the millions of brain cells with the necessary blood, so that the brain might work effectively. But there were occasions, said counsel, when the heart was able to perform that function and to supply the brain with all the necessary blood for its proper action. That really depended on these circumstances. If the deceased was sufficiently interested (I think the phrase was) in any particular matter, the necessary stimulus to make the heart function was provided, the blood was supplied, and (in the words of counsel) the deceased had complete understanding. But if the subject under discussion was a matter in which he took no interest, or which bored him and made him listless, the necessary stimulus was lacking and blood was not supplied to the brain. For example, figures and details of the business were matters which the deceased, at the age of seventy-eight, did not appear any longer to be interested in, and it would seem that from 1938 onwards his effective interest in the business had never been what it was in the earlier days when a prosperous business had been built up. But there were some things, golf was mentioned, for example, in which he was keenly interested still, and he could speak about the trophies he had won and of the pleasant days he had spent on the golf links. That was a matter which so interested him that he became clear and coherent because blood was being supplied to his brain. Similarly, it appears that he was a freemason, or, at least, was interested in freemasonry, and that that was a subject which had the same effect on him. So, said counsel, this all-important matter of his marriage was one in which he was keenly interested, and he was completely alert with regard to the actual fact of entering into the marriage contract.

KARMINSKI, J., who, no doubt, heard the same arguments, said that there could, in his view, be no doubt that from the early part of 1949 the deceased was anxious to have a permanent female companion with whom he was prepared to go through a ceremony of marriage. The deceased was a lonely man, quite obviously. The death of his wife after fifty years had been a terrible blow, and it is understandable that an old and ailing man should feel more secure if he had a companion always with him, and the learned judge so found, and if counsel for the plaintiff is right, then that was a matter which would stimulate him, and on the particular matters relating to it his mind would be fully occupied.

KARMINSKI, J., said in his judgment (ante, p. 414), quoting SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (6) (10 P.D. 95):

"The question which I have to determine is not whether she was aware that she was going through the ceremony of marriage, but whether she was capable of understanding the nature of the contract she was entering into, free from the influence of morbid delusions upon the subject";

and (ante, p. 414):

"I ask myself the question asked in Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (6) by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P.: Was the deceased capable of understanding the nature of the contract he was entering into?"

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that certain matters ought to be kept in mind. He said that there should be knowledge of the ceremony itself and the parties must understand the nature of the contract. The parties must further understand their rights and the responsibilities that marriage creates, e.g., the husband's duty to maintain his wife. And, finally, both parties must be able to take care of their persons and their property. It was not enough that the parties should appreciate that they were taking part in a marriage ceremony or that they should be able to follow the words of the service. If the parties lacked the qualities referred to in his three submissions, then the marriage was invalid. My Lord has dealt fully with that question and cited the answer quoted in the course of the case with regard to the normal and usual understanding: Durham v. Durham (6) (10 P.D. 81); and I think myself, at any rate, that this is quite clear, that KARMINSKI, J., had the all-important question most clearly and vividly before him.

A Counsel for the plaintiff submitted, therefore, that what this court had to do was to consider three things. (i) Did the learned judge misunderstand the evidence given? I do not think anyone could say that KARMINSKI, J., misunderstood the evidence, because as I said in the course of the argument, his judgment, full and complete, gave a most admirable summary of all the important evidence in the case, and certainly on that point no one could say that he misunderstood it. (ii) Did KARMINSKI, J., draw the wrong inferences from the evidence, and, if so, this court was in an equally good position to draw what it considered to be the right inferences. (iii) Did the learned judge make any mistake in the law which he applied to the facts of the case?

On that last matter counsel for the defendant complained of the approach which the learned judge had made to this question when he said (ante, p. 413):

C "Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the capacity required to make a will was of a higher degree than that required to contract a marriage, and he relied on the direction to the jury given by SIR JAMES HANNEN in Boughton v. Knight (2) (L.R. 3 P. & D. 72): '... whatever degree of mental soundness is required for any one of these things,—responsibility for crime, capacity to marry, capacity to contract, capacity to give evidence as a witness,—I must tell you, without fear of contradiction, that the highest degree of all, if degrees there be, is required in order to constitute capacity to make a testamentary disposition. And you will easily see why. Because it involves a larger and wider survey of facts and things than any one of those matters to which I have drawn your attention.' SIR JAMES HANNEN expanded and explained this passage in Burdett v. Thompson (4), when he said (ibid., 73n), speaking of the making of a will: 'From the character of the act it requires the consideration of a larger variety of circumstances than is required in other acts, for it involves reflection upon the claims of the several persons who, by nature, or through other circumstances, may be supposed to have claims on the testator's bounty, and the power of considering these several claims, and of determining in what proportions the property shall be divided amongst the claimants; and, therefore, whatever degrees there may be of soundness of mind, the highest degree must be required for making a will'. I think there is force in the argument of counsel for the plaintiff, and I approach the facts of this case on the basis that a lesser degree of capacity is required to consent to a marriage than in the making of a will."

G He said that was important because of the decision of the jury in 1950. I think it is a little unfortunate that the learned judge changed the word. SIR JAMES HANNEN quite clearly was speaking about degrees of unsoundness of mind—whatever degree there may be of soundness of mind, the highest degree must be required for making a will. It is perfectly plain, of course, that there are degrees of soundness of mind, and in one of the early cases which was quoted to us, Turner v. Meyers (11) (which, I think, must have been before the court in Tennessee when it gave its judgment (Jemima Cole v. William Cole (10), because that court reproduced much of the language used in the case, SIR WILLIAM SCOTT, referring to this question of unsoundness of mind, said (nearly one hundred and fifty years ago) (1 Hag. Con. 417):

H "Madness is a state of mind not easily reducible to correct definition, since it is the disorder of that faculty with which we are little acquainted; for all the study of mankind has made but a very moderate progress in investigating the texture of the mind, even in a sound state. In disease, where it has pleased the Almighty to envelope the subject-matter in the darkness of disease, it will probably always continue so; but the effects of this disordered state are pretty well known. We learn from experience and observation all that we can know, and we see that madness may subsist in various degrees, sometimes slight, as partaking rather of disposition or humour, which will not incapacitate a man from managing his own affairs, or making a valid contract. It must be something more than this, something which, if there be any test, is held by the common judgment of mankind to affect his general fitness to be trusted with the management of himself and his own concerns."

Then, in Boughton v. Knight (2), in the note which SIR JAMES HANNEN added in the case of Burdett v. Thompson (4), to explain the misunderstanding which had arisen on his judgment, he said (L.R. 3 P. & D. 73n.):

"The question of unsoundness of mind is one of degree, and it is impossible to lay down any abstract proposition of law which will guide you in determining it."

So, there can be no doubt that there are degrees of unsoundness of mind, and, of course, there can be degrees of capacity quite apart from unsoundness of mind. Some men are very able and some are not, and it is understandable, for example, that an illiterate, uneducated man, perfectly sound of mind, but not of a high quality, might be able to understand the contract of marriage in its simplicity, as my Lord defined it this morning, but who, coming into a sudden accession of wealth, might be quite incapable of making anything in the nature of a complicated will, quite apart from any question of unsoundness of mind. I think, therefore, that the way the case was put was a little unfortunate, and that it was a pity that that matter was introduced into this case at all.

I think the test is as my Lord defined it this morning. On the facts of this case, is it shown that the deceased was not of the mental capacity to understand the nature of the contract? I cannot think that degrees of unsoundness of mind really can have much relevance to that question. It was said, and with truth (my Lord cited the passage in Durham v. Durham (6) (10 P.D. 82)), that the contract of marriage is in its essence one of simplicity. The real question finally comes down to this, not of the degree of the unsoundness of mind or any particular degree of capacity, but simply to the question, yes or no, is it shown that this man was not mentally capable of understanding the contract into which he had entered? The test which was applied by KARMINSKI, J., was the proper test, and so all this discussion about degrees I do not think matters, because it is quite plain, when the learned judge's judgment is read, that he had in mind what were the requisites of a valid contract of marriage, and what was to be understood, and that he applied that test to the evidence that was given with regard to the morning of May 30. He dealt with the superintendent registrar's evidence referred to by my Lord and I think he had before him all the essential matters that it was important that he should have in coming to his decision. He quite clearly appreciated the degrees which I have mentioned, and I think he had in mind the submissions which were made by counsel for the plaintiff. He said:

"The evidence in this case is at many points conflicting, and the conflict has not been made easier to resolve because it has come (apart from that of the plaintiff) from witnesses whom I have regarded as reliable and truthful. In my view, the conflicting nature of the evidence can be largely explained by the fact that from the summer of 1948 until his death in June, 1949, the condition of the deceased varied from day to day and sometimes, as Dr. Urwick found, almost from hour to hour. It is important to recognise that the deceased was a man who had been of good business and general intelligence, able to build up and to direct a successful trading company. This is certainly not a case where a man has from birth been deprived of the usual intellectual faculties or has been in any sense mentally deficient."

That is why I think the judge was influenced by the submissions that counsel for the plaintiff made.

A Finally, after reviewing the whole of the evidence, and saying that Lady Greer was a witness of high standing, whose evidence he accepted, and recognising the conflicting character of the evidence, and having in mind, as I think, all the circumstances of the case on the one side and on the other, and having before him the clear tests which he had to apply to determine the issue before him, he said (ante, p. 415):

B "In the course of his argument counsel for the defendant accepted that no high intellectual standard was required in consenting to a marriage; he further accepted that the burden was on him to prove the invalidity of a marriage in form properly celebrated. If he has failed to discharge that burden of proof, then the plaintiff must succeed . . ."; and the learned judge was clearly of opinion that he had failed to discharge that burden of proof, because he goes on to say (ibid.):

C ". . . but I prefer in this case to answer the question posed to himself by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (6). Was the deceased capable of understanding the nature of the contract he was entering into, free from the influence of morbid delusions on the subject? It is not an easy question in this case to answer. I have had to consider carefully the manifest mental weaknesses and confusions of the deceased, D on the one hand, and his pertinacity and determination with regard to the marriage, on the other. I have come to the conclusion that he could and did understand the nature of the contract he was entering into, and I find that the ceremony of marriage in fact performed on May 30, 1949, between the deceased and the plaintiff constituted a valid and binding marriage between them."

E Therefore, I think that KARMINSKI, J., quite palpably had every one of those conflicting matters in mind. He had in mind most of all, I think, this variation from day to day and differences from hour to hour; and with all that in mind, and the evidence of the actual day of the marriage, and the circumstances surrounding the ceremony, he came to that conclusion. For my part, I do not F feel that it is possible to depart from that decision. I share my Lord's view that in many respects this case is an unsatisfactory one, but we in this court have to decide the issues before us free from bias or prejudice of any kind that liking or disliking may bring about. Looking at the matter in that way, I do not think that this judgment of KARMINSKI, J., ought to be disturbed, and I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

G HODSON, L.J.: The defendant has contended that KARMINSKI, J., misdirected himself in law when he said at the outset of his judgment that he approached the facts in this case on the basis that a lesser degree of capacity is required to consent to a marriage than in the making of a will. As I understand the matter, capacity is equivalent to mental capacity, and that is equivalent to soundness of mind, and it was in that sense that the learned judge was using the H word "capacity". The learned judge felt that the distinction was of importance, having regard to the fact that in an earlier case (Culross v. Park (1)) the court had pronounced against the will of the deceased made on the same day as the marriage following on the verdict of a jury who answered in the negative the question: "Do you find the testator at the time of the execution of the will was of sound mind, memory and understanding?" In my opinion, there is no sliding scale of soundness of mind by reference to which different matters of which the law is required to take cognisance may be measured. The authority of SIR

JAMES HANNEN in Boughton v. Knight (2) (L.R. 3 P. & D. 71) and Burdett v. Thompson (4) (ibid. 73n.) do not, I think, support such a proposition. Indeed, in the latter case SIR JAMES HANNEN was at pains to point out (ibid.) that it had been erroneously supposed that he had said it required a greater degree of soundness of mind to make a will than to do any other act. He said he never said that or meant to say that. He repeated that if you are at liberty to draw a distinction between various degrees of soundness of mind, then whatever is the highest degree of soundness of mind is required to make a will. In Boughton v. Knight (2) he had pointed out that, in considering the question whether the testator is of sound disposition, you cannot put aside the contents of the will and surrounding circumstances connected therewith, and this passage indicates that one cannot consider soundness of mind in the air (so to speak), but only consider it in relation to the facts and the subject-matter of the particular case.

It is true that the jury answered in general terms the question put to it in the probate action in which the will of the deceased made on May 30 was disputed (Culross v. Park (1)), but the question was not answered without a direction from the learned judge as to the facts of the particular case, and the answer to the question cannot be treated as if it were a certificate of insanity concerning the condition of the deceased on that day a few hours after his marriage had taken place.

The contents of a will vary greatly from one case to another, as also the surrounding circumstances, and similar considerations apply to any transaction which a man may seek to carry through. It is true, as SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., pointed out in the case of Durham v. Durham (6) (10 P.D. 82), that the contract of marriage is a very simple one which does not require a high degree of intelligence to comprehend, and in Browning v. Reane (5) SIR JOHN NICHOLL said (2 Phillim. 70) of marriage that it was “ . . . the most important contract of life, the very essence of which is consent.”

In dealing with the contract of marriage into which the deceased purported to enter on May 30, the learned judge had these considerations in mind, and I think directed himself correctly. What he said about the approach to the problem cannot be described as a misdirection, since the trial of the issue of capacity in the earlier probate action was, as counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, a trial of a different issue where the evidence was different, and in which the burden of proof lay on different sides. In dealing with the contract of marriage, the learned judge had the right considerations in mind. He concluded by asking himself the right question, namely, the one posed, again by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (6) (10 P.D. 95). The question is: Was the deceased capable of understanding the nature of the contract he was entering into free from the influence of morbid delusions on the subject? He answered the question in favour of the plaintiff, and did so deliberately after a review of the evidence, refraining from resting on the ground that the defendant had not discharged the burden of proof. In arriving at his conclusion he gave, as his careful and clear analysis of the evidence shows, due weight to all relevant matters and did not, I think, lay undue stress, as was contended on behalf of the defendant, on the central fact that the deceased was aware that he was being married at the time when the forms prescribed by law for a marriage in a register office were being followed. The evidence accepted by the learned judge pointed clearly to the fact that the deceased had determined to marry the plaintiff in the knowledge that she was the successor to his former wife, with whom he had enjoyed many years of happy marriage. The evidence also showed that he was aware of the duties and responsibilities to her in the sense that he took steps to make a home for her with him at the flat in which he had previously lived, and took steps to make room for her there by securing the removal of other persons. The evidence also shows that he was aware of his duty to make financial provision for her,

Counsel for the defendant contended that, in the senile condition in which the deceased undoubtedly was, he could not take care of his person and property, so that he could not dispose of his person and property by the matrimonial contract any more than by any other contract. In this contention he was supported by the authority of SIR JOHN NICHOLL in Browning v. Reane (5), to which I have referred previously. Although this language may, no doubt, be interpreted in such a way as to lend support to the defendant's argument based on the facts of this case, I do not think that the learned judge can be said to have erred in arriving at the conclusion in favour of the plaintiff on this point. Indeed, on the totality of the evidence, leaving out of account the evidence of the plaintiff, unreliable as it was except where it was expressly or tacitly admitted by other witnesses whose evidence the learned judge accepted, I think that the conclusion was right. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Lewis W. Taylor & Co. (for the defendant); Ager & Ager (for the plaintiff); Pritchard, Englefield & Co., agents for Boote, Edgar & Co., Manchester (for the parties cited).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re ADLARD'S SETTLEMENT TRUST. Re CAMPBELL'S SETTLEMENT TRUST. Re FULTON'S SETTLEMENT TRUST. TAYLOR AND OTHERS v. ADLARD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), October 27, 28, November 12, 1953.]

Settlement—After-acquired property—Settlement on daughter—Covenant by daughter to settle after-acquired property on trusts of settlement—Property acquired more than thirty years later—Received by trustees and held on trusts of settlement—Claim by daughter to recover property from trustees.

By a settlement, dated June 14, 1918, and made between the settlor, of the first part, his daughter A., who had attained the age of twenty-one and was then unmarried, of the second part, and trustees, of the third part, the settlor settled the sum of £3,500 war loan (referred to hereafter as "the trust fund") on trust to pay the income to A. during her life, and, subject thereto, on trust for her children or issue as she should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, on trust for all her children who should attain the age of twenty-one, in equal shares. If there should be no child of A. who should attain a vested interest, the trust fund was to be held on trust for the statutory next of kin of A. who would have been entitled thereto if she had died possessed thereof intestate and a spinster. By the deed of settlement A. covenanted with the trustees to assign to them all her after-acquired property, to be held by them on the trusts of the settlement. On the same date, viz., June 14, 1918, by means of settlements in identical terms mutatis mutandis with that in favour of A., the settlor settled the same sum on each of his daughters, C. and F., who were also over twenty-one and unmarried at the time. The daughters had no separate advice when they entered into the covenants. Subsequent to June 14, 1918, all three married. A. and C. each had children. F., who was now a widow, had no children. The settlor died on Dec. 23, 1944, and his wife died on Aug. 25, 1951. On their mother's death A., C., and F., and another daughter became entitled absolutely, in equal shares, to the following funds: (i) £8,000 under an appointment, dated June 1, 1934, and made by the settlor in exercise of a power contained in his marriage settlement; (ii) £16,000 under an appointment of the same date, made by the mother in exercise of a similar power; (iii) £40,000 under a voluntary settlement, dated May 5, 1943, and made by the settlor; and (iv) £10,000 under an appointment made by the mother by her will, dated Dec. 17, 1947, in exercise of a power contained in the settlor's will, dated June 4, 1934. Each of the daughters expressed her desire to receive her share of the funds for herself, but believed at the time that she had no power to do so, and in January, 1952, their respective shares were transferred to the trustees of their settlements. A., C., and F. now sought to recover their shares from the trustees.

HELD: assuming that A., C., and F. could have arrested the funds and retained them in breach of their covenants contained in the settlements of June 14, 1918, they were not now entitled, either at law or in equity, to recover them from the trustees, who had duly received them by reason of the obligations imposed by the covenants and now held them, and were bound to continue to hold them, in accordance with the tenor and true meaning of the settlements from which their obligations were derived.

Re Bowden ([1936] Ch. 71), applied.

AS TO COVENANTS TO SETTLE AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 29, pp. 571-580, paras. 833-843; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 40, pp. 493-517, Nos. 422-618.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Ellenborough, [1903] 1 Ch. 697; 72 L.J.Ch. 218; 87 L.T. 714; 40 Digest 537, 800.
- (2) Meek v. Kettlewell, (1842), 1 Hare, 464; 11 L.J.Ch. 293; 66 E.R. 1114; affd. L.C., (1843), 1 Ph. 342; 13 L.J.Ch. 28; 2 L.T.O.S. 205; 41 E.R. 662; 25 Digest 534, 236.
- (3) Kekewich v. Manning, (1851), 1 De G.M. & G. 176; 21 L.J.Ch. 577; 18 L.T.O.S. 263; 42 E.R. 519; 40 Digest 534, 776.
- (4) Re Bowden, [1936] Ch. 71; 105 L.J.Ch. 23; 154 L.T. 157; Digest Supp.
- (5) Re Kay's Settlement, [1939] 1 All E.R. 245; [1939] Ch. 329; 108 L.J.Ch. 156; 160 L.T. 172; Digest Supp.
- (6) Re Brooks' Settlement Trusts, [1939] 3 All E.R. 920; [1939] Ch. 993; 109 L.J.Ch. 28; 161 L.T. 158; Digest Supp.
- (7) Allcard v. Walker, [1896] 2 Ch. 369; 65 L.J.Ch. 600; sub nom. Allcard v. Walker, Re Lucas, Walker v. Lupton, 74 L.T. 487; 38 Digest 708, 529.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by the trustees of three settlements, dated June 14, 1918, and made by Rupert Darnley Anderson (referred to hereafter as "the father") on his three daughters, viz., the first defendant, Mrs. Adlard, the second defendant, Mrs. Campbell, and the third defendant, Mrs. Fulton, respectively, to determine questions in regard to the share of each of the three daughters in certain funds.

By the settlement made on her on June 14, 1918, each of the three daughters covenanted with the trustees to assign to them all her after-acquired property (with certain small exceptions) to be held by them on the trusts of the settlement. The father died in 1944. On the death of their mother on Aug. 25, 1951, the three daughters and another daughter (who was not a party to these proceedings) became entitled, in equal shares, to (a) the parents' marriage settlement funds, under a deed of appointment executed by both parents on June 1, 1934; (b) a fund subject to the trusts of a voluntary settlement made by the father in 1943; and (c) a sum of £10,000 under an appointment made by the mother by her will in exercise of a power given to her by the father's will. After the trustees of the daughters' settlements had received the investments representing the funds and allocated them to the respective settlements, the three daughters, Mrs. Adlard, Mrs. Campbell and Mrs. Fulton, sought to recover their shares from the trustees. By the summons the trustees asked the court to determine, inter alia, whether the shares were, by virtue of the covenants by the three daughters, subject to the trusts of the settlements of 1918 and ought to be retained by them, or whether they should be transferred to the daughters as their absolute property.

L. H. L. Cohen for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the settlements.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and Arthur Bagnall for the first, second and third defendants, and adult children of the first and second defendants.

Neville Gray, Q.C., and W. F. Waite for infant grandchildren of the first and A second defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 12. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The late Mr. Rupert Darnley Anderson was married once only, namely, to a Miss Harland, and I will refer to them respectively as "the father" and "the mother". He died on Dec. 23, 1944, she on Aug. 25, 1951. Of their marriage there was issue, a son and
B four daughters. The eldest daughter, the defendant, Mrs. Adlard, has had issue, two children, each of whom has attained the age of twenty-one, is married, and has an infant child. Mrs. Adlard is now sixty-three years of age. The second daughter, Mrs. Shuttleworth, was married in 1917, and on her marriage there was a settlement similar to those of her sisters with which this case is concerned, but she is not a party to these proceedings. The third daughter, the defendant,
C Mrs. Campbell, aged fifty-eight, has two adult children and an infant grandchild. The fourth daughter, the defendant, Mrs. Fulton, is fifty-six years of age, is a widow, and has never had any issue.

At the date of the three settlements with which this action is concerned, namely, June 14, 1918, Mrs. Adlard, Mrs. Campbell and Mrs. Fulton had all attained the age of twenty-one and were spinsters. One of these settlements was
D made on Mrs. Adlard, another on Mrs. Campbell and a third on Mrs. Fulton. I will refer to these three sisters as "the sisters" and to their settlements as "the three settlements". In each case the parties to such settlement were (i) the father, and (ii) the daughter concerned, in addition to the original trustees. Each of the settlements recited that the father intended to transfer the sum of £3,500 five per cent. war loan to the trustees of the settlement to be held on the trusts thereinafter declared, and also that the daughter who was party thereto was desirous of settling her after-acquired property in the manner thereafter appearing. Each of the three settlements provided as follows. (A) The father, in pursuance of his said intention and in consideration of his love and affection for his daughter, party thereto, covenanted with the trustees to transfer the said sum of war loan to them, and the expression "the said trust fund" used therein was defined as
E meaning the war loan and the investments from time to time representing the same. (B) The trust fund was to be held in trust to pay the income thereof to the daughter, party thereto, during her life, and subject thereto she was given a power of appointment by deed or will among her children or issue, and in default of appointment the fund was to be held in trust for all her children who should attain the age of twenty-one years or, being daughters, attain that age or marry
G under that age, in equal shares. (C) If there should be no child of the said daughter who should attain a vested interest, then, subject as aforesaid, the trustees were to hold the trust fund in trust for the statutory next of kin of the daughter who would have been entitled thereto if she had died possessed thereof intestate and a spinster. (This provision is, of course, material in the case of Mrs. Fulton). (D) Such daughter was empowered by deed executed prior to and in
H contemplation of any marriage or by will to appoint to or for any husband who might survive her an interest for his life in all or any part of the trust fund. (E) In pursuance of her said desire the daughter, party thereto, covenanted with the trustees that any real or personal property to which she should at any time thereafter become entitled, whether in possession, reversion, or otherwise, except (i) personal effects, (ii) any legacy or other property acquired at one and the same time not exceeding in amount £200, and (iii) the income or accumulations of income (whether invested or not) of any fund or property in which she might have an interest, should, as soon as circumstances would admit, and at the cost of the trust estate, be assigned and assured by her and all other necessary parties to the trustees on trust to retain or sell as therein provided, and to hold the same or the proceeds of sale on the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions thereinbefore declared and contained concerning the said trust fund, save and except that, if there should be no child of the said daughter who should attain the age of twenty-one years or, being female, attain that age or marry, then (subject to the foregoing trusts and powers) the trustees should hold the said after-acquired property and the investments representing the same on trust for such persons and purposes as such daughter should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment in trust for the statutory next of kin of such daughter as in the case of the trust fund, as already mentioned. (F) It was declared that it should not be obligatory on the trustees to see to the settlement of any property of the said daughter and no act or omission in such respect should be chargeable as a breach of trust. In the case of each of the three settlements: (i) the father duly transferred the sum of £3,500 war loan to the trustees; (ii) the plaintiffs since 1934 have been, and they still are, the trustees of such settlement; (iii) the income of the war loan or the investments representing the same has been paid to the daughter, party to such settlement, since the date of the settlement; (iv) no appointment has been made by such daughter under any of the powers in such settlement contained; (v) prior to the death of the mother nothing had been actually transferred to the trustees of such settlement under the covenant therein contained for settlement of after-acquired property.

The property affected or supposed to be affected by the several covenants, is the following. (A) Under a marriage settlement, dated Jan. 1, 1889 (hereinafter called "the parents' marriage settlement"), made on the marriage of the father and the mother, two funds were thereby settled, viz., a husband's fund, settled by the father, and a wife's fund, settled by the mother, and, subject to their successive life interests in such funds, the parents had a joint power of appointment by deed among their issue, with the usual trust in default of appointment for their children. By a deed, dated June 1, 1934 (hereinafter called "the 1934 appointment"), the father and the mother irrevocably appointed both funds to their four daughters (viz., the sisters and Mrs. Shuttleworth), in equal shares. The plaintiffs have been the trustees of the parents' marriage settlement since 1934. Death duties became payable on the husband's fund on the death of the father and on the wife's fund on the death of the mother. The net values of these funds after providing for the said duties are respectively about £8,000, for the husband's fund, and about £16,000 for the wife's fund. (B) On May 5, 1943, the father made a voluntary settlement (hereinafter called "the 1943 settlement"), of which the plaintiffs were and are the trustees. By that settlement the father settled a fund on trust for the mother during her life and on her death (in the events which have happened) on trust for his four daughters in equal shares. As the death of the father occurred within three years of the making of the 1943 settlement, estate duty became payable in respect of the settled fund, and the value thereof after payment of such duty is about £40,000. (C) By his will, which was dated June 4, 1934, and proved on Apr. 16, 1945, in the Principal Probate Registry by the mother and the plaintiff, Geoffrey Lewis Taylor, the executors and trustees thereby appointed, the father settled his residuary estate on trust to pay the income thereof to the mother during her life and conferred on her a power to appoint any part of his residuary estate up to a sum of £10,000 to or for all or any of his said daughters to take effect after her death, and, subject to any exercise of that power, his residuary estate was settled on trust as to one equal fourth part for each of his four daughters during her life with remainder on trusts for her children or issue. By a deed, dated Feb. 12, 1947, General Sir Robert Hadden Haining was appointed an additional trustee of the father's will, and ever since the death of the mother he and the plaintiff, Geoffrey

Lewis Taylor, have been the trustees of the will. (D) The mother, by her will, dated Dec. 17, 1947, and proved on Oct. 26, 1951, exercised the power of appointment given to her by the will of the father and appointed the sum of £10,000 (hereinafter called "the £10,000 appointed fund") in equal shares to her four daughters absolutely. She also bequeathed her net residuary estate to her four daughters in equal shares and that estate is believed to be of the value of about £8,000. The executors and trustees of the will of the mother were and are

A William Helm Hadfield and the plaintiff, Claude Pritchard Lewis.

There can be no doubt that, according to the tenor of the after-acquired property covenants contained in Mrs. Shuttleworth's settlement and in each of the three settlements of 1918, the share of Mrs. Shuttleworth and the sisters in each of the funds hereinbefore mentioned was affected, that is to say: (a) the husband's fund comprised in the parents' marriage settlement and the appointment of 1934; (b) the wife's fund comprised in the same settlement and appointment; (c) the fund comprised in the settlement of 1943, and (d) the £10,000 appointed fund. The shares of the three sisters in the net residuary estate of the mother under her will would also be so affected, but the trustees of the three settlements (being the plaintiffs in each case) have elected to take no steps to get them in as they had power to do, as I have already mentioned. Mrs. Shuttleworth's settlement, executed on her marriage, stands on a somewhat different footing to the three settlements and need not be further mentioned.

After the mother's death and when the sisters realised the terms in which they had covenanted, it came as something of a shock to them, and each expressed the strong wish to receive for herself her share in all the before-mentioned funds. For a considerable time all the parties were of opinion and convinced that the covenants could be and should be and must be enforced, and before the end of 1951 schemes of division of the various funds were prepared and submitted to each of the four daughters with an intimation that she would not be entitled to receive her share for herself, and that it would be made over to the trustees of her settlement. None of the daughters raised any objection to the proposal, for the reason that all of them believed that they had no power to do so, and in that belief they accepted the schemes for division. In January, 1952, the schemes were carried into effect and the trustees of the various settlements were placed in full possession of the investments allocated to the respective settlements. It so happened that such trustees were the same persons as were trustees of the parents' marriage settlement and of the settlement of 1943, but I understand that by the end of January, 1952, they had fully discharged all their duties in respect of such last-mentioned trusts, and the funds were held by them entirely and exclusively on the trusts of the three settlements. The amounts are considerable, as I have said. The husband's fund is £8,000, the wife's fund is £16,000, the fund in the 1943 settlement is £40,000, and then there is the £10,000 fund. It may well be that the covenants would not have been enforceable against any of the sisters if it had been necessary to invoke the assistance of the court to enforce them. I thought at one time that the original settlements of the £3,500 war loan were made by the father in consideration of the covenants, although not so expressed, but that may be irrelevant. It further occurred to me that the existence of these covenants might have been the reason why these large sums of money were allowed to go to the four daughters absolutely under the various documents to which I have alluded, and that, but for the existence of those covenants, those funds would have been in some way tied up by the father and the mother, but that, again, may be irrelevant. In any case, there is no evidence of this, and it is quite likely that the existence of the covenants was not present to the minds of their parents any more than it was present to the minds of the daughters. But the fact remains that the covenants were entered into.

This case raises a point for which I can find no direct authority, which is this. Assuming that the daughters could have arrested these funds and claimed to retain them in breach of their own covenants, can they now claim to recover them from the trustees into whose hands they have, in fact, come and who hold them on perfectly valid trusts? My difficulty is to see what possible equity the daughters can have to do anything of the kind. It may be unfortunate that they were not aware of their possible right to repudiate their obligations at an earlier stage, but it seems to me that the trustees of the three settlements are now under an obligation to continue to hold funds which have come into their hands quite regularly by reason of the obligations imposed by the covenants. Whatever may be their personal views on the matter, I do not see that the sisters are entitled, either at law or in equity, to deprive them of what they hold in fact, and hold in accordance with the tenor and true meaning of the three settlements from which their obligations are derived.

The cases which were cited to me seem to me to establish the position of the trustees and to afford no assistance to the claims of the daughters. The general law as to enforceability of the covenants in equity is stated in Re Ellenborough (1), to which the headnote is:

"The decision in Meek v. Kettlewell (2) that the voluntary assignment of an expectancy, even though under seal, will not be enforced by a court of equity, has not been overruled by Kekewich v. Manning (3)."

But the case nearest to the present seems to me to be Re Bowden (4), to which the headnote reads as follows:

"By a voluntary settlement made in 1868 a settlor settled any property to which she might become entitled upon the death of her father and gave the trustees of the settlement full power to receive and give receipts for the same or any part thereof in her name. Her father died in 1869 and during the years 1871-1874 his executors transferred the share of the settlor under her father's will to the trustees of the voluntary settlement. In 1935 the settlor requested the trustees to transfer the funds representing the above mentioned property to her as her absolute property:—Held, that the original trustees had received the settlor's share under a valid authority unrevoked, and that it became impressed with the trusts contained in the settlement."

In his judgment BENNETT, J., said ([1936] Ch. 75):

"In the year 1935 it seems to have occurred to the settlor that she might not have settled what came to her, so on Jan. 23, 1935, she addressed a communication in writing to the trustees requesting them to transfer to her as her absolute property the cash representing the fund. She states that to the best of her knowledge she never authorised the transfer of any such property to the trustees of that settlement. Those are the facts which give rise to the question raised by the summons. Counsel for the settlor submitted that the question should be answered in the affirmative and that the property the subject of the trusts of the settlement should be transferred to her. He based his argument on the authority of Meek v. Kettlewell (2) and Re Ellenborough (1) and contended that the settlement, being a voluntary settlement, was void and altogether unenforceable. Neither of these authorities supports either of his propositions. All that was decided in Meek v. Kettlewell (2) was that where the assistance of the court of equity is needed to enable the trustees of a voluntary settlement to obtain possession of property subjected to the trusts of the voluntary settlement, the property not having been vested in the trustees, a court of equity will render no assistance to the plaintiff. But here nobody is seeking the assistance of the court of equity to enforce the voluntary settlement. Under a valid authority, unrevoked, the persons appointed trustees under the settlement received the settlor's interest under her father's will, and, immediately after it had been received by them, as a result of her own act and her own declaration, contained in the voluntary settlement, it became impressed with the trusts contained in the settlement. No assistance is required from a court of equity to put the property into the hands of the trustees."

I cannot see that it makes any difference that the period in question here is far shorter. Re Kay's Settlement (5) and Re Brooks' Settlement Trusts (6) do not, in my judgment, throw any further light on the matter, nor, I think, does Allcard v. Walker (7). I have a good deal of sympathy with the sisters and acquit them of any kind of impropriety in endeavouring to avoid or even to evade their obligations. But I can find no ground on which to give effect to their claim now to undo what they covenanted to do and, in fact, did, and I will make the consequent declaration with an appropriate order as to the costs of the action. It may be that the sisters, who are said to have had no separate advice when they executed the three settlements and may well have failed to understand the meaning and effect of these covenants, might have had them set aside if they had sought that remedy at a much earlier date. But as they have enjoyed the income of the £3,500 war loan for upwards of thirty years, it must, surely, be too late for that now. In any case, that issue is not before me. While expressing some sympathy with the sisters, I think that the obligation solemnly undertaken by them under seal ought not to be too lightly repudiated. I incline to think that there ought, in strictness, to have been three separate actions here, but I need not take any objection to the proceedings on that ground. Let the costs and expenses of and incidental to this action of the plaintiffs as trustees of all the three settlements be taxed. Let the costs of the defendants be taxed as between solicitor and client, and let one-third of such costs and expenses and one-third of such costs be raised and retained or paid out of the capital funds in each of the three settlements.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Stanley Attenborough & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Haslewood, Hare, Shirley Woolmer & Co., agents for W. H. Hadfield & Son, Farnham (for the defendants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

LLOYDS BANK, LTD. v. OLIVER'S TRUSTEE AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), October 13, 14, November 18, 1953.]

Husband and Wife—Deserted wife in occupation of husband's dwelling-house—Mortgage of matrimonial home by husband before desertion—Claim for possession by mortgagees—Wife's right to remain in matrimonial home.

On Oct. 22, 1945, the husband mortgaged the matrimonial home to the plaintiff bank by way of legal charge and thereby became a tenant at will to the bank of the property. In 1948 he executed a second legal charge in favour of the bank to secure a further advance. On or about Oct. 13, 1952, he deserted his wife, who obtained an order from BARRY, J., that she be permitted to reside in the matrimonial home and that the husband should not create any right in any other person to evict her or interfere with her residence therein. On Dec. 18, 1952, the husband was adjudicated bankrupt. On a summons for possession by the bank, the wife claimed that she had a right to remain in the matrimonial home notwithstanding that as against her husband and his trustee in bankruptcy the bank had an undisputed claim.

HELD: a wife had no right in the nature of an irrevocable licence to remain in the matrimonial home which arose on entry; the earliest moment at which her right to continue to reside in the husband's house against his will arose when he deserted her; the desertion in the present case had taken place after the creation of the mortgages; and, therefore, the wife's right was subject to the rights of the mortgagees, who were entitled to possession.

FOR THE MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT, 1882, s. 17, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 804.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Woolwich Equitable Building Society v. Preston, [1938] Ch. 129; 107 L.J.Ch. 63; sub nom. Woolwich Equitable Building Society v. Oriston, 158 L.T. 216; Digest Supp.
- (2) Weldon v. Weldon, (1883), 9 P.D. 52; 53 L.J.P. 9; 27 Digest, Replacement, 284, 2289.
- (3) Bendall v. McWhirter, [1952] 1 All E.R. 1307; [1952] 2 Q.B. 466; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (4) Bramwell v. Bramwell, [1942] 1 All E.R. 137; [1942] 1 K.B. 370; 111 L.J.K.B. 430; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, [1947] 2 All E.R. 792; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Middleton v. Baldock, [1950] 1 All E.R. 708; [1950] 1 K.B. 657; 31 Digest, Replacement, 698, 7894.
- (7) Dunn v. Dunn, [1948] 2 All E.R. 822; [1949] P. 98; [1949] L.J.R. 87; 112 J.P. 436; 2nd Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for possession of the premises known as 212, 212A, 214 and 216, Capstone Road, Bournemouth, which were charged to the plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank, Ltd., by legal charges dated Oct. 22, 1945 and Jan. 26, 1948.

Harold Brown for the mortgagees, Lloyds Bank, Ltd., the plaintiffs.

Freeland for the first defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, Gordon Peter Oliver.

Raymond Walton for the wife of the mortgagor, the second defendant, Gladys Georgina Oliver.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18. UPJOHN, J., read the following judgment. In this summons a wife, the second defendant, who has been deserted by her husband, the mortgagor of the matrimonial home, is asserting against the mortgagees a right to remain in possession of the mortgaged premises notwithstanding that, as against the mortgagor and his trustee in bankruptcy, the mortgagees have an undisputed right to possession. The whole question I have to determine is whether that claim is good in law.

The mortgagor and his wife were married in March, 1940, and they at once entered into a flat in No. 212 Capstone Road, Bournemouth, and continued to reside there as the matrimonial home until some date in 1948. On Oct. 22, 1945, the husband mortgaged the matrimonial home, together with other premises as to which no question arises, to the plaintiff bank to secure his overdraft up to a limit of £1,600. The mortgage was by way of legal charge and cl. 10 contained the following provision:

"The mortgagor hereby attorns and becomes tenant at will to the bank of such part of the mortgaged premises as are in the occupation of the mortgagor at a monthly rent of 6d. if demanded Provided that neither the receipt (if any) of the said rent nor the tenancy created by the said attornment shall render the bank liable to account as mortgagee in possession."

In 1948 the husband entered into a further legal charge with the plaintiff bank in the same terms as the mortgage of 1945 to secure an advance of a further £500. Later on in the same year the husband and wife vacated No. 212 Capstone Road for a short period, but returned there shortly afterwards. In September, 1952, the wife went into a nursing home, but she came out on Oct. 13 when her husband took her and the children of the marriage to a house of the wife's sister, telling them that they must stay there for a few days.

About this time (the exact date is not in evidence) it is common ground that the husband deserted the wife and she then discovered that, while she was in the nursing home, the husband had removed all the furniture and her clothes from the matrimonial home. Accordingly, on Nov. 18, 1952, the wife applied in the Queen's Bench Division, under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for an order against the husband permitting her and the children of the marriage to reside in the matrimonial home until further order. On that summons an order was made by BARRY, J. on Apr. 14 of this year in the following terms:

"(a) That the said Gladys Georgina Oliver and the three children of herself and of the said Gordon Peter Oliver be permitted to reside in and to occupy the lower flat at 212 Capstone Road aforesaid until such time as the husband provides suitable accommodation for the applicant and her three children of the marriage. (b) That the said Gordon Peter Oliver shall take no step by sale or assignment of any right title or interest which he now has in the said property or by any other act whatsoever create any right title or interest in any other person to evict his said wife and the children or any of them from the lower flat at 212 Capstone Road aforesaid or in any way interfere with their residence therein, until such time as the husband provides suitable accommodation for the applicant and her three children of the marriage. That the said Gordon Peter Oliver be restrained and an injunction is hereby granted restraining him from selling or agreeing to sell the said flat or from otherwise creating any right title or interest therein in any person to evict his said wife or children or any of them therefrom or from otherwise interfering with the residence in the said flat of his said wife and children or any of them, until such time as the husband provides suitable accommodation for the applicant and her three children of the marriage."

Pursuant to that order the wife has been put back into possession of the matrimonial home and she remains there pending the determination of this summons. On Dec. 8, 1952, the bank gave a notice to the husband calling in the amount of the overdraft, then some £2,273, and on Dec. 18, 1952, a receiving order was made against the husband on his own petition and in due course the first defendant was appointed his trustee in bankruptcy.

In that state of affairs it is clear that ever since the mortgage of 1945 the only right of the husband and subsequently of his trustee in bankruptcy to remain in possession as against the plaintiff bank was as tenant at will, and that tenancy was brought to an end by the issue or, at any rate, service of the summons for possession: see Woolwich Equitable Building Society v. Preston (1); it being conceded that no prior notice to determine the tenancy is required by the terms of the mortgage. From this it follows, first, that no right asserted by the wife on behalf of or as agent of her husband will be of any avail against the plaintiff bank, and, secondly, that any right asserted by the wife independently of the husband—that is, not as his agent, but by virtue of some right conferred on her by matrimonial status—to be effective against the plaintiff bank must arise by virtue of some act or event in the law before the mortgage of 1945. It is useless for the wife to assert any right to remain in possession of the matrimonial home by virtue of her matrimonial status which arose for the first time after the mortgage of 1945, e.g., by reason of the husband's desertion or the order of BARRY, J., for as against the plaintiff bank she could never assert any right to remain in possession which exceeded her husband's interest in the premises.

In these circumstances counsel, in his argument on behalf of the wife, put his claim in two ways. He formulated his first proposition in this way, namely, that on entering into the matrimonial home a wife, as an incident of her matrimonial status, is entitled to an irrevocable licence to continue to reside on the premises so long as they remain the matrimonial home and thereafter during any desertion by the husband and the subsistence of the marriage, subject always to an order being made against her under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ordering her to vacate the matrimonial home. That right attached on the moment of entering into the matrimonial home, and is, he submitted, in the nature of an equity which binds all persons having subsequent dealings with the premises except a purchaser for value without notice of her claim. This right, he submitted, really originated from the old order of restitution of conjugal rights. He cited to me Weldon v. Weldon (2). In that case the usual decree ordering the husband to take his wife home and render her conjugal rights had been made. In purported compliance therewith the husband had provided a suitable home for his wife, but he had not proposed to share it with her. The question was whether that was a sufficient compliance with the order, and it was held that it was not. SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., said (9 P.D. 55):

"The principle derived from the law on which the ecclesiastical courts proceeded was, that it is the duty of married persons to live together, and that this duty should be enforced by the decree of the court, unless it could be shown that the complaining party had been guilty of some matrimonial offence for which a judgment authorising living apart might have been obtained by the other. Authority for this proposition is not needed, but I may quote the words of BLACKSTONE: 'The suit for restitution of conjugal rights is brought whenever either the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction or lives separate from the other without any sufficient reason, in which case they will be compelled to come together again, if either party be weak enough to desire it, contrary to the inclination of the other.'"

Pausing there, it does not seem to me that the ancient power of the court to order the spouses to live together affords any support for the broad principle submitted by counsel for the wife. At common law husband and wife on marriage become one, and, although a wife has always been entitled to pledge her husband's credit for necessities if he failed to maintain her, the proposition advanced by counsel for the wife in relation to the matrimonial home would, I venture to think, have startled not only the lawyers but all husbands one hundred years ago.

The position of a wife before the Married Women's Property Acts of the last century has, indeed, recently been stated by DENNING, L.J., in Bendall v. McWhirter (3), in these terms ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1309):

"The first question is whether the wife has any right of her own to stay in the house. Under the old common law as it existed until seventy years ago she had no rights at all apart from those of her husband. She was treated by the law more like a piece of his furniture than anything else. The husband could not sue her in ejectment or trespass, but neither could he sue a piece of furniture. He could bundle his furniture out into the street and so he could his wife. The law did not say him nay. It merely gave the wife authority to pledge his credit for necessities. If her husband turned her out, she had to go and find lodgings elsewhere, pledging his credit for the rent, that is, if she could find anyone to trust to his credit."

Counsel, however, submitted that there were three modern cases which supported his general proposition. The first is Bramwell v. Bramwell (4), a case in the Court of Appeal. The actual decision there is not in point in the present case, but GODDARD, L.J., suggested that a husband could not bring an action for recovery of land against his wife, for that would be an action for tort which could not be maintained by a husband against a wife having regard to s. 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the only remedy available to the husband was under s. 17. That authority was dealing with a matter of procedure, and, with all respect to the argument, had nothing to do with the true nature of the right of a wife to continue in the matrimonial home.

The next case was Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (5), the facts of which were that a wife, whose husband had left her, obtained a decree of judicial separation and continued to live in the house which had been the matrimonial home and of which

A the husband was the owner. The husband claimed, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, that the wife should forthwith be ordered to give up possession of the house to him. The wife stated that the house was the only home of herself and the son, who was suffering from a serious illness; that it would be injurious, mentally, physically and psychologically to the health of the son if they had to leave the house; that she had refused to accede to her husband's request that she should divorce him; and that the husband had bought another house in which he was living with another woman. The court held that they had a judicial discretion whether or not to make an order for possession under s. 17 of the Act of 1882, that the granting of a decree of judicial separation did not affect the exercise of that discretion, and that in the circumstances no order for possession would be made. Again, I can find nothing in that case which supports the proposition sought to be established. No doubt, it must now be taken to be established by Bendall v. McWhirter (3) in the Court of Appeal that a wife who had been deserted has a right as against her husband, subject to an order under s. 17, to remain in occupation of the matrimonial home, but there is nothing in either of the authorities I have mentioned which goes to the length of establishing that a wife has something in the nature of an irrevocable licence which attaches at the moment of entering into the matrimonial home.

C The next case was Middleton v. Baldock (6). That was a case on the Rent Restrictions Acts and counsel relied on certain passages in the judgments of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., and of DENNING, L.J. I forbear to examine that case in detail, however, because what the case decided was, not that a wife had anything in the nature of an irrevocable right to remain in possession of the matrimonial home, but that a deserted wife could on behalf of the husband assert a continued right to possession of premises protected by the Rent Acts which the husband was powerless to prevent. But for the reasons I have already given, a right only maintainable as agent of the husband does not help the wife in this case.

D Finally, I was referred to Bendall v. McWhirter (3), and, particularly, to the judgment of DENNING, L.J. In that case the Court of Appeal decided that a wife who had been deserted could remain in possession of the matrimonial home as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the husband, the bankruptcy being subsequent to desertion. I do not propose to refer to that judgment at length for it seems to me clear that DENNING, L.J., who stated the law more favourably to the wife than the majority of the court, did not consider that any right to possession arose in the wife before she was deserted. DENNING, L.J., said this ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1311):

E "In my opinion, therefore, the right of a deserted wife to stay in the matrimonial home proceeds out of an irrevocable authority which the husband is presumed in law to have conferred on her. This accounts for the fact that the husband cannot turn the wife out. It also accounts for the fact that, as against the landlord, the wife must assert her right in the husband's name. The authority which is thus conferred on her is an authority to stay in the house until the court orders her to go out. This authority flows from the status of marriage, coupled with the fact of separation owing to the husband's misconduct."

F That authority, in my judgment, also makes it abundantly clear that a wife who has been deserted can, as against third parties only, assert rights on her husband's behalf and in his name.

In my judgment, there is no support to be found in any authority that was cited to me for the broad proposition advanced by counsel for the wife. The proposition that a wife has anything in the nature of an irrevocable licence to remain in the matrimonial home which arises on entry is wholly contrary to the conception of marriage. It is the duty of a husband and wife to live together in such matrimonial homes as the fortunes or vicissitudes of life may dictate, and it is their duty to agree on that home from time to time. The position was recently stated by DENNING, L.J., in Dunn v. Dunn (7) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 823):

"The decision where the home should be is a decision which affects both the parties and their children. It is their duty to decide it by agreement, by give and take, and not by the imposition of the will of one over the other. Each is entitled to an equal voice in the ordering of the affairs which are their common concern. Neither has a casting vote, though, to be sure, they should try so to arrange their affairs that they spend their time together as a family and not apart. If such an arrangement is frustrated by the unreasonableness of one or the other, and this leads to a separation between them, then the party who has produced the separation by reason of his or her unreasonable behaviour is guilty of desertion."

However, PILCHER, J., said that he agreed with every word that had been said by DENNING, L.J., on the question of onus, but it seemed to him that in the case of a difference of opinion between the spouses as to the place of the matrimonial home, someone must have the casting vote.

In my judgment, the earliest moment at which the right of the wife to continue to reside in the house of the husband against his will arises is when the husband deserts his wife. In this case that happened long after the mortgages were created and must, therefore, be subject to the mortgagees' rights. In these circumstances it becomes unnecessary to consider in detail counsel's second and even broader proposition which he put forward to overcome the additional difficulty with which he was faced in this case, namely, that after the date of the further charge the premises for a short time ceased to be the matrimonial home. Therefore, even if he established his first proposition, it would be open to the plaintiff bank to contend that the wife gave up her irrevocable licence on going out of possession in 1948 and the licence arose again on re-entry after the mortgages had been effected. Briefly, counsel's proposition was that a wife has on entering the matrimonial home a right to continue in occupation of the matrimonial home and even prior mortgagees are bound by this right when it arises. It was said, for example, that a mortgagee who permits the mortgagor to remain in possession knows that his bachelor mortgagor may marry, whereupon the wife's right to occupation of the matrimonial home will arise on entry. The mortgagee, it is said, must have entered into the mortgage with that possibility in mind, so as to accept that risk and take subject to the after-taken wife's right of possession. I say no more about so fantastic a proposition. There must be judgment for the plaintiff bank for possession against the wife.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Cameron, Kemm & Co. (for the plaintiff bank); Cameron, Kemm & Co., agents for F. J. M. Gale & Co., Bournemouth (for the first defendant); D. B. Levinson & Co., agents for Harry Ellis & Co., Bournemouth (for the second defendant).

[Reported by MISS PHILLIPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

BRAY AND ANOTHER v. PALMER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), October 8, 9, 1953.]

Court of Appeal—New trial—Contradictory allegations of parties—Refusal of judge to find cause of accident—Dismissal of claim and counterclaim.

A The plaintiffs were travelling on the highway on a motor cycle owned by the first plaintiff and driven by the second plaintiff, and coming from the opposite direction was the defendant, driving a motor car. The defendant drove to his off-side to avoid a pool of water which had been caused by heavy rainfall on his side of the road, and a head-on collision of both vehicles occurred in the middle of the road. The plaintiffs claimed from the defendant damages for personal injuries received by them which, they B alleged, were due to his negligence. The defendant denied negligence and counterclaimed damages for personal injuries and damage to his car, from the first plaintiff as owner of the cycle which, he alleged, was being driven by the second plaintiff as the servant or agent of the first plaintiff, and from the second plaintiff who, he alleged, was guilty of negligence in the driving of the cycle. He contended that the second plaintiff swerved suddenly to his right- C hand side, thereby causing the collision. The trial judge took the view that the accident must have been due to the exclusive negligence of one or the other side; he rejected the possibility of both sides being to blame; and, being unable to make up his mind which was the right story, dismissed both the claim and the counterclaim.

D HELD: the judge was not entitled to dismiss the claim and the counterclaim on the ground that he was unable to decide which party was in the right; it was his duty to come to some conclusion on the evidence and he should not have excluded the possibility of both parties being in some measure to blame, and, therefore, there must be a new trial.

E AS TO GROUNDS FOR GRANTING NEW TRIAL, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, pp. 124-128, paras. 245-252; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Practice, pp. 592-604, Nos. 2331-2448.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decision of OLIVER, J., dated Mar. 4, 1953.

F On Aug. 6, 1951, the plaintiffs, who were riding a motor cycle, were involved in a collision with the defendant, who was driving a motor car in the opposite direction. The plaintiffs claimed damages for personal injuries caused by the defendant's negligence, and the defendant counterclaimed for personal injuries and damage to his motor car. OLIVER, J., dismissed both the claim and the counterclaim and the plaintiffs appealed.

Berryman, Q.C., and G. G. Macdonald for the plaintiffs.

Fox-Andrews, Q.C., and F. C. Williams for the defendant.

G SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: On Aug. 6, 1951, the two plaintiffs were travelling on a motor cycle southwards towards Bristol on the main road from Gloucester. The road was approximately twenty-six feet wide. Coming in the opposite direction was the defendant, driving a small motor car with passengers in it. There was no other traffic at the material part of the road and the only obstacle in the way of either vehicle was a pool of water (the exact H dimensions of which is a matter in dispute), caused by a gutter having become blocked owing to heavy rains, on the side of the road which was on the left of the defendant. It appears not to be in dispute that the defendant moved towards the centre of the road to avoid driving through this pool. The kernel of the matter, so far as the conflict of evidence is concerned, is the extent of his right-handed movement and whether it was one, or more than one, movement. As they approached the defendant's car, the plaintiffs also moved to their off-side. They said they did so because the defendant left them no room to pass on their own side. The defendant said it was an inexplicable move on the plaintiffs' part for which there was no justification such as the plaintiffs had suggested. Whatever be the truth, the fact is that the vehicles met head-on in the middle of the road. Neither the motor car nor the motor cycle was proceeding at an unduly fast speed, but, of course, the effect of a head-on collision is to add the two speeds together for the purpose of ascertaining the force of the impact, and the plaintiffs suffered severe injuries. They alleged that the cause of those injuries was the negligence of the defendant, and the defendant, by his counterclaim, said that the collision was due to the negligence of the plaintiffs in their capacities as owner and driver of the cycle. OLIVER, J., heard evidence of other witnesses independent of and not participants in the accident, namely, a man who lived in a nearby house and a policeman, but he did not give any indication of a preference for one set of witnesses to the other in the matter of credibility. He reserved his judgment. After considering the evidence and its mutually repugnant character, he said he was of opinion that the accident must have been due to the exclusive negligence of one side or the other. He put aside the possibility of both parties having been to blame, and then said that, as he was unable to make up his mind which was the right story, on the principle that the plaintiff must prove his case, he rejected both claim and counterclaim. He said:

"One or other of those stories must approximate to the truth. I do not know which. It seems to me that one is as good as the other—or as bad. One of these two parties must have driven abominably. Either for some mad reason the car did go right across, blocked the motor cyclist's road, and put him into the emergency that he had to cut across, or, on the other hand, the motor cyclist was not looking, did not see the car until the last moment, and then, panicking, tried to go across. Either of those might be true. I cannot tell which is true. In those circumstances, I am driven, it seems to me, to do a thing that I have never done before since I have been on the bench, i.e., I am quite unable to say that the one case is more or less probable than the other. They are both wildly improbable, and yet one of them happened."

Counsel for the defendant said that in substance the learned judge concluded—as he was entitled to conclude—that the occurrence in issue was only explicable on hypothesis "A" or upon hypothesis "B", and that there was no duty on a judge so compelling that he must, whatever the evidence and its nature and however great his experience, conclude the matter in favour either of "A" or of "B". I do not find it necessary to express a conclusion whether the judicial duty in such circumstances does require a judge to decide one way or the other. No judge could have been more qualified by his experience to make up his mind between two conflicting stories than OLIVER, J., but I am not satisfied that the premise on which it is said the final conclusion should have been reached is established. MORRIS, L.J., quoting from one of the last passages I have read, has observed: "The judge is saying: 'Both stories are wildly improbable, and yet one of them happened'. If they are so wildly improbable, I am not satisfied that the judge was justified in excluding the possibility of the truth lying somewhere between the two, so that, perhaps, each would be less wildly improbable, or, at least, in excluding the possibility (which it seems to me was open) of both being wrong". JENKINS, L.J., observed: "Unless that was so, the judge seems to me to have stated the case and his conclusions in such a way that one party or the other or both must have suffered an injustice". Whether or not that is so, if the result appears to be so, this court ought to order a new trial, and I have come to the conclusion, with the utmost respect for OLIVER, J., and acknowledging his difficulty and his experience, that his statement of the matter involves either a real flaw, or something that looks so like it that it would not be right to leave the matter thus. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed and a new trial ordered.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. There is no doubt that a judge is entitled in an action for damages for personal injury occasioned by the negligent driving of the defendant to reject the plaintiff's case if, in the view of the judge, the evidence does not suffice to make out that case. The onus is on the plaintiff. The same, of course, applies where there is a counterclaim; the onus is on the defendant to make out the counterclaim.

A On the part of the defendant it is said, in effect, that the present case was a simple case of the learned judge rejecting the plaintiffs' claim on the ground that they had not discharged the onus which lay on them, and, similarly, rejecting the defendant's counterclaim. In my view, the case is not of that simple character. OLIVER, J., did not simply reject the plaintiffs' and the defendant's evidence, and say: "I do not believe that the accident happened in the way claimed by either side". If he had done that, his decision would not, as far as I can see, be open to any criticism. The judge's reasoning appears, in effect, to have been: "The choice lies between the plaintiffs' story and the defendant's story, either of which may, and one of which must, be true. If the plaintiffs' story is true, they are entitled to succeed, but I am unable to say whether or not it is true, as it is equally possible that the defendant's story may be the true one. On the other hand, if the defendant's story is true, he is entitled to succeed, but I cannot say whether it is true or not, as it is equally possible that the plaintiffs' story may be the true one. I will, therefore, grant no relief either way". This seems to me to fall short of a decision of the case. Having come to the conclusion that the accident happened either in the way asserted either by the plaintiffs or by the defendant, he said, in effect, that he was unable to decide which story was right. With the greatest respect to OLIVER, J., that seems to me to be a denial of justice. It can only mean that the parties are deprived of relief in which they are entitled. In my view, it behoved the learned judge to form some conclusion in the matter and I think the difficulty in which he found himself was in great measure due to his method of approaching the problem, which appears from his observation to the effect that he did not see his way to find that both parties were responsible or both were to blame, and that it seemed to him to be a case of one or the other. Although it has been pressed on us that that question was to be considered in the light of all the evidence, I cannot see anything in the evidence to justify that conclusion. It seems to me that the explanation that both were in some measure to blame is, on the face of it, at least as likely as the explanation that one or other was wholly to blame, and that, unless and until the learned judge had decided that the accident did happen in a particular way, he was not in a position to say that it was not a case in which both were partly to blame. Accordingly, I agree that this is a case in which there should be a new trial.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. The case of the plaintiffs and that of the defendant on his counterclaim depended on a variety of allegations set out in the pleadings, which allegations were of a nature which is usual in cases of this kind. OLIVER, J., thought that the stories both of the plaintiffs and of the defendant were wildly improbable. In those circumstances, I find it difficult to see how the case could proceed on the basis that one or other case must substantially be true and that the allegations on one side or the other must be rejected in their entirety. I do not think it was appropriate in this case to reject consideration of the possibility that there may have been some measure of fault on either side.

New trial ordered.

Solicitors: F. Hollis, agent for F. E. Metcalfe & Co., Bristol (for the plaintiffs); Rider, Heaton, Meredith & Mills, agents for Bobbett Bros., Bristol (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re DELHI ELECTRIC SUPPLY & TRACTION CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), November 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 1953.]

Company—Winding-up—Foreign tax—Claim by Indian government—Admissibility of proof—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 302.

D. Co., a company incorporated in England, carried on business in India under a licence granted by the government of India. In 1947 the company's undertaking was purchased by the Indian government under an option contained in the licence. In 1947 a large part, and in 1948 the balance, of the purchase price was paid and remitted to England. In May, 1949, the company went into voluntary liquidation. From August, 1949, onwards the Indian income tax authorities made several assessments on the company to Indian capital profits tax arising out of the sale of the undertaking of the company. The Indian government claimed in the voluntary liquidation of the company the tax due under these assessments, amounting to about £120,000. The liquidator rejected the claim.

HELD: (i) it was a well-established rule of English law that the English courts would not and could not be used as a means of collecting taxes imposed by another State, and for the purposes of that rule no distinction could be drawn between States adhering to the British Commonwealth and other States.

Re Visser ([1928] Ch. 877), approved.

DICTUM OF LORD MANSFIELD in Holman v. Johnson (1775) (1 Cowp. 343), discussed.

(ii) the word "liabilities" in the Companies Act, 1948, s. 302, did not include claims not enforceable according to the laws of this country in the courts of this country;

(iii) therefore, the claim for Indian tax was not admissible to proof in the winding-up of D. Co.

Re Lorillard ([1922] 2 Ch. 638), applied.

AS TO ENFORCEMENT OF FOREIGN REVENUE LAWS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, p. 198, para. 241; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 11, p. 325, Nos. 16-18.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Visser, [1928] Ch. 877; 97 L.J.Ch. 488; 139 L.T. 658; 11 Digest, Replacement, 323, 7.
- (2) Sydney Municipal Council v. Bull, [1909] 1 K.B. 7; 78 L.J.K.B. 45; 99 L.T. 805; 11 Digest, Replacement, 322, 6.
- (3) Henry v. Sargeant, (1843), 13 New Hamp. 321.
- (4) A.-G. v. Lutwydgc, (1729), Bunb. 280; 145 E.R. 674; 11 Digest, Replacement, 322, 4.
- (5) Boucher v. Lawson, (1736), Lee temp. Hard. 85, 194 (95 E.R. 53, 125); Cunn. 144 (94 E.R. 1116); 11 Digest, Replacement, 440, 823.
- (6) Holman v. Johnson, (1775), 1 Cowp. 341; 98 E.R. 1120; 11 Digest, Replacement, 325, 16.
- (7) Planche v. Fletcher, (1779), 1 Doug. K.B. 251; 99 E.R. 165; 11 Digest, Replacement, 325, 17.
- (8) Clugas v. Penaluna, (1791), 4 Term Rep. 466; 100 E.R. 1122; 11 Digest, Replacement, 441, 829.
- (9) Bernard v. Reed, (1794), 1 Esp. 91; 170 E.R. 290; 12 Digest, Replacement, 308, 2367.
- (10) Waymell v. Reed, (1794), 5 Term Rep. 599; 101 E.R. 335; 11 Digest, Replacement, 441, 830.
- (11) Alves v. Hodgson, (1797), 7 Term Rep. 241 (101 E.R. 953); 2 Esp. 528 (170 E.R. 443); 11 Digest, Replacement, 429, 755.

- (12) James v. Catherwood, (1823), 3 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 190; 11 Digest, Replacement, 325, 18.
- (13) Bristow v. Sequeville, (1850), 5 Exch. 275; 19 L.J.Ex. 289; 155 E.R. 118; 11 Digest, Replacement, 430, 757.
- (14) A.-G. for Canada v. Schultz, (1901), 9 S.L.T. 4.
- (15) Clegg v. Levy, (1812), 3 Camp. 166; 170 E.R. 1343; 11 Digest, Replacement, 429, 756.
- A (16) Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd., [1948] 1 All E.R. 811; affd. H.L., [1949] 2 All E.R. 621; [1950] A.C. 24; [1949] L.J.R. 1687; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (17) Ralli Brothers v. Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar, [1920] 2 K.B. 287; 89 L.J.K.B. 999; 123 L.T. 375; 11 Digest, Replacement, 435, 791.
- (18) Milwaukee County v. M. E. White Co., (1935), 296 U.S. Rep. 268.
- B (19) Gooch v. London Banking Assocn., (1886), 32 Ch.D. 41; 10 Digest 1000, 6947.
- (20) Re Art Reproduction Co., Ltd., [1951] 2 All E.R. 984; [1952] Ch. 89; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (21) Re Lorillard, [1922] 2 Ch. 638; 92 L.J.Ch. 148; 127 L.T. 613; 24 Digest 798, 8275.
- C (22) Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. v. Roy, [1902] A.C. 220; 71 L.J.P.C. 51; 86 L.T. 127; 13 Digest 401, 1235.
- (23) Re General Rolling Stock Co., Joint Stock Discount Co.'s Claim, (1872), 7 Ch. App. 646; 41 L.J.Ch. 732; 27 L.T. 88; 10 Digest 933, 6399.

APPEAL of the Government of India, Ministry of Finance (Revenue Division), from a decision of VAISEY, J., dated July 30, 1953.

D The Government of India claimed to be admitted as creditor in the voluntary winding-up of the Delhi Electric Supply & Traction Co., Ltd., in respect of assessments to Indian capital profits tax. The liquidator rejected the claim. The Indian government applied by summons in the Chancery Division of the High Court under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 307, for an order that the decision of the liquidator rejecting their claim be reversed and the said claim be allowed in full. VAISEY, J., refused the application.

E Mustoe, Q.C., and R. R. D. Phillips for the applicants, the Government of India. Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and O. R. Smith for the respondent, the liquidator.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The question in this case is whether the applicants, the Government of India, Ministry of Finance (Revenue Division), ought to be admitted to proof in the liquidation of the Delhi Electric Supply & Traction Co., Ltd., for a sum of income tax substantially, though not wholly, consisting of capital profits tax, which is, in India, a form of income tax. The sum involved is a large one, and as regards the capital profits tax arose on the sale of the whole undertaking of the company in India. That sale took place pursuant to an option which was contained in the original licence granted to the company to carry on their electrical operations in or near the city of Delhi for a period of forty-two years. The result of the sale was necessarily to put an end to the business activities of the company, and the company, which is an English company incorporated in this country in 1916, is now being wound-up in England, the necessary resolutions having been passed for a voluntary liquidation of the company on the footing that it was solvent.

H It will be convenient to mention a few dates. The sale to which I have alluded took place early in 1947, and the greater part of the purchase money was paid on Mar. 1, 1947, in India, but was remitted from India to England a few days later. In April, 1947, an Act of the Indian legislature came into force which introduced the capital profits tax, and, as has been said on behalf of the Indian revenue authorities, the tax was applicable to the profit made over or in excess of the book values as the result of the sale. In September, 1948, the balance of the purchase price was remitted to this country, and in May, 1949, the company went into liquidation in the manner I have mentioned.

The subject-matter of the claim consists of more than one assessment, and the claim in respect of the first assessment was dated in August, 1949. I have mentioned those dates because it is right that it should be made clear that no charge or suggestion has been made by the applicants that the liquidator in any way surreptitiously removed the assets of the company from India for the purpose of evading the payment of this capital profits tax.

The liquidator, however, rejected the claim of the Government of India to prove, and, in accordance with the procedure applicable under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 307 (1), and the rules made under that Act, the Government of India applied to the judge having cognisance of these matters for a reversal of the liquidator's decision. The substance of the application was as follows:

"an application on behalf of the Government of India, Ministry of Finance (Revenue Division), of Aldwych, Strand, London, a creditor of the above-named company, for an order that the decision of Samuel Henry Taylor, the liquidator of the above named company in the voluntary winding-up thereof, rejecting the claim of the Indian government may be reversed and that the said claim may be allowed in full."

The application came before VAISEY, J., and he, on July 30, 1953, made an order in this form: "The court doth not think fit to make any order on the said application"—in other words, the application failed or was refused. The appeal is now made from the learned judge to this court to reverse the decision of the judge and to give effect to the application which I have already read.

The arguments before us have ranged over a wide area, and a large number of authorities has been cited. I think, however, for my part, that the point is really a short one, and I hope that counsel for the applicants will forgive me if I do not, in the course of this judgment, refer to all the points which they took before us or to all the cases which they cited. The question shortly stated is whether the liability, which is one that the company would have been bound to discharge in India (i.e., so long as the company operated in India, or remained subject to the effective jurisdiction of the Indian courts), is a liability for which the liquidator must make provision under the terms of the Companies Act, 1948, and, in particular, s. 302 of that Act.

Section 302 provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act as to preferential payments, the property of a company shall, on its winding-up, be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and, subject to such application, shall, unless the articles otherwise provide, be distributed among the members according to their rights and interests in the company."

Section 316, which is the first of a number of "Provisions applicable to every mode of winding-up", provides:

"In every winding-up (subject, in the case of insolvent companies, to the application in accordance with the provisions of this Act of the law of bankruptcy) all debts payable on a contingency, and all claims against the company, present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages, shall be admissible to proof against the company, a just estimate being made, so far as possible, of the value of such debts or claims as may be subject to any contingency or sound only in damages, or for some other reason do not bear a certain value."

Section 307 (1) is in this form:

"The liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to the court to determine any question arising in the winding-up of a company, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls or any other matter, all or any of the powers which the court might exercise if the company were being wound-up by the court."

A There can be no doubt that, for example, a trading obligation incurred in the ordinary way by this company in India would be a liability within the language of the Act which I have read. Prima facie, at any rate, an Indian creditor claiming as such by virtue of some trading contract entered into in India would be entitled to come to the courts of this country and establish and enforce here his claim. But it is said that there is an old-established principle of our law that the courts of this country cannot be used as a means of collecting taxes imposed by another State, and it is further said that the liabilities mentioned in s. 302 of the Act of 1948 do not include liabilities of a kind which cannot be enforced here—in particular, liabilities in respect of taxes imposed by a foreign State.

B I think it logical and convenient first to examine the so-called rule in regard to collecting taxes claimed by foreign countries and to arrive at a conclusion whether such a rule does exist, and, if so, what is its scope. The existence of such a rule has, undoubtedly, been assumed for very many years. According to LORD TENTERDEN, it is attributable in origin to LORD HARDWICKE, as will later appear. What is, perhaps, remarkable, however—and it is the fact—is that, though the rule has been referred to from time to time as being well established, it is only rarely and recently that its validity has been directly tested in cases at all comparable to the present, and it has never been so directly tested in this court.

C The most recent of the cases in which the matter was directly in issue was Re Visser (1), before TOMLIN, J. The plaintiff in that action was the Queen of Holland and the defendants were executors of the deceased Visser. The action was in form an administration action as commonly experienced in the Chancery Division of the High Court. By the claim, the plaintiff asked for a declaration that she was a creditor of the estate of the late Visser and for an account and if necessary an order for the administration of the estate of the deceased person. D An application was then made by the defendants to strike out the plaintiff's claim on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action by reason of the fact, as was alleged, that in the claim the plaintiff was seeking to enforce, whether directly or indirectly, a foreign revenue claim, the plaintiff being a foreign sovereign.

E The numerous cases to which we have been referred in the present appeal were referred to in the course of the argument in Re Visser (1), and TOMLIN, J., stated his conclusions in the following terms ([1928] Ch. 884):

F “My own opinion is that there is a well recognised rule, which has been enforced for at least two hundred years or thereabouts, under which these courts will not collect the taxes of foreign States for the benefit of the sovereigns of those foreign States; and this is one of those actions which these courts will not entertain.”

G Having again examined all the cases and such references in the text-books as have been found for us I am of the same opinion as was TOMLIN, J. I think that the alleged principle is properly formulated in the way I have already stated, viz., that the courts of this country will not and cannot be used as a means of collecting taxes imposed by another State. That convenient and, as I think, correct statement is derived from the reported argument of Mr. Simon, K.C., in one of the two earlier cases in which the matter was directly in issue, viz., Sydney Municipal Council v. Bull (2), before GRANTHAM, J. The claim there was a direct claim, i.e., an action brought by the council directly against the defendant, Bull, claiming, H not national tax, but local rates or local revenue. Mr. Simon is reported as having put his argument in this form ([1909] 1 K.B. 91):

“International comity does not extend to the recognition of liabilities imposed by a State on its subjects for its own domestic management and regulation.”

I pause there to say that the word “subjects” must, I think, mean “persons subject to its jurisdiction”. The argument goes on (ibid.):

"For that reason the penal laws of a foreign country are not subject-matter of an action in this country."

Then there is a reference to DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, and the argument proceeds:

"nor are suits for the recovery of penalties, pecuniary or otherwise, for any violation of statutes enacted by a foreign State for the protection of its revenue or other municipal laws . . . For the same reason the courts of one State cannot be used as a means of collecting the taxes imposed by another . . ."

Mr. Simon cited as authority in support of that last proposition an American case, Henry v. Sargeant (3), to which I shall have occasion to make some reference hereafter.

For myself, I say at once that I think that on general principles both of justice and convenience there is (to say the least) much to commend the rule as I have stated it, though, undoubtedly, there may be hard cases such as this may well be. If there were no such rule, the result, as it seems to me, would be somewhat arresting. There is no apparent limit to the revenue legislation which any country may bring into operation, and if all revenue claims were liable to be enforced in other countries the consequences would be, to put it no higher, arresting. That, however, is another matter and beside the present point. The question is, since this court is now asked to re-examine the matter, what is the authority for the existence of this rule as I have attempted to formulate it? Of the two earliest cases to which we were referred one (cited by counsel for the liquidator) was A.-G. v. Lutwydgc (4), decided in 1729. I am not of opinion that that case assists in the present matter. The plaintiff was the English Attorney-General and he sought to recover a sum due or alleged to be due on a bond which was executed at Dumfries in Scotland. PENGELLY, C.B., said (Bunb. 281):

"Before the union [of England and Scotland] this court had no jurisdiction of the revenues in Scotland . . ."

I think that only means in its context that the court in England had no jurisdiction to collect for English purposes revenues in Scotland and I doubt whether it has really any bearing on the rule that we are now considering.

Then we were referred by counsel for the applicants to Boucher v. Lawson (5). That was a case concerning the freight of certain goods and the point which emerged was that the voyage had involved exporting gold from Portugal which, according to Portuguese law, was an illegal traffic. In the course of his judgment, LORD HARDWICKE, C.J., used this language (Lee temp. Hard. 89):

"But if it should be laid down, that because goods are prohibited to be exported by the laws of any foreign country from whence they are brought, therefore the parties should have no remedy or action here, it would cut off all benefit of such trade from this kingdom, which would be of very bad consequence to the principal and most beneficial branches of our trade . . ."

When the matter was later before the court, LORD HARDWICKE observed (ibid., 198):

"I think the unlawfulness of the trade makes no difference, for it is not material to us what the law of Portugal is, but what the law of England is, and here in England it is not only a lawful trade, but very much encouraged."

Whether that case was cited because it was before LORD HARDWICKE and was possibly the origin of LORD TENTERDEN'S attribution of the relevant statement to LORD HARDWICKE, I do not know, but I think it has a remote bearing on the present problem. Its consequence may be, as counsel for the applicants naturally and properly stated, that the rule in its origin was derived from a desire not to hinder but rather to promote all forms of trading. In those days the revenue laws likely to be involved if the rule existed would not be in regard to what we now know as income tax (which had not then emerged on the experience of mankind), but rather in regard to customs duties, which tended, no doubt, to interfere with trade.

The first real statement of the rule is to be found in two cases before LORD MANSFIELD, Holman v. Johnson (6) and Planche v. Fletcher (7). Holman v. Johnson (6) was a case in which the seller of tea under a contract made with the buyer in Dunkirk, sued for the price. The buyer had in fact smuggled the tea into England and it was proved that the seller knew when he made his contract that such was the intention of the buyer, but the seller was himself in no way implicated in, nor was he concerned with, the smuggling operations. The contract of sale between him and the buyer in Dunkirk was such a contract as he might have made with any other buyer, whatever had been the later intention or activity of the buyer. For that reason it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. But in the course of the judgment appears the classic statement of LORD MANSFIELD from which, according to the books as they are now available to us, everything else has flowed. The statement is (1 Cowp. 343):

“For no country ever takes notice of the revenue laws of another.”

That statement was repeated almost in the same terms in the later case I have mentioned, Planche v. Fletcher (7). The facts of that case again were far removed from those of the present. It concerned the insurance of a ship which was intended to go, and did go, direct to Nantes though it had been cleared to Ostend, it being the apparent but not the actual intention that the vessel should call at Ostend and not go direct to Nantes. That circumstance affected the customs duties which might be exacted. It was suggested that the sailing direct to Nantes was a fraud on the underwriters, but that suggestion was clearly rejected by LORD MANSFIELD, and in the course of his judgment he made use again of the formula (1 Doug. K.B. 253):

“One nation does not take notice of the revenue laws of another”— substantially the formula that he had used in Holman v. Johnson (6).

There are three cases which came before LORD KENYON, C.J., and it was part of the applicants' case that LORD KENYON did not accept LORD MANSFIELD'S dictum, but proceeded on some different principle. If that were so, it would, no doubt, weaken the authority of the original formula of LORD MANSFIELD. I am, however, of the opinion that there is no dissent between LORD MANSFIELD and LORD KENYON. Indeed (as will appear in a moment) I think it clear that LORD KENYON accepted as established the rule which LORD MANSFIELD had formulated. The three cases are Clugas v. Penaluna (8), Bernard v. Reed (9), and Waymell v. Reed (10). I need not refer fully to them all, but I will take first Clugas v. Penaluna (8). That was a case in which a contract had been made in Guernsey for the sale of brandy and gin to a buyer, but (unlike the case of Holman v. Johnson (6)) it was part of the bargain not only that the buyer should buy in Guernsey the brandy and the gin, but that the seller should participate in the operation in smuggling the brandy and gin into England, for it was part of the arrangement that the seller should pack the brandy and gin in a particular manner appropriate to the later smuggling operation. It was, therefore, held that the seller, being particeps criminis with the buyer, could not recover in this country. He could not, in other words, set up the contract which disclosed his own wrong in being a party to the smuggling operation. Let me read the judgment of BULLER, J. (4 Term Rep. 467):

“If goods be bona fide sold in Guernsey, and delivered there in the fair course of trade, the seller may recover the price of them here, though they be afterwards smuggled into this country. But here the plaintiff himself was assisting in the act of smuggling, by the means of packing the goods; for the spirits were delivered in ankers, which are used for the purpose of smuggling; and if he take part in the transaction, it taints the whole of it. And this distinguishes the case of Holman v. Johnson (6) from the present."

The leading judgment of LORD KENYON, C.J., had been to the same effect. I should add that at the end of the report there is the observation by LORD KENYON that this case was in other respects distinguishable from Holman v. Johnson (6).

I have paused a little over Clugas v. Penaluna (8) because it seems to me that there is no question of any reluctance or refusal on LORD KENYON's part to adopt as a valid principle of law what LORD MANSFIELD had stated in the earlier cases.

The second case, Bernard v. Reed (9), is really to the same effect as Clugas v. Penaluna (8) and I can pass over that case without more reference to it. As regards Waymell v. Reed (10), it will be found that in that case LORD KENYON in terms accepted and treated as good law the proposition which LORD MANSFIELD had earlier stated. I need not refer to the details of the case, but I will read two or three sentences from LORD KENYON's judgment, which was as follows (5 Term Rep. 599):

"It is sufficient, in order to dispose of this case, to advert to the distinction laid down by LORD MANSFIELD in Holman v. Johnson (6), to which I entirely subscribe, that where the contract and delivery of goods are complete abroad, and the seller does no act to assist the smuggling them into this country, such a contract is valid, and may be recovered upon here. But here the plaintiff was concerned in giving assistance to the defendants to smuggle the goods, by packing them in the manner most suitable for, and with intent to aid, that purpose. He cannot, therefore, resort to the laws of this country to assist him in carrying his contract into execution. What was said by LORD MANSFIELD, at the end of Holman v. Johnson (6), comes up to the present case."

Those three cases, therefore, cannot, in my judgment, be used to support the suggestion that there was any conflict between LORD MANSFIELD and LORD KENYON, or that LORD KENYON doubted the validity of the proposition which LORD MANSFIELD had enunciated.

The next cases in the series are cases relating to a specific matter of stamp duty, and they differ in this respect. In the first of them, Alves v. Hodgson (11), it appears that the absence of a stamp on a contract made in a foreign country invalidated the contract altogether in that country, so that it could not be proceeded on there or anywhere else. In two other cases, James v. Catherwood (12) and Bristow v. Sequeville (13), the evidence was that the absence of a stamp only affected in the foreign country its admissibility in evidence as distinct from its validity, and it was, therefore, held that in this country (the rules of evidence going according to the lex fori) there was nothing to prevent the admissibility of the contracts in evidence notwithstanding the absence of stamps which would have made them inadmissible in the courts of the country of their origin.

James v. Catherwood (12) I have mentioned specifically because that was the case in which LORD TENTERDEN (then ABBOTT, C.J.) attributed the origin of the rule, as I have earlier stated, to LORD HARDWICKE. The chief justice in his judgment said (3 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 191):

"This point is too plain for argument. It has been settled, or at least considered as settled, ever since the time of LORD HARDWICKE, that in a British court we cannot take notice of the revenue laws of a foreign State. It would be productive of prodigious inconvenience, if in every case in which an instrument was executed in a foreign country, we were to receive in evidence, what the law of that country was, in order to ascertain whether the instrument was or was not valid. Nothing must be taken by the motion."

The note of the reporter at the foot is:

“Vide Holman v. Johnson (6), 1 Cowp. 343, where LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., says: ‘no country takes notice of the revenue laws of another.’”

That statement of ABBOTT, C.J., may, I think, be in some respects rather wide, but it does not matter for present purposes whether it is entirely correct or whether it is not.

A In the third case which I have mentioned, Bristow v. Sequeville (13) (which was, like the second case, a case where a document, by reason of the absence of the stamp, was inadmissible according to the laws of the foreign country being the country of its origin) ROLFE, B., says this about the first case in this series of three, Alves v. Hodgson (11) (5 Exch. 279):

B “The marginal note of Alves v. Hodgson (11) is perfectly correct, although I cannot help thinking that there must be some mistake in the report of the case. The marginal note is in these terms: ‘The plaintiff cannot recover upon a written contract made in Jamaica, which, by the laws of that island, was void for want of a stamp.’ I agree that if for want of a stamp a contract made in a foreign country is void, it cannot be enforced here. But if that case meant to decide, that where a stamp is required by the revenue laws of a
C foreign State before a document can be received in evidence there, it is inadmissible in this country, I entirely disagree.”

I have referred to those last three cases because it seems to me that they have, when examined, only this bearing on the matter in hand, viz., that they show that in certain circumstances the courts will “take notice” of the revenue laws of a foreign country in the sense that where the revenue laws, i.e., the stamp
D laws, of a foreign country affect the validity of the contract in the country of origin, then these courts may hold, as in Alves v. Hodgson (11), that no contract has been made which could be sued on either in the foreign country or anywhere else. But those cases do not touch the question with which we are directly concerned, viz., whether the courts of this country can be used to collect revenue
E of another country, whether imposed as stamp duty, income tax, customs duty, or in any other way. I think, however the matter goes further than that. Having looked at those cases, it seems to me that they show a general rule in the form stated by LORD MANSFIELD (whatever be its exact scope) as treated by lawyers in this country in the eighteenth century as well established. I think it equally clear that the rule has continued thenceforward to be accepted. As I have
F already said, its origin may well have had to do with questions of freedom of trade and the direct application to that problem of customs duties imposed by foreign countries, but that is, so to say, no more than the accident of its birth, and does not affect the existence of the principle and its applicability to other forms of revenue which may from time to time emerge. I think, then, that these cases show that, though the full import of the words: “No country will take notice
G of the revenue laws of another country,” may require explanation or even qualification, the true rule was then regarded, and should be now regarded, as well established that claims by representatives of a sovereign foreign State to recover penalties or the revenues of that State will not be enforceable in these courts.

I have used the two words “penalties” and “revenues”. We have not in H this case been concerned with penalties, but I observe that there is a certain affinity between the two. The distinction between that which is penalty and that which is mere revenue may in some circumstances obviously be somewhat fine. So much, however, for the earlier cases.

I now come to the three instances, much later in date, when direct application of the rule came before the courts. The first was a Scottish case, and though, of course, the law of Scotland is not the law of England, still this rule, as will later appear, was always treated as, and was stated by LORD MANSFIELD as, a rule of private international law. In any event, the courts of this country will always pay regard to the decisions of the Scottish courts. The case was A.-G. for Canada v. Schultz (14), in which certain goods of the defendant had been seized in Canada and the Canadian courts had affirmed the validity of the seizure and ordered the defendant to pay costs incurred in the Canadian courts when that matter was there decided. The Attorney-General for Canada then sued Schultz in Scotland to recover the costs. It was contended by the defendant that the costs were vitally concerned with and inseparable from the penalty of the seizure and that, therefore, the suit would not be entertained by the Scottish courts. The Scottish courts held in favour of that contention, that the costs not being capable of dissociation from the penalty could not be recovered in the Scottish courts.

The next case is one to which I have already alluded, Sydney Municipal Council v. Bull (2). I do not propose, because I think it unnecessary, to take time examining the details of that case. It was a claim directly made against Bull to recover local revenue charged by the municipality of Sydney. The argument of Mr. Simon, which I have already read, was accepted by GRANTHAM, J., and the suit was dismissed.

The third case is Re Visser (1), to which also I have already made considerable reference. I only now add one or two more citations from the judgment of TOMLIN, J. I have quoted his own conclusion at the end of his judgment and expressed my agreement with it. At the beginning of his judgment the learned judge says ([1928] Ch. 881):

"The short ground for the application [to strike out the statement of claim] is that these courts do not take notice of the revenue laws of a foreign State, and that the foreign State cannot sue in this country for the recovery of taxes falling to be paid under the foreign law."

The second part of the statement is the particular application of the general rule earlier stated. The learned judge observed that in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS there appeared, for the first time in the 1922 edition, the word "revenue" in addition to the word "penalty". It is significant that there was no new edition of DICEY until 1922 after the decision of GRANTHAM, J., in 1909 in Sydney Municipal Council v. Bull (2). I shall refer to DICEY presently, but the learned judge, in that part of his judgment, accepts the revised statement of DICEY appearing in the third edition as it has since appeared in later editions. The learned judge deals particularly with the stamp duty cases, Alves v. Hodgson (11), Clegg v. Levy (15) and Bristow v. Sequeville (13), two of which I have already mentioned, and says this, with which I agree (ibid., 883):

"They [the stamp duty cases] really turn upon this, that where you are suing on an instrument or contract—a foreign instrument or contract—you have to establish its validity according to foreign law, but if it is valid according to foreign law, it is none the less valid because of a provision of revenue law. If, on the other hand, the revenue law does not operate to invalidate the instrument, but only affects its admissibility in evidence, then it is plain, on Bristow v. Sequeville (13), that the instrument would be admissible in evidence in our law. Now that seems to me to be the explanation of those cases, and all that those cases do is to indicate that however unwilling the courts may be to recognise foreign law, there are certain cases in which, although they do not enforce the foreign revenue law, they are bound to recognise some of the consequences of that law—namely, those cases where, as one of the terms of the law, contracts are rendered invalid by the foreign law."

Again, I respectfully agree and adopt that conclusion of the learned judge on those stamp cases.

The existence of this rule and its particular application to the recovery of revenue has since, as I think, been further recognised, not only in the courts, but also by Parliament in this country. In Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (16) reference to the existence of the rule is to be found both in the judgments in this court and in the speeches in the House of Lords. The matter was not directly at issue and I do not, therefore, suggest that the references which I am about to make amount to more than dicta, but they are dicta of authority in these courts, and they recognise, as I have said, the existence of this rule and treat it as well-established. In the Court of Appeal the leading judgment in the Kahler case (16) was delivered by myself, and I used language which I hope I may be permitted to quote. I should, perhaps, in order to make the reference clear, explain that the question involved, very briefly, was this. The plaintiff, Kahler, claimed to be entitled, as against the Midland Bank, to certain securities. The Midland Bank was the bailee of those securities for a Czech bank and the question was whether the Midland Bank could properly hand over the securities to the plaintiff. The answer to his claim was that they held them to the order of the Czech bank and that any transfer out of the name of the Czech bank would involve an infringement of Czechoslovak currency laws, the contract relevant for consideration being held to be governed by Czech law, with the result, as this court and the House of Lords held, that the Midland Bank could not be required to do something which would involve an infringement of the law applicable to the contract on the part of the Czech bank. In the passage to which I am alluding I say ([1948] 1 All E.R. 819):

"It is, indeed, conceded that, save with the necessary permission, the Bohemian bank could not consent to the transfer of the securities in the defendants' books from its own name to that of the plaintiff without a contravention on its part of the regulation to which the bank is subject, and, in my judgment, recognition of this fact does not amount to an enforcement of the 'revenue laws' of another country. Assuming in the plaintiff's favour that the currency regulations in question can properly be described as 'revenue laws', it is, it seems to me, necessary for the plaintiff to show that the English courts will not in any circumstances 'have regard to' such laws, even though it is not in any proper sense of the term 'enforcing' them."

In the House of Lords I find the following passages relevant to cite. LORD NORMAND, after referring to Ralli Brothers v. Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar (17) says ([1949] 2 All E.R. 629):

"The principle on which they were decided is that the courts of this country will not compel the fulfilment of an obligation when performance includes the doing in a foreign country of something which the laws of that country make it illegal to do, but a judgment in rem compelling the delivery of securities held in London would not involve the doing of anything in a foreign country. I think that the dismissal of the appeal does not involve the enforcement of Czechoslovakia revenue law or penal laws."

LORD REID said (and it is not relevant for this purpose that LORD REID's opinion was a minority opinion) (ibid., 635):

"In my judgment, those regulations do not come within the category of confiscatory or fiscal legislation of a foreign country which English courts cannot recognise."

Finally, LORD RADCLIFFE said (ibid., 642):

"... I should not have been prepared to treat such currency regulations as we are concerned with here as if they were no more than the 'penal or revenue laws' of another State the existence of which our courts are traditionally disposed to ignore."

In each of those citations it is, I think, plain that those from whose observations I have quoted are treating as a well-established axiom or principle of the law the principle formulated long ago by LORD MANSFIELD. But, as I have said, it is not merely recognition of the principle by the courts that is to be found in the books, but recognition also, as I think, by Parliament. In 1933 there was passed a statute known shortly as the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933, and that Act was designed to enable persons who have obtained judgments in foreign countries with whom certain conventions have been made by His Majesty to enforce those judgments direct, i.e., to execute them directly in this country without the necessity first of obtaining a judgment of the courts of this country. The kind of judgment which might be so enforced is defined or specified in s. 1 (2) thus:

"Any judgment of a superior court of a foreign country to which this Part of this Act extends, other than a judgment of such a court given on appeal from a court which is not a superior court, shall be a judgment to which this Part of this Act applies, if . . . (b) there is payable thereunder a sum of money, not being a sum payable in respect of taxes or other charges of a like nature or in respect of a fine or other penalty . . ."

There is a similar reference in s. 10 in regard to the issue of certificates of judgments obtained in the United Kingdom with the object of obtaining reciprocity in the foreign country. The matter is stated thus:

"Where a judgment under which a sum of money is payable, not being a sum payable in respect of taxes or other charges of a like nature or in respect of a fine or other penalty, has been entered in the High Court . . ."

I am not, of course, suggesting that that Parliamentary language carries the present question any further than this, that it is an apparent recognition by Parliament of the special category, to say the least, into which claims for revenue or penalties are traditionally in this country, and, I think I may add, in other countries, regarded as falling. I have indicated that the rule is not, as I follow it, merely a rule of English municipal law. It is treated also as a rule of private international law.

With that introduction, I refer to the passage in DICEY to which (in the 1922 edition) TOMLIN, J., had referred in Re Visser (1). In the sixth edition, which is the present edition of DICEY, the passage is to be found at p. 152, thus:

"Rule 22.—The court has no jurisdiction at common law to entertain an action (1)—for the enforcement, either directly or indirectly, of a penal, revenue, or political law of a foreign State . . ."

In the comment which follows there is set out a statement of LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, which, I think, is worth while reading. He said (ibid., p. 153):

"The penal laws of foreign countries are strictly local, and affect nothing more than they can reach and can be seized by virtue of their authority; a fugitive who comes hither, comes with all his transitory rights; he may recover money held for his use, stock, obligations and the like—and cannot be affected in this country by proceedings against him in that which he has left beyond the limits of which proceedings do not extend."

I read that passage as supporting the view which I have earlier intimated on my own part, that there is a good ground in justice for a rule such as this, even though, as I concede, there may from time to time be, and, perhaps, here is, a hard case to be found. The passage in DICEY, as I have said, was accepted by TOMLIN, J., and I also accept it. Its counterpart in American law is to be found in BEALE'S CONFLICT OF LAWS and in the case [Henry v. Sargeant (3)], among others, to which Mr. Simon referred in Sydney Municipal Council v. Bull (2) as establishing a formulation of the proposition which I adopt as correct. In BEALE, 1935 edition, the matter is dealt with in vol. 3, p. 1633 et seq. The learned author refers first to the English decisions, to which I have already made considerable allusion, and he then treats the matter as it has come before the courts in the United States.

The first case which he mentions is Henry v. Sargeant (3). The author says:

"The American cases treating this problem begin with Henry v. Sargeant (3). In that case action was brought against defendants, the selectmen of Chester Vermont, to recover a tax which was claimed to have been illegally assessed under Vermont law, and also to recover damages for causing the arrest of plaintiff for refusing to pay the tax. The New Hampshire court examined the law of Vermont and gave judgment for plaintiff. PARKER, C.J., said: 'It is said that the court will not enforce the penal laws, or the revenue laws, of another State. But this principle is not applicable in this case, nor can it be true to that extent. There is no attempt to enforce the penal or revenue laws of Vermont in this action. If there were, it would be held that this was not to be done through the instrumentality of the courts of another State; as, for instance, if the attempt was to collect a tax assessed in Vermont by a suit here.'"

The matter later came twice before the Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, and as regards one of those cases there is a citation of the basis of the rule by a very learned judge, JUDGE LEARNED HAND. He, concurring specially in the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, used this language:

"While the origin of the exception in the case of penal liabilities does not appear in the books, a sound basis for it exists, in my judgment, which includes liabilities for taxes as well. Even in the case of ordinary municipal liabilities, a court will not recognise those arising in a foreign State, if they run counter to the "settled public policy" of its own. Thus a scrutiny of the liability is necessarily always in reserve, and the possibility that it will be found not to accord with the policy of the domestic state."

I have read that passage out of respect to JUDGE LEARNED HAND, but if that were the true basis of the rule, it would, beyond doubt, greatly limit its application. As I understand the rule as applied in England, its origin is not of the limited character stated by JUDGE LEARNED HAND. However that may be, in the United States of America it is clear that the problem is apt to be, and frequently has been found to be, of a rather special character, because there the problem has arisen as between States in the Union, whether there is an obligation on the courts of one State to enforce the revenue claims or judgments of another State in the Union, having particular regard to the article in the Constitution of the United States, art. IV, s. 1, known as the "Full faith and credit clause." An example of that application of the problem came before the Supreme Court of the United States in Milwaukee County v. M. E. White Co. (18). That was a case where the question was whether the courts of one State ought to give effect to a judgment for tax made in another State. Article IV, s. 1, known as the "Full faith and credit clause" of the constitution, is expressed thus:

"Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other State."

It was held by a majority of the Supreme Court that in the light of that provision it was the duty of the State in question to give effect to the judgment for tax of another State, and the court left expressly open the question whether either within or without the Union the proposition that one State should not enforce the revenue claims of another State was to be treated as valid or not, and if not, to what extent.

I have referred to all these matters since we have been given the advantage of a most careful argument and very full research made by the learned counsel before us. Having completed my citations, it seems to me that they provide, indeed, a formidable and weighty authority for the acceptance, at any rate in this court, of the rule in the form in which I have stated it, and for the formulation of which I acknowledge my indebtedness to LORD SIMON when at the Bar. Counsel for the applicants has contended that whatever might have been the political philosophy two hundred years ago justifying such a rule, in existing conditions it has become archaic and disregards the obvious fact that from time to time the courts of this country may have to consider and do consider in detail the revenue laws of other countries, particularly countries adhering to the British Commonwealth. Counsel for the applicants has gone further and said that he has found indications in the books that learned judges have expressed the view that the scope of the rule in modern times should be reviewed. By way of example, he referred to the case which I have already mentioned, Ralli Bros. v. Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar (17). That was a case which involved the application of the principle which LORD NORMAND stated in a passage in the speech I have already read, viz., that the courts of this country will not enforce contracts, the performance of which according to its terms in a foreign country will be illegal in that place of performance. SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1920] 2 K.B. 300):

"In my opinion the law is correctly stated by PROFESSOR DICEY in CONFLICT OF LAWS, 2nd ed., p. 553, where he says: 'A contract . . . is, in general, invalid in so far as . . . the performance of it is unlawful by the law of the country where the contract is to be performed'—and I reserve liberty to consider whether it is any longer an exception to this proposition that this country will not consider the fact that the contract is obnoxious only to the revenue laws of the foreign country where it is to be performed as an obstacle to enforcing it in the English courts. The only authorities on the point require re-consideration, in view of the obligations of international comity as now understood."

Any observations of SCRUTTON, L.J., deserve, and invariably obtain, the greatest consideration, but, in my judgment, what was in the mind of the learned lord justice was the broad scope which the words, unqualified and unexplained, of LORD MANSFIELD might bear, and he was not intending in any way to throw doubt on the validity of the more limited proposition that the courts of this country will not be used as a means of collecting the revenue of a foreign country. Indeed, as I have already mentioned, in 1950 three members of the House of Lords obviously regarded that more limited principle as well established.

If, then, the rule be well established and be correctly stated in the way I have stated it, what is the effect of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 302, which says that the property of the company shall be applied in paying all liabilities? It is said that, by that section, every liability has to be provided for, including a liability of this nature, i.e., a liability for tax due in a foreign country, particularly in a foreign country where the company has been trading and has earned the money in respect of which tax is assessed. It is said that that is so because, according to ordinary language and the ordinary interpretation of the section, such a claim as that with which we are concerned is a liability, notwithstanding the rule to which I have referred and notwithstanding that it may be the fact that the Government of India might not, under the rule, be able to come to this country and directly sue to recover the sum that was due.

I am unable to accept that view of s. 302. In my judgment, and allowing for the fact that "liability" is a word of the widest import, and was deliberately used accordingly (see, e.g., what PEARSON, J., said in Gooch v. London Banking Assn. (19) (32 Ch.D. 47)), still, if a liability or an obligation such as that with which we are here dealing is within the section, then it will follow that the liquidator has a statutory duty in relation to it. He is, as has been said, a trustee under the statute in favour of the Government of India as a creditor. In other words, the acceptance of the proposition that this claim is a liability within s. 302 is inevitably acceptance also of the proposition that the claim is one enforceable in these courts by the Government of India, for the liquidator could then and on this hypothesis, at the suit of the Government of India be compelled to give effect to the statutory duty or statutory trust in favour of the Government of India. I cannot accept the proposition that the liquidator ought to be treated as a trustee quoad the amount here claimed for the Government of India, at the same time accepting the view that the Government of India could never as cestui que trust or otherwise enforce its claim. That seems to me to lead to an absurd conclusion.

A Put, then, in another way, I think the present claim, made in accordance with the procedural provisions of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 307, is in substance and effect, though not, perhaps, in form, a proceeding to enforce, or to attempt to enforce, payment of the tax which the Government of India allege to be due to them. It is in that connection, I think, not irrelevant to observe that under the original counterpart of s. 307, viz., s. 133 of the Companies Act, 1862, it was not open to a creditor to make an application (as could the liquidator or a contributory) in a form such as the present application. He would have had to bring an
B action to recover his claim against the company, or (I assume), if the liquidator had parted with the money, against the liquidator. Now he cannot effectively bring any proceeding in that form, or, if he did, it would inevitably fail. The difference, I think, is merely procedural. The substance of the matter is the same. The Government of India, claiming to be a creditor, is, by these means, which are the only means available to them, seeking to enforce the claim.

C The result, in my judgment, is that, construing "liabilities" as I do, in the widest sense, and so as to include present and future and contingent liabilities, and so forth, I think the word must still be so construed as to exclude claims that are not enforceable according to the laws of this country in the courts of this country. Here, after all, by the terms of the Act, is an estate being administered, and
D prima facie where an estate is being administered, whether it be the estate or property of a company in liquidation, or the estate of a deceased person, the rules governing the administration will be the rules applied by the lex fori, i.e., the laws of the country where the property is being administered.

Thus, I think, there is a true and valuable analogy to be found by considering the case of a debt which is statute-barred according to the laws of this country. WYNN-PARRY, J., in Re Art Reproduction Co., Ltd. (20), decided that a liquidator
E in a voluntary winding-up of a solvent company could not pay a statute-barred debt without the consent of the contributories. We are not at the moment concerned directly with that matter, but I have always understood that statute-barred debts are not provable in the liquidation of a company. For the moment, however, I refer to this matter of statute-barred debts by way of analogy, and I have found assistance for present purposes in the case in this court of Re
F Lorillard (21). The facts of that case were of a rather special character. A testator was domiciled in New York, but died in England, and he left assets and creditors in both countries. The principal administration was in the United States, but there was also administration of his estate in England, the English
G administration being, as was stated, ancillary to the American. It appears that the English administrator had discharged all the debts and had in hand a surplus which he was proposing to distribute among the English beneficiaries. The American estate was, however, less ample, and it had been exhausted without H paying all the American creditors—in particular certain American creditors (and this is the significance of the case) whose claims were good in America but whose claims were bound to be defeated if prosecuted in England because they were barred here by the English Statute of Limitations. Two summonses were brought before EVE, J. The first summons was by the administrator in England for directions what he should do with the surplus in his hands. Ought he to pay it to the English beneficiaries, or was he precluded from doing so by the fact that he had notice of these creditors in America even though they had deliberately abstained from trying to prove in the English administration? The second summons was a summons issued by the American administrator asking that the balance might be ordered to be handed over to him. The learned judge treated the matter as one in his discretion whether he should order the English administrator to hand over to the American administrator, and in his discretion he answered the question negatively. The Court of Appeal expressed the view that there was no reason to interfere with his discretion. The significance of the matter is that in the judgments of LORD STERNDALE, M.R., and of YOUNGER, L.J., can be found references to the situation and rights quoad the English estate of these American creditors. Thus, LORD STERNDALE, M.R., says ([1922] 2 Ch. 644):

"There are debts in America which according to English law are statute-barred, but not so according to the law of New York. If claims in respect of these debts had been made here they would rightly have been rejected."

And then again later (ibid., 645):

"The American creditors, however, did not present their claims, presumably knowing that if they did so they would be rejected."

YOUNGER, L.J., said (ibid., 646):

"The only persons whom the American administrator claims to represent, the so-called American creditors, would, if they brought in their claims in this country, be defeated by the statute."

Those remarks were directly relevant to the decision because on the basis of those statements the judges in this court were saying: "Although the administrator here has notice of these claims they are not enforceable here, and therefore he has no duty towards these American creditors." That was a clearly relevant consideration in deciding whether this court would vary the decision of EVE, J., when he directed the English administrator not to pay to the American administrator but to hand over the surplus assets to the English beneficiaries. As I say, I find that case of assistance as indicating that in the administration of any estate, be it the property of a company in liquidation, or the estate of a deceased person, the question how you shall administer it, and, in particular, what liabilities you ought to accept and discharge, is a matter to be dealt with prima facie by the lex fori, that is, the law of England.

A point was taken by counsel for the applicants that, though the rule which found expression in Re Visser (1) be well established as a rule of common law, the effect of the Companies Act, 1948, and its deliberate use of the wide word "liabilities", was for the purpose of that Act to override the common law rule. He cited Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. v. Roy (22), which is an illustration of the well-known proposition that a corporation (e.g., a local authority in common instances) which by statute is given powers to do particular things, cannot be held liable at common law for, say, nuisance for doing that which the statute empowers the corporation to do or contemplates that it should do. I accept, of course, the proposition that, if the terms of the Companies Act, 1948, were clear and imperative, that would necessarily supersede the common law rule. For example, if s. 302 said "liabilities whether enforceable in the courts of this country or not," there would be no room for an invocation of LORD MANSFIELD's rule, but, in my judgment, the terms of the section are not so clear and are not so imperative. Indeed, I find no difficulty in treating the use of the word "liabilities", consistently with giving it its widest scope, as meaning liabilities in the sense of claims capable of enforcement in these courts and so as not to include every liability of every kind, be it a statute-barred debt or an obligation of a kind which no court here could ever enforce.

Counsel for the applicants finally argued that, accepting the rule as I have stated it, still it should not apply to States within the so-called "consortium" of the British Commonwealth. I can find no possible basis on which a distinction could be drawn between States adhering to the British Commonwealth and other States. I have already said that this case may in all the circumstances appear to be a hard case, and I can see that in modern conditions there may be good arguments for some relaxation of the rule as between States of the Commonwealth. But that is plainly a matter to be regulated by executive action, by convention or agreement between governments, who could decide to what extent and subject to what conditions, if any, the revenue claims of one member State ought to be treated as enforceable in other member States.

A I have, during the course of what, I am afraid, has been an over-long judgment, assumed that we are here dealing with a sum certain which in India should be treated as having been due or as being due from the company to the Indian government. It has been convenient so to treat it, though it is, perhaps, right that I should say that in truth, as I understand it, the actual amount of the assessment is still not finally determined. The liquidator obtained leave to challenge the amount of the assessment without prejudice to his contention (which was communicated in India to the authorities concerned) that, in any circumstances, B no part of it could be admitted to proof. I mention the fact because counsel for the applicants contended that certain observations to be found in letters, and in the declaration of solvency, and in the language of certain orders made, and the conduct generally of the liquidator, in some way amounted to an admission on the liquidator's part from which he could not now resile so as to make this case C an exception to the general rule which I have stated if the rule were otherwise applicable. In my judgment, there is no ground for saying that any of the facts which I have mentioned amount to such an admission or prevent the liquidator quite properly from taking the point he has taken and contending that this debt cannot be admitted to proof.

D The result is that I agree with the conclusion of VAISEY, J. I agree with him also that the paucity of direct authority may well be due to the fact that for so long a period this rule has been regarded as too well-established to make effective challenge possible. However that may be, and without more, I concur with the learned judge and for the reasons which he gives, and think accordingly that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

E JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The appeal raises in effect two questions: first, whether the claim made by the Government of India to tax assessed on the company under Indian law is in the eye of English law a claim enforceable by legal process in this country against the company or against its assets situated here; and, secondly, if it is not, whether it is nevertheless a claim for which the liquidator should be held bound to provide as one of the liabilities of the company within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 302.

F As to the first question, DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 152, states the rule to be that the court has no jurisdiction at common law to entertain an action for the enforcement, either directly or indirectly, of a penal, revenue, or political law of a foreign State. As regards penal and revenue laws (for with political laws we are not here concerned) I am satisfied that this proposition is well founded. Of the many authorities cited to us, I need only refer to A.-G. for Canada v. Schultz (14), Sydney Municipal Council v. Bull (2), Re Visser (1), and G the observations made in Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (16), by LORD NORMAND ([1949] 2 All E.R. 620), LORD REID (ibid., 635), and LORD RADCLIFFE (ibid., 642). These are passages to which my Lord has already referred, but I may, perhaps be forgiven for repeating what was said by LORD RADCLIFFE (ibid., 642):

H "For my part I should not regard the application of this principle to this case as a concession of extra-territorial operation to foreign currency regulations. I should regard it rather as an insistence that in applying the proper law of a contract—a conception which is inescapable in private international law—it is the full complex of substantive law that must be applied . . . But, however that may be, I should not have been prepared to treat such currency regulations as we are concerned with here as if they were no more than the 'penal or revenue laws' of another State the existence of which our courts are traditionally disposed to ignore."

The view taken in these cases seems on the whole to be borne out by the American decisions, to some of which we were referred, though in cases arising as between different States of the Union the issue is liable to be obscured by considerations turning on the special relationship of such States to each other under the Federal Constitution. It is true that the earlier cases, which I do not propose to review in detail, while including decisions expressive of recognition of the existence of a rule broadly of this nature, provide no very satisfactory account of its origin, and, indeed, little or nothing in the way of actual authority for its application in circumstances at all resembling those of the present case. Its origin may, perhaps, be said to be lost in the mists of antiquity, and the best authority for it to reside in the consensus of opinion of generations of lawyers. Be that as it may, the later cases to which I have referred provide weighty recognition of its existence. I am satisfied, as was TOMLIN, J., in Re Visser (1), that it does exist, and, in my view, its existence is called for by cogent considerations of convenience, international comity, and public policy.

Accordingly, I accept the rule and would respectfully adopt the re-statement of it by TOMLIN, J., in Re Visser (1), at the conclusion of his judgment, in the passage which my Lord has already read ([1928] Ch. 884):

"My own opinion is that there is a well-recognised rule, which has been enforced for at least two hundred years or thereabouts, under which these courts will not collect the taxes of foreign States for the benefit of the sovereigns of those foreign States; and this is one of those actions which these courts will not entertain."

A third way of formulating the rule, which LORD RADCLIFFE seems to have had in mind in making the observation in Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (16), to which I have already referred, is to state it as being to the effect that the law of England does not accord extra-territorial validity to the revenue legislation of foreign States. This mode of stating it may, perhaps, be said to have the merit of pointing to the reason why the courts of this country will not entertain proceedings to enforce, or act as collectors of, taxes imposed by the laws of foreign States.

I should add on this aspect of the case that the exception of judgments in respect of taxes and the like from the provisions of the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933 (see s. 1 (2) (b) and s. 10 of that Act) affords some indication of statutory recognition of the rule. Accordingly, I answer the first of the two questions above posed in the negative.

As to the second question, i.e., whether, given acceptance of the rule, the claim in respect of Indian tax is, nevertheless, one of the liabilities of the company for which the liquidator should be held bound to provide under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 302, I do not see how this can be. It is, no doubt, true that "liabilities" is a term of wide import: see Gooch v. London Banking Assocn. (19); but I think its meaning must be limited to obligations capable of enforcement (whether immediately or prospectively or contingently) in the courts of this country.

Given the acceptance of the rule, the claim here in question cannot answer that description. Nor, in my view, is the argument for the Government of India advanced by the submission that, on the liquidation of a company, its assets are subjected to a trust for the discharge of its liabilities, for if the trust is a trust for the discharge of the company's liabilities it cannot extend to claims which are not liabilities. On this aspect of the case, I derive some assistance from analogy with a statute-barred debt, which cannot be paid even in the winding-up of a solvent company unless the contributories consent: see Re Art Reproduction Co., Ltd. (20).

Further, in my opinion, there is no distinction, for the purposes of the rule, between an action against the company while a going concern for enforcement of the claim and an appeal to the court in the winding-up of the company against the liquidator's rejection of a proof in respect of the claim. Both forms of procedure invoke the aid of the courts of this country to enforce the claim, and both have for their ultimate object a judgment or order for the payment by the company, or out of its assets, of the amount claimed. This seems to me to be directly obnoxious to the rule even in the form in which it is stated in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, above cited. A fortiori, I think an appeal to the court in the winding-up of the company is obnoxious to the rule as re-stated by TOMLIN, J., in Re Visser (1), for it clearly invokes the aid of the English court in the collection for the benefit of a foreign State of a tax imposed by the revenue laws of that State.

If the third method, suggested above, of stating the rule is accepted, then inasmuch as English law does not accord extra-territorial validity to the revenue laws of a foreign State, the short answer is that this claim, albeit enforceable against the company in India under Indian law to the extent of any assets of the company situated there, does not, in the winding-up of this English company under English law, or in the distribution in the course of such winding-up, and in accordance with English law, of its assets situated here, rank as a debt or liability of the company at all.

It is, in my view, nothing to the purpose to say that this is a liability enforceable under Indian law and that it must, therefore, rank as a liability in the winding-up in England of this English company. The question whether it is to rank as a liability or not must be determined by reference to English law: compare Re Lorillard (21), where the Court of Appeal was clearly of opinion that debts owing in America, which were statute-barred according to English law, but not according to American law, would not be recoverable in the English administration of a deceased person's estate.

A subsidiary argument was raised on behalf of the Government of India to the effect that the liquidator had recognised or admitted the claim in such a way as to preclude him from now contesting it. I am satisfied that there is no substance in this contention. I am also in complete agreement with my Lord that India's membership of the British Commonwealth of Nations cannot of itself in any way affect the conclusion at which we have arrived. Accordingly, I would dismiss this appeal.

MORRIS, L.J.: Although my mind has been much exercised in regard to some aspects of this matter, I have reached the same conclusion. The survey of the authorities in the course of the submissions addressed to us has led me to the view that the rule which is recorded in Re Visser (1) is one that must be regarded as established in our law, even if it were thought that its very first origins could not with certainty be discovered. If some disadvantages can be pointed to as resulting from the rule, it can with much force be shown that these are offset, and, perhaps, outweighed, by considerations of convenience. Some of these considerations are recorded in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 154. But whatever view may be held as to these matters, I consider that it is now too late successfully to submit that the rule has not been accepted in our law.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., has reviewed the cases, and I could not add anything to the reasoning, with which I am in agreement, by which the authoritative nature of the rule has been demonstrated. The anxiety that I entertained during the arguments was whether, assuming that the principle or rule could not be impeached, it followed that the claim, or some claim, of the applicants must be rejected.

I think it is only fair to the liquidator to have in mind that the purchase price which was received by the company was transferred to this country long before the voluntary liquidation. Incidentally, the transfer also took place before the legislation was passed by which a capital gains tax was levied. We are, however, not in any way concerned with any question as to the quantum of any tax which may be due in India. The liquidators have very properly reserved and kept open the opportunity for challenging in India the correctness of the actual amount of the tax demanded. The matter must proceed before us on the assumption that some tax is due in India.

On this footing the issue before us depends on the meaning of the word "liabilities" in the Companies Act, 1948, s. 302. In Re General Rolling Stock Co., Joint Stock Discount Co.'s Claim (23), JAMES, L.J., in dealing with the language of s. 98 of the Companies Act, 1862, used these words (7 Ch. App. 648):

"A duty and a trust are thus imposed upon the court, to take care that the assets of the company shall be applied in discharge of its liabilities. What liabilities? All the liabilities of the company existing at the time when the winding-up order was made which gives the right."

If in the light of this guidance the word "liabilities" is given a wide meaning, does it cover a claim to tax by the applicants? It follows from acceptance of the rule of principle recorded that the applicants could not have sued the company in this country for tax. But on the assumption that some tax is owed in India so that there is a liability in India, can it be said that such liability is denoted by s. 302? I have felt it a disturbing thought that a company incorporated in this country that has carried on its activities in another country may be allowed to end its existence without having discharged such financial obligations as it may be ascertained to owe to the government of that other country, though possessed of resources to discharge them. The question for decision is, however, whether, if the rule or principle recorded in Re Visser (1) is accepted, some tax owed abroad is covered by the word "liabilities" in s. 302. If the rule may be regarded as having amongst its consequences the avoiding of situations of international embarrassment, then the disturbing thought to which I have referred can, perhaps, be offset by the consideration referred to by VAISEY, J., in his judgment, that rules of general application sometimes press hardly one way and sometimes another.

I have come to the conclusion that if the claim of the applicants were allowed, subject to ascertainment of quantum, the substance and reality of the matter would be that the English court would be collecting tax for the benefit of another State. That would involve an invasion of the principle which, as I think, must be definitely recognised. I considered during the arguments whether it could be said that the English court, in declaring what were the liabilities of a company that has operated in another country, would have regard to the law of that country when fixing and declaring what liabilities must be allowed for proof as liabilities within s. 302, but apart from any guidance which may be deduced from Re Lorillard (21), to allow the present claim would inevitably, I think, violate the established principle.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Stanley Johnson & Allen (for the applicants); Sanderson, Lee & Co. (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

SMEATON HANSCOMB & CO., LTD. v. SASSOON I. SETTY SON & CO.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), November 6, 19, 1953.]

Arbitration—Claim within time fixed by agreement—Claim to be made within fourteen days from final discharge of goods—Breach by beneficiary of fundamental term of contract—Goods delivered of kind specified in contract, but short in measure and substantially undergrade.

Sale of Goods—Description—Sale of mahogany logs—Delivery of mahogany logs, but short measure and substantially undergrade.

By a clause in a contract dated May 22, 1951, for the sale of about thirty-five tons of round mahogany logs f.o.b. Lagos for shipment to Liverpool: "Should any dispute arise with respect to any matter connected with this contract, the buyers shall nevertheless accept the goods as shipped and make due payment . . . such payment, however, shall not affect their right, if any, to claim compensation for breach of this contract by the sellers. Such difference shall be referred to arbitration . . . Any claim must be made within fourteen days from the final discharge of the goods and before they are removed." Final discharge of the ship carrying the logs was completed on June 6, 1951, and on July 12 or 13, 1951, the buyers complained to the sellers' agents of the quality of the logs, there being a shortage in measure as well as a serious percentage undergrade, which complaint they confirmed by letter on July 16, 1951, when they also claimed to reject the consignment.

HELD: (i) it was a principle of construction that exceptions in a contract were to be construed as not being applicable for the protection of those for whose benefit they were inserted if the beneficiary had committed a breach of a fundamental term of the contract, and a clause requiring a claim to be brought within a specified period was an exception for this purpose, but in the present case the goods delivered were round mahogany logs, and the fact that there was a shortage in measure as well as a substantial percentage undergrade did not render the performance totally different from what the contract contemplated and so was not sufficient to bring that principle into operation; and, therefore, the sellers were entitled to rely on the time clause.

Per DEVLIN, J.: There is no reason why a clause should not be worded so as to provide that a limitation point should not deprive the arbitrator of jurisdiction, and that it should be for him and not for the court to determine the point finally, so far as it is a question of fact. I think that the authorities accept a third category of this sort. At any rate, on the authorities, if the point is dealt with in the arbitration, whether as a limitation point or as one going to the jurisdiction of the arbitrator which the parties leave him to determine for himself, his finding—subject, of course, to a Case Stated—is conclusive. Furthermore, if I have to choose between construing a clause which provides that any claim must be made within fourteen days either as a clause that bars the claim altogether or as a clause that goes to the jurisdiction of the arbitrator, I should choose the former, for I can see no reason for holding that a clause which is, in form, a limitation clause, should be construed so as to affect the authority of an arbitrator or the validity of his appointment.

AS TO LIMITATION CLAUSES IN ARBITRATION AGREEMENTS, see HALSBURY, Simonds Edn., Vol. 2, p. 19, para. 47; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 2, p. 337, No. 165.

Cases referred to:

(1) Pinnock Brothers v. Lewis & Peat, Ltd., [1923] 1 K.B. 690; 92 L.J.K.B. 695; 129 L.T. 320; 21 Digest 239, 682.

- (2) Atlantic Shipping & Trading Co. v. Dreyfus (Louis) & Co., [1922] 2 A.C. 250; 91 L.J.K.B. 513; 127 L.T. 411; 12 Digest, Replacement, 284, 2193.
- (3) Ayscough v. Sheed, Thomson & Co., (1924), 93 L.J.K.B. 924; 131 L.T. 610; 21 Digest 239, 681.

SPECIAL CASE stated by arbitrator.

By a contract in writing dated May 22, 1951, the sellers, Sassoon I. Setty Son & Co., agreed to sell, and the buyers, Smeaton Hanscomb & Co., Ltd., agreed to buy, about thirty-five tons of round mahogany logs in fair quality at the price of £24 per ton, based on forty cubic feet per ton, Hoppus quarter girth measure tape under bark, 144 divisor, f.o.b. Lagos, nett, for shipment to Liverpool. The contract contained certain provisions as to quality and size and the following clause dealing with disputes:

"Should any dispute arise with respect to any matter connected with this contract, the buyers shall nevertheless accept the goods as shipped and make due payment as already provided; such payment, however, shall not affect their right, if any, to claim compensation for breach of this contract by the sellers. Such difference shall be referred to arbitration . . . Any claim must be made within fourteen days from the final discharge of the goods and before they are removed."

At the date of the contract the goods were already on the high seas, having been shipped from Lagos on Apr. 27, 1951. The ship arrived at Liverpool about May 27, 1951, and discharged twenty-one round mahogany logs together with one Sida (walnut) log, the property of the sellers, final discharge of the vessel being completed on June 6, 1951. The buyers, through their Liverpool agents, arranged for Alfred Dobell & Co., one of the recognised panel of firms appointed for the purpose, to measure and grade, and the shipping company to weigh and load on to railway wagons at the quayside, the twenty-one round mahogany logs and forward them, together with the Sida log, to their sawmills at High Wycombe. Alfred Dobell & Co.'s detailed specification, dated July 3, 1951, disclosed a shortage in measure as well as a serious percentage undergrade. On July 12 or 13, 1951, the buyers complained of the quality of the logs to the sellers' agents by telephone, and on July 16, 1951, confirmed the complaint by letter, claiming to be entitled to reject the consignment and to the return of the payment which they had made against documents before the ship arrived at Liverpool, plus computed freight and delivery charges from ex ship Liverpool to their sawmills. The buyers appointed an arbitrator, and the sellers, having failed to do likewise after service of a notice dated Sept. 15, 1952, in accordance with s. 7 of the Arbitration Act, 1950, the dispute was referred to the buyers' arbitrator as sole arbitrator.

The questions of law for the decision of the court were (i) whether, on the facts found and on the true construction of the contract, the buyers were entitled to maintain any claim against the sellers in the arbitration, (ii) if the answer to the first question was in the affirmative, whether, on the facts found and on the true construction of the contract, the buyers were entitled to reject the goods, and (iii) if the answers to the first and second questions were in the affirmative, whether, on the facts found, the damages payable by the sellers to the buyers included the cost of transporting the logs from ex ship Liverpool to the sawmills at High Wycombe. Depending on how the court answered these questions, the arbitrator made various awards.

Widgery for the buyers.

Adrian Hamilton for the sellers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19. DEVLIN, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: The first question stated is whether the buyers are entitled to maintain any claim against the sellers. This question raises the point that the claim was not brought within the period prescribed by the contract, that is, within fourteen days of final discharge and before the goods were removed. It was not, in fact, brought until after fourteen days from the completion of final discharge at Liverpool, and until after the goods were removed from Liverpool to the buyers' place of business at High Wycombe.

Counsel for the buyers makes three answers to this point. The first is that the claim is not out of time, because the place of the final discharge of the goods was not Liverpool, but High Wycombe; alternatively, because the time must be taken to run from the date when Messrs. Dobell completed their detailed specification. I think, with respect, that both these points are quite unarguable.

Secondly, counsel submits that the sellers can rely on this clause only if they have delivered goods that correspond with the contract description. He cited an obiter dictum by ROCHE, J., in Pinnock Brothers v. Lewis & Peat, Ltd. (1) ([1923] 1 K.B. 695). It is, no doubt, a principle of construction that exceptions are to be construed as not being applicable for the protection of those for whose benefit they are inserted if the beneficiary has committed a breach of a fundamental term of the contract, and that a clause requiring the claim to be brought within a specified period is to be regarded as an exception for this purpose: see Atlantic Shipping & Trading Co. v. Louis Dreyfus & Co. (2). In that case, the fundamental term was the implied condition of seaworthiness, which is treated, as LORD SUMNER said ([1922] 2 A.C. 260), as "underlying the whole contract of affreightment". The same principle has been applied to cases of deviation and other fundamental terms. I do not think that what is a fundamental term has ever been closely defined. It must be something, I think, narrower than a condition of the contract, for it would be limiting the exceptions too much to say that they applied only to breaches of warranty. It is, I think, something which underlies the whole contract so that, if it is not complied with, the performance becomes something totally different from that which the contract contemplates. If, for example, instead of delivering mahogany logs the sellers delivered pine logs and the buyers inadvertently omitted to have them examined for fourteen days, it might well be that the sellers could not rely on the time clause. ROCHE, J., in Pinnock Brothers v. Lewis & Peat, Ltd. (1), dealt with the same point in relation to another clause in the same contract which sought to exclude the right of rejection, and in relation to that he said ([1923] 1 K.B. 697): "... the delivery in this case could not be properly described as copra cake at all". In the case I am considering the goods delivered are described throughout as round mahogany logs, and it does not appear that anyone quarrelled with that description. What the arbitrator found was that there was "a shortage in measure as well as a serious percentage undergrade". That finding is not, in my view, sufficient to bring into operation the principle on which counsel for the buyers relies.

Counsel for the buyers' third point raises a question on the construction of this type of clause. He submits that clauses of this type in contracts which also contain an arbitration clause have been held on the authorities to fall within one or other of two categories. In one category they are treated as true limitation clauses, which bar the claim for all purposes, whether in the arbitration or at law. In the other category, they have no effect except in conjunction with the arbitration clause. In this second category, the object of the clause is merely to fix a limit to the time within which the party aggrieved may claim to enjoy the benefits of arbitration; if he does not act within the time prescribed he loses his right to arbitrate, but his claim in law is unaffected. Counsel submits that, on the true construction of this clause, it does not fall into the first category, but into the second, and all that befell the buyers was that they lost the right to arbitrate, or, conversely, that the sellers obtained the right to object to the arbitration proceedings as being out of time. That was, counsel contends, the only right which the clause gave to the sellers, they failed to exercise it at the appropriate time by objecting to the arbitration, and there is now nothing left in the clause. It is, of course, admitted that counsel for the sellers at the arbitration took the point on the clause, and, indeed, the question with which I am dealing is stated on that point. But counsel for the buyers submits that that is not good enough. The only effect, he says, that can be given to the clause is to deprive the arbitrator of jurisdiction. The party, therefore, who wishes to exercise his rights under the clause can do so only by objecting to the jurisdiction; if he fails to do that, he loses the benefit of the clause. There is, in fact, a dispute about whether counsel for the sellers at the arbitration did, or did not, in terms protest against the arbitrator exercising jurisdiction. That is a point which I could determine only on motion by taking evidence ab extra. There is no protest noted in the Special Case, and for the limited purpose of these proceedings I shall assume that none was made.

I do not think that all clauses of this type must be placed in one or other of the two categories which counsel for the buyers has specified. If a clause provides that an arbitrator is to be nominated within fourteen days, I can see the force of an argument that a party must either take the objection to an appointment as being out of time or waive it, and that he cannot in effect say: "I do not object to your appointment as arbitrator, but I am going to leave it to you to determine whether you were properly appointed or not". Perhaps he can. I do not know and I need not decide it. For this clause goes, not to the appointment of the arbitrator, but to the making of the claim which the arbitrator has to determine. I can see no reason why a party should not say in effect: "I agree that you are quite properly appointed and have jurisdiction, and I want you to determine whether this claim was made within the contract time or not". On the argument of counsel for the buyers that the clause is limited to arbitration proceedings, it must be read as if it provided that any claim in the arbitration must be made within fourteen days. That does not, on the face of it, touch the jurisdiction of the arbitrator. There is no reason why a clause should not be worded in that way so as to provide that a limitation point should not deprive the arbitrator of jurisdiction, and that it should be for him and not for the court to determine the point finally, so far as it is a question of fact. I think that the authorities accept a third category of this sort. In Ayscough v. Sheed, Thomson & Co. (3) VISCOUNT CAVE (131 L.T. 612) seemed to think there was one, and so, I think, did ROCHE, J., when, in Pinnock Brothers v. Lewis & Peat, Ltd. (1) ([1923] 1 K.B. 696), he dealt with Ayscough v. Sheed, Thomson & Co. (3). At any rate, on these authorities, if the point is dealt with in the arbitration, whether as a limitation point or as one going to the jurisdiction of the arbitrator which the parties leave him to determine for himself, his finding—subject, of course, to a Case Stated—is conclusive. Furthermore, if I have to choose between construing a clause which provides that any claim must be made within fourteen days either as a clause that bars the claim altogether or as a clause that goes to the jurisdiction of the arbitrator, I should choose the former, for I can see no reason for holding that a clause which is, in form, a limitation clause, should be construed so as to affect the authority of an arbitrator or the validity of his appointment.

Accordingly, I answer the first question stated in the negative, and, consequently, the other questions do not arise.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: William A. Crump & Son (for the buyers); Parker, Garrett & Co. (for the sellers).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

DRIVE YOURSELF HIRE CO. (LONDON), LTD. v. STRUTT AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), October 28, 29, 30,
November 2, 3, 4, 24, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Sub-tenancy—Covenant by sub-tenant not to assign without consent of both superior landlord and tenant—Assignment with consent of tenant only—Enforcement of covenant by superior landlord—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 15 (3).

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Assignment—Covenant not to assign without consent—Enforcement by head lessor—Assignment of sub-lease—Head lessor not party to sub-lease—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 56 (1).

By a lease dated Oct. 27, 1931, the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs demised to the first defendant a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied for a term of twenty years expiring on Nov. 11, 1951. This lease contained a covenant by the first defendant not to assign, underlet, or part with possession of the premises without the consent in writing of the landlord, and on Apr. 20, 1932, with his written consent, the first defendant sub-let the premises to D.S. for a period of years expiring on Nov. 10, 1951. The consent of the superior landlord was given on condition that the under-lease should contain a covenant by the under-lessee (D.S.) not to assign, let, or part with possession of the premises without his warrant or that of his successors in title, and, in accordance with this, para. 2 (x) of the sub-lease contained a covenant by D.S. not to assign, etc., without the written consent of the first defendant and the superior landlord. The power of re-entry and determination for breach of covenant was reserved only to the first defendant. On Jan. 27, 1937, with the written consent of the superior landlord and the first defendant, D.S. assigned her lease to W.E., Ltd., subject to the performance by W.E., Ltd. of the covenants in the original sub-lease. On Feb. 28, 1951, the first defendant executed a licence to W.E., Ltd., to assign to the second defendant, the assignment being executed on May 21, 1951, without the consent of the plaintiffs who, by that time, had become the reversioners. After the expiration of the under-lease on Nov. 10, 1951, and of the head lease on Nov. 11, 1951, the second defendant continued in occupation of the premises. In an action for possession of the premises, the second defendant claimed the protection of s. 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as a "sub-tenant" to whom the premises had been "lawfully sub-let".

HELD: in view of the definitions of "tenant" in s. 12 (1) (f) and (g) of the Act of 1920, the expression "sub-tenant" in s. 15 (3) of the Act included, not only an original sub-tenant, but also an assignee of a sub-tenant; to bring himself within the terms of the sub-section, however, the second defendant was required to show that the assignment to him was lawful, and, since the assignment was made in breach of the covenant contained in para. 2 (x) of the sub-lease, which had been expressly inserted at the request of and for the protection and benefit of the superior landlord, the assignment could not be said to be lawful although the superior landlord was not a party to the sub-lease and could not forfeit it for breach of the covenant; and, therefore, the second defendant was not entitled to the protection of s. 15 (3).

Per DENNING, L.J.: Under the provisions of s. 56 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the superior landlord could take the benefit of the covenant inserted in the sub-lease by requiring his consent to be obtained, even though he was not a party to the instrument.

Decision of LYNKEY, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 1036), reversed.

FOR THE INCREASE OF RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST (RESTRICTIONS) ACT, 1920, s. 12 (1) (f) and (g) and s. 15 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 999 and p. 1019.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Norman v. Simpson, [1946] 1 All E.R. 74; [1946] K.B. 158; 115 L.J.K.B. 107; 174 L.T. 279; 31 Digest, Replacement, 639, 7471.
- (2) Maley v. Fearn, [1946] 2 All E.R. 583; [1947] L.J.R. 276; 176 L.T. 203; 31 Digest, Replacement, 711, 7975.
- (3) South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co., [1905] A.C. 239; 74 L.J.K.B. 525; 92 L.T. 710; 34 Digest 169, 1322.
- (4) Lee v. Carter (K.), Ltd., [1948] 2 All E.R. 690; [1949] 1 K.B. 85; [1949] L.J.R. 7; 31 Digest, Replacement, 426, 5529.
- (5) Smith v. River Douglas Catchment Board, [1949] 2 All E.R. 179; 113 J.P. 388; sub nom. Smith & Snipes Hall Farm, Ltd. v. River Douglas Catchment Board, [1949] 2 K.B. 500; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Boyer v. Warbey, [1953] 1 All E.R. 269; [1953] 1 Q.B. 234; 117 J.P. 106.
- (7) Haywood v. Silber, (1885), 30 Ch.D. 404; 54 L.T. 108; 30 Digest, Replacement, 513, 1530.
- (8) White v. Bijou Mansions, Ltd., [1937] 3 All E.R. 269; [1937] Ch. 610; 107 L.J.Ch. 32; 157 L.T. 105; affd. C.A., [1938] 1 All E.R. 546; [1938] Ch. 351; 107 L.J.Ch. 212; 158 L.T. 338; Digest Supp.
- (9) Stromdale & Ball, Ltd. v. Burden, [1952] 1 All E.R. 59; [1952] Ch. 223; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (10) Dutton v. Poole, (1678), 1 Freem. K.B. 471 (89 E.R. 352); T. Jo. 102 (84 E.R. 1168); 1 Vent. 332 (86 E.R. 215); 3 Keb. 786, 814, 830, 836 (84 E.R. 1011, 1028, 1038, 1041); 2 Lev. 210 (83 E.R. 523); T. Raym. 302 (83 E.R. 156); 12 Digest, Replacement, 47, 251.
- (11) Martyn v. Hind, (1779), 2 Cowp. 437 (98 E.R. 1174); 1 Doug. K.B. 142 (99 E.R. 94); 19 Digest 428, 2652.
- (12) Marchington v. Vernon, (1787), 1 Bos. & P. 101, n.; 126 E.R. 801; 12 Digest, Replacement, 47, 254.
- (13) Carnegie v. Waugh, (1823), 2 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 277; 1 L.J.O.S.K.B. 89; 31 Digest, Replacement, 293, 4307.
- (14) Gilby v. Copley, (1683), 3 Lev. 138; 83 E.R. 618; 12 Digest, Replacement, 47, 252.
- (15) Chesterfield & Midland Silkstone Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Hawkins, (1865), 3 H. & C. 677; 34 L.J.Ex. 121; 12 L.T. 427; 159 E.R. 698; 12 Digest, Replacement, 45, 232.
- (16) Cooker v. Child, (1673), 2 Lev. 74; 83 E.R. 456; 17 Digest 197, 79.
- (17) Chelsea & Walham Green Building Society v. Armstrong, [1951] 2 All E.R. 250; [1951] Ch. 853; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (18) Tweddle v. Atkinson, (1861), 1 B. & S. 393; 30 L.J.Q.B. 265; 4 L.T. 468; 25 J.P. 517; 121 E.R. 762; 12 Digest, Replacement, 234, 1752.
- (19) Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd. v. Selfridge & Co., Ltd., [1915] A.C. 847; 84 L.J.K.B. 1680; 113 L.T. 386; 12 Digest, Replacement, 234, 1754.
- (20) Gosling v. Woolf, [1893] 1 Q.B. 39; 68 L.T. 89; 30 Digest 419, 624.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of LYNKEY, J., dated Mar. 30, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 1036, dismissing a claim for possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied.

Belcourt for the plaintiffs.

L. A. Blundell and Hyamson for the first defendant, Emily Strutt.

M. Waters for the second defendant, James George Groville Dugdale.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 24. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: In these proceedings the plaintiffs are claiming possession of a first floor flat. Under a lease dated Oct. 27, 1931, the premises were let by the plaintiffs' predecessor in title to the first defendant, Miss Strutt, for twenty years from Nov. 11, 1931. That lease contained a covenant to deliver up the premises on the expiration of the term in 1951 and such delivery up was not made in circumstances which will appear. The lease contained a covenant not to assign or under-let without the written consent of the landlord, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld. In 1932 the first defendant desired to underlet the premises to a Mrs. Sykes. The plaintiffs' predecessor in title, a Mr. Payne, consented to this, but on terms that were contained in a licence dated Apr. 19, 1932, which reads as follows:

"I the undersigned hereby consent to an under-lease from Apr. 1, 1932, to Nov. 10, 1951, determinable at the option of the said Emily Strutt on Nov. 11 in any of the years 1934, 1936, 1938, 1940, 1942, 1944, 1948, or 1950, at a rent of not less than £150 a year by Miss Emily Strutt of 11, Chester Street, London, to Mrs. Dorothy Sykes of 6, Deanery Street, London, of the premises demised by a lease dated Oct. 27, 1931, and made between myself of the one part and the said Emily Strutt of the other part such under-lease to contain a covenant by the under-lessee not to assign let or part with the possession of the premises or any part thereof without the warrant of myself or those claiming under me provided that this licence is restricted to the particular under-lease hereby authorised and save as aforesaid the covenant in the said lease contained against assignment or under-letting shall remain in full force and effect."

One of the points in this case is whether this document is to be regarded as contractual as between the parties, and, if so, whether it imposed any obligation on the first defendant other than the insertion of the covenant in the sub-lease.

The covenant with which the appeal is concerned is contained in para. 2 (x) of the sub-lease which is as follows:

"The tenant agrees with the landlady as follows . . . Not to assign under-let or part with the possession of any part of the demised premises or any part thereof without the written consent of the landlady and the superior landlord such consent however not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person."

Mrs. Sykes was minded to assign her interest in the premises to Wroxall Estates, Ltd. In accordance with the covenant the consents of the first defendant and the head landlord were obtained in a document dated Jan. 26, 1937, which reads as follows:

"We, the undersigned, Arthur Samuel Roberts Payne and Emily Strutt hereby give our licence and authority to an assignment by Dorothy Sykes of all her estate in the premises demised by a lease dated Apr. 20, 1932 and an extension of lease dated Nov. 21, 1932 (both made between the said Emily Strutt of the one part and the said Dorothy Sykes of the other part) unto Wroxall Estates, Ltd., for use and occupation by Commander James George Greville Dugdale of Wroxall Abbey in the county of Warwick provided that this licence is restricted to the particular assignment hereby authorised and save as aforesaid the covenant in the said lease contained against assignment or under-letting shall remain in full force and effect."

The assignment to the second defendant by Wroxall Estates was made on May 21, 1951. The plaintiffs' consent was not asked for or obtained. The second defendant's interest came to an end on Nov. 10, and the first defendant's on Nov. 11. The plaintiffs, who by that time were the reversioners, claimed possession, and the second defendant alleged that he was entitled to remain in possession under s. 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The sub-section reads as follows:

"Where the interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house to which this Act applies is determined, either as the result of an order or judgment for possession or ejection, or for any other reason, any sub-tenant to whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully sub-let shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be deemed to become the tenant of the landlord on the same terms as he would have held from the tenant if the tenancy had continued."

The first point submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs is that that sub-section does not apply to or protect assignees of sub-leases. In considering the argument one must bear in mind the definitions under s. 12 (1) (f) of the Act of 1920. The expression "tenant" includes any person from time to time deriving title under the original agreement. Under s. 12 (1) (g) the expressions "tenant" and "tenancy" include "sub-tenant" and "sub-tenancy" and the expression "let" includes "sub-let". These, I think, are the relevant definitions which govern the construction of the sub-section unless the context otherwise requires. It is clear, I think, that the second defendant is a sub-tenant. The fact that he is an assignee does not prevent his being a sub-tenant, but it is said that he is not a sub-tenant to whom the premises were sub-let—the sub-letting was to Mrs. Sykes. The context, therefore, requires that the only sub-tenant to be considered is an original sub-tenant, because the words are inapt to cover an assignee. There is, I think, force in this, and I doubt whether the legislature directed its attention to the position of assignees. Having regard, however, to the definition in s. 12 (1) (f) and the purpose of the section to be gathered from its terms, I have come to the conclusion that it should be construed as covering assignees. Leaving aside for the moment the meaning of "lawfully", it would seem clear that, if the assignee is to get the protection of the section, the assignment to him must be "lawful". One could imagine a case where the head landlord was a party to the sub-lease which required his consent for an assignment. In such a case he must plainly be able to rely on the unlawfulness of an assignment made without his consent. It is, I think, equally clear that he must be able to rely on the unlawfulness, if it exists, of the original sub-letting. One, therefore, has to expand the words after sub-tenant so as to read

"to whom the premises, or any part thereof have been lawfully assigned by or under a sub-tenant to whom they have been lawfully sub-let."

I will now turn to the meaning of "lawful". In Norman v. Simpson (1) the court took the view that premises were unlawfully sub-let if the head lessor had a subsisting right of re-entering. That formula was considered in Maley v. Fearn (2). In that case a tenant had sub-let in breach of a covenant which required that there should be no sub-letting except with the consent of the landlord. It was held that the part sub-let had not been lawfully sub-let, but the court doubted whether, if the sub-letting was contrary to the terms of the covenant, it would be necessary to show that it gave rise to a right of re-entry. MORTON, L.J., was a party to both decisions and in the latter decision he expressed the opinion that a right of re-entry was not a necessary condition of unlawfulness. I agree with this. It is said here, in the first place, that, as the head landlord was not a party to the sub-lease, he cannot rely on the fact that his consent was neither sought nor obtained. It is said in the second place that the first defendant had a right to release Wroxall Estates from the provision which required the head landlord's consent and that she did so.

I think the first question to be considered is whether there was any implied obligation arising out of the licence. It was suggested in the pleadings that

A the first defendant impliedly undertook to impose the term on and, if necessary, enforce the term against the under-lessee and her successors in title. I think this is putting the obligation too widely. It has been said countless times that terms cannot be implied unless it is necessary to give efficacy to the agreement. It is suggested here, on behalf of the defendants, that Miss Strutt, even if she knew that the head landlord would object if approached, could release her sub-lessee from the term requiring the head landlord's consent. If this were right, the agreement which the licence document evidences would, it seems to me, have no efficacy at all. The position would be precisely the same as if the first defendant's consent only was required. I think, therefore, under this contract the first defendant impliedly undertook not to release or waive her right to require the superior landlord's consent.

B Although I do not myself think it would have affected the result I will deal here with the suggestion that the first defendant through her solicitors waived or purported to waive the position with regard to the superior landlord's consent. The solicitors concerned did not give evidence so the matter turns on inferences from letters. On Nov. 30, 1950, the solicitor for Wroxall Estates wrote to Miss Strutt:

C "Your tenants, Messrs. Wroxall Estates, Ltd. wish to assign the lease to their managing director, Mr. James Dugdale. We are therefore writing to ask for permission for the assignment of the premises to Mr. Dugdale. We do not know whether you will require references having regard to Mr. Dugdale's position in the company, but if you do require them please let us know and we will forward them. Do you know whether under your own lease it is necessary for you to obtain the permission of your own landlord to an assignment of the under-lease? If so, it will be necessary to get the permission of the Drive Yourself Hire Company (London), Ltd. who we understand are the superior landlords."

D Miss Strutt herself sent an answer to that:

E "I do not think it is necessary for me to get permission for me to grant an assignment of 1A Chester Street. I should like references as per usual. I have been laid up for weeks with a concussion owing to falling on my head and am only allowed any urgent business. I will get someone to speak to my lawyer. I see no reason against Mr. Dugdale having the lease, Yours truly, Emily Strutt."

F The matter was referred to her solicitors and they wrote on Jan. 1:

G "We act for Miss Emily Strutt and she has now forwarded to us your letter to her of Nov. 30 with instructions. She regrets that this letter has not been answered before, but this has been through the illness of our client. We think it as well for the usual references to be submitted of Mr. Dugdale and perhaps you will kindly let us have these at your convenience. There appears to be no necessity to obtain the permission of our client's superior landlords to grant your clients, Wroxhall Estates, Ltd., a licence to assign the lease to Mr. Dugdale."

I I read this last letter as dealing with the question put in the first, namely, as to the head-lease. Those are the letters, and the consent given by the first defendant was dated Feb. 28. It contains a fairly long recital which unfortunately omits any reference to the clause of the sub-lease which deals with assignments. The learned judge thought that the letter of Jan. 1 ought to be treated as a consent to the assignment of the sub-lease without requiring Wroxall Estates to obtain the consent of the plaintiffs. He relied, I think, on contemporary references to the sub-lease dealing with repairs as evidence that the solicitors had the terms of the sub-lease before them. The only explanation, to my mind, of these and some later letters consistent with honesty, which everyone accepts, is that both firms of solicitors had completely failed to remember or remind themselves of para. 2 (x) of the sub-lease. There was, therefore, a breach of that provision. The question is whether that prevents the assignment being lawful within s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 having regard to the fact that it is the superior landlord, who was not a party, who is seeking to say that the assignment was unlawful. The provision here was, I think, an unusual one. It may well be that as a general rule breaches of provisions in a sub-lease of which the sub-lessor can take advantage would be irrelevant in considering the position of a sub-tenant or assignee in cases where the head landlord was the plaintiff. The provision which was broken here was, however, one inserted for his protection under an agreement by the first defendant with him, the terms and implications of which I have already dealt with. I have come to the conclusion that in those circumstances there was not a lawful assignment to the second defendant within s. 15 (3), as construed to bring assignees within its ambit. I should, perhaps, have mentioned that the plaintiff's objection to the second defendant is not personal, but based on the fact that the assignor, being a limited company, could not have claimed the protection of the Acts.

Various other points were argued which it is not necessary to consider. It was submitted that, if the second defendant was within s. 15 (3) the plaintiffs could maintain that there had been a breach of para. (d) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, which deals, inter alia, with cases where the whole of the premises have been assigned or sub-let. If that were right, it would give the court jurisdiction to make an order, if the court thought it were reasonable to do so. The learned judge came to the conclusion that the submission failed although he indicated that, if the plaintiffs had brought themselves within that paragraph, he would have thought it reasonable to make an order. I express no opinion on this point which had better be left over until it is necessary to decide it. The point on which I differ from the learned judge is a narrow one. The word "lawful" is not an easy one to construe and apply, but for the reasons which I have given I think in the special circumstances which existed in this case the defence fails. I would allow the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: The first question is whether in s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 the word "sub-tenant" includes not only the original sub-tenant, but also an assignee of a sub-tenant. I think it does, but, if this is done, I think the words "lawfully sub-let" must be expanded so as to include the process by which the assignee becomes sub-tenant. They include, not only the original sub-letting, but also the assignment. All the steps by which the sub-tenant becomes a sub-tenant have to be lawful before he can get the benefit of s. 15 (3). This means, at any rate, that they must not be in breach of contract, for to break a contract is an unlawful act: see South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. (3). In the present case all the steps by which the second defendant, Commander Dugdale, became sub-tenant were clearly lawful except the last step by which Wroxall Estates, Ltd., assigned the sub-lease to him. The sub-lease contained a specific covenant that the sub-tenant would not assign the premises

"without the consent of the landlady [Miss Strutt] and the superior landlord, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person."

In so far as the covenant required the superior landlord's consent, it was inserted at the express request of the superior landlord and for his benefit. Indeed, he insisted on it. When Wroxall Estates, Ltd., assigned the sub-lease to Commander Dugdale, they ignored that obligation. They obtained the consent of the landlady, Miss Strutt, but did not obtain the consent of the superior landlords. If Wroxall Estates, Ltd., had asked the superior landlords for their consent, the superior landlords could quite reasonably have refused to give consent, because Commander Dugdale would have become a protected tenant whereas Wroxall Estates, Ltd., were unprotected: Lee v. K. Carter, Ltd. (4).

Notwithstanding the fact that Wroxall Estates, Ltd., did not obtain the consent of the superior landlord in accordance with the covenant, the judge has held that the assignment to Commander Dugdale was lawful. The reason he gave was that the superior landlords were not parties to the sub-lease and could not enforce the covenants in it. It was for Miss Strutt alone to enforce it, and, if she thought fit to release Wroxall Estates, Ltd., from the obligations of it, the superior landlords could not complain. There is, I think, one short and decisive answer to this reasoning. When Mr. Payne, the predecessor of the superior landlords, gave his consent giving Miss Strutt, the tenant, permission to grant a sub-lease, he insisted that the under-lease should contain a covenant by the under-lessee not to assign the premises without the warrant of the superior landlord and those claiming under him. The consent thus given by Mr. Payne to Miss Strutt became a contract between them as soon as it was acted on. It was clearly an implied term of that contract that Miss Strutt, the tenant, should not release the sub-tenants from the obligation to get the superior landlord's consent, and the benefit of this implied term ran, I think, with the reversion so that not only Mr. Payne but also his successors in title could take advantage of it: see Smith v. River Douglas Catchment Board (5) and Boyer v. Warbey (6). If Miss Strutt did release the sub-tenants (Wroxall Estates, Ltd.), she herself was acting unlawfully, because she was breaking the implied term. If she did not release the sub-tenants, then the sub-tenants (Wroxall Estates, Ltd.) were acting unlawfully in that they assigned in breach of their obligation to her to obtain the superior landlord's consent. In either case the process was unlawful.

If I am wrong, however, in holding that there was such an implied term – and if the correct view is that Miss Strutt fulfilled all her obligations to the superior landlord by inserting the covenant in the sub-lease—which is what the judge thought, then I am still of opinion that the action of Wroxall Estates, Ltd., was unlawful. They deliberately broke a covenant which was inserted for the benefit of the superior landlord. Such a breach was, I believe, unlawful although the superior landlord was not a party to the instrument. I say this because the case seems to me to fall precisely within the words of s. 56 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which says that “A person may take . . . the benefit of . . . any . . . covenant . . . respecting land or other property, although he may not be named as a party to the . . . instrument.”

In the course of the argument ROMER, L.J., drew attention to the preceding covenant in the sub-lease whereby the sub-tenant, in case of the premises being destroyed by fire, agreed in certain circumstances to pay to the superior landlord the loss thereby occasioned to him. Surely the superior landlord could, under s. 56 (1), take the benefit of that covenant. So, also, under this covenant about assigning the superior landlord can, I think, take the benefit of it by requiring his consent to be obtained. I do not say that for breach of it the superior landlord could forfeit the sub-lease. He clearly could not do so, because the proviso for re-entry was not inserted for his benefit. Only the covenant was for his benefit. But he is, at least, entitled to say that an assignment in breach of the covenant is unlawful. It should be noticed that in Haywood v. Silber (7) this court insisted on such a covenant being inserted in a sub-lease for the benefit of the superior landlord, and they would not have done so if they had thought it was no good to him.

Counsel for the second defendant argued, however, that s. 56 (1) must be limited to persons “with whom some agreement or covenant is purported to be made”, relying on the observations of SIMONDS, J., in White v. Bijou

Mansions, Ltd. (8). If the covenant had been formally expressed to be "with" the superior landlord, it would, he said, have been enforceable by the superior landlord, although he was not a party, but, as it was not so expressed, it was not enforceable. But, as SOMERVELL, L.J., pointed out in the course of the argument, that may be too narrow an interpretation to place on the words used by SIMONDS, J. Enforceability depends, not on the form of the obligation, but on the substance of it. A covenant is, for this purpose, sufficiently made "with" a person if it is, on the face of it, made directly for his benefit in such circumstances that it was intended to be enforceable by him. In support of this view I would refer to the recent case of Stromdale & Ball, Ltd. v. Burden (9), where DANCKWERTS, J., as one ground of his judgment, held that an option to purchase was enforceable by a company as an "agreement . . . respecting land" although the company was not a party to the instrument and the agreement was not expressed in terms to be "with" the company. Much of the difficulty that has surrounded s. 56 has arisen from an inadequate knowledge of the history of the subject. It is often said to be a fundamental principle of our law that only a person who is a party to a contract can sue on it. I wish to assert, as distinctly as I can, that the common law in its original setting knew no such principle. Indeed, it said quite the contrary. For the two hundred years before 1861 it was settled law that, if a promise in a simple contract was made expressly for the benefit of a third person in such circumstances that it was intended to be enforceable by him, then the common law would enforce the promise at his instance, although he was not a party to the contract. That was clearly laid down by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in 1677 in Dutton v. Poole (10). One hundred years later it was so well accepted that LORD MANSFIELD in Martyn v. Hind (11) said (2 Cowp. 443) it was a matter of surprise how a doubt could have arisen about it, and BULLER, J., said in Marchington v. Vernon (12) (1 Bos. & P. 101 n.) quite categorically that " . . . if one person makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third, that third person may maintain an action upon it."

Finally, in 1823, the Court of King's Bench, then in its golden age, including as it did ABBOTT, C.J., and BAYLEY and HOLROYD, JJ., specifically so held: see Carnegie v. Waugh (13); and in 1844 JOSEPH CHITTY in his highly authoritative work on PLEADING, 7th ed., vol. 1, pp. 4, 5, treated the law as settled accordingly. He would be a bold man who would say that a principle supported by the names I have mentioned did not represent the law of England, especially when it is so eminently just and reasonable.

So much for simple contracts. It was different with contracts under seal, as ABBOTT, C.J., himself pointed out in Carnegie v. Waugh (13). There was an inflexible rule that no one could sue on an indenture inter partes unless he was named as a party to it. Numerous examples of this rule will be found from Gilby v. Copley (14), in 1683, to Chesterfield & Midland Silkstone Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Hawkins (15) in 1865. But that rule was strictly confined to indentures made between parties, that is, indentures which specifically named the parties to it in a formal way, as by saying: "This indenture made between John Doe of the one part and Richard Roe of the other part": see CHITTY, ibid., at p. 3. The rule never applied to a deed-poll or to an indenture which was not expressed to be made between parties. The result was that if the indenture did not specifically name the parties in formal fashion, but started off simply by saying that: "This indenture witnesseth that John Doe and Richard Roe have agreed as follows", stating their agreement and followed by their signatures, then the common law allowed a third party to sue on a covenant contained therein which was made expressly for his benefit. This was laid down in 1673 in Cooker v. Child (16), and was applied in striking fashion recently by VAISEY, J., in Chelsea & Walham Green Building Society v. Armstrong (17).

Such was the state of the law in 1845 when Parliament passed s. 5 of the Real Property Act, 1845. That section abolished the technical rule about indentures so far as land was concerned. It enabled a person to take the benefit of a covenant over or respecting land, although he was not named as a party to the indenture. Naturally enough, that section only applied to indentures because in 1845 they were the only documents in which the law needed to be remedied. In all other cases at that time a third party could sue. In 1861, however, came the unfortunate case of Tweddle v. Atkinson (18) in which the Court of Queen's Bench departed from the law as it had been understood for the previous two hundred years and held, quite generally, that no stranger could take advantage of a contract, although made for his benefit, and that was assumed, without argument, to be the law by the House of Lords in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd. v. Selfridge & Co., Ltd. (19). I do not pause to consider whether this new rule was legitimately introduced into the law. Incidentally, the courts of the United States of America have not adopted this new rule. They have followed the original common law, which is much more in accord with the needs of a civilised society. So is the Scots law. But what I do suggest is that the rule in Tweddle v. Atkinson (18) was itself greatly modified by s. 56 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. Just as the Real Property Act, 1845, modified the old technical rule about indentures, so the Act of 1925 modified the new technical rule about contracts generally. Section 56 (1) applies, not merely to indentures, but to any instrument of agreement, and it applies not only to land, but to any property, real or personal. It says that:

"A person may take . . . the benefit of any . . . agreement . . . respecting . . . property, although he may not be named as a party to the . . . instrument."

I can think of no words more apt to do away with the rule in Tweddle v. Atkinson (18), leaving the courts free, in cases respecting property, to go back to the old common law, whereby a third party can sue on a contract made expressly for his benefit, and be rid also of the old rule about deeds inter partes.

In support of this view I would like to give some modern instances. First, there is the important decision which I have already mentioned of VAISEY, J., in Chelsea & Walham Green Building Society v. Armstrong (17). A man who had mortgaged a house sold it to a purchaser. In the deed of transfer (which was not inter partes) the purchaser covenanted that he would pay the future instalments to the building society. The building society was not a party to the transfer, but VAISEY, J., held that the building society could enforce the covenant by direct action against the purchaser. For this purpose he went back to the old case, Cooker v. Child (16), but he could not have done this unless the rule in Tweddle v. Atkinson (18) had been done away with so as to permit him to go back to the old common law. If it is permissible to go back to Cooker v. Child (16), in the second volume of LEVINZ's reports, why not also go back to Dutton v. Poole (10) in the same volume? especially as it has never been overruled by any court of competent authority. Next there is the recent decision of DANCKWERTS, J., in Stromdale & Ball, Ltd. v. Burden (9). A deed of licence (which was inter partes) gave an option to purchase to a company which was not a party to the deed. The company could not have sued at common law because the deed was inter partes. But by virtue of s. 56 (1) of the Law of Property Act, it was held entitled to do so. Finally, in regard to simple contracts, I would refer to the cases I mentioned in Smith v. River Douglas Catchment Board (5), namely, commercial credits, pension agreements, and household insurances. No court would, I fancy, deny the third party a remedy in such cases, and the remedy is to be found by recourse to the old common law.

My conclusion is, therefore, that s. 56 (1) applies so as to entitle the superior landlord to take the benefit of this covenant although he was not named as a party to the under-lease in which it was contained. The assignment to Commander Dugdale was unlawful because the consent of the superior landlord was not obtained. He is, therefore, not protected by s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920. In these circumstances there is no reason to consider paras. (a) and (d) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 and I do not do so. I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. The first question to consider is whether the protective provisions of s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 extend to an assign from a sub-lessee or whether they are confined to sub-lessees themselves. The sub-section refers in terms only to sub-tenants to whom premises have been sub-let and it is not altogether easy to fit assignees into the language which the draftsman used. Nevertheless, a person to whom a sub-lease is assigned undoubtedly becomes the sub-tenant of the immediate reversioner, and it would be a curious intention to attribute to Parliament that an original sub-lessee is protected, but not an assignee from him, in cases, for example, where the head lessor has expressly approved both the sub-lease and the assignment thereof. In my opinion, assignees of underleases are, in fact, within the sub-section, not merely as a matter of expectation, but by virtue of the definitions of "tenant" in s. 12 (1) (f) and (g) of the Act of 1920. The difficulty of applying the language of s. 15 (3) to under-tenants by assignment is not such, in my judgment, as to oust these definitions from the sub-section by reason of the excluding preface to s. 12 (1) "except where the context otherwise requires". I think that s. 15 (3) may reasonably be read as applying both to sub-lessees and their assigns, but so that no assign can invoke it unless both the sub-lease and the assignment thereof are "lawful" in relation to the superior lessor or lessors who would, but for the sub-section, be entitled to possession of the premises sub-demised. Whether the word "lawfully" has an even wider scope it is not, for present purposes, necessary to consider.

On the construction which I have attributed to s. 15 (3) the second defendant, Commander Dugdale, is entitled to rely on it provided that the assignment to him by Wroxall Estates, Ltd. was valid not only as against Miss Strutt but as against the head lessors when Miss Strutt's lease fell in, on which date this defendant was in possession (in reliance on s. 15 (3)) of the whole of the premises demised. Was, then, this defendant's assignment "lawful" as against the head lessors? To answer this question it is necessary to inquire as to the relevant rights which Mr. Payne acquired in relation to the property and to which the plaintiffs have, at all material times, been entitled as his successors. Mr. Payne was the freeholder of the property, and it is quite clear that, when he leased it to Miss Strutt, he attached considerable importance to retaining control over the persons who might from time to time occupy the premises under a title deriving from her. Such control could, in fact, only be achieved with certainty by his insisting on being a party himself to all subsequent dispositions of the property by way of assignment or sub-lease. After the grant of the lease to Miss Strutt there was a variety of ways in which the property might change hands during the term of the demise. Miss Strutt might, for example, assign the term and subsequent assignments might follow, or she might grant a sub-lease and other persons might acquire an interest by assignment or under-lease from the sub-lessee. Mr. Payne might have so arranged matters when he granted the head-lease that none of these subsequent devolutions could be validly effected except by instruments which imposed on the taker of each successive interest a covenant contractually enforceable by the head lessor against assigning or sub-letting except with his own consent. This course, however, is somewhat burdensome, especially in the case of a large estate, and, whether for this reason or some other, Mr. Payne did not think proper to adopt it; instead he introduced into the licence to Miss Strutt a condition, the effect of which was that her sub-lessee should covenant with her not to assign or further sub-lease without both her consent and his, and this condition was duly incorporated by way of covenant in the under-lease which Miss Strutt, in pursuance of such licence, granted to Mrs. Sykes.

A It was contended before us on behalf of the second defendant that, in these circumstances, Miss Strutt, the covenantee, could at any time, and without the head lessor's consent, and, indeed, without reference to him at all, release Mrs. Sykes and any person claiming through or under her, from the burden of this covenant. Whether, in fact, she released Wroxall Estates, Ltd., from their obligation to her to obtain the plaintiffs' consent when the company assigned the sub-lease to the second defendant depends on the effect of the letters which passed at the time and is a matter that may be open to question, but, if she did, I am satisfied that she had no right, as against the plaintiffs, so to do. I quite agree with my brethren that the licence which Mr. Payne granted to Miss Strutt to sub-let gave rise to an implied promise by this lady not to release from its operation any person claiming through her who became bound by covenant. Such a release would render the condition on which the licence was given altogether useless and abortive to the head lessor. If Miss Strutt had not agreed to accept the condition, she would not have got the licence at all; the condition was, in fact, the consideration for the licence and it would be against conscience that she should take the benefit and disregard the obligation. I do not for one moment suggest that this was what she intended to do when the company asked for her consent to assign to the second defendant, for neither she, nor, apparently, her solicitors, had any appreciation of the plaintiffs' rights, but, had the plaintiffs ascertained that it was proposed to effect an assignment without their own consent, I have no doubt but that the court would, on their intervention, have restrained the company from acting in disregard of such consent and Miss Strutt from purporting to authorise them to do so. The plaintiffs did not, however, hear of the assignment to the second defendant in time to apply to the court and it was, accordingly, carried through without their knowledge.

B

C

D

E It is in these circumstances that the question arises whether the second defendant can claim that the assignment was "lawful" and thus defeat the claim which the plaintiffs have brought for possession of the premises. In my opinion, this question must be answered in the negative. So far as Miss Strutt and Wroxall Estates, Ltd., and Commander Dugdale are concerned it may well be that the assignment was perfectly valid. Miss Strutt gave her consent to it and at no time subsequently challenged it in any way. The company acted in breach of their covenant with Miss Strutt, but I think myself that it would have been difficult for her to have made this the subject of legal complaint in view of the letters which passed, and, in any event, as I have said, she never attempted to do so. Nor could either Miss Strutt or the company set up any invalidity in the assignment as against Commander Dugdale.

F

G In my judgment, however, the matter by no means rests there. One of the results of s. 15 (3) is, undoubtedly, to foist on landlords, in many cases, tenants whom they do not wish to have and whose right of occupation may be of unforeseeable duration. This effect of the sub-section was presumably known to the legislature, and I think that the word "lawfully", which was inserted for the protection of the landlord, should be given a reasonably wide construction. It seems to me that the mere fact that a sub-lease or an assignment thereof is "lawful" as between the parties thereto does not of itself render it lawful as against a superior lessor. Now, when Wroxall Estates, Ltd., took their assignment from Mrs. Sykes the position would appear to be (although the point was not argued before us and I do not wish to be taken as expressing any definite opinion on it) that the company were entitled to see the head-lease to Miss Strutt as well as the sub-lease by her to Mrs. Sykes: Gosling v. Woolf (20); but not the licence which Mr. Payne gave to Miss Strutt: Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 45 (3). It may be that, notwithstanding s. 44 (3) of that Act, the company had constructive notice of the licence, but the position as to this is somewhat obscure and it would be unsafe to deal with the case on the footing that they had. Even on the assumption, however, that the company neither knew nor had notice of the licence and of the implied obligation on Miss Strutt arising thereout, they knew of the covenant in the sub-lease requiring the head lessor's consent. They knew also that when they took their own assignment this covenant was duly observed in that Mr. Payne's written consent thereto was obtained as well as that of Miss Strutt, and they must surely have known, as a matter of ordinary common sense, that the covenant was introduced solely for the benefit of the head lessor, and not for the benefit of anybody else. As to Miss Strutt (who played an essential part in the transaction, for it could not lawfully have gone through without her consent), she knew, or must be taken to have known, of her obligation to her own reversioner which was implicit in the licence and it is nothing to the purpose that it had escaped her mind when she acted (if in fact she did so act) in disregard of it.

H

In view of all of these considerations it is not possible to say, in my judgment, that the assignment was "lawful" within the meaning and intendment of s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920. It was, in fact, executed in plain breach of the rights of the plaintiffs, who had and have a greater interest in the property than any of the parties who were engaged in the transaction. The second defendant cannot, therefore, in my opinion, rely as against the plaintiffs on the assignment as being a lawful document of title and I agree that the appeal must be allowed. On this view of the matter it becomes unnecessary to decide any of the other points which were argued before us (some of which, at least, I think are difficult), and I prefer to express no concluded opinion on them.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Merton Naydler (for the plaintiffs); Farrer & Co. (for the first defendant); Child & Child (for the second defendant).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

HAWKSLEY v. FEWTRELL AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), November 12, 13, 16, 1953.]

Jury—Verdict—Given in judge's absence—Validity.

In an action for damages for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution the judge left the court before the jury had finished deliberating, and their verdict, which was a simple verdict in favour of the defendants, was given to the associate in his absence. The associate discharged the jury and on the next day of the sitting of the court the judge entered judgment for the defendants.

HELD: the verdict of the jury was a public verdict and not a privy verdict requiring to be affirmed or altered before the judge in open court, and, though it was undesirable that the verdict should be given in the absence of the judge (dicta of SCRUTTON, J., in Fanshaw v. Knowles ([1916] 2 K.B. 549) and of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Banbury v. Bank of Montreal ([1917] 1 K.B. 442), adopted), his absence did not of itself render it a nullity.

AS TO THE GIVING OF A VERDICT BY A JURY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 19, p. 316, para. 658; and AS TO GROUNDS FOR A NEW TRIAL, see ibid., Vol. 26, pp. 124-128, paras. 245-249.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Fanshaw v. Knowles, [1916] 2 K.B. 538; 85 L.J.K.B. 1735; 115 L.T. 339; 30 Digest, Replacement, 276, 427.
- (2) Saunders v. Freeman, (1561), 2 Dyer, 209a (73 E.R. 461); 1 Plowd. 209 (75 E.R. 321); 30 Digest, Replacement, 288, 586.

- (3) Banbury v. Bank of Montreal, [1917] 1 K.B. 409; 86 L.J.K.B. 380; 116 L.T. 42; 30 Digest, Replacement, 288, 588.
- (4) Doe d. Lewis v. Baster, (1836), 5 Ad. & El. 129 (111 E.R. 1115); 6 Nev. & M. K.B. 541; 30 Digest, Replacement, 293, 651.
- (5) Bentley v. Fleming, (1845), 3 Dow. & L. 20; 1 C.B. 479 (135 E.R. 627); 14 L.J.C.P. 174; 5 L.T.O.S. 73; 30 Digest, Replacement, 273, 393.
- (6) Ellis v. Deheer, [1922] 2 K.B. 113; 91 L.J.K.B. 937; 127 L.T. 431; 86 J.P. 169; 30 Digest, Replacement, 288, 583.
- (7) Baker v. Oakes, (1877), 2 Q.B.D. 171; 46 L.J.Q.B. 246; 35 L.T. 832; 16 Digest 179, 841.

APPEAL by the plaintiff against an order of FINNEMORE, J., dated Apr. 20, 1953, in an action for damages for false imprisonment and for malicious prosecution, in which he gave judgment in accordance with the verdict of the jury in favour of the defendants. The plaintiff contended that the verdict was a nullity on the ground that it was given to the associate in the absence of the judge, and that there had been misdirection of the jury.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and Leonard Halpern for the plaintiff.
Elwes, Q.C., and Stabb for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This appeal arises out of an action brought by the plaintiff against two police officers for damages for false imprisonment and for malicious prosecution. The case was heard before FINNEMORE, J., and a jury on Thursday and Friday, Apr. 16 and 17, 1953, and on Monday, Apr. 20, the learned judge directed that judgment be entered for the defendants. The more important point raised on the appeal is that there was no verdict of the jury on which judgment could be given. It arises in this way. After the direction given to them by the judge, the jury retired at 3.35 on the Friday afternoon. They did not return to court until twelve minutes past six, by which time the judge had left without, so far as we have been told, any intimation to the parties. The verdict of the jury, which was in favour of the defendants, was taken by the associate, after which he discharged the jury. On the Monday morning, counsel for the defendants applied for judgment. Counsel for the plaintiff opposed the application in these terms:

"I oppose the application on this ground, my Lord. After a retirement of some two and a half hours the jury returned to the court and gave what, in my submission, was an informal verdict to the associate. After that they were discharged. In those circumstances, I beg to move for a new trial inasmuch as that, before your Lordship today, there is no final formal verdict of a jury, and so far as I can see one cannot now be obtained, because that jury is no longer in existence."

Counsel referred to a note in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, under Ord. 36, r. 39, and to Fanshaw v. Knowles (1), in regard to which the judge said: "I know. I read it on Friday while the jury were out." I am not sure that the judge meant that he had read the whole of the report of that case. It may be he meant he had read the note in the ANNUAL PRACTICE.

After hearing counsel for the plaintiff, FINNEMORE, J., said:

"I do not think there is anything in the point at all. There was for a long time doubt whether the very strict rules which apply in the taking of a verdict from a jury in a criminal case applied in the same measure to a civil jury. The case to which reference has been made, Fanshaw v. Knowles (1), showed quite plainly that they did not. Quite apart from that, it has happened in many cases that a jury have deliberated for a very long time and that the judge has not been present when the jury have come back, and it has been the practice for a long time that, if they have given a proper, plain, straightforward verdict, as in this case, with no qualifications and no point calling for legal argument, or anything of that kind, the verdict has been accepted as the verdict of the jury, and in due course, normally the next day, formal judgment has been asked for and has been entered. That is what I propose to do here. Judgment will be entered for the defendants."

Counsel for the plaintiff asks this court to say that that judgment is wrong and that there must be a new trial. He was not able to refer us to any case in which it had been held that a verdict so given was of no effect, but he relied on what was said in the Court of Appeal in Fanshaw v. Knowles (1) to the effect that a verdict given, or taken, in the absence of the judge is a privy verdict and is a nullity unless it is followed by a verdict given in open court in the presence of the judge. The decision of the court in Fanshaw v. Knowles (1) was that the rule that any separation of the jury after the judge's summing-up in a criminal case invalidates their verdict does not apply to a civil case. As the headnote shows, the history of the law as to separation of juries was considered. DARLING, J., had put questions to the jury and had left the court before they answered them. They did not answer them all that evening, and they were told to attend again the next morning, when the judge would be present. In the morning they gave further answers on which the judge entered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants' appeal was dismissed. It was argued that the verdict was bad in that the jury had been allowed to separate before giving their verdict. LORD READING, C.J., said ([1916] 2 K.B. 543):

"We have had the advantage of an interesting and learned argument upon the subject. The defendant has urged that the same rule must apply in a civil trial. On the other hand it has been argued for the plaintiffs that the old rule of law which would prevent the separation of the jury before they give their verdict after they have retired to consider it is one that no longer applies to civil trials; that the rigidity of the old rule has been relaxed in civil trials, just as it has been relaxed even in criminal trials partly by custom, and recently by the Juries Detention Act, 1897. In COKE UPON LITTLETON, 227b, it is stated that 'By the law of England a jury, after their evidence given upon the issue, ought to be kept together in some convenient place, without meat or drinke, fire or candle, which some bookes call an imprisonment, and without speech with any, unless it be the bailife, and with him onely if they be agreed. After they be agreed they may in causes between party and party give a verdict, and if the court be risen, give a privy verdict before any of the judges of the court, and then they may eat and drinke, and the next morning in open court they may either affirme or alter their privy verdict, and that which is given in court shall stand. But in criminal cases of life or member, the jury can give no privy verdict, but they must give it openly in court.' It is clear, therefore, that at the time of this work being written there was a distinction to be drawn between civil and criminal cases. In the one case, that is in the civil trial, a privy verdict could be given, and then the jury were allowed to eat and drink and they could either confirm or alter that verdict, that is that privy verdict, when the verdict was given as a public verdict. In BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, iii. 377, it is stated, dealing with verdicts between party and party, that 'A verdict is either privy or public. A privy verdict is when the judge hath left or adjourned the court: and the jury, being agreed, in order to be delivered from their confinement, obtain leave to give their verdict privily to the judge out of court: which privy verdict is of no force, unless afterwards affirmed by a public verdict given openly in court; wherein the jury may, if they please, vary from their privy verdict. So that the privy verdict is indeed a mere nullity; and yet it is a dangerous practice, allowing time for the parties to tamper with the jury, and therefore very seldom indulged.' It appears, therefore, that the jury when they had once agreed could return an informal verdict called a privy verdict, and that when they had done

A that they were entitled to eat and drink, as is said in COKE UPON LITTLETON, which was already a relaxation of the rigidity of the old rule; and in BLACKSTONE's time he says that when they were agreed they gave their privy verdict in order to be delivered from their confinement. It seems, therefore, not only were they allowed to eat and drink if they had given their privy verdict, but in BLACKSTONE's time they were no longer confined, and they could on the next morning, when they gave their public verdict, alter the privy verdict or affirm it as they pleased. Now that shows that when BLACKSTONE's COMMENTARIES were written it was clear that in civil trials B juries were allowed to give a verdict after they had separated. The progress in the liberty afforded to juries is shown by the allowance of the release from confinement, which is stated in BLACKSTONE, but not in COKE UPON LITTLETON; and even in COKE UPON LITTLETON a reference to the case of Saunders v. Freeman (2) (1 Plowd. 211) shows that after there had been a privy verdict the jury were then allowed to eat and drink and lie together. It appears to have been by custom that juries were allowed to do this. The words are 'and then the same juries for their ease as is the custom to eat and drink together for them aforesaid and to lie together until the morrow aforesaid and then to give their verdict aforesaid openly before the aforesaid C justices at Northampton.' So that going back to the time of Queen Elizabeth there had already existed some relaxation which is shown by the custom mentioned in PLOWDEN and extended gradually till we get to the date of BLACKSTONE's COMMENTARIES."

The Lord Chief Justice said further (ibid., 547):

D "The conclusion to which I have come upon this point is that in civil trials the separation of the jury does not invalidate the verdict. I think that it is a practice which should be resorted to only in rare instances and where special circumstances demand it. The danger of allowing the separation is pointed out by BLACKSTONE. It is a danger which none the less exists in the present day. There are, of course, circumstances which make it necessary or desirable that the jury should return on the next day for the purpose of E hearing a further direction from the judge, or perhaps of settling some point of controversy between the jury as to the evidence, or perhaps for some explanation of the summing-up of the learned judge which some of the jury may not properly have appreciated. The practice in modern times has been, within the knowledge of all who practise in these courts, to allow a verdict F to stand which is given after the consideration of the jury in such a case as the present. It does not happen often, and no doubt for the reason which I have pointed out it is thought undesirable by the judges that it should happen; nevertheless it may happen, and when it does, unless there is something more in the case and in the circumstances of the finding of the verdict than the mere fact of the separation of the jury, the verdict will not G be invalidated."

WARRINGTON, L.J., said (ibid., 549):

H "I am of the same opinion, and I only wish to add a very few words. The defendant contends that in a civil action the mere fact that the jury are allowed to separate avoids the verdict, that is, if they are allowed to separate after they have received the learned judge's charge and been asked to consider their verdict. Now I think the authorities which have been referred to as to the power of a jury to give a privy verdict are conclusive that that question must be answered against the contention of the defendant. Those authorities seem to me to establish this: first, that on giving such a verdict as that the jury in recent times have been allowed to separate; secondly, that such a verdict was not final, but that when the jurors give their formal verdict they may, at any rate where they have had a further consultation since their separation, either alter or reverse the privy verdict. If that is so, I think it follows necessarily that they may give that which alone is their final verdict after they have separated. In my opinion, therefore, the bare question which is asked here, namely, whether in a civil action after the jury have been charged they can be allowed to separate without avoiding their verdict, must be answered in the affirmative."

The judgment of WARRINGTON, L.J., points strongly in favour of the plaintiff's contention in this case, but he was not considering the question before this court. Indeed, he referred to what was asked in that case as "the bare question which is asked here." SCRUTTON, J., who was sitting as an additional member of the court, said (ibid.):

"Secondly, I think that in civil actions the practice of juries separating should be resorted to as seldom as possible for the reason given by BLACKSTONE: 'It is a dangerous practice, allowing time for the parties to tamper with the jury, and therefore very seldom indulged.' I cannot help noting, speaking for myself, that in this case and in the last case before the court considerable difficulty, if not the whole difficulty, has arisen from the fact that the learned judge who tried the case has not stayed while the jury were deliberating, so that when they found themselves in difficulty they have not had the judge to advise them. I think myself it is the duty of the judge to stay to assist the jury so long as the jury are deliberating on their verdict, and the fact that in two cases here we have had appeals which I think would have been prevented if the judge had stayed supports my own personal feeling on the duty of the judge in these matters.

That shows that there had been two cases at that time, one following the other, in which a question as to the judge leaving before the jury returned their verdict had been called in question, and SCRUTTON, J., expressed his own personal feelings in the matter. In the same year Banbury v. Bank of Montreal (3) was before the Court of Appeal. There had been two hearings. On the first hearing before LORD READING, C.J., the jury had failed to reach agreement. On the second, before DARLING, J., the jury had answered questions, and they had added a rider to their answers to the questions, and the judge had later given judgment for the plaintiff. The appeal of the defendants was allowed on grounds which it is unnecessary to state, and judgment was entered for the defendants. SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1917] 1 K.B. 442):

"The jury added a rider that the plaintiff should return all securities. The judge was not there when the verdict was given, a practice which is most unsatisfactory and has already once been commented on unfavourably in this court; and therefore no attempt was made to find out whether the jury meant that the securities were really valueless after the bank's claim was exhausted, or had not troubled to value them in view of their rider that the bank should have them. On this part of the case a new trial must have been ordered had not we ordered judgment to be entered for the defendants."

I should imagine that the hearing before DARLING, J., and a jury had taken place before the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Fanshaw's case (1). SCRUTTON, L.J., was sitting in the Court of Appeal in both cases, and if he had regarded the verdict of the jury in Banbury v. Bank of Montreal (3) as a nullity he would surely have said so. The judge was not there when the verdict was given, he said, and for the second time he condemned the practice as most unsatisfactory. The point which is now taken could have been raised as an additional ground of appeal by the bank. I am unable to say when the practice to which SCRUTTON, L.J., referred began, or how far it has extended, though I should not like to think it is a general practice in any sense. It may well be that it commenced through difficulties on circuit, when a judge had to move from one circuit town to another. He could not leave a jury in a criminal case, but, perhaps, he could in a civil case, or he may have been content to rely on the agreement of counsel.

Two cases were cited to us, one in London and the other on circuit. I take the reports from which the point appears most clearly. In Doe d. Lewis v. Baster (4), tried before LORD DENMAN, C.J., in Michaelmas term, 1835, the report shows that (6 Nev. & M. K.B. 542):

A "The jury retired to deliberate and were absent for upwards of three hours, in the course of which time his Lordship and the counsel on both sides left the court, it having been previously agreed, that the associate should be left to receive the verdict. The jury, upon their return, handed in a written verdict, by which they found 'that the machinery was the same, but that the annoyance had been increased during the application of the horse power.' "

B In the following term counsel obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and to have a new trial, and that was argued. I only cite the case for the purpose of showing what was done by the agreement of counsel. WILLIAMS, J., said (ibid., 545):

C "It is quite clear, that by the mutual consent of the parties, the officer of the court was substituted for the judge, for the purpose of taking the verdict."

In Bentley v. Fleming (5), heard in 1845, before CRESSWELL, J., at Liverpool, the side-note reads (3 Dow. & L. 23):

D "Upon the trial of a cause, in which three issues were raised, each going to the whole cause of action, it was agreed on both sides that the verdict should be taken by the associate in the absence of the judge, who, before he retired from the court, directed the associate to take the verdict upon each of the issues separately. Upon the return of the jury, the associate asked them whether they found for the plaintiff or the defendant; and the foreman answered 'for the plaintiff.' The defendant's counsel requested the associate to put the questions left to the jury by the judge, to which the plaintiff's counsel objected; whereupon the associate refused to put the questions, and ultimately a general verdict was entered for the plaintiff. Held, that the neglect to take the verdict upon each of the issues, was a miscarriage on the part of the officer of the court in taking the verdict; and the court, therefore, made a rule absolute for a new trial, without costs on either side."

F It was not suggested in either of those cases that the verdict was a nullity. If it was by reason of its not being given in the presence of the judge, the court must have said so, for it would seem that agreement of counsel cannot turn a nullity into a reality. It might well lead to most unfortunate results for litigants and for jurors if a verdict returned in the absence of the judge must be held to be a nullity. Notwithstanding that which is said in COKE UPON LITTLETON and in BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, it seems that, for general convenience, there has existed for a long time a practice in which an officer of the court has taken the verdict of a jury in the absence of the judge. The proper practice is that stated in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 19, pp. 316, 317, paras. 658, 659:

H "658. The verdict of a jury of issue must be given in open court, in the presence of them all, and in cases of treason and felony in the presence of the defendant. It must be unanimous, except that in civil causes the verdict of a majority may be taken by consent. It is forthwith entered on the record by the officer of the court, and the sealing and signing required of juries of presentment are dispensed with. The jury are then discharged. 659. A jury once discharged after giving a verdict upon which judgment has been entered cannot be re-called to rectify the same, but there must be a new trial if the court considers that injustice has been done."

In Ellis v. Deheer (6) ATKIN, L.J., said ([1922] 2 K.B. 120):

"This was a trial by jury, and in order to determine the issues in the action it was necessary that there should be a unanimous verdict of all the twelve jurymen. In accordance with the ordinary practice the verdict is, or ought to be, delivered in open court by the foreman in the presence of the other jurymen, and if it is so delivered in their presence, and none of them protest, there is a prima facie presumption that they all assented to it."

"Open court" means when a judge is sitting. The ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, at p. 2002 under the note "The court or a judge" contains this passage:

"The words 'the court' mean the court sitting in banc—that is, a judge or judges in open court; they do not include a judge at chambers . . ."

We are, of course, dealing only with a verdict given in a civil cause, a suit between parties. SCRUTTON, L.J., years ago drew attention to the undesirability of departing from the regular practice. The mere fact that the parties have to come back on another occasion adds to the cost of litigation to some extent, and there are other considerations: (i) The jury might wish further guidance from the judge, or they might desire to be reminded of some part of the evidence. (ii) The question might arise as to how long they should be kept together in the hope of their arriving at an agreement, or as to the taking of a majority verdict. (iii) Answers given by a jury may give rise to a difficulty which cannot be cleared up if they have been discharged.

Counsel for the defendants, while accepting what SCRUTTON, L.J., said, added that, if a judge left before the jury returned a verdict, he did so at his risk. I feel that the risk is rather that of the parties. The parties, and the jury, are entitled to expect that the judge will remain if they have to do so—that is, in the absence of unforeseen circumstances. I am not prepared to hold that the mere fact that a verdict in a civil case is returned, or is taken, when the judge is not present renders it a nullity. There must have been a number of cases in which a verdict has of necessity been taken in those circumstances, and there is no decision of the courts which supports the plaintiff's contention. This court ought not to hold that the verdict is a nullity in the absence of any other ground. If we did so, it would add to the difficulties of both litigants and jurors. In my opinion, this point fails.

[HIS LORDSHIP held that the further grounds of appeal failed also and said that, in his opinion, the appeal must be dismissed.]

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The first point taken by the plaintiff is unusual in that, as I understand it, it has never been raised in a court before. That ground of appeal was stated in this way—that the learned judge was wrong in law in directing on Apr. 20, 1953, that judgment be entered for the defendants when no verdict of the jury had been taken by the learned judge from them prior to their discharge on Apr. 17, 1953. The facts are really not disputed, and, in my opinion, no injustice was done by the procedure followed. That, of course, does not end the matter, but it is an ingredient for consideration. Counsel for the plaintiff on the Monday morning made the suggestion to the learned judge that the jury might have changed their minds between the Friday night and the Monday morning after further consultation, and have returned a different verdict in court. I share the view of the judge that that was a little fanciful. Had there been any ground for suggesting that any injustice had been done here to the plaintiff, the whole case would, in my opinion, have quite a different complexion.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The point presented by junior counsel to FINNEMORE, J., on the Monday was presented by senior counsel in this court—that the absence of the judge, when the jury returned their verdict and the associate received it, made the proceedings a nullity so far as the verdict was concerned. Counsel said there was no verdict in law at all, that this was a privy verdict, and a privy verdict was a nullity unless it was turned into a public verdict, which could only be done by the jury publicly returning their verdict to the judge. To be a valid verdict, the verdict must be returned in open court, and unless the judge was present it was not an open court, and, indeed, in his submission, it was no court at all. To constitute a court in the true sense of the term the presence of the judge was essential, and the judge had no power to delegate his duties. Counsel made two quotations from BACON'S ABRIDGEMENT in support of that submission.

No authority was produced that was directly in point on the submission that, in the absence of the judge when it was given, the jury's verdict was null and void, and in all the learning in the many volumes of state trials where almost every conceivable point relating to juries has been determined and discussed, there is no mention of the point. Fanshaw v. Knowles (1) was cited in support of the submission, although it was recognised that the question there in issue was quite different from the issue in the present appeal. The learning which was cited in support of the submission in that case was relied on in so far as it applied to the point in this case, and the submission was that the verdict was a privy verdict, which there were no means of turning into a public verdict. I am of opinion that the term "privy verdict" cannot properly be applied to the verdict returned in the circumstances of this case. A privy verdict was a verdict given for the purpose of alleviating the hardship suffered by jurymen in olden days. In the office of the clerk of the peace of 1682, the words of the oath given to the party sworn to take charge of a jury on its retirement were:

"You shall well and truly keep every person sworn of this jury in some private and convenient room without light, drink, fire, candle or lodging";

MACAULAY, in most memorable language, has dealt with the situation as it existed at the famous trial of the seven bishops in 1688; and in 1854, when the Common Law Procedure Bill was being discussed in the House of Lords, LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., himself relates the attempts which he there made to overcome what he termed the barbarous custom of imprisoning and starving juries to compel unanimity. Indeed, as we know from the citations in this case, it was not until 1870 that the Act was passed which permitted a jury to have a fire. In olden days, when a jury had agreed on their verdict and had communicated it privately to the judge, those hardships could be alleviated, but that private verdict, delivered for the purpose of alleviating their hardship, was no verdict at all unless it was in some way turned into a public verdict, which, according to the learning recorded in Fanshaw's case (1), could only be done by the jury returning their verdict in open court before the judge.

I do not think that that learning and that decision have any bearing on the circumstances of this case. We are not told the circumstances in which FINNEMORE, J., left the court on the Friday, or the instructions or directions which he left to the officer of the court, the associate. From what FINNEMORE, J., said on the Monday morning, I think a fairly clear inference can be drawn, because when counsel was arguing before him the possibility of the jury changing their mind the judge said:

"Are you suggesting that, if the judge had been sitting in court, they would have returned a different verdict, or what? (Counsel:) There is always that possibility. (FINNEMORE, J.): There is not the least possibility of it that I can see. If the jury had come back and said: 'We do not understand something', or, 'We want guidance on something,' then, of course, they would have been asked to come back today and they would have been given the extra direction and they would have given their verdict. If they come back to court with a perfectly plain verdict, what is wrong with that?"

It looks as though the instruction of the judge to the associate was to receive the verdict if it was a plain verdict, but if any complication of any kind arose, then the jury were to be asked to return. The shorthand note shows exactly what happened. The jury returned into court, and the associate said:

"Members of the jury, are you agreed upon your verdict? (The foreman of the jury): Yes, we are. (The associate): Do you find for the plaintiff or defendants? (The foreman of the jury): We find for the defendants. (The associate): That is the verdict of you all? (The foreman of the jury): Yes. (The associate): Thank you. You are discharged from further service."

When the jury returned into court, the associate received that verdict and recorded it for the learned judge to see on the Monday morning, and certainly it could not be said that there was anything private or privy except in a highly technical sense. It was a thing publicly done and publicly recorded in the presence of all the jurymen, no doubt of counsel, and no doubt of such members of the public as had remained in court interested in the result. There was no secrecy, or anything of that kind, which the administration of justice has always been strong to avoid, and, in my view, this could not properly, in the circumstances of the case, be termed a privy verdict.

The question would, therefore, seem to be this. Is it essential to the validity of the verdict of a jury in a civil case that the judge himself shall be in court to receive it at the time the jury returns, and the associate, as the officer of the court, receives the verdict? I agree very fully with what SCRUTTON, J., said in 1916 in Fanshaw v. Knowles (1), and what, as a lord justice, he affirmed in 1917 in Banbury v. Bank of Montreal (3). In Fanshaw v. Knowles (1) he said ([1916] 2 K.B. 549):

"I think myself it is the duty of the judge to stay to assist the jury so long as the jury are deliberating on their verdict, and the fact that in two cases here we have had appeals which I think would have been prevented if the judge had stayed supports my own personal feeling on the duty of the judge in these matters."

In Banbury v. Bank of Montreal (3) he said ([1917] 1 K.B. 442):

"The judge was not there when the verdict was given, a practice which is most unsatisfactory and has already once been commented on unfavourably in this court . . ."

I want strongly to indorse what was said in 1916 and 1917 about the desirability of the judge being present in court while the jury are deliberating. A jury may want further assistance during their deliberations. Their verdict, when delivered, may be ambiguous and require explanation. It may be a verdict that the judge cannot accept. The jury may agree on some questions and disagree on others. The parties may be asked to consider whether they will take a majority verdict. It is plain that in circumstances such as these nothing can be done until the judge is present, and it is, therefore, in my view, most desirable that he should be present while the jury are deliberating.

But the question really for this court is this. Is it essential when none of the things which I have enumerated occurred? FINNEMORE, J., on the Monday morning said, in the passage which I have quoted, that, if there had been any trouble of that kind, the jury would have had to come back, and he also said on the same day:

" . . . that, if they have given a proper, plain, straightforward verdict, as in this case, with no qualifications and no point calling for legal argument, or anything of that kind, the verdict has been accepted as the verdict of the jury, and in due course, normally the next day, formal judgment has been asked for and has been entered "

A The learned judge was stating from his experience that this situation was not unknown and not uncommon. In many cases, no doubt, where this procedure has been followed no question at all has been raised, since it is only where trouble has occurred about the verdict that ordinarily those matters come into court. But the submission was made that the verdict must be returned in open court, and that, in the absence of the judge, there was not merely no open court, but there was in truth no court at all. The passage was read from the ANNUAL PRACTICE to which my Lord has referred, with the authorities there cited in support of the view that a court means the judge sitting in open court. The use of the term "open court" is customarily designed to emphasise the publicity of English judicial proceedings. These things must be done in open court, they must be done publicly and they must be done for all men to see. That, I think, is the usual use of the words "open court". The passage which has been cited, and the authorities which support it, seem to show that "open court" means the court where the judge is sitting.

B
C
D
E In the present case it is clear that the judge had instructed the associate to receive the verdict in his absence in the court-room in the presence of the jury, and everything in fact happened on the Friday afternoon exactly as it would have happened if the judge had been seated in his chair. The associate would have asked those questions, would have received those answers, and in obedience to the direction of the judge would have discharged the jury, and, presumably, he received the verdict and discharged the jury under the judge's direction just as though the judge had actually been sitting there giving the instructions at that moment. I do not think there was here any delegation of the judge's duty in the sense in which counsel for the plaintiff submitted there had been delegation, because the act which the associate did under the direction of the judge was the act which he would have done had the judge in fact been present in person. I still think it is a difficult point, but I would decide it in this way. It is quite plain that the practice which was followed that afternoon was not unknown. SCRUTTON, J., referred to two cases in 1916, and in 1917 to a further case, and he never said: "All this renders it a nullity." He said: "I express my personal view that for the judge to be absent is unsatisfactory"—not that there was no court. Not that everything which was done was of no validity. He confined this statement to his personal view.

F
G In Bentley v. Fleming (5) before CRESSWELL, J., it was agreed between counsel on both sides that the associate should take the verdict. The learned judge left the court, having previously handed certain questions to the associate. On the argument which took place on that verdict no one ever suggested that the whole proceedings were a nullity because the judge was not present. TINDAL, C.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, said (3 Dow. & L. 25) that if the associate had followed the direction which he had received from the judge, all would have been well, and it is very difficult to imagine that he had in mind that if the judge was not there the whole thing was a nullity.

H In 1836, in Doe d. Lewis v. Baster (4), the same point was raised. The jury retired to deliberate and were absent for upwards of three hours. Counsel and the judge left the court, LORD DENMAN, C.J., the judge, with the agreement of counsel permitting the verdict to be returned in his absence. When the matter came up for argument, LORD DENMAN, C.J., LITLEDALE, J., PATTESON, J., and WILLIAMS, J., all delivering judgments, never said one word to the effect that the proceedings were a nullity because the judge was not present in court. For more than a hundred years, therefore, there have been occasions when the procedure followed by FINNEMORE, J., on this Friday afternoon have been followed in courts. I agree with my Lord that it is impossible to believe that the parties can by agreement add validity to that which is in its very nature invalid, and if a judge is compelled to leave the court when the jury is deliberating, as he may well be for reasons which can easily be formulated, and in his absence the jury returns with a single verdict which the associate has been instructed to receive, and if in the event of complications arising the jury are to be asked to return, I cannot think that, in the light of past experience and of what would appear to have been the practice to be followed in cases of emergency, the absence of the judge makes the verdict of the jury invalid. I am, therefore, of opinion that the first, really important, point in this case fails.

[HIS LORDSHIP held that the other grounds of appeal failed and said that he agreed that the appeal should be dismissed].

HODSON, L.J.: The main question in this appeal is this. The plaintiff contends that the judge was wrong in entering judgment for the defendants, because the verdict was given by the jury to the associate in the absence of the judge. In making that submission the plaintiff relies, in the first place, on the passages in COKE UPON LITTLETON and in BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES which have already been read from the judgment of the lord chief justice in Fanshaw v. Knowles (1). Those passages had to do with the difference between a privy verdict and a public verdict, a public verdict being one which must be given in open court, whereas a privy verdict could previously be given to any of the judges available in order to release the jury from their confinement in civil cases.

At the conclusion of his argument, counsel for the plaintiff, I think, recognised that he could not fairly compare the verdict given (as in this case) to the associate with a privy verdict which has long since ceased to be a matter of practical importance. But he did rely, and, indeed, was entitled to do so, on the language of COKE and BLACKSTONE where emphasis was laid on the words "in open court". He said that "open court" necessarily involved the presence of the judge, that one could not conceive those words being used of a court-room in which, indeed, the officer of the court was sitting, but there was no judge, and that it would follow from that that any verdict so given must be a nullity.

I agree that that argument is a formidable one. If one takes the words "in open court" at their accepted value, the verdict in this case was not given in open court, but the matter does not rest there. One has to remember that these things develop on historical lines, as, indeed, the relief of juries developed on historical lines, and since the eighteenth century the practice of the courts, as the authorities show, has been to regard the giving of the verdict to the associate in the absence of the judge as a recognisable practice.

I agree wholeheartedly with what has fallen from my Lords with regard to the undesirability of the practice of allowing the verdict to be taken in the absence of the judge, a practice which was, although disapproved of by SCRUTTON, J., later SCRUTTON, L.J., in Fanshaw v. Knowles (1) and Banbury v. Bank of Montreal (3), recognised by him, I think, as an existing practice. The two cases in the last century which have been referred to, in which by consent the verdict of a jury was taken by an officer of the court in the absence of the judge, show that in the eyes of the court those verdicts could not be regarded as mere nullities, because, if they were nullities, consent could not cure their invalidity.

The researches of counsel drew our attention to another case, Baker v. Oakes (7). That case was heard in the Court of Appeal, and the subject-matter of the appeal was a question of costs which has no relevance, but the judge of appeal, SIR RICHARD AMPHLETT, did recognise the existence of this practice in supposing a case in which a judge had left the court, or, perhaps, the circuit town, before a verdict was returned, and he supposed also that an officer had been delegated by the judge to take the verdict. That was in 1877. Passing by the two cases in the Court of Appeal to which I have already referred, I come to Ellis v.

Deheer (6), in which ATKIN, L.J., referring to this matter said ([1922] 2 K.B. 120):

“In accordance with the ordinary practice the verdict is, or ought to be, delivered in open court . . .”

That, again, I think, was the language of a learned lord justice who recognised that there had been cases where, in the strict sense of the word, the verdict had not been delivered in open court, and I think the development of the law, as shown by the decided cases, compels this court to say that the rigidity of the rule has been relaxed to this extent—namely, that the associate may, if the circumstances warrant it, receive the verdict of the jury in the absence of the judge, although, of course, no judicial act can be taken on that verdict.

I agree, therefore, that the appeal fails on this ground, and also on the separate ground of misdirection. On that matter I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: T. D. Jones & Co. (for the plaintiff); T. MacDonald Baker, Solicitor, Metropolitan Police (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. WINES.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), March 31, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Falsification of accounts—Intent to defraud—Accounts falsified with intent only to avoid dismissal—Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (c. 24), s. 1.

The appellant was convicted of larceny of wireless sets and falsifying accounts. He admitted making false entries with regard to the wireless sets in the accounts of the co-operative society for which he worked, but contended that he had done this, not to conceal the theft of the wireless sets as contended by the prosecution, but to make the gross profit of his department appear higher than it was so that he would not lose his employment. The recorder directed the jury that, whichever of these versions was true, it amounted to an intent to defraud.

HELD: since the appellant intended by the falsification to induce his employers to keep him in their employment and to pay him wages, he was inducing a course of action by his deceit, and intending to defraud his employers, and, therefore, the recorder's direction to the jury was correct.

Dicta of BUCKLEY, J., in Re London & Globe Finance Corp., Ltd. ([1903] 1 Ch. 732), applied.

Case referred to:

(1) Re London & Globe Finance Corp., Ltd., [1903] 1 Ch. 728; 72 L.J.Ch. 368; 88 L.T. 194; 15 Digest 940, 10,354.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Henry Leonard Asquith Wines, a manager of the radio department of a co-operative society, was convicted on Jan. 6, 1953, at Oxford City Sessions of larceny of wireless sets and other goods, conspiracy to steal, and falsification of accounts, and was sentenced to four years' imprisonment on each count, to run concurrently.

F. L. Clark for the appellant.

Micklethwait for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The only difficulty that has arisen is this. The appellant was convicted on certain counts of falsifying accounts. The suggestion for the prosecution, and by far the most probable reason, was that he falsified the accounts to cover up the thefts, but he went into the witness box and swore that the reason why he falsified the accounts was to make it appear that the gross profit of his department was higher than it was—to make it appear that the gross profit of his department was twenty-four per cent. and not merely sixteen per cent. The reason why he did it, he said, was because he feared that if he only showed sixteen per cent. he would be dismissed and lose his employment and, therefore, lose his wages. A

The only point that we are concerned with is whether the direction which the learned recorder gave to the jury was right. The jury did not say which version they accepted, whether the version of the prosecution or the version of the defence, and the learned recorder, in effect, directed the jury that it did not matter which version was true, as whichever version was accepted, there was evidence of an intent to defraud. He said this: B

“If, therefore, you are satisfied, as Wines himself admitted, first, that he is a servant, which has been proved, secondly, that he made a false entry in the document, which is admitted, and, thirdly, that the object of it was either, as the prosecution ask you to infer, to conceal the depredations which had been made in the stock, or, as Wines himself says, in order to keep a job which he would have lost if he had not made these false entries, if that was the intention, then that is an intent to defraud and the charge is made out.” C

So the learned recorder tells the jury: “Whichever version you take, that amounts to an intent to defraud”, and counsel for the appellant has put to us in a very clear argument that that was a misdirection. If it was a misdirection, we should have to quash the convictions on the counts for falsification, although I say at once that that would not make any difference to the sentence, because the learned recorder passed a sentence on each count to run concurrently. So it is an academic point, but one of some importance, whether this was a correct direction on a point of law. D

Having had the advantage of a full argument, the court has come to the conclusion that the recorder's direction in these circumstances can be upheld and is correct. The definition which has been so often given as the difference between an intent to deceive and an intent to defraud is to be found in BUCKLEY, J.'s judgment in Re London & Globe Finance Corp'n., Ltd. (1), where he said this ([1903] 1 Ch. 732): E

“In both ss. 83 and 84 of the Larceny Act of 1861, and s. 166 of the Companies Act, 1862, the offence is that of making or publishing a false statement or account, or a false or fraudulent entry with intent to deceive or defraud.” F

In the Companies Act it does not matter whether it is to deceive or defraud, but in dealing with accounts it does matter because it is not criminal if the intent is merely to deceive; it must be an intent to defraud. The learned judge went on: G

“To deceive is, I apprehend, to induce a man to believe that a thing is true which is false, and which the person practising the deceit knows or believes to be false. To defraud is to deprive by deceit: it is by deceit to induce a man to act to his injury. More tersely it may be put, that to deceive is by falsehood to induce a state of mind; to defraud is by deceit to induce a course of action.” H

That is the locus classicus on the subject. It has been cited with approval over and over again, and, therefore, one has to consider in all these cases whether the deceit which has been practised has merely induced, or was intended merely to induce, a state of mind, or has induced a course of action.

One thing that is clear here is that the appellant has himself said what he intended to achieve by this falsification, which was to remain in the service of the society; in other words, to avoid being dismissed by them, as he feared they would dismiss him if he showed a proper return. If he had been dismissed because he did not show a satisfactory return, he would have lost his wages, and, therefore, the society, by his falsification, assuming that his object to be what he said it was, would be induced to retain him in their service and to pay him his wages, and he was thereby getting wages from the society by means of falsifying these accounts.

For these reasons we think that the learned recorder was justified, in view of what the appellant himself said, in directing the jury that, whether they thought the object of the falsification was to conceal the thefts—and I should think there was very little doubt that really that was what was in his mind—or whether they thought it was merely to induce the society to keep him in their employ and pay him his wages, that, in these circumstances, did amount to an intent to defraud, and, therefore, the direction was right. For these reasons, the appeal is dismissed. With regard to sentence, we cannot possibly alter it.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal (for the appellant); H. J. A. Astley, Oxford (for the Crown).

[Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

HOLT AND OTHERS v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), October 20, 21, 22, 23, November 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 25, 1953.]

Estate Duty—Company—Shares—Valuation—Restriction on alienation—Basis of valuation for estate duty purposes—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 7 (5).

The principal value for estate duty purposes of 43,698 ordinary shares of £1 each (out of a total issued of 697,680) in a private limited company fell to be ascertained at Mar. 11, 1948. All the shares of the company were owned by members of a family or family trusts and there was a strong desire to retain control in the family. By the articles of association the unfettered transfer of shares to non-members was prohibited so long as a member or person approved by the directors was willing to purchase them at a fair value (to be certified by the company's auditor in case of difference) and the directors could refuse to register a transfer. The company carried on trade with West Africa, where trade was hazardous owing to variations in prices, and had been affected by riots and a boycott of European traders just before the relevant date. In the 1914-18 war the company made large profits and out of the accumulated reserves tided over the heavy losses in the immediately following years and thereafter made modest profits until 1937. In 1937 and 1938, during the ensuing war, and in 1946 and 1947 it made large profits, but had small sums available for reserves or dividends owing to heavy taxation of excess profits (relieved somewhat in 1946). Though earnings immediately before 1948 were sufficient for much larger distributions, it followed its practice of limiting dividend to five per cent. It was conceded that the large profits of 1946 and 1947 reflected the contemporary inflation. The company was over-trading and had a large bank overdraft. Two of its five ships required replacement. In a valuation on "open market value" under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 7 (5),

HELD: (i) since the hypothetical purchaser with a minority holding would have little opportunity to influence the policy of the directors so long as they retained the support of the general body of shareholders, and would be affected by the articles restricting transfer of the shares and by the absence of a Stock Exchange quotation, he must be conceived as an exceptional kind of investor who would not enter into the transaction hurriedly, but would carefully consider the prudence of the course and would seek the fullest information as to the company's past history and prospects and its trade;

(ii) such a purchaser would consider the inter-war results of the company, the effect of the 1914-18 war on its trade, the heavy losses sustained thereafter, the effects of current inflation on the value of money as affecting the company's financial position, the handicap of taxation on the building up of reserves, and the difficulties imposed on the replacement of assets such as ships by taxation allowances for depreciation based on original cost and not replacement cost;

(iii) the purchaser would also have regard to the possibility of an increase of dividend likely to result from pressure of the family as a result of the fall in value of money, and of an issue of ordinary shares to the public.

AS TO THE VALUATION OF SHARES OF A PRIVATE LIMITED COMPANY WITH A RESTRICTION ON ALIENATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, p. 271, para. 275; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 21, pp. 24, 25, Nos. 133-137.

FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1894, s. 7 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, p. 362.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Crossman, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Mann, [1936] 1 All E.R. 762; [1937] A.C. 26; sub nom. Re Crossman, Re Paulin, 105 L.J.K.B. 450; 154 L.T. 570; Digest Supp.
- (2) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Clay, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Buchanan, [1914] 3 K.B. 466; 83 L.J.K.B. 1425; 111 L.T. 484; 39 Digest 226, 63.
- (3) Findlay's Trustees v. Inland Revenue, (1938), 22 A.T.C. 437;

PETITION by way of appeal against a decision of the Inland Revenue Commissioners as to the value for the purposes of estate duty of ordinary shares in the capital of John Holt & Co. (Liverpool), Ltd., a private company. The Crown had claimed a value of £3 per £1 share, had subsequently determined the value at 34s. per share, and now contended that it should be 25s. per share. The petitioners contended that it should be, at first 11s. 3d. per share and finally 17s. 2d. per share.

MacKenna, Q.C., Graham-Dixon, Q.C., and Rink for the petitioners.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.), Cross, Q.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal under s. 10 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, against the decision of the Inland Revenue Commissioners as to the value for the purposes of estate duty of ordinary shares in the capital of a private company known as John Holt & Co. (Liverpool), Ltd. The shares had been settled by a voluntary settlement dated Jan. 7, 1947, made by Mr. Robert Longstaff Holt, who died on Mar. 11, 1948, with the result that estate duty became payable under s. 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, on his death on the principal value of the shares, and the petitioners are the trustees of the settlement. The shares were 43,698 ordinary shares of £1 each. The settlement also included 11,643 6½ per cent. preference shares of £1 each, but the value of these for the purposes of estate duty has been agreed at 21s. per share. At the date of the settlement and the date of the death of Mr. Robert Longstaff Holt, the capital of the company was £1,150,000, divided into 150,000 preference shares and one million ordinary shares of £1 each, of which 139,140 preference shares and 697,680 ordinary shares had been issued, so that the 43,698 ordinary shares included in the settlement formed a minority holding.

The articles of the company contain restrictions on the transfer of shares on more or less familiar lines, the essential features being that unfettered transfer to non-members is prohibited as long as a member or person approved by the directors is willing to purchase the shares at the fair value to be certified (in the case of difference) by the company's auditor in accordance with art. 26 of the company's articles of association. By art. 31 the directors are given a general power to refuse to register a transfer.

Under s. 7 (5) of the Finance Act, 1894, the principal value of any property is to be estimated for the purposes of duty

“ to be the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, such property would fetch if sold in the open market at the time of the death of the deceased.”

But in this case the decision of the commissioners is not final and conclusive on the question, as by s. 10 (1) a right of appeal is given to any person who is aggrieved by the amount of any duty claimed by the commissioners, whether on the ground of the value of any property or otherwise. There was no quotation for any of the company's shares on the Stock Exchange, and they were all held by the Holt family or family trusts.

The principles on which shares in a private company are to be valued for the purpose of estate duty have been settled by the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Crossman, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Mann (1). The House of Lords decided in that case (by a majority of three to two) that the facts that a shareholder by the articles of a company may be compelled to sell his shares at the “ fair value ” ascertained in accordance with the articles, and that by the articles the directors may have power to refuse to register a transfer, must be ignored, but none the less it must be assumed that a purchaser will be bound by the company's articles once he is on the register of members. The result is that I must enter into a dim world peopled by the indeterminate spirits of fictitious or unborn sales. It is necessary to assume the prophetic vision of a prospective purchaser at the moment of the death of the deceased, and firmly to reject the wisdom which might be provided by the knowledge of subsequent events. In my task I have had the assistance of a number of experts on each side who differ in their opinions in the manner in which experts normally do, and the frankest of them admitted that certain of his calculations were simply guesswork. It seems to me that their opinions are, indeed, properly described as guesswork, though, of course, it is intelligent guesswork, aided by the experience which they have gained by their work as stockbrokers or accountants. No possible suggestion can be made against the honesty of these witnesses, but their methods of calculation appear to me to be inevitably uncertain and controversial, and, in my view, statements by several of them, that they would be ready to buy the shares at the price reached by them, if they had had the opportunity some five years ago, must be discounted accordingly. None the less I could not have approached my task without their valuable assistance, and my remarks must not be taken to belittle the efforts which have been made by them to provide an answer to a question to which no certain answer is possible.

By the terms of the section I have to imagine the price which the property would fetch if sold in the open market. This does not mean that a sale by auction (which would be improbable in the case of shares in a company) is to be assumed, but simply that a market is to be assumed from which no buyer is excluded: see Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Clay, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Buchanan (2), per SWINFEN EADY, L.J. ([1914] 3 K.B. 475). At the same time, the court must assume a prudent buyer who would make full inquiries and have access to accounts and other information which would be likely to be available to him: see Findlay's Trustees v. Inland Revenue (3).

With those principles in mind I approach the history of the company and the evidence of the witnesses in this case. The company was incorporated on Mar. 25, 1897, to take over the business of trading in West Africa started in 1867 by John Holt with the assistance of two younger brothers. The company also owned ships, this side of the business having been started in 1869 with a sixty-five ton schooner, and in the period with which I am concerned the company owned five cargo ships which also had accommodation for some passengers. The company was during the material period a private company, and all the shares were held by members of the Holt family or vested in Holt family trusts, and there was a strong desire in the family to retain control of the company and the ordinary shares. The company, however, did become a public company on Sept. 15, 1950 (which, of course, is two and a half years after the death of the deceased), in connection with an issue to the public of 650,000 five per cent. first cumulative redeemable preference shares of £1 each.

The company owned a number of trading stores in West Africa and the business consisted of purchasing and carrying to West Africa of goods for sale there, and purchasing and re-selling the products of West Africa, the goods being carried in both directions in the ships owned by the company. The company's results have fluctuated considerably, apparently because of the variations in price of the commodities in which the company dealt, and the West African trade has been described as a particularly hazardous trade. The company has maintained a settled policy of "making provision in the good years for the bad ones which must inevitably follow sooner or later."

Since 1921 the practice of the company has been to limit distributions on the ordinary shares to five per cent. less tax, and to build up its reserves by accumulating surplus profits in good years. An exceptional cash capital bonus of one and a quarter per cent. was, however, paid in February, 1948, out of the realisation of an investment. Figures which are available for the thirty-six years from 1912 to the year ending on Sept. 30, 1947, enable the fluctuations in the company's profits to be appreciated. In 1914 there was a loss of £132,993, but in the war years 1915 to 1919 (inclusive) very large profits, rising in 1919 as high as £797,437, were made. In the years 1920 to 1923, however, when the post-war slump occurred, very severe losses were incurred, e.g., £597,768 in 1921. It appears that the company was able to tide over this difficult period by means of the reserves accumulated during the profitable war years, when there was not the same confiscatory taxation that was adopted during the second world war. In the subsequent years between the wars, except for a loss of £134,593 in the unfortunate year 1931, a modest profit, averaging not more than £45,000 a year, was made until 1937 and 1938, which were very successful years, including in one year a profit of £211,000. The war years again brought very large profits, but the policy of making provision by means of reserves for a post-war slump was severely handicapped by the heavy taxation of "excess profits", so that, though the profits reached the high figure of £762,285 in 1943, and the other years were little short of this, comparatively small sums were available for dividends and reserves after provision for such taxation. Some relief from taxation came in 1946 when the profit was £681,745, and in the year ending Sept. 30, 1947, the profits reached the very high figure of £1,011,928. When the deceased died on Mar. 11, 1948, the accounts for this last year were not finally completed, but it is fair to assume that information as to the approximate results of the year's trading would have been ascertained by a prospective purchaser. The figures to which I have referred are partly taken from the table prepared by Mr. H. A. Benson (one of the witnesses for the petitioners) from the company's profit and loss accounts, and partly from the figures given in the 1950 share issue prospectus (on which the witnesses for the Crown based their calculations). There are certain variations in these figures, but these are not large enough to affect the general picture which I have stated. A dividend of five per cent. on the ordinary shares (which had not been exceeded in the years in question) required only some £22,000, and so the company's earnings during the years immediately prior to 1948 were amply sufficient to allow a much larger distribution to the shareholders, if large sums were not set aside for other purposes, such as reserves, including the cost of new ships. At this date two of the five ships owned by the company were of an age which demanded their replacement. The company had a large overdraft at its bankers, which approached one million pounds in 1947. It was really common ground that the company was over-trading, and that the large figures for profits in the years 1946 and 1947 reflected the contemporary inflation.

After beginning at as high a figure as £3 a share, the value claimed by the Crown is now 25s. per share, though the value formally determined by them was not that figure but 34s. per share. The figures given on behalf of the petitioners started at 11s. 3d. as the fair value stated by the company, and rose to a value of 17s. 2d. per share put forward in the petition and at the hearing. I am entitled, therefore, to assume that the principal value of the shares is one or other of these figures of 25s. and 17s. 2d., or some other value somewhere in between. It appears that a value of 17s. 6d. per share was agreed on the occasion of a death on Apr. 5, 1943, and a value of 20s. per share was agreed on the occasion of other deaths which occurred on Nov. 15, 1945, and June 3, 1946, but a period of one and three-quarter years had elapsed since the later of those dates when Mr. Robert Longstaff Holt died on Mar. 11, 1948.

I now turn to the evidence of the witnesses. The first witness on behalf of the petitioners was Mr. Henry Alexander Benson of the firm of Messrs. Cooper Bros. & Co., a chartered accountant with a knowledge of conditions in Africa as well as experience in this country. He said that the West African trade had had a very bad reputation in the last thirty or forty years, and referred to the riots following a boycott of European traders which occurred in February, 1948, shortly before the death of the deceased. He also referred to the devaluation of the French colonial franc, which occurred in January, 1948, as another depressing factor. He considered that a purchaser of the company's shares would be interested primarily in the profits made by the company and the dividends likely to be paid in the future. In his view the war-time and post-war profits represented an artificial prosperity which in no circumstances would continue indefinitely, and he thought that a purchaser would observe the heavy losses suffered by the company after the first world war and would be apprehensive that such a phase might be repeated. Mr. Benson thought that the position in regard to the assets and liabilities of the company in 1946 and 1947 was very vulnerable, having regard to the large amount of the company's assets represented by stocks and the size of the company's overdraft. He said that a ratio of assets to liabilities of two to one was too low for a company of this character. The company's accounts showed the ratio to be 1.73 to 1 in 1946 and 1.55 to 1 in 1947.

Mr. Benson thought that, having regard to the steady dividend policy of the company, a purchaser would count on a dividend at the rate of five per cent. not being reduced, but on the other hand he would not expect it to be increased. Mr. Benson thought that the absence of any quotation of the shares on the Stock Exchange, and the restrictions on transfer to which the purchaser would be subject when he got on the register, were factors which would make a purchaser require a further one-and-a-half per cent. of income yield in reaching the appropriate price for the shares. Mr. Benson supported his evidence with various tables, containing the figures relating to various companies whose shares had a quotation on the Stock Exchange, and other figures obtained from the Actuaries' Investment Index. Such tables are not without a value as they provide some possible basis of comparison for the purpose of checking the calculations of a witness, but it is easy to attack them on the ground that the varying circumstances of the companies and the difficulty of applying the prices of quoted shares to the shares of a private company not quoted on the Stock Exchange may render the comparison of little value. On this basis Mr. Benson reached a figure of 15s. 2d. per share, and to this he added the sum of 1s. 6d., making a figure of 16s. 8d. The addition of 1s. 6d. represented Mr. Benson's estimate of the allowance which a purchaser might make in his offer for the possibility sooner or later of the company's shares being offered to the public, with a resulting capital accretion in some way to the shares held by a previous purchaser. Mr. Benson considered that the time for this event would be later rather than sooner, and this was one of the points on which his evidence differed considerably from that of the witnesses for the Crown, who considered that the issue of shares to the public would be sooner rather than later, and attributed a much greater value to this factor. Finally, Mr. Benson added a further 6d. to his estimated price as representing the amount of the net dividend likely to be declared in respect of the year 1947. Thus, the value which he placed on the shares was 17s. 2d. a share.

Mr. Benson expressed the view that the prices of ordinary shares tended to follow the price of Consols, and produced a graph which recorded the rise of Consols to a peak in 1946 (when ordinary shares in the company were valued for estate duty at 20s. a share) and a subsequent fall in the price of Consols which, if followed by the company's shares, would bring the price of these to less than 16s. 8d. by March, 1948. Mr. Benson's view was not accepted by the witnesses for the Crown in this respect.

Mr. John Alphonse Holt is one of the petitioners, and he is a director and, at the present time, the chairman of the company. He had, of course, a complete knowledge of the affairs of the company, and he had lived in West Africa. His description of the company's business was that the company exported from West Africa all the products which West Africa produces so far as possible, and imported into West Africa most of the merchandise which was required by the inhabitants of West Africa. Mr. Holt made it plain that no increase on the dividend of five per cent. on the ordinary shares of the company was contemplated by the board of directors in March, 1948. He regarded the financial position of the company at that time as "very unsafe". The liquid condition of the company's assets had not improved since the accounts for 1946 had been published, and the company's overdraft had substantially increased. The stocks carried by the company had increased by fifty per cent. The company was in the position of having to restore practically the whole of its buildings in West Africa, and to replace before long the two of its five ships which had been built in 1929. But the company had no plans for putting the company's ordinary shares on the market in the foreseeable future.

One question of some importance dealt with by Mr. Holt was how far a prospective purchaser would have been able to obtain information as to the company's position and prospects by inquiry from the directors. Mr. Holt said that all the information which he had given in evidence would not have been given directly to a buyer of a small quantity of shares, but it would have been made available, in confidence, to a reputable firm of accountants, acting on behalf of a buyer and approved by the board of directors, with the result, as I understood the position, that the information so revealed would not be passed on to the buyer but his accountant would be in a position to advise him as to the prudence of the purchase and the price which could reasonably be offered for the shares. Mr. John Holt said that the large profits which the company had been making were frightening because they represented the effect of inflation, and in March, 1948, he thought the sellers' market was virtually disappearing and a recession in trade was expected at any moment. In his view, as the company's reserves were in the form of the company's current trading assets, the company was extremely vulnerable.

I take the evidence of Mr. Frank Samuel next, because his evidence had some features in common with that of Mr. Holt. Mr. Samuel is chairman of the United Africa Co., a very much larger company than John Holt & Co., carrying on trade

A in West Africa, and a subsidiary of Unilever, Ltd. Mr. Samuel has had long experience of West African trading, and this led him to describe the trading risks in West Africa as immensely greater than in any other part of the world. These risks, he explained, were due to the prosperity of these territories being based on agriculture, and in some cases on some particular kind only, such as the culture of cocoa or groundnuts, so that they were affected by the wide fluctuations in the prices of the products and by growing conditions. In his view the necessity of traders in West Africa carrying heavy stocks at times of high prices represented a tremendous danger because it was only a question of time when a break in prices would come. In 1946, 1947 and 1948, Mr. Samuel expected that a break in prices was imminent, and his opinion was generally shared in the West African trade. Another adverse factor in his view was the growing tendency in West B African countries to try to get trade away from European firms. Mr. Samuel thought that the company might appear to be earning more money while in fact having "a much worse time", because of the cost of replacing the company's assets and the level of taxation. He was of opinion that a buyer would not expect increased dividends to be paid by the company because of the company's earnings in 1946 and 1947, if he knew anything about West African trade. He could not see how the company's shares could be attractive to a surtax payer or other C purchaser looking forward to capital accretion.

By comparison with the quoted prices of shares in other companies Mr. Samuel reached a percentage yield of 4.89, to which he added $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for weaknesses in the company's position compared with those companies, making a total required yield of 6.14 per cent. To this he thought it was necessary to add a D further 2.05 per cent. to compensate for the lack of a quotation and difficulties of transfer, thus producing a yield figure of 8.19 per cent. This was equal to a value of 12s. 2d. ex dividend. Mr. Samuel could not see any real possibility of capital appreciation sufficient to bring into account, and added nothing for this factor. It was suggested in cross-examination to Mr. Samuel, and I think it is a fair point, that an ordinary buyer would not have all the information on West E African conditions which led him to take such a depressing view. Consequently, in my view, Mr. Samuel's estimate of the value of the shares, so far as based on the unattractiveness of the company's ordinary shares to him, must be discounted by this consideration.

F Mr. Mark Richard Norman is a partner in Messrs. Edward Stein & Co., merchant bankers, who are also managers of and advisers to investment trusts. He was provided with copies of the company's balance sheets and accounts, and extracts from the chairman's speeches and from the company's articles. He made inquiries from Mr. Benson (who asked him to make a valuation) and also outside enquiries, but he said that if he had really been faced with the problem of buying these shares he would have made longer inquiries. He was asked at what price he would have been willing to purchase 43,698 ordinary shares of the company on Mar. 11, 1948, and his answer was that the highest price G he would have paid was 15s. per share ex dividend. His view was confirmed by all he had heard since March, 1952, when he was asked to make his valuation. Mr. Norman thought that, in March, 1948, it was generally expected that a fall in prices was going to follow the post-war boom, and the reason it did not occur was the outbreak of the Korean war in 1950. In 1948 he would not have expected the dividend to be increased, because he did not think that the profits retained H by the company after taxation were adequate—by a long way. After looking at the yield of other companies and the Actuaries' Investment Index, Mr. Norman thought that on an expected dividend of five per cent. a yield of half as much again— $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—would be looked for. This produced a required yield of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and a price of 13s. $4\frac{1}{2}$ d. per share. As this was an awkward figure and he would have been anxious to help if the company had come to his firm in 1948 for help, he increased the price to 15s., which is equivalent to $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. yield on a five per cent. dividend, and, therefore, he considered 15s. p share a favourable price. He thought 25s. an absurd price, and would not have paid anything like it.

Mr. Roger Anthony Hornby is a director of Messrs. Cazenove, Akroyds & Greenwood, an unlimited company carrying on business as stockbrokers, which specialises in the underwriting of new issues of capital, and in fact acted as London brokers to the issuing house of Baring Bros. when the issue of preference shares to the public was made by John Holt & Co. in September, 1950. Anticipating that a five per cent. dividend was likely to be paid by the company, Mr. Hornby deducted from a price of 20s., according to the practice of his firm when making valuations, twenty per cent. for the absence of quotation on the Stock Exchange and marketability and for the restrictions on transfer, thus reducing the price to 16s. cum dividend. Mr. Hornby thought that Mar. 11, 1948, following so closely on the boycott and riots in West Africa, could not have been a worse time to try to place the company's shares.

Sir Harold Montagu Barton was the first witness called on behalf of the Crown. He is a very experienced chartered accountant with a long experience of the valuation of shares in public and private companies. Sir Harold Barton agreed that the company was trading in a somewhat dangerous way, but he was not alarmed by the size of the company's overdraft in 1947, nor by the company's liquid assets being very much locked up in debtors and stocks and so forth. He considered that, in this way, the company's assets were profitably invested, and he even said that he regarded an overdraft as a healthy sign. In Sir Harold Barton's opinion the predominant circumstance in arriving at a price for the shares would be the question of dividend yield and prospective dividend yield, and after that the earnings and the relation of the dividends to the earnings. Another factor which Sir Harold Barton took into consideration was the effective management of this old-established business. Sir Harold Barton took the extremely low yield figure of three per cent. and on this basis reached a price of 33s. 4d., to which he added 8d. for the dividend expected for the year 1947, making a price of 34s. Apparently, Sir Harold Barton was impressed by the evidence of the petitioners' witnesses, and, in particular, Mr. Holt's emphasis on the policy of restricting the dividends, to the extent of increasing his yield figure to four per cent. producing a price of 25s. On the other hand, Sir Harold Barton was inclined to discount the danger of a post-war slump, and he said that everyone had learnt lessons from the experience after the first world war. But when I questioned him as to the steps which business men would take to avoid the difficulties experienced after the first world war, he was only able to suggest a more cautious dividend policy, and the keeping of more money in reserve, which seem to be measures tending to reduce the price of the shares as contended by the petitioners. Sir Harold Barton thought Mr. Holt's and Mr. Samuel's expectations of a severe fall in prices unduly pessimistic, and considered that purchasers would not necessarily take a similar view. A great many of Sir Harold Barton's answers seemed to me somewhat vague, and it would appear that he had not examined the position of the company in any great detail. It is not at all clear that Sir Harold Barton considered the effect which the restrictions on transfer of shares contained in the company's articles would have on the purchaser.

Mr. Charles Ian Ritchie Hutton is another experienced chartered accountant. In his view the main factors affecting a prospective purchaser were the rate of dividend which he expected to receive on the shares, the prospects of capital appreciation and the restrictions on transfer. He thought that a purchaser would expect to secure a dividend of not less than five per cent. and would expect to receive a larger dividend, but, in view of the statements made by the board, he might expect to wait a year or so before he had a substantial increase. Mr. Hutton approached the question of capital appreciation on the basis of the strong probability that in the near future the company would have to go to the public for money in one shape or another. He would make some allowance for restrictions on marketability. Mr. Hutton's method was to divide his valuation into two parts—(i) a fixed element representing a dividend of five per cent. and (ii) a contingent element in which he attempted to give effect to his estimates of contingencies affecting the price of the shares. He reached a price of 18s. for his fixed element on the basis of a yield figure of just under four per cent. from the Actuaries' Investment Index in respect of five per cent. preference shares, and an addition of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for restrictions on transfer, thus assuming a five per cent. yield. But having regard to the price of 21s. which had been agreed between the parties for the $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. preference shares of the company, he reduced his figure from 18s. to 16s. 2d. It appeared that this corresponded in his view with the figure of 15s. 8d. reached by Mr. Benson (before he added 1s. 6d. for the contingencies) and 16s. reached by Mr. Hornby, and consequently, so far, there was very little difference between the respective valuations. But then Mr. Hutton proceeded to assume that the dividend must rise to ten per cent., and in his calculations the additional five per cent. represented a further 16s. 2d. This (contingent) 16s. 2d. Mr. Hutton discounted by twenty-five per cent. to compensate for delay and uncertainty, and allowing against these contingencies (on the credit side) the prospects of a further issue of shares by the company. It appeared that this deduction of twenty-five per cent. could not have any mathematical or scientific basis, and was purely guesswork. This reduced the second or contingent 16s. 2d. to 12s. 1d., and made Mr. Hutton's valuation 28s. 3d. He said that, in March, 1948, he would have advised a purchaser to buy at that price, and, if offered the shares at 25s., he would have marshalled the resources of his family and friends in order to purchase. Mr. Hutton discounted the effects of the boycott and riots in West Africa in February, 1948, and the apprehensions for the future expressed by Mr. Holt and Mr. Samuel, and Mr. Hutton actually said that "there are no bad risks in the Commonwealth these days", which I find a very surprising statement.

Mr. Thomas Austin Hamilton Baynes, another chartered accountant, had made a special study of the valuation of shares in private companies, and had read papers on the subject at meetings in many parts of England. He was a frank and attractive witness. The first thing that Mr. Baynes looked at was the five per cent. dividend, and he looked at the profits for a period of ten years up to and including 1947, because that happened to include two pre-war years and two post-war years. He found that the average profits for this period were £524,744. This figure he discounted by twenty-five per cent. because, as I understood, the very high profits of 1947 were not likely to be maintained, and this gave him a figure of £393,558 which he regarded as approximately twice the pre-war profit. He admitted that the deduction of one quarter from the average of ten years was made for no particular reason, but he was trying to get at some kind of guesswork figure for the future profits. It seems to me, moreover, that the years to which Mr. Baynes confined his average might well produce a misleading result, because the years selected were the war years of exceptionally high profits and the years of post-war inflation, and the two pre-war years, 1937 and 1938, were years of unusually high profits not at all typical of the years between the two wars. Mr. Baynes thought that the dividend paid by the company was quite unrealistic, having regard to the profits earned, but he thought it very unlikely that the company would remain a private company for long. He reached the conclusion that an investor would require an $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. yield. He thought that the company would be likely to distribute a third of its profits with a view to a forthcoming issue of shares to the public. This represented a sum of £131,000 which was subject to the preference dividends of some £9,000, leaving a figure of £122,000 and a possible dividend on the ordinary shares of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This gave Mr. Baynes, on an $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. yield, a price of £2 1s. per share. He thought the type of investor who would be attracted was the surtax payer, looking for a capital profit. Apparently, he thought such an investor would be prepared to pay 30s. 9d. in the expectation of a rise to £2 1s. and a capital accretion of 10s. 3d. or about $33\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on his investment. So he took a price of 30s., which included the prospective dividend for the year 1947. It is clear that, if the figure taken by Mr. Baynes for the average profits of £393,558 was unreasonable for any reason, all the calculations by which he reached his selling price of 30s. per share would be affected. It appears also that he had not paid any attention to the way in which heavy war-time taxation had affected the ability of the company to place money to reserve to meet future capital expenditure and the possibility of a post-war slump. Mr. Baynes made no allowance for the lack of a quotation on the Stock Exchange and restrictions on transfer, because, he said, he had approached the problem of valuation in such a way that these considerations did not really affect the position.

Mr. Henry Samuel Loeb is the senior partner in the firm of Messrs. Montagu, Loeb, Stanley & Co., stockbrokers, and he has been a member of the Stock Exchange since 1904. Mr. Loeb was very much affected by the personalities of those connected with the management of a company. He said that, if he were satisfied with the integrity and ability of the men who ran the company, he would go no further. He appeared to have a touching confidence in the likelihood of business ability being reproduced in successive generations of Hols as in the case of the Brookes in the case of Brooke, Bond & Co., the tea producers and dealers. When he looked at the company's balance sheets, he looked particularly at the assets in relation to capital and the reserves, and, one other thing, cover for the dividend which was being paid. He did not anticipate particularly increased dividends in the case of John Holt & Co. It appeared that he thought that a conservative policy of limitation of dividends was likely to benefit the shareholders in some form or another. He was not troubled with abstruse calculations. The question he asked himself was: "Is this a firm in which I would like to be a sleeping partner?". Having answered that in the affirmative, he reached a price of 28s. to 29s. per share, as far as I can see, by some process of intuition. Then it occurred to him that the Crown, by whom he was instructed, would want something more than this, and so he looked for some other company to form a guide and took Brooke, Bond & Co. He admitted that many people might think that there was no real basis for comparison in the companies, but it was "the nearest thing in which he held shares". He came to the conclusion that Brooke, Bond & Co. represented a better investment, and so lowered his figure for the shares of John Holt & Co. to 25s. per share. He said that he himself would have been prepared to purchase the shares at 25s. or a bit more in case of competition, and if Mr. Benson had offered him the shares at 17s. 2d. he would probably have fainted. Matters like the boycott and riots in West Africa in Mr. Loeb's view would not affect the price, and non-marketability or restrictions on transfer did not worry him at all. Dividend yield was a matter of indifference to him. He dismissed Mr. Samuel's anxieties as to the future with the remark: "Personally I never think there is a risk of falling prices."

That really completes the evidence, for I need not deal with the evidence of Mr. Frederick William Gower, an accountant of the Board of Inland Revenue, who was merely called to deal with some disputed matters of detail in regard to the figures appearing in certain tables.

As I have already indicated, the problem to be decided is purely hypothetical, because, in a company in which the family are determined to retain control, it is obvious that a member or person selected by the directors would be found to enforce a transfer at "the fair value" under art. 25 of the company's articles of association. I am bound to assume, however, that this provision in the articles was not being enforced, and that the shares were thrown open for purchase by anyone who was willing to buy them. Now, it is plain that the shares did not give a purchaser the opportunity to control the company, or to influence the policy of the directors to any great extent, as the shares available only represent 43,698 shares out of 697,680 ordinary shares which had been issued. Any purchaser, therefore, would be dependent on the policy of the directors, so long

A as they should have the support of the general body of the shareholders. I think the kind of investor who would purchase shares in a private company of this kind, in circumstances which must preclude his disposing of his shares freely whenever he should wish (because, when registered as a shareholder, he will be subject to the provisions of the articles restricting transfer), would be different from any common kind of purchaser of shares on the Stock Exchange, and would be rather the exceptional kind of investor who had some special reason for putting his money into shares of this kind. He would, in my view, be the kind of investor who would not rush hurriedly into the transaction, but would consider carefully the prudence of the course, and would seek to get the fullest possible information about the past history of the company, the particular trade in which it was engaged and the future prospects of the company. I think that such a purchaser would consider the inter-war results of the company, the effect of the 1914 war on the company's trading and the heavy losses sustained in the years which followed that war. In my view, therefore, the evidence of the witnesses for the Crown is open to criticism in so far as it ignores or minimises unduly (as it seems to me) the history of that period in the company's trading. The possibility of losses due to some severe fall in prices emphasises the importance of reserves, and I do not see how anyone considering the financial situation of the company could properly ignore the effects of inflation on the value of money, the way in which the building up of adequate reserves to meet the difficulties likely to be caused by a slump in prices had been handicapped by the enormous sums required to be taken from profits for taxation in the years of the second world war, and the way in which the provision for the replacement of capital assets, such as ships, had been made more difficult by allowances for depreciation being made on the basis of original cost and not the expense of replacement. In my view, these matters, as well as the fluctuating nature of West African trading, would be likely to have a greater effect on the mind of the hypothetical purchaser than was admitted by the witnesses for the Crown. I rule out of consideration the knowledge provided by the passage of time since Mar. 11, 1948, that the company's dividend on ordinary shares has not been increased from five per cent. and that the company has been able to avoid a public issue of ordinary shares by launching an exceedingly successful issue of new preference shares in September, 1950. But I think that the witnesses for the Crown have over-valued the prospects on Mar. 11, 1948, of an increase of dividend and the issue of ordinary shares in the future.

F On the other hand, owing to the fall in the value of money, five per cent. on the ordinary shares did represent a much smaller return in fact to the members of the family than that dividend represented in pre-war years, and there might have been pressure by the family in 1948 or later to increase the dividend (having regard to the ample earnings of the company). Moreover, some possible hypothetical purchaser might well have thought that the company would be forced to raise further capital by an issue of ordinary shares to the public instead of adopting the method of an issue of preference shares, or debentures, or unsecured notes. Any such anticipation could have no more certainty than a guess. But I think that the petitioners' witnesses have under-valued this element in the price which the hypothetical purchaser might pay in this hypothetical open market.

H Having carefully considered the evidence which has been given, including such assistance as may be gained from the various tables which have been put in and the various comparisons with the prices of shares of other companies quoted on the Stock Exchange (so far as any useful deductions can be made from these), and making the most intelligent guess that I can, I have come to the conclusion that these shares of John Holt & Co., if sold on the hypothetical open market which the authorities and the section in the Act require me to assume, would fetch a price of 19s. a share. Accordingly, I determine the principal value of the 43,698 ordinary shares in the company to which this appeal relates to be 19s. multiplied by the number of shares, and the resulting figure is, I think, £41,513 2s. The amount of the estate duty payable on this sum can, no doubt, easily be determined.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for Alsop, Stevens & Co., Liverpool (for the petitioners); Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.]

A

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R.), November 30, 1953.]

B

Court of Appeal—Notice of appeal—Contents—Certificate of service—Notice by appellant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., read the following statement, which was made contemporaneously in the other Divisions of the Court of Appeal:—

Before we begin today's list I wish to draw attention to two small matters of difficulty which have arisen in the Court of Appeal.

C

The first is (and it appears only likely to be met in practice where appeals are entered in district registries) that an appeal may on occasion get set down and appear in the list before notice of it has been served on the respondent. The second is where a respondent appears in person and may not know when the appeal is coming on—indeed, he may be misled by the common form of notice of appeal ("Take Notice that this court will be moved at the expiration of . . . days from the service upon you of this notice . . ."). To get over these difficulties it is suggested that the notice of appeal should contain a statement and a certificate the effect of which I will state in a minute.

D

I would emphasise that there is no form of notice of appeal fixed by statute or the rules, and I should, therefore, make it clear that, if a notice of appeal does not contain the suggested statement or certificate, it will not thereby be invalid. We think, however, that, if the suggestions are adopted, they will save the mischance that I have mentioned and, therefore, save trouble and costs.

E

The suggestions are these:

On setting down an appeal to the Court of Appeal one copy of the notice of appeal should be indorsed with a certificate of the solicitors for the appellant (or the appellant himself if in person) stating the date or dates on which notice of appeal was served on the party or parties named as respondent(s). The officer receiving the notice of appeal should satisfy himself that it was served in due time on the respondent(s) and must refuse to set the appeal down if it appears that the notice was served out of time. The copy of the notice of appeal containing the certificate as to service shall be in the custody of the officer in attendance on the Court of Appeal when the appeal comes on to be heard.

F

Notices of appeal should contain after the signature by the solicitor for the appellant a statement as follows:

G

"No notice as to the date on which this appeal will be in the list for hearing will be given: it is the duty of solicitors to keep themselves informed as to the state of the lists. A respondent intending to appear in person should inform the Appeal Clerk, Room 136, Royal Courts of Justice, W.C.2., of that fact and give his address; if he does so he will be notified by telegram to the address he has given of the date when the appeal is expected to be heard."

H

DYSON v. DYSON.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), November 23, 24, 1953.]

Divorce—Maintenance of wife—Charge of cruelty and of adultery against wife—Failure of charges—Offer by husband to resume cohabitation—Refusal of wife—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 23 (1).

On Jan. 15, 1951, the husband left the matrimonial home and on Jan. 20, 1951, he wrote to the wife asking her to leave those premises. He filed a petition dated June 13, 1951, for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery and cruelty, and on Dec. 13, 1951, the petition was dismissed. The husband appealed against the dismissal of the charge of adultery, and on June 16, 1952, the appeal was dismissed. On June 20, 1952, the husband wrote to the wife: "You will no doubt have heard by now that my appeal has been dismissed. The court decided that my suspicions were wrong. As that is the case, let us drop the matter now, once and for all, and I assure you it will never be raised again by me. The house is still here and we really must arrange a meeting and see if we can get together again". The wife refused to meet the husband or to discuss a reconciliation. On a summons by the wife for maintenance under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1),

HELD: there being no suggestion that the husband was guilty of a matrimonial offence, the wife had to prove that he had been guilty of such grave and weighty conduct as to make married life impossible; the husband's charges of cruelty having been heard and disposed of, the wife could not for ever set up the fact that he had made those charges as providing her with just cause for refusing to live with him; the husband's offer in his letter of June 20, 1952, to meet the wife with a view to a reconciliation was genuine in the sense that he was prepared to take her back; the wife's refusal to meet the husband was not justified; and, therefore, he had not wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance.

Price v. Price ([1951] 2 All E.R. 580n.), applied.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 23 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 410; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 84, 85, Nos. 631-636.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Russell v. Russell, [1895] P. 315; 64 L.J.P. 105; 73 L.T. 295; affd. H.L.. [1897] A.C. 395; 66 L.J.P. 122; 77 L.T. 249; 61 J.P. 771; 27 Digest, Replacement, 307, 2551.
- (2) Oldroyd v. Oldroyd, [1896] P. 175; 65 L.J.P. 113; 75 L.T. 281; 27 Digest, Replacement, 289, 2349.
- (3) Price v. Price, [1951] 2 All E.R. 580, n.; [1951] P. 413; 115 J.P. 468, n.; 27 Digest, Replacement, 85, 636.

SUMMONS by the wife under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1).

The parties were married on Apr. 3, 1948, and there was one child of the marriage born on Dec. 29, 1948. On Jan. 15, 1951, the husband left the matrimonial home and on Jan. 19, 1951, the wife took the child and went to her parents' house. On Jan. 20, 1951, the husband's solicitors wrote to the wife that "in view of your conduct we must ask you to vacate the [matrimonial home]."

On Jan. 29, 1951, the wife's solicitors replied, denying that she was guilty of any conduct which would justify the husband in asking her to leave, and stating that she was ready and willing to continue living with him. On Jan. 30, 1951, the husband's solicitors wrote, repeating the husband's request that the wife leave the house. On June 13, 1951, the husband filed a petition for the dissolution of the marriage on the grounds of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent and cruelty, and, as particulars of cruelty, he alleged, inter alia, that from February, 1949, to January, 1951, the wife caused the matrimonial home to become so filthy that the health of the husband and the child of the marriage was impaired; that the husband became subject to nausea and vomiting as a consequence of the circumstances in which the wife required him to eat and live and that his health deteriorated; and that from September, 1950, to January, 1951, the stench in the house became so strong that the husband frequently vomited as a consequence thereof and as a consequence of having to eat in such conditions and that his general physical condition further deteriorated. The husband gave further and better particulars of these allegations. By her answer the wife denied the allegations of adultery and cruelty. On Dec. 5, 1951, the suit came before COLLINGWOOD, J., at Leeds Autumn Assizes, and on Dec. 13, 1951, the judge dismissed the petition. The husband appealed against the dismissal of the charge of adultery, and on June 16, 1952, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. On June 20, 1952, the husband wrote to the wife:

"Dear Doreen, Please find cheque for £20 for the care of you and baby Margaret. You will no doubt have heard by now that my appeal has been dismissed. The court decided that my suspicions were wrong. As that is the case, let us drop the matter now, once and for all, and I assure you it will never be raised again by me. The house is still here and we really must arrange a meeting and see if we can get together again. After all, there is Margaret to consider, she is only four years old. Please write me, Yours, Kenneth."

On June 24, 1952, the wife's solicitors replied, directing their letter to the husband's solicitors:

"We would refer you to your letter to us of Jan. 30, 1951, and we can only express the greatest surprise that after the allegations of cruelty and adultery which [the husband] has seen fit to make against [the wife] he should consider that [the wife] can now agree to a meeting with him."

On the same day the wife's solicitors also wrote to the husband's solicitors asking them to give a date on which the wife could collect some of her furniture, to which the husband's solicitors replied on June 26, 1953:

"We are reluctant to do so as this is liable to obstruct any possibility of a reconciliation, and in the same way we also feel that it would be a pity to divest the matrimonial home of various fittings and effects if there is any possibility of [the wife] returning."

On July 9, 1952, the husband's solicitors wrote a further letter:

"[The husband] informs us that his letter of June 20 was quite genuine and he is anxious to meet [the wife] with a view to discussing their affairs and if possible to effect a reconciliation. This suggestion still stands and there is no doubt that it would be a good idea if the parties could meet and discuss their differences. If, however, [the wife] refuses to change her attitude as stated in your letter of June 24 there is nothing more which [the husband] can do about it."

On July 24, 1952, the wife's solicitors replied:

"She is unwilling to meet her husband and there can be no question of a reconciliation."

On Oct. 29, 1952, the wife issued a summons under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1), alleging that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife and the infant child of the marriage.

Faulks for the wife.

Temple, Q.C., and Law for the husband.

BARNARD, J.: This is a summons by the wife, in which she complains that her husband has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her and the only child of the marriage, and she asks for an order for maintenance. It is a commonplace that maintenance does not merely mean pounds, shillings and pence. If a husband is willing to provide a home for his wife, he cannot then be found guilty of wilful neglect to provide her with reasonable maintenance. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It is the charge of cruelty which the husband made against the wife that has put him in a grave and difficult position. The suit was heard by COLLINGWOOD, J., who, on Dec. 13, 1951, gave a judgment in which he dismissed the petition and said certain things about the charge of cruelty which, I think, are important and to which I have to give weight.

The charge of cruelty was a grave reflection on the wife as a housewife. The husband accused her of keeping the house in such a filthy and dirty condition that often on his return home he would vomit because of the disgusting smells that came from different parts of the house, and—what is far more serious—he made grave reflections on her as a mother and alleged that she so neglected the child that the child's health was in danger. Even if COLLINGWOOD, J., had accepted the husband's evidence, it seems to me doubtful whether that conduct could come within the realm of cruelty. The husband was complaining about the character of the woman he married. It may be that he married a lazy woman who would not take the trouble to keep the house clean and in order, and it may be, as regards the charges dealing with the child, that she was an ignorant mother and did things from ignorance and from laziness which left the child in a dirty condition. But it is clear from his judgment that COLLINGWOOD, J., did not believe the husband. Dealing with the way the wife looked after the child he said:

"There is not a scrap of truth in this long list of complaints."

Then, as regards the charges in general, COLLINGWOOD, J., said:

"It is not only grossly exaggerated, it is grossly and deliberately distorted . . . I am satisfied that that story of having to live in these appalling conditions, day after day, week after week, is in the main a distortion."

The charge of adultery was a different matter. I do not think anybody could say that the husband had no grounds for suspicion. There was clear evidence, accepted by COLLINGWOOD, J., that the wife and the co-respondent were on more than one occasion seen kissing and caressing. The judge, having referred to that, went on to say:

"That such conduct is utterly reprehensible nobody will seek to deny, but such conduct, in my opinion, is not necessarily accompanied by adultery."

I think that, so far as that charge is concerned, the judge was saying that the burden of proof was on the husband, and that he had failed to prove the charge beyond all reasonable doubt. The husband was not content with that decision, and he appealed to the Court of Appeal on the charge of adultery. On June 16, 1952, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. In so many words, they said that it was a pure question of fact on which the judge had made up his mind, and, in the circumstances, it was hopeless to come to them by way of appeal. [His LORDSHIP referred to the correspondence and continued:] I have to consider two points: (i) Had the wife just cause for refusing to live with her husband?; and (ii) Was the offer made by the husband on June 20, in all the circumstances of the case, genuine?

I find little difficulty in dealing with the question of just cause. I have been referred to Russell v. Russell (1), which deals not only with what amounts to cruelty, but also with what affords just cause in resisting a petition for restitution, or, in the same way, would amount to a good defence to a charge of desertion. I have also been referred to the decision of GORELL BARNES, J., in Oldroyd v. Oldroyd (2), and I think that it is clear that the wife must satisfy me either that the husband has been guilty of a matrimonial offence, or that he has been guilty of such grave and weighty conduct as to make married life impossible. As there is no suggestion that the husband has been guilty of a matrimonial offence, the wife has to satisfy me that his conduct was so grave and weighty as to make married life impossible. I have been referred to Price v. Price (3), where one spouse made, but failed to prove, charges against the other and, as far as I know, made no apology for having made them, and that was not considered just cause. Although I have no wish to belittle the charges of cruelty which the husband in the present case did make at one time against the wife, they were heard in court and disposed of, and, as the husband himself said in the witness box: "That's an end of it". In my view, the wife cannot for ever set up the fact that he made these charges as providing her with just cause hereafter for refusing to live with him.

The other question—whether or not this letter is genuine—is not so easy. It is difficult to believe that a husband who has described his wife in the way in which he described her when he made these charges of cruelty against her is ready to have her back. Price v. Price (3) makes it clear that an offer, to be genuine, need not carry the implication that the person who makes it is desirous of having the other party back, provided that he or she is honest in saying that he or she will receive the other spouse back. SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1951] P. 416):

"It is plain from the evidence that the judge was determined to probe the wife's evidence very carefully before he was satisfied that this offer was a genuine one. As he has done that, and as he has decided that it was a genuine offer, that to my mind is an end of this case . . ."

Then DENNING, L.J., dealing with what it is necessary to prove in order to establish a genuine offer, said (ibid., 417):

"This wife deserted her husband and then went to the Divorce Court and charged him with cruelty. She lost her case, and immediately, through her solicitors, offered to go back to her husband. She made the offer genuinely in this sense, that she was prepared to return to her husband if he would have her; but she did not have any genuine desire to re-establish the marriage."

HODSON, L.J., dealing with this point, said (ibid., 421):

"I do not think it possible for the courts to investigate matters of emotion . . ."

In that case the wife, who had made the offer, said in the witness box that she hated her husband, but none the less her offer was considered to be genuine because, whether or not she hated him, she was prepared to make the best of it, and go back to him.

It is in the light of that decision that I have to consider whether or not this offer was genuine. I saw the husband in the witness box and, of course, counsel for the wife, fairly and properly, made the most of what COLLINGWOOD, J., had said about him in the divorce case, and not for one moment am I seeking to go behind anything that COLLINGWOOD, J., said. But I do not think that it follows that, because a husband coloured his case to succeed with his petition for divorce, whenever he appears in court again he is of necessity telling lies. More likely, having realised that his petition failed, he has learned a most salutary lesson, and I say at once that I thought the husband seemed an honest witness. I watched him carefully. I heard him cross-examined and he said:

"If my wife will come back to me I shall be quite ready to provide for her."

True, he went further, and again I think he was genuine, and said:

"I genuinely want her back. I think if we can get together we could make a go of it. Surely we can make something out of it?"

The wife will not even meet him. She will not allow the matter to be discussed, and she made it perfectly plain in her own evidence that: "As soon as I got his letter suggesting a meeting, I made up my mind never to go back", and that is still her mind—never, in any circumstances, to go back. I can sympathise with her to a great extent, after what he said about her as a wife and a mother, but in law she cannot take up that attitude for ever. More than a year has passed since these unfortunate proceedings between the parties, and I feel convinced that when the husband wrote, without any legal advice or assistance, this letter to his wife, he meant what he said. He wanted her to meet him to see whether they could not discuss the whole thing and clear the air, with a possibility of their coming together again.

This would have been a different case if the wife had been prepared to meet him and had given me evidence as to what had taken place at an interview, but she completely shut the door at a stage where I do not think she is entitled to shut it for ever. It was also suggested that the husband's offer could not be genuine because, months later, when it was apparent that she was not even going to meet him, there was some further trouble over a sum of money which the husband said he gave to the wife to furnish the house. That, of course, was when the two solicitors had taken up the cudgels on behalf of their respective clients. There did not then appear to be any possibility of a reconciliation or of a meeting.

I do not think that this is an idle offer by the husband. As he told me, the matrimonial home is still there; the living accommodation is temporarily used by clerks, but within a few hours they could be turned out and he could be ready to receive his wife back. The wife suggested that she could not live in that district again (not that I think the district matters, because she has firmly made up her mind never to live with her husband again), but the husband has said he is quite prepared to find a home anywhere else in the neighbourhood if she does not like going back to the same premises. I am satisfied on the evidence, in spite of the somewhat grim surrounding circumstances, that the husband did make a genuine offer on June 20, 1952, for his wife to meet him with a view to a reconciliation, and, the wife having definitely refused to meet him from that day onwards, I think that this summons must fail and be dismissed.

Summons dismissed.

Solicitors: A. F. & R. W. Tweedie, agents for Cook, Fowler & Outhet, Scarborough (for the wife); Ludlow, Head & Walter, agents for Willey Hargrave & Co., Leeds (for the husband).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NICHOLS AND ANOTHER v. WALTERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.),
November 24, 25, 1953.]

Mortgage—Possession of mortgaged property—Premises subject to Rent Restrictions Acts—Default in payment of mortgage interest for more than twenty-one days—Subsequent payment—Loss of protection—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 7.

By a legal charge dated Sept. 28, 1951, the owner of the fee simple in possession of premises comprising business and living accommodation which she occupied herself mortgaged them to secure repayment of £2,200. In June, 1952, the mortgagees called in the principal, and, thereafter, for a period exceeding three weeks, the mortgagor refrained from paying interest which fell due, and also failed to pay a fire insurance premium due under the legal charge. By a summons issued on Dec. 17, 1952, the mortgagees claimed possession. On Feb. 3, 1953, the master, on the mortgagor's undertaking to clear the arrears of interest and premium at once, stood the matter over with liberty to restore if default were made. On Feb. 7, 1953, the arrears were paid, but later the matter was adjourned to the judge and an order for possession was made.

HELD: assuming that the Rent Restrictions Acts applied to the legal charge, the notice calling in the mortgage in June, 1952, was unlawful by virtue of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 7, but, having fallen into arrear in the payment of interest for more than twenty-one days, the mortgagor lost the protection of s. 7 and she did not regain it by paying off the arrears, and, therefore, the order for possession was rightly made.

Evans v. Horner ([1925] Ch. 177), approved.

Quaere whether s. 7 of the Act of 1920 applies as between mortgagee and mortgagor where the mortgaged premises are in the hands of the freehold owner.

AS TO RESTRICTIONS ON ENFORCING MORTGAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, p. 423, para. 625; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 35, pp. 697, 698, Nos. 4402-4410.

Case referred to:

- (1) Evans v. Horner, [1925] Ch. 177; 94 L.J.Ch. 220; 132 L.T. 730; 35 Digest 698, 4407.

APPEAL by the mortgagor from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated July 21, 1953.

By an originating summons issued under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, the mortgagees of premises comprising a restaurant and living accommodation claimed possession from the mortgagor who owned the fee simple of, and occupied, the premises. In June, 1952, when the mortgagees called in the principal due under the mortgage, no interest was in arrear, nor was the mortgagor in breach of any covenant, but, after receipt of the mortgagees' notice, the mortgagor ceased to pay interest, which became overdue for more than twenty-one days, and failed to pay a premium for fire insurance for which she was liable under the mortgage. The summons was issued on Dec. 17, 1952, and was heard by the master on Feb. 3, 1953. The master stood the matter over, noting that:

"The defendant undertakes to clear the arrears of interest and the premiums at once. Stand over with liberty to restore if default made."

On Feb. 7, 1953, the mortgagor made payment in accordance with the undertaking, but on Feb. 10, 1953, the summons was restored, and, finally, DANCKWERTS, J., made an order for possession.

The mortgagor appeared in person.

C. B. Guthrie for the mortgagees.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: In my judgment, there is no ground on which we can disturb the order made by DANCKWERTS, J. The plaintiffs sued as mortgagees under a legal charge dated Sept. 28, 1951, whereby the defendant mortgaged her premises, of which she was the fee simple owner in possession, for £2,200 repayable as provided in the charge, with interest at $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. reducible to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on punctual payment. The mortgagees in June, 1952, nine months after the deed, called in the principal moneys, and, though the mortgagor has very rightly said that she is here, not for sympathy, but for what she claims to be her rights, I can well understand that the calling in disturbed her. The result was that she forebore to pay the interest due in September, 1952.

The first part of the mortgagor's argument is that she is protected as against the mortgagees by the Rent Restrictions Acts, and, in particular, by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 7. That section is in the following terms:

"It shall not be lawful for any mortgagee under a mortgage to which this Act applies, so long as—(a) interest at the rate permitted under this Act is paid and is not more than twenty-one days in arrear; and (b) the covenants by the mortgagor (other than the covenant for the repayment of the principal money secured) are performed and observed; and (c) the mortgagor keeps the property in a proper state of repair . . . to call in his mortgage or to take any steps for exercising any right of foreclosure or sale, or for otherwise enforcing his security . . ."

A mortgage to which the Act applies is defined in s. 12 (4) of the same Act which is in these terms:

"Subject to the provisions of the Act, this Act shall apply to every mortgage where the mortgaged property consists of or comprises one or more dwelling-houses to which this Act applies, or any interest therein . . ."

with certain exceptions which it is not necessary for me to read. Section 12 (2) provides:

"This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling, where . . .", and then follow the financial limits imposed by the Act, on which nothing now turns. Finally, the mortgagor draws attention to s. 12 (6), which provides:

"Where this Act has become applicable to any dwelling-house or any mortgage thereon, it shall continue to apply thereto whether or not the dwelling-house continues to be one to which this Act applies."

I confess that I find these provisions somewhat obscure, and I have seen elsewhere (MEGARRY'S THE RENT ACTS, 7th ed., p. 17) that the adjective "enigmatic" has been applied to sub-s. (6).

At the date of the mortgage of September, 1951, and ever since, these premises in Westbourne Grove have not been let to anyone either in whole or in part. The mortgagor carries on a business on the ground floor, lives in part of the upper floor, and has not, in fact, let the other part. It is said by the mortgagees that s. 7 is inapplicable as between mortgagee and mortgagor where the mortgaged premises are in the hands of their freehold owner. I think that question is open to doubt, and I prefer to express no opinion about it.

I will assume that the mortgagor is correct when she states that the mortgage was one to which the Act applies. On that footing the notice calling in the mortgage in June, 1952, was unlawful, i.e., invalid and bad, but as I have already said, unfortunately for her, the mortgagor did not pay the interest due in September and allowed it to get considerably more than twenty-one days in arrear. She also did not pay an insurance premium which she was bound to pay. The summons, asking, not for the payment of the principal, but to enforce the security by an order for possession, was issued on Dec. 17, 1952, and it came before the master on Feb. 3, 1953. I have before me the note made by the master which, so far as relevant, is:

"The defendant undertakes to clear the arrears of interest and the premiums at once. Stand over with liberty to restore if default made."

According to the mortgagor (and I accept her evidence in the absence of any refutation or challenge), she paid the arrears on Feb. 7, 1953. Counsel for the mortgagees said that was not paying "at once", but I should have thought for practical purposes it was. However, the summons was restored on Feb. 10, 1953. The mortgagor says it ought not to have been restored, because the arrears had then been paid, and, therefore, there was no right of action left in the mortgagees, but, as I think, the mortgagor was not entitled, because she had paid the arrears, thereupon to get the summons dismissed. In fact, the court never lost seisin of the matter. It was considered carefully by the master in February and was three times before the judge, and we are now in November.

Subject to one point, therefore, it seems to me that, as a matter of law—whether or not it may be hard on the mortgagor is not relevant—the mortgagees were entitled to ask for an order enforcing their security, and that is what they obtained. The only question is whether, having paid off the arrears of interest in February, 1953, the mortgagor can still claim the benefit of s. 7. I think the answer to that point is provided by Evans v. Horner (1), decided by RUSSELL, J., in 1925. The learned judge concluded as follows ([1925] Ch. 178):

"Section 7 (a) means that so long as interest is paid not later than twenty-one days after it is due, the mortgagee cannot call in his mortgage or take any steps for exercising any right of foreclosure . . ."

The learned judge had earlier said (ibid.):

"In my opinion the section only suspends the rights of the mortgagee during one continuous period, which lasts so long as conditions (a), (b) and (c) are complied with, and that when once those conditions are broken a subsequent compliance with them does not revive the protection given by the section."

That decision has never been questioned in this country for the quarter of a century which has passed since it was delivered, and I should, in any case, be slow to differ on a matter of this kind from that very learned judge.

In the circumstances, therefore, I think the answer inevitably is that the mortgagor, having allowed the interest to get more than twenty-one days in arrears (whatever may have been the reason), ceased to be able to invoke s. 7. When that stage is reached I think everything else follows, and I think, as I said at the beginning, that this appeal must fail.

I said during the argument that I felt some sympathy for the mortgagor, and, indeed, I do, but I think, also, that, even if she was able now to postpone an order for possession, it would not in the end make any difference. Ultimately, I have no doubt, from what the mortgagor told me, an order would have to be made. I should not wish, from anything I have said, to be treated as criticising the mortgagees or to suggest that they have not behaved properly in this matter.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Farrar, Porter & Co. (for the mortgagees).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

STARKIE v. STARKIE (No. 2).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Collingwood, J.), November 16, 17, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance—Wilful neglect to maintain—Consensual separation—No agreement as to maintenance—Neglect to maintain child—Liability of husband.

On July 20, 1953, the wife left the matrimonial home, taking with her the child of the marriage, then aged about eighteen months. On July 24, 1953, the wife issued a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, alleging that the husband had deserted her and had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her and the child. The justices found that "the wife left home . . . on a consensual basis . . . and that the husband had not constructively deserted the wife", that "there was no agreement, express or implied, that the husband should pay maintenance for the support of the wife and/or the child", and that "there was no evidence from either side that after the parting on July 20, 1953, the husband paid the wife any maintenance either in respect of herself or the child." The justices held that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife and the child and ordered him to pay the wife £2 10s. per week, being £1 for her benefit and £1 10s. for the benefit of the child. On appeal by the husband,

HELD: since the justices had found that the separation was consensual and that there was no agreement, express or implied, to maintain the wife, the husband could not be guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her; the failure of the wife's complaint in regard to her own maintenance did not exonerate the husband from his liability to maintain the child; in the absence of any explanation by the husband of his failure to maintain the child, the wife was entitled to an order in her favour in respect thereof; but the justices had awarded the maximum sum, £1 10s., in respect of maintenance for the child, and, therefore, the proper sum to be awarded in respect of the wife should be nominal, namely, 1s. a week.

Baker v. Baker (1949) (66 (pt. 1) T.L.R. 81), followed.

Kinnane v. Kinnane (ante, p. 1144), applied.

AS TO WILFUL NEGLECT TO MAINTAIN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 838, para. 1340; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 701-703, Nos. 6703-6721.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Tulip v. Tulip, [1951] 2 All E.R. 91; [1951] P. 378; 27 Digest, Replacement, 85, 635.
- (2) Morton v. Morton, [1942] 1 All E.R. 273; 111 L.J.P. 33; 166 L.T. 164; 106 J.P. 139; 27 Digest, Replacement, 706, 6750.
- (3) Baker v. Baker, (1949), 66 (pt. 1) T.L.R. 81; 27 Digest, Replacement, 82, 630.
- (4) Chapman v. Chapman, unreported.
- (5) Stringer v. Stringer, [1952] 1 All E.R. 373; [1952] P. 171; 116 J.P. 102; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (6) Kinnane v. Kinnane, ante, p. 1144.
- (7) Jones (A.) v. Jones (D. L.), (1929), 142 L.T. 167; 94 J.P. 30; 27 Digest, Replacement, 705, 6734.
- (8) Sullivan v. Sullivan, [1947] P. 50; 111 J.P. 27; 27 Digest, Replacement, 734, 7023.

APPEAL by the husband against an order of the justices for the Cockermonth petty sessional division of Cumberland, dated Aug. 10, 1953.

On July 24, 1953, the wife issued a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, alleging that the husband had deserted her on July 20, 1953, and that he had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her and the infant child of the marriage from the same date. On Aug. 10, 1953, the justices dismissed the charge of desertion, but found proved the charge of wilful neglect to maintain, and made an order in favour of the wife for the payment of £2 10s. per week, being £1 for the benefit of herself and £1 10s. for the benefit of the child of whom she was awarded custody. The husband desired to appeal, and on the husband's request the clerk to the justices sent the following statement of the justice's reasons for their decision:

"I hereby certify that the reason given by the [justices] for their decision in this matter on Aug. 10, 1953, was that the [husband] had neglected to maintain the complainant and child."

On Oct. 30, 1953, the Divisional Court (LORD MERRIMAN, P., and COLLINGWOOD, J.), set out, ante, p. 1255, certain questions to which the court required an answer before deciding the appeal. The answers of the justices to the questions were as follows:

"(i) Q.—In respect of [a previous] parting (from about Aug. 31, 1952, to July 11, 1953) did the justices accept the evidence of the husband in cross-examination by the wife's solicitor that he agreed to pay maintenance, and, if so, at what rate per week if the wife was (a) working or (b) not working, respectively. A.—The justices accepted the evidence of the husband in cross-examination by the wife's solicitor that he agreed to pay maintenance, but did not accept his evidence that any particular rate per week was agreed, because there was no evidence to support this statement and the justices did not believe it in view of the fact that payments were in fact irregular, and the husband apparently went off to sea without a care as to his responsibilities.

"(ii) Q.—Did the justices accept the evidence of both the husband and the wife that the husband paid maintenance at the rate of £4 10s. per week between the resumption of cohabitation on July 11, 1953, and July 20, 1953, the date of the present parting? A.—The justices accepted the evidence of both the husband and wife that a payment of £4 10s. was made, but they considered that this was an isolated payment, as supported by the wife's evidence, and not a regular weekly payment.

"(iii) Q.—On what grounds was the wife's complaint of desertion in respect of the present separation dismissed? A.—The justices considered that the wife left home rather on a consensual basis than because of the words and conduct of her husband and that there was for that reason no constructive desertion.

"(a) Q.—What did the justices find was the nature of this parting, and on what evidence did they base their finding? A.—The justices considered that the wife's evidence showed that that parting was on a friendly basis. The husband also stated that they agreed to separate. The justices accepted this evidence and therefore found that the husband had not constructively deserted the wife.

"(b) Q.—If the justices found that the parting was consensual, did they find that there was any agreement (i) express, or (ii) implied, that the husband should pay maintenance for the support of the wife and/or the child? Note (which applies to the whole question): A full statement of the grounds for this answer is required. A.—The justices found that there was no agreement, express or implied, that the husband should pay maintenance for the support of the wife and/or the child. They considered that there was no evidence before them which could support a finding that there was such an agreement.

“(c) Q.—If so, how much ? A.—See (b).

“(iv) Q.—After the parting on July 20, 1953, did the husband pay the wife any maintenance in respect of herself and/or the child, and, if so, how much respectively ? A.—The justices considered that there was no evidence from either side that after the parting on July 20, 1953, the husband paid the wife any maintenance either in respect of herself or the child.

“(v) Q.—On what ground was the wife’s complaint of July 24, 1953, that on and after July 20, 1953, the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her and her infant child held to be proved ? Note (which applies to the whole question): A full statement of the grounds for this answer is required. A.—The justices considered (i) That on July 20, 1953, any such payments as had been made by the husband did not constitute reasonable maintenance. This they considered was supported by the fact that the wife had been compelled to apply to the National Assistance Board. (ii) That after July 20, 1953, there was no evidence that any payment at all had been made. For these reasons the justices considered that on and after July 20, 1953, the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife and her infant child.”

Sneade for the husband.

D. R. Ellison for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the facts and continued: This court has, more than once recently, emphasised that when the wife is the complainant under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949 (and I realise that there are circumstances in which the husband may be the complainant), the order is made in her favour—it is her order, and that in these cases which deal with wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance, to support the findings of the justices the wife must establish wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance (i) for her and (ii) for the child, who must be her child, must be an infant child, and a child whom the husband is legally liable to maintain. But still, in respect of the child as in respect of the wife, it must be possible for her to establish that the husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. In my opinion, it is still the law, although the contrary has been argued, that in either case wilful neglect imports an element of misconduct. For the contrary view, Tulip v. Tulip (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal, was cited. But that case strongly affirmed decisions of this court, particularly Morton v. Morton (2), in which the element of misconduct in the phrase “wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance” was emphasised.

Starting with the proposition that the wife is the complainant in respect of wilful neglect to provide maintenance, not only for herself but also for her infant child, it is, I think, important to bear in mind that, however badly the husband has behaved in respect of the infant child, there may be a complete and absolute bar to the wife obtaining an order, for under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 6. no order can be made if she has committed adultery which has not been

“ . . . condoned, or connived at, or by his wilful neglect or misconduct conducted to ”

by the husband. As it is not suggested that this wife has disentitled herself by any other matrimonial misconduct, such as desertion, it would be academic to discuss the question whether a wife, who had disentitled herself from any maintenance for herself because she had deserted her husband, might also, in certain circumstances, have disentitled herself from complaining of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the infant child whom she had carried away with her in the process of deserting her husband. That matter can be discussed when it arises. Any failure on this wife's part to prove her own claim for maintenance does not depend on any misconduct on her part, whether adultery or otherwise. For the same reason, I do not think it necessary to pursue the interesting topic which has been debated, whether by any contractual act on her part she can make it difficult to assert that the husband has been guilty of neglect to maintain not only her, but also the child. I can imagine circumstances in which the self-same contract might conceivably be available as evidence in favour of the husband—not conclusive evidence: Tulip v. Tulip (1)—that he had no more been guilty of wilful neglect to maintain the child than of the wife. But, again, I do not think it necessary to pursue that topic. The wife's difficulty is that as regards her own maintenance she has been held, on evidence which, I think, abundantly justifies the finding, to have consented to this particular separation, and without any stipulation, express or implied, that the husband shall maintain her while they are thus living separate and apart. With regard to that, the law, as established at present, is conveniently contained in a short passage (66 T.L.R. (pt. 1) 82) from a judgment of this court in Baker v. Baker (3) quoted in the Court of Appeal in Chapman v. Chapman (4) and followed in Stringer v. Stringer (5), which reads as follows:

"There is no law involved in this case; it is merely an application of the principle that, if a wife is living separate and apart from her husband, it is not enough for her to give evidence that her husband had money and that she needed maintenance. The question is: What was the nature of the parting? If the wife can prove desertion, she is, of course, entitled to a maintenance order on that ground. If the separation was consensual, then, if she can prove—and Mr. Crispin accepted that the onus was on the wife—that this was on the basis, express or implied, that the husband undertook to be responsible for her maintenance, she is entitled either to the agreed amount (if there was an agreed amount), or to a reasonable amount under the section, although she is living apart from her husband. But unless she can show, where the separation was consensual, that the husband had accepted a liability, express or implied, to maintain her, she has no case at all."

That is precisely what has been found in this case. The separation was consensual, and there was no agreement, express or implied, to maintain the wife. In my opinion, therefore, the finding of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife cannot stand.

That is not, however, the end of the case. We pointed out in Kinnane v. Kinnane (6) that the wife would be entitled, if she established a complaint of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her infant child whom the husband was legally liable to maintain, to any order permissible under the Act of 1895, s. 5, and the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, s. 1 (1), and containing, of course, a provision giving her the custody of the child. We also pointed out that the establishment of that complaint might entitle her to an order for maintenance, not limited to any sum which was awarded in respect of the child of which she was given the custody. But, at the same time, we pointed out that if she failed to establish wilful neglect to maintain herself, the discretion of the justices as to the amount to be awarded must be exercised in recognition of the fact that she had failed to establish that matter. Remembering that we are talking about a wife being barred, not by some statutory disability, but merely by her own consensual act in agreeing to a separation without an obligation on the part of the husband to maintain her, the question in this case is: Does the failure of her complaint necessarily carry with it, in those circumstances, exoneration of the husband from responsibility in respect of the child? Having regard to some of the arguments which were addressed to us, I think it is important to distinguish, with reference to the husband's responsibility, two things: (i) the condition precedent that he is legally liable to maintain the child, and (ii) the offence that he has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for the child. It may be, speaking generally, that there is little practical difference, but they are not the same thing. Unquestionably, in this case, there is no doubt about the husband's legal liability to maintain the child. There has been a dispute about the paternity of the child, but that, to put it at its lowest, certainly has not been resolved in the husband's favour, and there is nothing to show that his legal liability to maintain his infant child does not subsist. I point out, however, that if his legal liability to maintain the child, as contrasted with wilful neglect to provide maintenance for the wife, necessarily imports wilful neglect if he does not do so, s. 4 of the Act of 1895 need only have referred to the husband's failure to maintain any given child, and made no reference to wilful neglect. The justices have found that from the moment of this parting on July 20, 1953, the husband paid nothing in respect of this child. I cannot see that he has given any excuse or explanation except the suggestion that the child was not his, which has not been determined in his favour. In my opinion, therefore, the fact that the wife cannot make out a case of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for herself does not bar her from proving that there has been wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the child, and I think that the justices were entitled to find that complaint proved, and that that is the right conclusion in this case.

There remains the question whether or not the whole order can stand. That is to say, on the basis that the wife has proved one out of her three complaints, can she have an order of £1 for herself as well as the £1 10s. in respect of the child of whom she is given custody? The order for £1 was challenged, but although, as we have said in Kinnane v. Kinnane (6), it is possible for the justices to make an order for the maintenance of the wife on the basis that she has proved the complaint of wilful neglect to maintain the child, I do not think that, on the question of quantum, this order can stand, because the justices have awarded the maximum sum which is now possible under the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), in respect of the maintenance for the child. I think that it is wrong, therefore, that, in addition to that sum, £1 should be ordered in favour of the wife, who has failed in the two complaints in which she is principally concerned. In my opinion, the proper way to deal with the situation is to allow the order for the wife's maintenance to stand for the nominal sum of, say, 1s. a week, which will recognise the facts that she is the complainant, that she is entitled to an order, and that if at any time variation is necessary she will not be barred by the fact that no foundation for variation is laid.

COLLINGWOOD, J.: I agree. In answer to question (iv)

"The justices considered that there was no evidence from either side that after the parting on July 20, 1953, the husband paid the wife any maintenance either in respect of herself or the child."

We were invited to go behind that finding on the strength of an answer given by the wife, according to the note, but in view of the way in which these answers have been elicited, and not overlooking the fact that in the court below the husband gave no evidence on the matter, in my opinion, it is impossible to do so at this stage. By their answer to question (iii)

"The justices considered that the wife left home rather on a consensual basis than because of the words and conduct of her husband and that there was for that reason no constructive desertion", and they amplify that in their answer to question (iii) (a) by saying

"The justices considered that the wife's evidence showed that the parting was on a friendly basis. The husband also stated that they agreed to separate. The justices accepted this evidence and therefore found that the husband had not constructively deserted the wife."

That being so, and there being evidence to support that finding, clearly the wife was not entitled to maintenance from her husband save in the event of there being an agreement, express or implied, that the husband would maintain her. That is clear from Baker v. Baker (3). In answer to question (iii) (b),

"The justices found that there was no agreement, express or implied, that the husband should pay maintenance for the support of the wife and/or the child. They considered that there was no evidence before them which could support a finding that there was such an agreement."

Again, there was evidence to support that finding, and, in my opinion, that would have been the end of the wife's case of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her, had there been no question of the maintenance of a child. I put it in that form because it is important to remember what was said by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Kinnane v. Kinnane (6) (ante, p. 1146):

"... I reject the argument that an order cannot be made in favour of the wife for the maintenance of the wife unless it is founded on wilful refusal to provide reasonable maintenance for her, or, put the other way, that, if the only finding is that there has been wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the infant children whom the husband is legally liable to maintain, no order for maintenance of the wife can be made. I do not think that is the law. It may be that the amount which a court thinks reasonable as an award in favour of a wife may depend on whether the neglect has been of the wife or of the children or both, but, in my opinion, the right to make an order is established when the justices are satisfied that any one of the complaints set out in the Act of 1895, s. 4, is proved."

There is an infant child whom, there is no question, the husband is legally liable to maintain. Furthermore, no payments have been made by the husband in respect of that child. I agree that, to prove wilful neglect to maintain, it is not sufficient merely to show that the liability to maintain has not actually been carried out. It is clear from Jones v. Jones (7) and a number of cases up to Morton v. Morton (2) that wilful neglect imports some element of matrimonial misconduct. The justices have found that the husband has wilfully neglected to maintain the child, and, indeed, the wife. No payment has been made by the husband, and no attempt has been made by him to justify that. It is true there was some reference to a doubt as to paternity, but that was raised, according to him, by the wife herself, whether or not as a taunt to him is not clear, but he never put that forward, as I read the evidence, as in any way exonerating him from liability to maintain the child, and, therefore, in my opinion, there was material on which the justices could find that he had been guilty of wilful neglect in that regard.

The only question that remains, therefore, is the question of quantum. The order was made for £2 10s. The statutory maximum for the order in respect of the child's maintenance is now 30s., and, therefore, I agree that this order should be reduced in the way in which LORD MERRIMAN, P., has suggested.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: We pointed out [ante, p. 1256] that we would give the justices an opportunity to be heard about costs in view of the waste of public money, both parties being legally aided, owing to the default of the justices. But they have written to say that they did not intend to defy the court, and that they did not realise, owing to a misconception of the rules, that they had to give detailed reasons for their decision. I merely point out that although, perhaps, justices and their clerks are not to be expected to read month by month the law reports, a pointed reference to Sullivan v. Sullivan (8) about the duty of justices and their clerks is contained in, inter alia, STONE'S JUSTICES' MANUAL, 85th ed., p. 1122, n. However, we do not think it necessary to say any more, although it is owing to the difficulties created by their default that recourse to a second hearing before us has been occasioned. We do not think it necessary to make any other order as to costs than that both sides shall tax under their certificates.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Beachcroft & Co., agents for Curwen & Co., Workington (for the husband); Speechly, Mumford & Craig, agents for Paisley, Falcon & Highet, Workington (for the wife).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re HOUSE PROPERTY AND INVESTMENT CO., LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), November 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 1953.]

Company—Winding-up—Voluntary winding-up—Assignment of lease for value—Permitted assignment—Future performance of covenants—Landlord's right to have sufficient assets of company set aside to meet future rent and provide for performance of other covenants.

Where a solvent company, having resolved to be wound-up voluntarily, has assigned for value a lease which is beneficial to the assignee, the assignment being a permitted one, there is no absolute right to have a fund set aside out of the assets of the company to answer its liabilities under its covenants in the lease. The landlord's remedy in such a case is to prove in the winding-up.

James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman ([1936] Ch. 216), applied. Elphinstone (Lord) v. Monkland Iron & Coal Co. (1886) (11 App. Cas. 332), distinguished.

FOR THE COMPANIES ACT, 1948, ss. 302, 316, 317, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 3, pp. 690, 697, 698.

Cases referred to:

- (1) James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman, [1936] Ch. 216; 105 L.J.Ch. 70; 154 L.T. 113; Digest Supp.
- (2) Elphinstone (Lord) v. Monkland Iron & Coal Co., (1886), 11 App. Cas. 332; 10 Digest 1000, 6948.
- (3) Gooch v. London Banking Assn., (1885), 32 Ch.D. 41; 10 Digest 1000, 6947.
- (4) Hardy v. Fothergill, (1888), 13 App. Cas. 351; 58 L.J.Q.B. 44; 59 L.T. 273; 53 J.P. 36; 4 Digest 250, 2385.
- (5) Re Panther Lead Co., [1896] 1 Ch. 978; 65 L.J.Ch. 499; 10 Digest 935, 6414.
- (6) Re Midland Coal, Coke & Iron Co., Craig's Claim, [1895] 1 Ch. 267; 64 L.J.Ch. 279; 71 L.T. 705; 10 Digest 1057, 7391.
- (7) Ex p. Waters, Re Hoyle, (1873), 8 Ch. App. 562; 28 L.T. 757; 4 Digest 259, 2453.
- (8) Metropolis Estates Co., Ltd. v. Wilde, [1940] 3 All E.R. 522; [1940] 2 K.B. 536; 109 L.J.K.B. 982; 163 L.T. 192; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) Re New Oriental Bank Corpn. (No. 2), [1895] 1 Ch. 753; 64 L.J.Ch. 439; sub nom. Re New Oriental Bank Corpn., Ltd. Ex p. Hong Kong Land Investment & Agency Co., Ltd., 72 L.T. 419; 10 Digest 935, 6413.
- (10) Re London & Colonial Co., Horsey's Claim, (1868), L.R. 5 Eq. 561; 37 L.J.Ch. 393; 18 L.T. 103; 10 Digest 935, 6411.
- (11) Re Telegraph Construction Co., (1870), L.R. 10 Eq. 384; 22 L.T. 649; sub nom. Telegraph Construction & Maintenance Co., Ltd. & Reduced, Ex p. Enderby's Trustees, 39 L.J.Ch. 723; 9 Digest 164, 967.
- (12) Oppenheimer v. British & Foreign Exchange & Investment Bank, (1877), 6 Ch.D. 744; 46 L.J.Ch. 882; 37 L.T. 629; 10 Digest 1000, 6946.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS in the voluntary winding-up of a company.

The applicant, Reginald Moses Phillips, was the freeholder of property, known as the Royal Arcade, No. 28, Old Bond Street and 12, Albemarle Street, London, W.1, which comprised fifteen shops, with offices, basement storage place and toilet accommodation for each shop, and first floor showrooms at each end of the arcade. The applicant's title to the property was at all material times an absolute title under the Land Registration Act, 1925.

By a lease (referred to hereinafter as "the lease"), dated Mar. 29, 1933, and made between the applicant, of the first part, certain mortgagees, of the second part, and London Freehold and Leasehold Property Co., Ltd., hereinafter called "the property company", of the third part, in consideration of a premium of £15,000 the applicant, with the consent of the mortgagees, demised the property to the property company for the term of ninety years from Mar. 25, 1933, subject to and with the benefit of the existing leases therein specified, at a yearly rent of £3,500 for the first year, £4,000 for the second year, £4,500 for the third year, and £5,000 for the remainder of the term. The lease contained covenants by the lessee, inter alia, to pay the rent and rates, to repair, to insure, and to leave for registration with the applicant's solicitor every assignment of the demised premises or of the lease within twenty-one days after the execution or date of such assignment. There was a proviso for re-entry in the event of a breach of covenant. After the lease was granted the mortgage was paid off and the property was discharged therefrom.

The property company was a subsidiary of the House Property and Investment Co., Ltd. On Mar. 2, 1936, the property company resolved, by special resolution, that it be wound-up voluntarily, and a liquidator was appointed for the purpose of the winding-up. By an instrument of transfer of lease, dated Mar. 16, 1936, the property comprised in the lease was transferred by the property company and its liquidator to the parent company (referred to hereinafter as "the investment company") for the residue of the term granted by the lease. On July 1, 1937, the applicant, as landlord, made certain claims in the winding-up of the property company in respect of its liability as lessee under the lease, one of the claims being to have a sum set aside which, when invested in consols, would with half-yearly rests be sufficient to produce the rent falling due during the residue of the term of the lease. By cl. 1 of a deed (referred to hereinafter as "the supplemental deed"), dated Feb. 17, 1938, and made between the applicant, of the first part, the property company and its liquidator, of the second part, and the investment company, of the third part, in consideration of the sum of £105 paid by the investment company to the applicant to cover his costs in the matter and of the covenants by the investment company thereafter contained, the applicant withdrew the claim made by him in the winding-up of the property company and released the property company and its liquidator from the covenants and agreements on the part of the property company contained in the lease and all liability thereunder, provided that the release was not to affect the said covenants and agreements so far as they were real covenants and agreements binding on the premises demised by the lease and the persons from time to time possessed thereof, but was only to affect the personal liability of the property company and its liquidator thereunder. Clause 1 also provided that the release was not to prejudice or affect the applicant's right to re-enter on the demised premises for non-payment of the rent reserved by the lease, or for the breach of any of the covenants, agreements, or conditions contained in the lease, except so far as the said covenants and agreements were thereafter modified. By cl. 2, the investment company covenanted with the applicant that, as from Dec. 25, 1937, and during the residue of the term granted by the lease, that company would pay the rent reserved by the lease and perform and observe all the covenants and agreements contained in the lease and on the part of the lessee to be performed and observed, but, as regards the said covenants and agreements, as the same were modified by cl. 4 thereof. The modifications in cl. 4 were not material for the purpose of the application. By cl. 5 it was provided that the lease should be read in conjunction with the supplemental deed and (as modified by cl. 4) should, as from Dec. 25, 1937, and throughout the residue of the term thereby granted, operate and have effect as between and be binding on the applicant and the investment company, as though the same had originally been entered into between them instead of between the applicant and the property company. The supplemental deed was duly noted on the register at the Land Registry.

A In June, 1951, the investment company delivered to the Registrar of Companies a declaration of solvency under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 283. The declaration showed that its surplus assets, after satisfying all liabilities, were estimated at £2,207,857. On July 19, 1951, the investment company resolved by special resolution that it should be wound-up voluntarily and, by ordinary resolution, that the respondent, Norman Percival Seaton, and the former respondent, the late Henry Morris Parry, be appointed liquidators for the purposes of the winding-up. In the winding-up the investment company sold and assigned its leasehold interest in the demised property to the respondent, David Bluston, the sale being completed on May 7, 1952. The price paid for the assignment was £46,000. The total rents received from the sub-lessees amounted, at the time, to £9,481 10s. On May 13, 1952, notice of the assignment was given to the applicant's solicitors. Since the assignment the respondent, Bluston, had tendered the rent to the applicant's solicitors, but it was not accepted. On receiving a notice from the liquidator to submit a proof, the applicant issued the originating summons whereby he asked, inter alia: (i) whether, as the lessor of the demised property under the lease, he was entitled to have sufficient assets of the investment company set aside to meet all future and other rent under the lease and supplemental deed and to provide for the performance of the covenants on the part of the company under the lease and supplemental deed; and (ii) whether the proper amount to be so set aside was £200,000, or any and what other sum. By paras. (v) and (vi) of the summons, he asked for the following relief, in the event of the answer to question (i) being in the negative: (v) that the time for proving in the winding-up of the company in respect of its liabilities under the lease and supplemental deed be extended; (vi) that the liquidator might be directed not to proceed with any distribution in the winding-up of the company pursuant to the Companies (Winding-Up) Rules, 1949, r. 106, pending adjudication on and disposal of the applicant's proof without retaining in hand the sum aforesaid, or some other sum approved by the court, earmarked only for the satisfaction of the applicant's proof. By para. (vii) he asked, in the same event, whether, on the receipt by the Registrar of Companies of the account and either of the returns referred to in the Companies Act, 1948, s. 290 (4), or, alternatively, on the dissolution of the company, the applicant would be entitled to re-enter on the demised property either under the power of re-entry contained in the lease or otherwise (subject nevertheless to any relief against such forfeiture which might be granted to any person by any competent court).

G Millard Tucker, Q.C., R. J. T. Gibson and R. R. D. Phillips for the applicant.
Bell, Q.C., and Raymond Walton for the liquidator.
Goff, Q.C., and L. J. M. Smith for the assignee.

H ROXBURGH, J., stated the facts, and continued: The difficult questions that I have to determine at present are solely questions of law. The short point is that, if the House Property and Investment Co., Ltd., which I shall refer to as "the company", is allowed to dissolve, the applicant will lose something of value. That is indisputable. The declaration of solvency, which was filed by the company in June, 1951, showed that its surplus assets, after satisfying all liabilities, were estimated at £2,207,857. In its liquidation the company sold and assigned its leasehold interest in the Royal Arcade to the respondent, David Bluston (whom I shall refer to as "the assignee"). I regard that as a feature of cardinal importance. This is not a case of a lease which was onerous to the lessee. It was not a lease which any liquidator would want to disclaim, such as are some of the leases in cases which were cited to me. Nor is this a case where the liquidator remains in beneficial occupation, as happened in some of the cases. Nor is it a case where the original lessee remains in possession and is the only person liable on the covenants in the lease. On the contrary, it is a case where the company has assigned the lease for a very substantial consideration. Though no one doubts that the applicant has the benefit of the covenants of the company in liquidation, equally there is no doubt that he cannot get the rent twice over.

[HIS LORDSHIP read the questions asked by the summons, and continued:] The first question is: Has the applicant a right in law or equity to have a fund set aside? If he has, that is an end of the case except as to the amount of the fund. If he has not, then the next question is whether I have jurisdiction to set aside such a fund. If I have not, that would be an end of the point. The third question is: Supposing that the applicant has no absolute right in law or equity to have the fund set aside, but that the court has jurisdiction to set it aside, ought the court to set it aside? If the answer to that question is that it ought to set it aside, then the court would have to proceed to the assessment of what is the actual sum to be set aside, and how it is to be set aside. I want to dispose of some minor matters before I come to the main question. If a fund is to be set aside, I have indicated all the points that arise. If a fund is not to be set aside, the summons asks that the time for proving be extended, and that sufficient sums should be kept in hand until the proof has been finally adjudicated on. As regards those two claims for relief, the liquidator has at no stage raised any opposition, and, therefore, if my decision should be that a fund ought not to be set aside, it follows as a matter of course that questions (v) and (vi) of the summons will be answered in the way in which the applicant seeks to have them answered. Question (vii), however, stands on quite a different footing. There is one difficulty which will make it impossible for me to proceed at this stage, if my answer to the first three questions which I have stated is in the negative. The applicant is not bound to prove. I do not know whether he will prove or not, but his course of action in that regard might have some bearing on the solution of question (vii). I take the view that the assignee is entitled to know what the applicant proposes to do about that before he is called on to defend his position against a claim to re-enter which might compel him to ask for relief. Therefore, it is clear that I cannot proceed today with the questions which arise if my answer to question (i) is in the negative. That is the question which I have to consider, and it is a difficult question and one that has been debated for many years.

James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal, is the only recent case which has any bearing on my problem. That case is, in some respects, similar to the present one, but it took a course which could not be described as usual, and it has been argued, with great force, that, by reason of the course it took, I ought not to treat it as having the authority which I should have been bound to give it, if it had taken another course. It is also said—and I will return to that question later—that it is unsatisfactory for another reason, namely, that it is at variance with Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron & Coal Co. (2), a decision of the House of Lords, and it is possible, though by no means certain, that that decision of the House of Lords was not cited to the Court of Appeal. The facts in James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1) were as follows. In September, 1925, certain premises were demised under two leases to a company, and each of the leases contained a personal covenant on the part of the company, as tenants, to pay the rent during the currency of the lease. In January, 1933, notice was given by the company to determine the leases, with the result that they would come to an end at Michaelmas, 1938. In January, 1933, the premises were assigned to another tenant. So far, the only distinction between the facts of that case and those of the present case seem to be that the assignment, in the present case, took place after the commencement of the liquidation, and, in the earlier case, before the liquidation. I cannot see that that can be a material distinction in law. After that the facts differ from those of the present case. In April, 1933, the company went into voluntary liquidation, and the liquidator distributed the assets without making provision for future rent due under the leases. In an action by the lessors against the liquidator for a declaration that, in distributing the assets without making provision for the liabilities of the company under the two leases, he had acted wrongfully and negligently and in breach of his duty as liquidator, and for damages, the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of BENNETT, J., that the liability was one which ought to have been admitted to proof by the liquidator under s. 261 of the Companies Act, 1929, and that he had committed a breach of his statutory duty under s. 247 of the Act to pay or provide for the liabilities of the company in not taking steps to have the value of the contingent liability ascertained, and that he was liable in damages to the plaintiffs.

The reference to "contingent liability" leads me to make one observation about a point which counsel for the applicant has stressed, and, if I may say so, rightly stressed. It may be doubted whether the words "contingent liability" which occur in some of the cases are quite an accurate description of the position. In fact, they are not, though it is a convenient phrase. The position, as I understand it, is this. The landlord can recover the rent after an assignment either from the lessee or the assignee, from the lessee because of privity of contract and from the assignee by reason of privity of estate. When I say "assignee", I mean "permitted assignee", and that is not unimportant, as will appear, I think, when I come to deal with the Elphinstone case (2). What the position would be if the lease were assigned without consent, I need not explore, because it did not happen in this case, but it is, undoubtedly, true that the position might be different, because, supposing the landlord was objecting to the assignment, then he could not safely accept rent from the assignee without giving up his right to object to the assignment. At least, I should not think that he could, but I have not fully considered the point. Therefore, it does not seem to me to follow that what I am saying about permitted assignments is necessarily true about non-permitted assignments, and I am talking about permitted assignments. There is no doubt in my mind that the landlord is bound to accept the rent from a permitted assignee if he tenders it. He cannot refuse to accept the rent and say that he likes the original lessee's money better. In other words, the tender of the rent discharges the original lessee from that amount of rent. If the assignee does not tender the rent, then it is common knowledge that the landlord can elect whether he will proceed against the original lessee or the assignee or both, but he cannot get the rent more than once. I agree with counsel for the applicant that to call that a "contingent liability" is, perhaps, not accurate, but I must confess that I do not know of any short formula which adequately describes that liability, but a liability it certainly is.

In James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), counsel for the liquidator contended that the lessors had no right to insist on anything being done in regard to their claim before a distribution. That was the point which the liquidator had to establish in order to succeed. The Court of Appeal heard him fully. It is not clear how far they heard the respondents, the lessors. There is a passage in the interlocutory observation by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., which would suggest that they did not hear them at all. I cannot say how far the court had heard the respondents when LORD HANWORTH, M.R., made his interposition, which is in no sense a binding judgment on any court—a fact which has been much pressed on me by counsel for the applicant—but I must read it in order to explain what happened and how the case proceeded. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1936] Ch. 227):

"We are prepared to hold in your favour that the judgment of BENNETT, J., ought to be affirmed, that the liability was one which was provable in the course of the liquidation, and which ought to have been admitted to proof by the liquidator, and the liquidator ought to have taken steps to have the value of the contingent liability ascertained, and that therefore there is ground for affirming the judgment of BENNETT, J., who has affirmed the liability against the liquidator and ordered an inquiry as to what is the quantum of that liability. If you want to go further and to say that it is plain, quite apart from what may be revealed in the inquiry, that the amount of the rent ought to have been set aside, we should have to hear you, because we are not prepared to say that the decision in Gooch v. London Banking Assn. (3) would apply in all cases and that the liquidator was wrong in not setting aside sufficient assets to provide for the further rent and other liabilities. That would be a possible course; but it is not one which can be affirmed as the necessary right on the part of the landlord. It is a possible protection which could have been granted him, but it should not be taken as an absolute right."

As far as I can see, the liability in that case did not differ one iota from the liability in the present case. In answer to that interposition, junior counsel for the respondents said (ibid.):

"I do not think we need carry the matter any further, because MAUGHAM, L.J., put the point that the court in assessing the damages cannot shut its eyes to what has happened in the present case."

That is a point on which that case is markedly distinct from the present one, for in the present case the assignee tendered the rent and it was not accepted, while in that case the assignee did not tender the rent and, as far as I can make out, was not likely to do so. That is the point of the observation by junior counsel.

As I have said, I do not regard the interlocutory observation of LORD HANWORTH, M.R., as in any way binding on anyone, but LORD HANWORTH deals with the matter in his judgment and, in my view, it is not possible to say that it is obiter, and I will give my reason. It was essential for the Court of Appeal to decide that the liquidator had a duty to do something, otherwise the appeal had to be allowed. Therefore, they did decide that he should, at least, have admitted the claim to proof. If that is so, then the setting aside of sufficient assets to provide for the future rent cannot possibly be the only remedy in all circumstances, because that would, ex hypothesi, exclude the admission of proof. Therefore, I cannot treat it as obiter, though it is true to say that, as the question of the right to have a fund set aside was not further argued in the circumstances which I have indicated, the case is not nearly so conclusive of the matter as it would have been if the decision had been made after the hearing of full argument on both points.

In his judgment LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (ibid., 228):

"In my opinion this claim by the landlords against their tenants was clearly a liability in respect of which they could have brought in a proof."

That he says quite clearly. He says it was a contingent liability. I have already made an observation about that phrase, but he goes on (ibid.):

"It was a contingent liability, for the assignees might have satisfied the liability for the rent, but it was a right which they had against the company who were their tenants under the demises and who were liable to them under the contract to pay the rent."

That is exactly the present case. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., continued (ibid., 229):

"That being so, if the liquidator had done his duty, he would have seen that a claim was brought in. Now what was the claim? It is suggested that it was one which it was impossible to ascertain, and that under those circumstances it was so contingent that it would not be possible to put a money value upon it. To my mind the dicta in Hardy v. Fothergill (4) are directly contrary to any such suggestion. I need not refer to the various passages which were mentioned in the course of the argument, but LORD SELBORNE, I think, makes it quite plain that there are cases where such contingent debts are capable of valuation. He says (13 App. Cas. 360): 'There may be contracts, such, for example, as a promise to marry (not broken), or a covenant not to molest, or not to carry on a particular trade within certain limits, etc.; which on a fair interpretation of these words ought to be excluded as having a different object from the payment of money in any contingency; although if they were broken a jury might award damages for their breach. I must guard myself against being supposed to lay down any rule applicable to cases of that kind, or to any others in which an injunction or specific performance would be the most proper remedy. But the present is not a case of that kind. A contract to indemnify against the non-performance of covenants in a lease, such as covenants to pay rent, or to keep the demised premises in repair, or to deliver them up in a proper state at the end of the term is, to all intents and purposes, "an obligation or possibility of an obligation to pay money or money's worth" on the breach of any such covenant: it is "an engagement to pay, or capable of resulting in payment of, money or money's worth", if the contingency against which the indemnity is provided should occur. Unless excluded . . . on the ground that the statute contemplates those liabilities only which are capable of being fairly valued, and that this particular liability is not capable of being fairly valued, it is, and must be included in those words.'

D LORD HANWORTH, M.R., then continued (ibid., 230)—and I regard this of great importance:

"It is true, as [counsel for the liquidator] said, the court were there considering words contained in a passage in a statute which does not find its place in the statute that we are considering at the present moment, but it is abundantly plain that LORD SELBORNE in the words which I have rather cursorily referred to intended to indicate that a contingent liability to pay rent was a contingent liability which was capable of being fairly valued. LORD MACNAGHTEN deals with the matter in more precise terms. He says (13 App. Cas. 369): 'It was said that the trustee would have done a foolish thing if he had tried to estimate it, and that if he had put a value upon it, the court on appeal must have set the estimate aside. I cannot agree in this view. A covenant such as that which has given rise to the liability as between the lessor and the lessee is not uncommon. It is not an uncommon thing for leases to be assigned, and for the assignee to undertake the assignor's liability. I cannot think that a person of practical experience in dealing with leasehold property would have any great difficulty in making a fair estimate of the value of such a liability when he was once made acquainted with the circumstances of the particular case.' It appears therefore that there was here a liability under the demise which could have been estimated and was a proper subject for estimation, and since Hardy v. Fothergill (4) one must look at such contingent liabilities as provable in a liquidation or in a bankruptcy. ROMER, J., in Re Panther Lead Co. (5), said ([1896] 1 Ch. 985): 'Since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill (4) the old cases as to proof by a lessor to a company in liquidation have to be re-considered, as was pointed out by LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Midland Coal, Coke & Iron Co., Craig's Claim (6); and certainly it will be the duty of the court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its lease in all cases like the present where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss on the footing of the lease being determined or treated as determined'—he makes observations that coincide with what I have said as to Hardy

v. Fothergill (4)—‘it will be the duty of the court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its lease in all cases like the present where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss.’ Of course, in some of the cases, as in Gooch v. London Banking Asscn. (3), the liability which was said to rest upon the liquidator was that he ought to have set aside sufficient assets to provide for future rent and other liabilities under the lease. That may be so in proper cases, but it does not appear that that course is one which would be followed in all cases, and the liquidator would have the opportunity of going to the court if he was in difficulty as to what ought to be done.”

ROMER, L.J., agreed. MAUGHAM, L.J., said ([1936] Ch. 234):

“There is, in my opinion, no doubt whatever that [the liquidator] was guilty of negligence in not making some provision for the liability of the company under the two leases in question. We have heard a long argument as to what the nature of the provision should have been. For my part I am satisfied that since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill (4) it has been impossible to doubt but that a company in liquidation, and a fortiori a perfectly solvent company in liquidation, is bound to submit to the assessment under the Companies Act of its contingent liability to a landlord in such a case as the present, that is to say, in a case in which the company being the original lessee is no longer interested in the leases. The leases having been assigned to third parties, the question is whether the landlords are entitled, under s. 261 of the Act of 1929, to prove for the debt as one payable on a contingency or to prove as for a claim against the company, ‘present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages’, arising by reason of the fact that the company has covenanted to pay the rent to the landlords during the continuance of the leases. I have said that in such a case as the present in my opinion there is no longer any doubt about the right of proof; but I am not forgetting that where the company is itself the tenant at the time of the liquidation considerable difficulty may arise . . . The liquidator may desire to surrender and the lessor may be unwilling to let him do so, or the liquidator may be unwilling to surrender though the lessor may be willing to accept the surrender on terms as to proof or otherwise. Those circumstances do not exist here, and as a matter of fact since the Act of 1929 will less often arise—for under s. 267 of the Act of 1929, there is, what there was not previously to the Act, a right of disclaimer when a company is in liquidation. In my opinion, in the case which we have here, where the company is no longer interested in the leases, there is no very serious difficulty in estimating the amount for which the lessors are entitled to prove; and all the Lords who sat in the important case of Hardy v. Fothergill (4) expressed, as I think, opinions which would at any rate cover this comparatively simple case. I will mention that LORD SELBORNE referred to a dictum of MELLISH, L.J., in Ex p. Waters, Re Hoyle (7) . . .”

I do not think I need read further from that passage, because it is only dealing with the right to prove, about which MAUGHAM, L.J., said: “. . . in my opinion there is no longer any doubt about the right of proof.” But towards the end of his judgment MAUGHAM, L.J., said (ibid., 235):

“Accordingly in my opinion we have not here to consider whether the course taken in Gooch’s case (3) and, I may add, in other cases, of declining to allow the final winding-up of the company and the distribution of all its assets, without making provision for the landlord’s claim under his lease, was the right one. I am content to agree with the view expressed by my brethren that here was a claim which could properly be proved under s. 261 of the [Act of 1929].”

This is a decision binding on me (though I am happy to be bound by it) that a landlord can prove in the liquidation of the original lessee company in respect of the original lessee's original covenants in a lease which has been assigned. In the particular circumstances of the particular case, he proves for the value of the original lessee's covenants the benefit of which he will lose by the original lessee's dissolution; not, of course, for the rent, because, if the assignee duly pays the rent, which he will do if the lease is beneficial, if only to avoid forfeiture, no rent could ever be recovered from the original lessee, and, of course, precisely the same applies to the other covenants. If the premises are duly kept in repair, as they undoubtedly will be by the assignee if the lease is beneficial, if only to avoid forfeiture, then no sum in cash would ever become payable by the original lessee. I certainly do not accept the position that a landlord can refuse rent from, or the performance of the other covenants by the assignee, and at the same time assert a claim against the original lessee. I am not saying this in order to preclude argument as to what may flow from an interim refusal to accept some rent in the present case, but I am dealing with it as a matter of principle to see what the obligation of the original lessee was. It seems to me quite clear that, so far as the particular sum which has been tendered is concerned, the landlord cannot now sue the company in liquidation, and this would apply, in my judgment, to each and every payment of rent, or each and every other covenant, if the assignee had tendered the rent or had been willing to perform the covenants, but had been prevented from so doing by the landlord. In other words, it is not true, in my judgment, that the landlord has a right to elect whether he will accept the rent from one or the other. If it is tendered by the assignee and if he does not accept it, in my judgment he loses all rights in respect of that particular payment of rent. I rather thought that counsel for the applicant was suggesting that the landlord had a complete option in all circumstances in the matter. That view I certainly cannot indorse.

It was agreed between the parties in this case that the sum for which a proof could be lodged is the difference, at the date of valuation, between the market value of this particular lease with the benefit of the original lessee's covenants, and the value of the same lease without the benefit of the original lessee's covenants. But the applicant wants to know whether he is relegated to proof. He says, through his counsel, that he has an absolute right to have a fund set aside. If it is an absolute right, it prevails in all circumstances, that is, whenever a company which is an original lessee has assigned a lease for value and thereafter wants to be dissolved. The applicant will, I am sure, not take it amiss if I say, while entirely acquitting him of any intention to abuse anything or anybody in this case, that that would set a precedent, which, in my judgment, would open the way to intolerable abuses.

Counsel for the liquidator, on the other hand, goes altogether the other way, and I am not prepared to decide in his favour on the grounds which he mainly advanced. I will deal at once with his ingenious point. He first read s. 302 of the Companies Act, 1948, which begins:

“Subject to the provisions of this Act as to preferential payments, the property of a company shall, on its winding-up . . .”

He pointed out that there is a slight change in phraseology as compared with certain earlier statutes [see s. 186 (1) of the Act of 1908], but I doubt whether the change is entitled to the weight which he sought to place on it. Section 302 runs on:

“ . . . be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and, subject to such application, shall, unless the articles otherwise provide, be distributed among the members according to their rights and interests in the company.”

It is noticed that the phrase there is “distributed”. Counsel then referred to

s. 365, which provides that the Lord Chancellor may make general rules. Section 365 (2)—and this is the important part of the section—is:

“All rules made under this section shall be judicially noticed and shall have effect as if enacted by this Act.”

Therefore, the rules appear to be given statutory force. It was not contended, and, I think, it probably could not be contended, that any rule of the character which I am about to read is ultra vires. A

The Companies (Winding-Up) Rules, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 330), r. 106 (1) is as follows:

“Subject to the provisions of the Act, and unless otherwise ordered by the court, the liquidator in any winding-up may from time to time fix a certain day . . . on or before which the creditors of the company are to prove their debts or claims, and to establish any title they may have to priority under s. 319 of the Act, or to be excluded from the benefit of any distribution made before such debts are proved, or as the case may be from objecting to such distribution.” B

It is to be noted that the words used are “or to be excluded”, and not “or be excluded”, and I think that may be the crisis. Counsel for the applicant submitted that the words of that rule do not apply to a claim of the nature which he is putting forward, and that “prove,” in the context, does not mean prove in the ordinary sense. I am disinclined to accept that submission, as will appear from a later part of this judgment. He also submits that the word “distribution” means distribution amongst creditors and does not include a distribution among shareholders. I am disinclined to accept that view, but what he further submits, and what I think is conclusive on this point, is that r. 106 (1) opens with the words: “Subject to the provisions of the Act, and unless otherwise ordered by the court . . .” I take the view, and it is a considered view, that those opening words apply to the whole of r. 106 (1). As I have pointed out, the words are not: “or be excluded”. They are: “or to be excluded”. That is to say, they refer to something that is to be in the notice in which the creditors are called on to prove. The liquidator has to give notice of a date on or before which the creditors are to prove or to be excluded, and I feel no doubt that the whole of that machinery is subject to the opening words: “Subject to the provisions of the Act, and unless otherwise ordered by the court”. I have no doubt that, in such a case as this, the court would invariably make such an order preventing the applicant from being excluded until an interesting point of law which he has raised had been determined by the highest tribunal to which anybody desired to resort, and, therefore, my conclusion is that the rule neither helps nor hinders the applicant. C
D
E
F

I am well aware of the danger of attaching undue importance to the interlocutory observations of a judge, but they are sometimes helpful, not only in the course of the argument, but for future generations, even though sometimes—and I shall come back to that point—they may not be wholly accurate. It is, however, clear that they are not judgments binding on any future court. In his interlocutory observations in James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1936] Ch. 227) that setting aside a fund would be a possible course, and I am certainly not prepared to say that that observation, though interlocutory, is wrong. I think, however, that an occasion for its exercise will seldom, if ever, arise in future. G
H

There have been other changes of relevance in the history of this interesting matter besides the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill (4). In James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), MAUGHAM, L.J., pointed ([1936] Ch. 234) to the right of disclaimer, which was new in 1929, long after most of the cases on which counsel for the applicant in the present case relied. Then there is the interesting decision of the Court of Appeal in Metropolis Estates Co., Ltd. v.

Wilde (8), to which counsel for the applicant referred, and, though I venture to suggest that he has misconstrued it, it is, I think, an important point in the history of this subject. The position, as I understand it now—and I realise that part of what I am now saying will be only obiter dictum—is really simple. If the liquidator requires beneficial occupation in the sense in which that term is defined by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J. ([1895] 1 Ch. 757) in Re New Oriental Bank Corpn. (No. 2) (9), i.e., either for his own occupation or so that he can obtain a rent from the premises from a sub-tenant, then he has to pay the rent. There is no question then of any proof or of the setting aside of any fund, and ex hypothesi he cannot close the liquidation while that state of affairs continues. He must somehow get rid of his beneficial occupation before he can close the liquidation. Under the present law what he would do is so obvious that I cannot see how any other position is likely to arise. If the lease is onerous, he will endeavour, probably with success, to disclaim it. If the lease is beneficial, i.e., if there is a value in it, he will, certainly with success, sell it. If my judgment stands in this case, there does not seem likely ever to be in this connection a future occasion for setting aside, but I do not wish to hold that there may not be such a case. I cannot think of one, but one cannot think of everything. The conclusion that I am about to come to is, therefore, that there is no absolute right but that it is a possible course, and, if it is a possible course, I shall have to consider whether it is a proper course in this case.

First, I desire to deal with Re New Oriental Bank Corpn. (No. 2) (9) and Metropolis Estates Co., Ltd. v. Wilde (8), which are, in my judgment, most important, though I feel that counsel for the applicant, in his argument, misconstrued them. In Re New Oriental Bank Corpn. (No. 2) (9), which was decided in 1895, the corporation, the original lessee, took possession of certain premises and paid the rent until May, 1892, but on June 23, 1892, it passed an extraordinary resolution in favour of voluntary winding-up, and on July 5, 1892, an order was made continuing the voluntary winding-up under supervision. The corporation was insolvent. The liquidator remained in possession of the premises and paid the rent until October, 1893, when he gave up possession and handed the keys of the premises to the lessors' agents, but, inasmuch as no agreement could be arrived at as to the terms on which the corporation should be free from further liability under the lease, possession was only accepted without prejudice to the rights of the lessors in respect of the future liabilities of the corporation under the lease. It is to be noted that that was a case in which there was no assignment. Indeed, I think it is true to say, with one possible exception, that in all the cases except James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), there was no assignment in the sense which is material in the present case. Re New Oriental Bank Corpn. (No. 2) (9) is a case in which, presumably, a disclaimer would have been made under the present law, but that was not possible in 1895. The crisis of the judgment, in my opinion, is in these words of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J. ([1895] 1 Ch. 757):

“In my judgment, if a company which is in liquidation remains in beneficial occupation of a lease—that is to say, if it occupies the demised premises, or takes the rent, and thus obtains the benefit of the lease . . .”

—that, if I may say so, is the signification in which I use the phrase “beneficial occupation” in this judgment—

“the court ought to do its very best to make the company pay the rent in full, and not merely a dividend.”

To that principle no exception can, in my judgment, possibly be taken, and that, in my judgment, is the principle which was applied in the Metropolis Estates case (8), to which I am going to refer next. Unfortunately, an inaccurate expression was used by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in an interlocutory observation, as his judgment, in which he said exactly what he did mean, shows. In the course of argument he said (ibid., 756): “If a lease is subsisting when the lessee is adjudicated a bankrupt, how can the lessor prove immediately?" Of course, he did not mean it quite like that, because, if he had meant that, he could not have gone on to say (ibid.): "He cannot have both the rent and possession". In his interlocutory observation he overlooked the fact that a lease would still be subsisting if it had been assigned for value. Of course, no one can say that it is not still subsisting, but it is certain from the context that the judge had no intention whatever of uttering a dictum by way of interlocutory observation about a position which did not arise in that case, namely, the position where there had been an assignment for value. Unfortunately, that is perpetuated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Metropolis Estates Co., Ltd. v. Wilde (8), because LUXMOORE, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, took his citation from the interlocutory observation and not from the body of the judgment.

In Metropolis Estates Co., Ltd. v. Wilde (8) the facts were as follows. On Dec. 9, 1935, the defendant, Wilde, took a lease of a flat for a term of seven years, from Dec. 25, 1935, at a yearly rent of £200, payable quarterly in advance. On Jan. 10, 1936, he was adjudicated bankrupt, and the official receiver was appointed the trustee in the bankruptcy. The defendant did not disclose to the official receiver his interest under the lease of 1935 and, therefore, no steps were taken to disclaim that interest. On June 30, 1937, he obtained his discharge from bankruptcy. On Oct. 27, 1939, the lessors instituted an action in the King's Bench Division against the defendant, claiming £50 in respect of one quarter's rent due in advance on Sept. 29, 1939, under the lease. On Feb. 2, 1940, the official receiver, without obtaining the leave of the court, purported to disclaim the defendant's interest under the lease. The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the Common Serjeant that the defendant's liability to the lessors remained unaffected, because they could not prove in bankruptcy for future rents, and, that being so, his discharge from bankruptcy had no effect with regard to future rents under the lease. The Court of Appeal also held that there had been no valid disclaimer of the lease, because the trustee in bankruptcy had not complied with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 54 (3), in regard to getting the leave of the court. That is important because, again, the matter could not have arisen but for the invalidity of the purported disclaimer. If the trustee had validly disclaimed, then, of course, the case could never have been brought. In that case—unlike a company case—the legal estate of the bankrupt vested in the trustee, the bankrupt remained in beneficial occupation, and neither the trustee nor the bankrupt could be heard to say that there had been an assignment of the premises for value. Therefore, I can find nothing surprising in the decision itself, but it seems to me clear from the judgment as a whole that the court intended to apply the principle enunciated in the judgment in the New Oriental Bank case (9) and not the principle enunciated in certain words in the interlocutory observation of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., though the court did not use the phrase "beneficial occupation", but used the phrase, "existing lease". LUXMOORE, L.J., said ([1940] 3 All E.R. 526):

"The fallacy in this argument is that the premise on which it is based—namely, that the lessors were entitled to prove in Wilde's bankruptcy for all future rent under the lease—is without foundation, for, where a lessor is seeking to prove against a bankrupt lessee's estate in respect of an existing lease, he can only prove for the arrears of rent due and the breaches of covenant which have taken place up to the time of proof: Re New Oriental Bank Corpn. (No. 2) (9)."

In my judgment, the court had picked up the phrase "existing lease" from the interlocutory observation of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J. ([1895] 1 Ch. 756), in Re New Oriental Bank Corpn. (No. 2) (9), but they were intending to apply the doctrine enunciated in the judgment in that case, which, of course, has no application to a case where there has been an assignment of the lease for value. I stress

A the word "value", because I am not considering what would be the position if there was an assignment to a man of straw. No one has ventured to suggest that the assignee in the present case is a man of straw. What I have said may or may not apply to an assignment to a man of straw, but that is not the case which I am considering. I am quite certain in my own mind that the Court of Appeal in the Metropolis Estates case (8) never intended to express any opinion whatever about the quite different problem with which I am confronted. It is, undoubtedly, true that a practice grew up of setting aside a fund in certain analogous cases, though, strangely enough, no case has been cited to me which bears any real resemblance on its facts to the present case, the nearest being James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), in the Court of Appeal in 1936.

B This practice was clearly explained by LINDLEY, L.J., in the judgment of the court in Re Midland Coal, Coke & Iron Co., Craig's Claim (6), and I cannot do better than read what he said on the point, as it is a summary of the position as it then existed and it ends with an important warning. The facts were as follows. Craig, the lessee of certain mines, assigned his leases to a company which covenanted to indemnify him against liability thereunder. The company went into liquidation, and a scheme of arrangement under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, was adopted and approved by the court for forming a new company which should take over the assets and liabilities of the old company, and should pay or satisfy the unsecured creditors of the old company within three months of the approval of the scheme by the court. After the new company was incorporated, the lessee applied in the liquidation to have a sum provided to meet his contingent liability for rents, royalties, and breaches of covenant. LINDLEY, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, said ([1895] 1 Ch. 275):

"First, as regards Mr. Craig's rights against the old company, apart from the scheme."

E After reading s. 158 of the Companies Act, 1862, which corresponds, for the present purposes, with s. 316 of the Act of 1948, he said (ibid.):

F "Notwithstanding the very comprehensive language of this section, GIFFARD, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor, decided in Horsey's Claim (10) that, as it was impossible to put a just estimate on the claim of a landlord to future rent and possible breaches of covenant, he was not entitled to prove against a limited company being wound-up and to receive a dividend on his proof, and this view prevailed until a comparatively recent date."

I may say that that view is no longer possible, because the Court of Appeal in 1936, in James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), decided finally, so far as I am concerned, against that view. Re London & Colonial Co., Horsey's Claim (10), so far as it is based on this ground, is no longer law in this court. LINDLEY, L.J., went on to say (ibid.):

"But after the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Hardy v. Fothergill (4), which must be considered in connection with s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875 [see now s. 317 of the Companies Act, 1948], it is difficult, if not impossible, to say that Mr. Craig could not have had his claim valued and have proved for its value against the old company. Mr. Craig, however, does not really want to do this. What he wants is to enter a claim with a view to have assets of the old company set apart for his indemnity before they are divided amongst the shareholders; or, if he is not in time for that, he asks that the old company may not be formally dissolved so long as he is exposed to liability under his covenants. He bases his claim in this respect on certain decisions in which a lessor of a limited company being wound up or applying for leave to reduce its capital has been held entitled to enter a claim for the amount of rent and royalties which may become due to him in future, and to an injunction to restrain the company from distributing its assets and dissolving without making proper provision for his payment. The cases in which orders to this effect have been made are: Re Telegraph Construction Co. (11), Oppenheimer v. British & Foreign Exchange & Investment Bank (12), Gooch v. London Banking Asscn. (3), and Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron & Coal Co. (2). The last of these cases was in the House of Lords, and the House made an order in favour of the lessor of a limited company which was being wound up voluntarily, and declared that the lessee company was bound to fulfil its future obligations under its lease, and that the liquidators were bound to make due provision for fulfilling such obligations and to set aside assets of the company in their hands for that purpose. It is true that this was a Scottish case, and a case between lessor and lessee; but we see no reason to suppose that there is any difference between English and Scottish law in this respect."

I must confess that that sentence has caused me some embarrassment, because I am going to suggest that there are important differences. I can hardly think that this passage could be regarded as anything more than an obiter dictum at that point. The Elphinstone case (2) is, indeed, the sheet anchor of counsel for the applicant, and I propose later to make a minute analysis of it. LINDLEY, L.J., went on to say (ibid., 276)—and with this, if I may say so, I am wholeheartedly in sympathy:

"The effect, however, of the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill (4) on the right of a lessor to have the assets of a limited company which is being wound up impounded has not yet been judicially determined. The English decisions in favour of his right to enter a claim and have assets impounded to meet it have all proceeded upon the view that the lessor could not prove for any ascertainable sum and be paid a dividend upon it, and on some future occasion those decisions will have to be reconsidered."

Pausing there, so far as my researches have gone that statement, which is, of course, obiter, is wholly accurate. It follows that if the cases were all based on a premise which the Court of Appeal, as a matter of decision, held to be wrong—and the premise has been, as a matter of decision, held to be wrong—then a judge of first instance is not impertinent if he looks anew even at things which have been said in the House of Lords, because, if the whole basis of one court's decision is declared by another court, in a decision which is binding on me, to be false, it is not unreasonable to think that the conclusions derived from the false premise may well be open to legitimate question.

I want to make another point at this stage. In what sense are decisions of the House of Lords binding? They are absolutely binding on every court, including, I think, themselves, in regard to the matter on which the decision is given, or any matter which is not distinguishable. Normally, however, they have a much wider importance. It often becomes material to consider whether a decision of the House of Lords should be applied in a case which can be distinguished, but is analogous. Normally, in such a case a judge hesitates long before disregarding a proposition stated in a speech in the House of Lords. But I think that that normal rule ceases to operate when the basis on which all the earlier law was founded has been destroyed, first, indirectly in Hardy v. Fothergill (4), and, later, positively by the decision of the Court of Appeal in James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), and when there have been such important changes in the whole situation, such as, for instance, the right of disclaimer, which had no application whatever to facts in the days when these broad pronouncements were being enunciated. I think I have spoken with respect to the highest tribunal in these matters, but I must go into this question, because there is, undoubtedly, difficulty in the decision of the House of Lords in Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron & Coal Co. (2), and it is, undoubtedly, true that, if nothing had happened since, I should have felt, though it is easily distinguishable, that I ought to apply it on the footing that this was an analogous case. But unless it is indistinguishable, I do not think, in view of what has happened since, that I ought to apply it in an analogous case. I have stressed that, because the position is precisely stated in Craig's Claim (6) by LINDLEY, L.J.

Another preliminary question is: What is the duty of a judge when he is confronted with a series of decisions which are difficult to reconcile? In my judgment, it depends. If there is a decision which cannot be distinguished from the case before him, even if it is a decision of a judge of first instance, a fortiori, of course, if it is a decision of the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords, he ought to apply it, expressing, may be, his doubts whether it is still good law, but leaving a superior tribunal to overrule it. Suppose there had been a case, either before or after Hardy v. Fothergill (4), in which a fund had been set aside in favour of a landlord out of the assets of an original covenantor when the lease had been sold for a large sum of money, and in which the jeopardy of the landlord, though not to be treated as of peppercorn value, ought certainly to be capable of being estimated for proof. I must be careful to say nothing to jeopardise the valuation which may come hereafter, but no one could say that in the present case there is any real jeopardy. If there were any reported case of that kind, decided, either at first instance, or by the Court of Appeal or House of Lords, I should have considered it my duty to follow it and to give such encouragement as I could to the liquidator to go to the Court of Appeal. But that is not the position. No case has been brought to my attention which is really indistinguishable from the present case. There are analogous cases in abundance, and, that being so, I think that it is my duty to endeavour to apply the principles which can best be extracted from the reported decisions as a whole, having in mind what has been said repeatedly about the bearing of Hardy v. Fothergill (4) on the problem, and may I add once more, the bearing of the right of disclaimer.

I would like to refer to two of these earlier cases. I agree that they are only two of quite a number. The first one to consider is Oppenheimer v. British & Foreign Exchange & Investment Bank (12). That case shows the danger of dealing with this type of case by analogy. In that case a banking company, which was registered under the Companies Act, 1862, obtained demises of premises from the plaintiff and covenanted to pay him rent at the usual periods during the terms. The shareholders passed a resolution for a voluntary winding-up of the company, though it was not insolvent. The headnote reads:

"A question having arisen as to plaintiff's claim for the future rent, he brought an action for an injunction to restrain the distribution of the assets until the liability of the company had been provided for:—Held, that the lessor was entitled to have a sum set apart which, when invested in consols, would, with half yearly rests, be sufficient to produce the amount of the rent."

There it is quite plain that there was no assignment of any kind. In support of his conclusion SIR CHARLES HALL, V.-C., said (6 Ch.D. 746):

"The question which has arisen is a very important one no doubt, but I am more embarrassed by the expressions which are to be found in the judgments of the cases which have been referred to than by any great difficulty in this case."

That is certainly true here. After reading s. 158 of the Companies Act, 1862, which is similar to s. 316 of the Act of 1948, he said (ibid., 747):

"It seems to me that rent is a sum which does bear a certain value, therefore the latter branch of the section is applicable only where the claim is incapable of bearing a certain value. Rent is not payable as a debt or a claim subject to a contingency; and because there is another remedy for payment, viz., by distress, its value is not made less certain. It appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to claim for the full amount, and to have a sum provided to meet it, less only such a sum as, when the whole has been set apart and invested, and is yielding income, will be necessary to make up the full amount."

SIR CHARLES HALL, V.-C., was talking about the position between a lessor and an original lessee who had not assigned the lease, and, whether or not his observations on that topic, which are the foundation of his judgment, would be accepted today, they are, plainly, quite inappropriate to a case where there has been an assignment for value. Thus, there is an analogous case in which the ratio decidendi is wholly inappropriate to the present case. I think that is an illustration of the danger of proceeding by analogy in this case.

The second case is Gooch v. London Banking Assocn. (3), to which the head-note is:

"An injunction was granted, on motion by the lessor, to restrain a company in voluntary liquidation from distributing assets among its shareholders without setting aside sufficient assets to provide for future rent and other liabilities under a lease."

This case, which was shortly before Hardy v. Fothergill (4), went to appeal, but the appeal was compromised before judgment. I rather think, though counsel for the liquidator doubted it, that, if it had not been compromised, the Court of Appeal would have affirmed the decision of the court below. Here I invoke the submission of counsel for the applicant. Though there are some interlocutory observations of considerable strength during the argument in the Court of Appeal, these are not binding, because there was no judgment, and, having regard to what LORD HANWORTH, M.R., and MAUGHAM, L.J., said in James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), I do not think it at all likely that the Court of Appeal would make similar interlocutory interjections in the circumstances of today. So there, again, the case, though it is analogous, has this important difference that it is not one in which there had been an assignment for value. That difference, I think, is most important, having regard to the choice which now seems to me to be envisaged by the general policy of the Companies Act. It seems to me plain that it is intended, and deliberately intended, by Parliament that the liquidator should do one of the three things to which I have already referred. The cases to which I have been referred seem to me to be mainly concerned with the position of the liquidator when he is either in beneficial occupation or unable to assign the lease, there being in those days no right of disclaimer, and the lease being in its nature onerous.

Now I come to what is, undoubtedly, the sheet anchor of counsel for the applicant. Am I bound by Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron & Coal Co. (2)? If it decides the point before me—in other words, if I cannot distinguish that case from the present case—I conceive myself to be bound by it. If, on the other hand, I can distinguish it, as I think I can, ought I to follow some of the things that were said in the course of the speeches? I must look into this case with some care. LORD WATSON said (11 App. Cas. 336):

"According to the law of Scotland the assignation of his lease by a tenant, who has power to assign, has the effect of making the assignee sole tenant from the time he attains possession of the subject of the lease, and of discharging the cedent [the assignor] from future liability to the landlord. When the tenant has no power to assign, the unqualified acceptance of the assignee by the landlord, whether express or implied, has the same effect."

I emphasise the word "sole" in the phrase "sole tenant", as that is important. I have read that passage at the opening of my analysis of this case because we are here considering that branch of the law of Scotland which corresponds to the English branch of law relating to assignments without the consent of the landlord. That is quite clear, and it is also quite clear that the two laws are different, which is important. The Elphinstone case (2) related to an agricultural lease of November, 1870, of which the respondents were the assignees and the appellant was the landlord, and to a minute of agreement, dated 1877 and containing thirteen articles of contract, which related to the deposit of mineral refuse on the appellant's land, and to which the respondents were original parties. The case in the court below also related to four other deeds, but the case in the House of Lords related only to the two which I have specifically mentioned. LORD WATSON said (ibid., 334):

A "The affairs of the respondent company became embarrassed; and, at an extraordinary meeting held on May 30, 1881, it was resolved that the company should be wound-up voluntarily, and the respondents, William Mackinnon and Nathaniel Spens, were appointed liquidators. On Aug. 9, 1881, the liquidators sold, by public roup [i.e., auction] the whole property and assets of the company, heritable and movable, including the company's right and interest in the leases and agreements . . . to a gentleman, who subsequently declared that he made the purchase on behalf of a new company, then in course of formation, which was incorporated and registered in September, 1881, as the Monkland Iron Company, Limited. In December, 1881, the respondents executed two formal assignments [i.e., assignments] transferring and making over their whole rights and interests, as tenants or otherwise, and their whole obligations and liabilities, under the six deeds of lease and agreement already specified, to the new company."

The importance of this case is that there was a purported assignment. I put in the word "purported" for reasons which will appear later. LORD WATSON went on to say (ibid.):

D "On July 1, 1881, the appellant lodged a claim in the liquidation, in which he insisted upon the liability of the respondent company to fulfil all the obligations and liabilities already incurred, or to become prestable to him under these six deeds. The liquidators gave no deliverance upon the claim, but proceeded to pay the creditors of the company; and after settling all claims of debt (other than the appellant's) a considerable sum remained in their hands at the time when this action was raised [i.e., begun] on Oct. 29, 1883. Between September, 1881, and October, 1883, there was a good deal of correspondence between the appellant's agents on the one hand, and the respondents and the new company on the other, as to the terms upon which the appellant should recognise the new company as having right by assignation to the leases and agreements in question."

F I stress that. The point was that the landlord was saying that the assignees were not entitled as against him to be treated as the tenants, and the old company was saying that they were. That, I should have thought, was a question which was, by its very nature, peculiar to Scots law. LORD WATSON continued (ibid.):

G "These negotiations terminated with an assertion on the part of the respondents and the new company that the respondents had absolute power to assign, and that the appellant had not the option to give or withhold recognition of the new company as tenants in lieu and stead of the respondent company; and the present action was brought in consequence of an intimation made by the liquidators on Oct. 4, 1883, to the effect that, if no proceedings were taken to interpel them before the 31st of that month, they would distribute the surplus assets among the shareholders of the company. The leading conclusions of the appellant's summons are for declarator that the respondent company are still liable to fulfil the whole obligations and liabilities attaching to them under the contracts assigned to the new company . . ."

H—in other words that there had been no assignment which was binding on the landlord—

" . . . and that the liquidators are bound to set aside the whole or so much of the surplus assets as may be required to meet such obligations and liabilities as they become due and prestable. These conclusions are founded upon the allegation that the respondents had no power to assign so as to make the new company the appellant's debtors in these obligations and liabilities without his consent."

That was the issue that was joined and the question was whether the original lessees were liable and the assignees not liable, or whether the assignees were liable and the original lessees not liable. In other words, it was a question which, as far as I know, could not possibly arise in England unless—and I must say this—it arose in some case in England in which there had been an assignment without a licence when a licence was required. I do not wish to pursue that question because the law is not the same in England and Scotland, and what would happen in such a case is quite irrelevant to the present case. There was no argument on the question whether, if the old company was solely liable, a fund would have to be set aside. I hardly think that there could have been any argument as the law stood in 1886. If the assignment was valid, ex hypothesi the old company would cease to be liable altogether. LORD WATSON made that quite plain, and, therefore, it is simply one more in the line of cases where there was no assignment for value, and it differs from those to which I have referred only in that it was a decision of the House of Lords. I regard the case as no authority whatever on what the position would have been if the decision had been that both the old company and the new company were liable.

The case proceeded on the two deeds which I have specifically mentioned. LORD WATSON said (11 App. Cas. 335);

"The lord ordinary (LEE), on Mar. 22, 1884, gave the appellant decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions. The case was then carried by reclaiming note to the Second Division of the court, who, on Oct. 30, 1884, allowed the parties a proof before answer of their respective averments. The learned judges, at the same time, decided that four of the contracts specified in the summons, viz., the mineral lease of March, 1836, the minute of April, 1853, the mill lands tack of December, 1855, and the agreement of November, 1862, were in terms assignable, and had been lawfully assigned by the respondents. Against that decision, which was given effect to in the subsequent interlocutor of May 27, 1885, no appeal has been taken. The proof allowed was led on Dec. 2, 1884, before one of the judges of the Division."

I, therefore, take it that, the assignments in those four cases being held to be binding on the landlord, the old company ceased to be liable, and there was no question, I assume, of setting anything aside. LORD WATSON then went on to say (ibid.):

"The case, which was then confined to the agricultural lease of November, 1870, and the minute of August and November, 1877, was again heard along with the proof; and by interlocutor of May 27, 1885, their Lordships recalled the interlocutor of the lord ordinary and dismissed the action. LORD YOUNG, in whose opinion the other judges concurred, was inclined to think that the appellant had accepted the new company as assignees of the contracts embodied in the lease of 1870 and agreement of 1877, and that he could not therefore take action against the respondents."

That is certainly right if the appellant had accepted the new company as assignees. Then comes what is really the important passage:

"But, inasmuch as he was of opinion that no present debt or liability to the appellant under either of these contracts had been averred or proved, his Lordship preferred to abstain from deciding the point, and to leave the appellant to prefer his claims in the liquidation. His Lordship also expressed the opinion that the circumstances of the case did not justify the appellant in resorting to an extraordinary remedy for his security."

I am not quite sure what is meant by "extraordinary remedy for his security". I expect it means that he, the appellant, ought to try to prove and see what happened, and that to try to get the company interpellated was an extraordinary remedy. The important point is that, if he was able to prove, or to do anything, it could only be because the original lessee, i.e., the respondent company was solely liable. There was no question of the respondent company and the assignee both being liable. That was not possible under the law of Scotland. Therefore, if the appellant had lodged a proof, it would have been on the footing that the assignment was invalid as against him or not binding on him, and, if it was not binding on him, then he could not look to the assignee for anything. To do that would have gravely prejudiced his position, because it would have involved recognising the very assignment which he was disputing. Therefore, he could only look to the respondent company so long as he was contending that the assignment was not binding on him, and, therefore, his proof would have been on the footing that the original lessee or the intermediate lessee—because there is a difference between the two contracts—was solely liable.

It was that phrase in LORD YOUNG's judgment that the circumstances of the case "did not justify the appellant in resorting to an extraordinary remedy for his security" which evoked the important passage in LORD WATSON's speech on which counsel for the applicant relied. LORD WATSON said (ibid., 336):

"I cannot assent to the propriety of the course taken by the learned judges in dismissing the action, and leaving the appellant to renew his claims in the liquidation. The appellant had preferred a claim in the liquidation more than two years before the action was instituted. He had, during the interval, made repeated endeavours to get the liquidators to dispose of the claim, which they declined to do, and ultimately recommended him to take judicial proceedings. It was, in my opinion, inexpedient to send back the appellant, with his claim, to the liquidators, four years after it had been submitted to them. If they had again declined to entertain it, or if they had adjudicated upon it, in accordance with the pleas they now maintain, the appellant would have been under the necessity of raising a fresh action, with conclusions substantially the same with those he now insists in, for the purpose of enforcing what he conceives to be his legal rights. When a limited company is in course of being wound-up voluntarily, I do not think a creditor, who is asserting future or even contingent claims against the company, can justly be said to resort to an extraordinary remedy when he seeks to have the liquidators judicially interpellated from dividing the surplus assets among the shareholders without making any provision to meet his claims when they shall arise."

In my view, LORD WATSON is there referring to the phrase used by LORD YOUNG in the context in which it was used and in the circumstances in which it was used, and I do not understand him to say that it is an absolute right of every future or contingent creditor to have a fund set aside without any regard to the circumstances. I do not think he said that. But, if he had said it, it would be obiter, and, in my judgment, for the reasons that I have given already, it is an obiter dictum which I should not be willing to adopt.

The only thing that was decided in that case was that, where there was no assignee liable, a fund should be set aside. When I say "assignee", I am not treating the intermediate lessee as an assignee. I think the same applies to what LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., said (ibid., 344):

"I cannot think that the learned judges in the court below were right in dismissing the action. If any liability to the appellant existed on the part of the respondent company . . ."

—and I would interpolate a sentence: “it was the the sole liability of the respondent company”—

“he was entitled to have provision made for it by the liquidators before the assets of the company were distributed among the shareholders.”

I think that the interpolation which I have made is consistent with the sense and reasoning of the case, and I think that is all that LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., meant. But if he meant anything more, then, again, it is plainly obiter dictum, and I cannot possibly agree, with all respect to the suggestion made obiter in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Craig's Claim (6), that it is not possible to differentiate the Elphinstone case (2) from other cases. To my mind, the difference in the law—the circumstance that either the original lessee or the assignee is liable, but both are not liable—is a fundamental difference which may lead to different conclusions. I have no knowledge of what view would be taken in Scots law now of the Elphinstone case (2), because the introduction of the disclaimer and Hardy v. Fothergill (4) are binding in Scotland as well as in England, as the company law applies with minor modifications to both countries. I think that for the reasons which I have given I ought not to regard the Elphinstone case (2) as having any decisive effect in the law of England on the point which I have to determine.

Therefore, I find no absolute rule, that, when there has been an assignment for value, a landlord is entitled as of right to have a fund set aside out of the assets of a company, which is an original lessee and which proposes to be dissolved, to answer its liability under covenants in a lease, and I go further. I think that in present circumstances, particularly in the present state of the authorities and owing to the introduction of the right of disclaimer, it is very unlikely that any setting aside would be made in any future case, though I do not rule out that possibility. Ought I, then, to make any such provision in the present case? It will not be forgotten that the rent under the lease is £5,000. The rack rent is over £9,000. The lease was so far from being onerous that the liquidator realised £46,000 on its sale. Looking at this case in isolation, it would be wrong to belittle the applicant's contention that, where the property is large and valuable and the rent high (though it is only a little more than half the rack rent), it might be a case in which something ought to be done for him in the way of setting a fund aside. I want to make it clear that I am dealing, not with any question of what he ought to be able to prove, but whether or not a fund ought to be set aside. The fund would in no conceivable circumstance, in my view, be or approximate to £200,000, but I am not going to go further than that. That amount seems to me to be, if I may say so, wholly unreasonable in the circumstances of this case. But I do not suggest that some provision by way of setting aside a fund would be unreasonable in this particular case, if I were to deal with the matter in isolation, but I cannot. In exercising my discretion, if I have one, I have to consider what the general effect of any such procedure might be, because I emphasise that, so far as I am aware, this has never been done before where there has been an assignment for value. It is a remarkable feature that, even when the liability stood as it did before 1877, so far as I know this had never been done in the case of an assignment for value. To start such a practice, when an assignor's liability has reached the position laid down in the Court of Appeal in 1936 in James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), would be to take a step which requires great circumspection in relation to its bearing on other cases.

If this practice began, where would it stop? Suppose that the rack rent was twenty times the ground rent, or suppose, for example, that it was a true ground rent. (In the present case, it may not be a true ground rent. It may be that the value of the site devoid from buildings is not £5,000 per annum. If it is not, it is not what I call a true ground rent, it is more than a ground rent. Equally plainly, it is not a true rack rent, that is to say, a full rent for the land and the buildings.) Take the man who has a true ground rent and whose ground rent may be covered several times over? Is he to have a fund, and, if not, why not? If the landlord is entitled to a fund where the lease has seventy years still to run, what about the case where the lease has ninety-nine years to run? Or where it has 999 years to run? Where would it stop? There is no different principle, though, of course, there is a difference in degree. If once this doctrine were incorporated in our law, it would lend itself, not in this case, but in cases which would arise, to terrible abuse. It would put a person who was entitled to some quite nominal rent for a very long period of years in a position to exact preposterous sums of money from a company which wanted to go into liquidation. I want to make it plain, as I said before, that I am not dealing with the present case. I am considering what the result might be in other cases if I accede to this application, and I am bound to refer to these matters because I have to consider other cases if I am going to lay down a new practice. It is, as far as I know, a new practice that counsel for the applicant is asking me to lay down. I think that, if the full implications of what he asks me to do are realised, anybody must resilé from it.

Secondly, I would like to refer again to s. 302 of the Act of 1948 for a different purpose. The section provides:

“ Subject to the provisions of this Act as to preferential payments, the property of a company shall, on its winding-up, be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and, subject to such application, shall, unless the articles otherwise provide, be distributed among the members according to their rights and interests in the company.”

It is the right of a company to wind itself up even though it is not insolvent. It is a statutory right: [see s. 278 (1) of the Act of 1948]. It is part of the policy of the law of England, and it is one manifestation of that wide branch of the law which abhors perpetuity. That, to me, is a feature of the greatest importance. Of course, a liquidator is not to distribute the property among the members before he has dealt with the liabilities. That is plain enough. But I am certain that, though it does not say so in express terms, the policy of the Act, as expressed in s. 302, carries the implication that he has to deal with the liabilities finally within a reasonable time, and thereafter to distribute amongst the members within a reasonable time. I imply those words in s. 302 from the general policy of the Act. Parliament cannot have contemplated liquidations lasting for 999 years. Where is the line to be drawn? Of course, what is reasonable must vary according to the circumstances of the company. In some cases the time required to complete the winding-up may be very long and still be reasonable, but, in my view, the policy of the Act would abhor an arrangement under which a winding-up could not be completed for seventy years because the liquidator had to administer, for the benefit of a landlord, a fund created out of the assets of the company, which was the original lessee, when the lease had been assigned for value and was beneficial to the assignee, and the landlord, presumably, would be delighted to accept a surrender at any moment and the chance of any claim against the original lessee ever becoming a live claim for actual money was almost as remote as it could be. The rack rent might, instead of being nearly twice as much, be twenty times as much.

It was submitted by counsel for the applicant that my fears are not warranted, that the liquidator could sell the reversionary interest in the fund. I have no doubt that he could sell it for something, but for what could he sell it? People do not usually like buying a property which is dependent on a contingency which will not be finally determined for seventy years, even though the contingency is remote. In other words, it is what conveyancers used to call a serious blot on the title. I do not believe that the reversionary interest in such a fund could be sold except at a sacrificial price. It is, however, a pure question of fact, and I may be wrong in my belief. No evidence was given that it could be sold at a reasonable price, and in the absence of evidence I shall not presume that it could. Therefore, from that point of view, it would put the company in a position of having to sacrifice a large sum of money to purchase the right to go into liquidation which the Act of Parliament confers on it. And there is another matter. The company has a statutory right to put itself out of a position to fulfil its future obligations. That position is now plainly visualised by s. 316 and s. 317 of the Act of 1948. In a sense, of course—and this has been, naturally, much stressed—the company, by dissolving itself, is breaking its contract as lessee, but it is entitled to break it provided that the Act is complied with when it breaks it. In other words, it is entitled to dissolve itself in accordance with the provisions of the Act and, in particular, s. 316 and s. 317. A

What the applicant is saying is: "Well, if you cannot comply with the letter of your bond, you must give me a better bond." What right has he to say that? It is agreed that he is entitled to have compensation, but why should he have a better bond than the bond that he has already? In other words, why should he capitalise the circumstance that the company wants to do what it has a statutory right to do, namely, to go into liquidation? I am going to explain that, because, in this particular case, it is not very obvious that he is capitalising the situation. Indeed, he may not in the particular circumstances of this case be capitalising it at all, for the reason that this was a very prosperous company and had very large assets on its liquidation. What I wish to point out is that I am dealing here with a question of instituting a new practice, and, if this practice applies to this rich company, why should it not also apply to a company which is just above the line of solvency, a company which has no credit, or very little credit, but yet has enough to pay off its creditors in the end and allow a small division among its shareholders? I want very much to stress this. I have been asked to institute a new practice. Consider a company which is just above the border-line of solvency. What is the value of its obligations as an original lessee? I suggest none. In the present case, the rack rent is nearly double the rent of the property which has been assigned. In those circumstances, what would be the value of the covenants of an almost insolvent original lessee? I should have thought none. There is no security for the lessor vis-à-vis the original lessee company, while it is a going concern. Vis-à-vis the assignee, of course, the security, in the business sense, though not in the legal sense, is the property, and a very real security it is in the business sense. But vis-à-vis the original lessee there is no security because ex hypothesi it is a permitted assignment and the estate has passed away from the original lessee. Therefore, the landlord has no security, and the unsecured covenant of an original lessee would, in my opinion, be of no importance whatever in a case of that sort. I know that is not the present case, but I am thinking of the practice that I am being asked to establish. What should I then have to do? Consider how solvent the company ought to be before a fund is established? I think anybody would agree that in that case a fund would never be set up. Where am I to draw the line in the principle between solvent and insolvent companies? Is the court to carry out an elaborate investigation into the value of the company's covenants in order to decide, and then speculate as to what would be a just sum to set aside in the circumstances? It is this sort of reflection which leads me to say that in no circumstances would I set aside £200,000. If I ever started the practice, which I am not going to do, though other courts may, the question how much the fund should be would always have to be a question of the facts of the particular case. I would never set aside a fund which would cover all the rent in a case in which it was unlikely that there would ever be a claim on the fund. But what principle I should adopt in settling how much the fund ought to be I have not the remotest idea. I have not, of course, dealt with any figures, and I am not now dealing with any figures, but it is the difficulties which would arise if I did introduce this practice which are weighing with me. B C D E F G H

A For the reasons which I have given, I decline to order the setting aside of any fund. There is no doubt, and it has been admitted throughout this case, that the applicant can prove in the winding-up if he so desires. That is plain on the authority of James Smith & Sons (Norwood), Ltd. v. Goodman (1), and counsel for the liquidator has never questioned it. Whether he has any other remedy against the company, I do not know. The summons does not ask. It asks, first, that he may have a fund set aside. That I refuse. It asks that he may have leave to prove and that the winding-up should not be completed until he has done so. He has had an opportunity of proving, and that has not been resisted. I do not know whether he has any other remedy. Insurance is often a solution of this kind of problem, but both sides agree that in this case it is not a solution because nobody will underwrite such a long-standing affair, though the risk may not be much. That has some bearing on the question to which I referred, viz., what the value of the reversionary interest might be. But, if he has no other remedy against the company, I shall not be shocked. It seems to me plainly the policy of the Act that in such a case the applicant should prove. It is quite plain that he can prove, but whether he can do anything else or not the future only can tell.

Order accordingly.

C Solicitors: Rider, Heaton, Meredith & Mills (for the applicant); Slaughter & May (for the liquidator); Julius White & Bywaters (for the assignee).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

D Re HILLIER. HILLIER AND ANOTHER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), November 6, 10, 1953.]

E Charity—Benefit to community—Public and charitable purpose—Appeal for funds for erection and maintenance of voluntary hospital in certain area—Failure of object of appeal—General charitable intention—Trusts affecting funds.

F In 1938 a council known as the S. Bucks. and E. Berks. Voluntary Hospital Council was formed, its immediate purpose being to raise funds for (1) the extension of the accommodation of the existing King Edward VII hospital at Windsor and (2) the erection and maintenance of a new voluntary hospital at Slough. In the same year the Slough Hospital Committee was formed with the special object of furthering the purpose of erecting this new hospital, and under a trust deed dated Oct. 28, 1938, three trustees known as the Slough hospital trustees were appointed to be trustees of the committee's property. In 1939 the council published an appeal in the form of a brochure containing articles advocating the voluntary hospital movement, emphasising the need for the extension of hospital services in the area, explaining the work of the council, and stressing the need for financial assistance. It further referred to the need for and intention to build a voluntary hospital at Slough and the way in which the council hoped to improve existing services at King Edward VII hospital. Prospective donors were told that they could give either to the extension fund of King Edward VII hospital or toward the erection of the Slough hospital, and that they could earmark their subscriptions for either purpose. A pocket to the brochure contained printed forms to be used by intending donors. The first (document 1) read as follows: "I have pleasure in enclosing remittance value (blank) in respect of contribution as below". Then followed three columns, one marked "Capital donation", the second marked "Maintenance donation", and the third marked "Annual subscription", each column setting out the same three alternatives, viz., "Council's discretion; Windsor hospital; or Slough hospital". The second form (document 2) read as follows: "South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospitals Council Deed of Covenant. I (blank) of (blank) do hereby covenant to pay to the secretary for the time being of the . . . council . . . yearly during the period of seven years . . . [certain] sums . . . ” Then the following alternatives were set out, viz., “(a) such hospital . . . in South Bucks. and/or East Berks. as the council may from time to time nominate on my . . . behalf. (b) King Edward VII hospital at Windsor. (c) The Slough hospital at Slough. (d) The (blank) hospital at (blank)”, and a note requested the intending covenantor to delete those alternatives which he did not desire to benefit. The appeal met with general support. Under document 2, £14,000 expressly allocated to the Slough hospital was received, and some £1,500 was received but not expressly allocated. £14,000 expressly allocated to the Slough hospital and £4,000 not expressly allocated was subscribed under document 1. Further funds were raised by means of whist drives, dances, collecting boxes and the like. The court accepted that as a result of the passing of the National Health Service Act, 1946, it had become impracticable to carry out the charitable purpose of building a voluntary hospital at Slough. On the question on what trusts the investments representing the subscriptions were held by the Slough hospital trustees, HELD: (i) on the true construction of documents 1 and 2 read in the light of the appeal, of which the whole object was to raise funds for a voluntary hospital, it was the clear intention of the donors that their subscriptions should be applied toward the erection and maintenance of what was essentially a voluntary hospital and not a hospital to be maintained by the State, and, since that purpose had become impossible, the object for which the subscriptions had been raised had become wholly impracticable and had failed.

(ii) where a donor, in exercising the option given him by documents 1 and 2, had indicated a desire to benefit the Slough hospital, it was impossible to infer any general charitable intention, and, therefore, in respect of the sums subscribed specifically to the Slough hospital, there was a resulting trust to the donors.

Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund ([1921] 1 Ch. 655) and Re North Devon & West Somerset Relief Fund Trusts (ante, p. 1032), distinguished.

(iii) the failure of one among a number of charitable objects did not bring a charitable gift to an end, and, therefore, although the building of the Slough hospital could not be carried out, the gifts in respect of the application of which a discretion had been given by the donor to the council continued to be held on various charitable trusts and could be applied at the discretion of the council among the existing hospitals in the South Buckinghamshire and East Berkshire area.

HELD, further, that moneys collected by means of whist drives, dances, collecting boxes and the like could not have been intended by the donors to be returned when the immediate object of the collection had failed (Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund ([1921] 1 Ch. 655), followed), but, quare, whether the funds could be applied cy-près on the footing that there was a general charitable intention, or whether they became bona vacantia.

AS TO CHARITABLE INTENTION, see HALSBURY, Simonds Edn., Vol. 4, p. 267, para. 562; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 8, pp. 291-297, Nos. 686-740.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re University of London Medical Sciences Institute Fund, [1909] 2 Ch. 1; 78 L.J.Ch. 562; 100 L.T. 423; 8 Digest 291, 690.
- (2) Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund, [1921] 1 Ch. 655; 90 L.J.Ch. 276; 124 L.T. 787; 8 Digest 349, 1444.
- (3) Re British Red Cross Balkan Fund, [1914] 2 Ch. 419; 84 L.J.Ch. 79; 111 L.T. 1069; 25 Digest 526, 180.

(4) Re North Devon & West Somerset Relief Fund Trusts, ante, p. 1032.

(5) Re Wilson, [1913] 1 Ch. 314; 82 L.J.Ch. 161; 108 L.T. 321; 8 Digest 313, 948.

A ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether the properties, investments and moneys donated and subscribed and held by the plaintiff, Sir Arthur Noel Mobbs, as surviving trustee under a declaration of trust dated May 25, 1946, setting out the said properties, investments and moneys, were still held on charitable trusts, and, if so, that if proper it should be determined what such trusts were or whether any charitable trust formerly affecting the same had failed, and, if so, whether any donors or subscribers were entitled to repayment of the amounts given or subscribed by them.

B The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment. In 1938 and 1939 an appeal was launched for subscriptions for the improvement of hospital services in the South Buckinghamshire and East Berkshire area, and, in particular, for the provision of a hospital at Slough. The appeal met with general support, and the subscriptions received by way of donations and deeds of covenant made by donors to make annual payments for a period of seven years amounted, with income tax recovered, to about £14,000, apart from sums that were earmarked, C under a special provision for King Edward VII hospital at Windsor. In 1938 a council was formed, under the title of the South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospital Council, of which Sir Arthur Noel Mobbs, one of the plaintiffs, was chairman. The objects of that council were to develop to the greatest possible extent the efficiency of hospital services in South Bucks. and East Berks., and the immediate purpose was to raise funds for two objects, the first being the extension D of the accommodation of Windsor hospital, and the second the building and equipment of a new hospital at Slough. In the same year a committee of the council was formed under the title of the Slough Hospital Committee, with the special object of furthering the purpose of the erection of the new hospital at Slough. On Oct. 28, 1938, Mr. Edward Thomas Bowyer, Mr. William Augustus Hillier and Sir Arthur Noel Mobbs were appointed trustees for the property E of the committee under a trust deed. This body of trustees has been generally referred to as "The Slough Hospital Trustees". Mr. Bowyer had died before, and Mr. Hillier had died since, the issue of the summons, leaving Sir Arthur Noel Mobbs as the sole trustee.

F In 1939 the council issued a brochure which appealed for donations and subscriptions for the purposes mentioned above. This brochure was headed: "Windsor, Slough and Associated Hospitals", and it contained on the fly-leaf an extract from a speech of Lord Horder made at Liverpool in November, 1938, viz.:

G "I believe that the voluntary hospital is as essential to this country's well-being today as ever it was. It still stands as a fortress of teaching, of research, and of efficient treatment; and as a centre where the spirit of medicine can live in freedom, owing no allegiance to political doctrine or State expediency", and at the foot of the page it read:

"We commend these words to the residents of South Bucks. and East Berks."

H The next page was headed, "The South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospitals Council", and the second paragraph read:

"Our voluntary hospital system is the envy of the world. The truly British characteristic of making provision, without force, for those in need of medical care is worthy of preservation. Without adequate finance the work of the honorary surgeons and physicians cannot go on. It is hoped that all will play their part in helping us to attain the objects that are detailed in the following pages. This booklet is intended to explain the work of the council and to make residents in this district individually conscious of the value of the voluntary hospitals."

On the next page there was set out the membership of the council, and on p. 3 there were the following words:

"With your assistance the hospitals council hope to accomplish the following."

Then followed a paragraph headed: "King Edward VII Hospital, Windsor", and a number of improvements that it was desired to effect to that hospital are set out. Next there was a paragraph headed: "The Slough Hospital", which reads as follows:

"The rapid industrial growth of Slough has thrown a heavy extra burden upon King Edward VII Hospital. The population has doubled in recent years and is still rapidly growing. To relieve the established hospital and to provide this industrial area with a hospital near at hand it has been decided to erect a new building at Slough on a site already purchased. The hospital, which will have sixty beds at its commencement, will be worked in close co-operation with King Edward VII hospital, and will supply a further urgently necessary addition to the hospital services of the whole area. £45,000 is the estimated cost of the new hospital, and it will cost approximately £13,000 per annum to maintain. The smaller hospitals in the area also require your help. £47,000 has already been promised. Please help us with your gift."

On p. 4 there is a quotation from the Right Honourable John Burns when President of the Board of Trade:

"The voluntary hospitals had saved in the course of a single generation a population equal to that of London or Australia."

On p. 7 these words were used:

"You can help the council by: A donation to the extension fund of King Edward VII Hospital, Windsor, or the building of the Slough hospital. An annual subscription towards the maintenance of hospital services in the area . . . You can earmark your help for either of the hospitals, although you may send it to the council."

At p. 8 there was a further commendation of the voluntary hospital system, and, finally, on p. 12 there was an extract from the Sankey report on the future of the voluntary hospitals.

A pocket to the brochure contained forms for the use of those intending to subscribe to the movement which were addressed to the South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospitals Council. The first reads:

"I have pleasure in enclosing remittance value (blank) in respect of contribution as below: Capital donation [and three alternatives were set out, viz.] Council's discretion; Windsor hospital; Slough hospital".

There was a column for a maintenance donation with the same three alternatives, and another column for an annual subscription with the same three alternatives. A space was left for the name and address, and then followed a note: "This form should accompany the donation and be sent to" and then followed the address of the South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospitals Council. That document is referred to in the judgment as document 1. Another enclosed form dealt with the endowment or maintenance of beds and cots, and again an alternative was given between donating a sum to the Windsor hospital or to the Slough hospital.

Another printed enclosure was a form of seven years' covenant, which was in these terms:

"South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospitals Council. Deed of A covenant. I/We (blank) of (blank) do hereby covenant to pay to the secretary for the time being of the South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospitals Council of 18a Mackenzie Street, Slough, Bucks, or other their address for the time being, yearly during the period of seven years from the (blank) day of (blank) 19 (blank) or during my/our life (whichever period shall be the shorter) such a sum as will after deduction of income tax at the standard rate for the time being in force leave in the hands of the said secretary a net yearly sum of (blank) such sums to be paid on the (blank) day of (blank) in every year commencing in the year 19 (blank) and to be paid out of my/our general fund of taxed income and to be deemed to accrue from day to day. All such sums shall be received and applied in such proportions as the council shall direct on my/our behalf for the augmentation of the income of the following."

B Then certain alternatives were set out, against which there was a note that the person entering into the covenant should delete those alternatives which he did not desire to benefit. There were four alternatives, viz.,

C " (a) Such hospital or hospitals in South Bucks. and/or East Berks. as the council may from time to time nominate on my/our behalf. (b) King Edward VII Hospital at Windsor. (c) The Slough hospital at Slough. (d) The (blank) hospital at (blank) ".

The covenant is referred to in the judgment as document 2. During the argument it appeared that these covenants were also used for capital gifts under seven years' covenants, and presumably intending donors altered the words "augmentation of the income" to "augmentation of the capital".

D In addition to those methods of raising money, other methods were employed, such as appeals through the Press, and personal applications for donations and subscriptions. Moneys were also collected by local clubs and committees, and by whist drives, flag days, collecting boxes, dances and similar means.

E In 1939 a site of some ten and a half acres was purchased in Stoke Road, Slough, at a cost of £6,000, and it was conveyed to the Slough hospital trustees, it then being thought that that site would be appropriate for the erection of the intended Slough hospital. In 1940 a new council was formed, called the Bucks. and East Berks. Divisional Hospitals Council, and the funds which had been received by the old council were transferred to, and the activities of the old council were merged in, the divisional council. The divisional council received a large number of subscriptions which had not been expressly allocated by the subscribers to any particular hospital, but which were left to be applied at the discretion of the council, that being one of the modes indicated in both documents 1 and 2. In 1942 those unallocated contributions were transferred to the Slough hospital trustees. In 1946 a trust deed was drawn up whereby the then trustees (that is to say, Mr. Bowyer, Mr. Hillier and Sir Arthur Noel Mobbs) declared themselves trustees of the funds set out in the schedule to the trust deed, the object of the trust deed being to define the property which was then held by the trustees. After the war, it was realised that the property which had been purchased in Slough was too small for the proposed hospital. It was, moreover, urgently required by the Berks. County Council as a site for the erection of a school in Slough. Accordingly, the site was sold, at a profit, for £7,750. Shortly afterwards, in 1948, the trustees purchased another property at a total cost of £30,000 known as Wexham Park, a large house and seventy acres of land in the neighbourhood of Slough outside the town, which was intended as a site for a hospital. The National Health Service Act, 1946, came into force on July 5, 1948, and since that date the house was, in fact, let and became a revenue-producing unit. In 1949 the trustees purchased a tithe farm property for £11,730, which was also let as a revenue-producing asset. The second property, Wexham Park, was let at a full rack rent to provide a nurses' home for the Canadian hospital at Taplow, which was an ordinary hospital operating under the National Health Service Act, 1946. It had been built by the Canadian army authorities in the war of 1939-45, and was handed over by them for use as an ordinary hospital at the conclusion of hostilities. The smaller property was let by the trustees at a full rack rent and was used as a clinic run by the Slough Estates.

There was before the court a schedule of the sums collected by the various means above mentioned including, inter alia, the following: (a) £14,000 of capital, collected under the seven-years covenants, which had been specifically allocated to the Slough hospital by the covenantors; (b) a little less than £1,500 collected and not allocated. Another schedule showed the amounts subscribed, the sums which had been expressly allocated to the Slough hospital, which amounted to £14,000, appearing in one column, and those sums which had been left to the council's discretion, amounting to £4,000, in another column. The schedule contained not merely gifts made under document 1, but other gifts made by means of whist drives, dances, concerts and the like, and there also appeared an amount produced by collections taken on Good Friday, and sent by the Bishop of Buckingham.

J. L. Arnold for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the funds.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General, the first defendant.

Peter Foster for the Official Solicitor representing the donors and subscribers.

UPJOHN, J., stated the facts and continued: I am concerned with two questions. The first is, whether it has become impossible or impracticable to carry out the purpose, which is admittedly charitable, of building a hospital at Slough, and, if so, on what trusts are the investments representing the subscriptions now held. Before dealing with those questions in detail, it may be convenient to deal with one matter quite shortly, namely, the amounts that were subscribed either under document 1 or document 2 where the council was given a discretion by the donor as to the application of the gift among hospitals in the South Bucks. and East Berks. area. In my judgment, no difficulty arises on that matter, for assuming, without for the moment deciding, that the project of erecting a hospital at Slough has become impracticable, there remain other hospitals in the area which are capable of benefiting from the donation and are proper objects of the discretion given by the donor to the council, which the council can, therefore, still exercise in relation to them. In other words, when the whole object of the donation is clearly a charitable one, the failure of one object among a number does not bring the charitable gift to an end. The other objects remain capable of being attained. That cannot possibly be affected by the fact that in 1942 the divisional council in fact handed over all the unallocated funds to the Slough hospital trustees, because, assuming that it has become impracticable to build a hospital at Slough, it means merely that that allocation has failed in its purpose, and, therefore, the divisional council must make some other allocation of those funds. Therefore, I need say no more about the funds which are not expressly allocated. They are plainly held on valid charitable trusts, and can be applied at the discretion of the divisional council among the existing hospitals in South Bucks. or East Berks. Nor does any question arise with regard to the sums which were specially directed to be given to the Windsor hospital. Those funds have already been handed over to the appropriate management committee. I am, therefore, concerned, and concerned only, with those sums which were specifically directed to be given to the Slough hospital under document 1 or document 2, or in the other modes that I have mentioned.

The facts as to the practicability of erecting and maintaining a hospital at Slough are to be found in para. 23 of Sir Arthur Noel Mobbs' affidavit. [His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence:] I accept as proved as a fact that it would now be quite impracticable for a voluntary body of persons to undertake the erection and maintenance of a voluntary hospital in the Slough area, but it is equally proved that not only is it possible, but it is contemplated that a new hospital will be erected in the Slough area by the Ministry of Health, and that work is, of course, as much a charitable work as is the erection of a voluntary hospital, because the provision of a hospital does not cease to be charitable because it is provided by the State. That, however, does not determine the question. The question (which is one of construction of documents 1 and 2) is whether the donors intended their gifts to be applied in the erection of what was essentially to be a voluntary hospital, or in a hospital however erected and maintained. Both documents 1 and 2 speak merely of the Slough hospital, and, taking that alone, I should see nothing to exclude the application of gifts given in those terms to a hospital to be erected by the Ministry of Health. I must, however, look at these documents as a whole, and I must read them in the light of the appeal. I note in particular that both documents 1 and 2 are headed: "The South Bucks. and East Berks. Voluntary Hospitals Council." The covenant in the case of the seven years' covenants is, indeed, with that council, but that is not conclusive of the matter, because the council is only in the position of a trustee. Nevertheless, it is, I think, some indication of the parties' intention. When I read these covenants in the light of the appeal, it seems to me reasonably clear that donors who signed document 1 or document 2 were quite plainly contemplating that their subscription would be used, and used only, for the provision, erection and maintenance of a voluntary hospital. The whole tenor of the appeal was directed to the necessity for voluntary hospitals, and, in particular, for a voluntary hospital at Slough, and, in my judgment, the whole object of the appeal was to gain funds for a voluntary hospital there.

Accordingly, in my judgment, on the true construction of documents 1 and 2 the donors intended that their subscriptions should be applied in the erection and maintenance of what was essentially to be a voluntary hospital, and not a hospital to be maintained by the State, which at the time when these subscriptions were given was not in the contemplation of any party. I, therefore, reach the conclusion that the object or the purpose for which these donations were made has become impracticable.

That gives rise to the second question. The purpose having become impracticable, I have to decide on what trusts these sums and the investments now representing them are held. I will deal in the first place with sums contributed through the medium of documents 1 and 2. The question is whether there is a resulting trust for the donors, the purpose of the donation having failed, or whether a general charitable intention can be inferred so that, although it has become impracticable to build a voluntary hospital at Slough, nevertheless the donors intended that there was to be a general charitable intention in favour of hospitals existing in the area of South Bucks. and East Berks. Apart altogether from authority, I should have thought that the answer was reasonably clear. When a donor is given the option of applying a donation at the discretion of the council among hospitals in the area, or directing that it shall go to the Windsor hospital or to the Slough hospital or, in the case of document 2, to some other hospital in the area, and when, exercising the option given to him by these documents, he is careful enough to exercise it in favour of the Slough hospital, and that purpose fails, I should have thought that, as a matter of principle, and, as I say, apart altogether from authority, it was impossible to infer any general charitable intention to benefit hospitals generally in that area, for he has, by deleting the paragraph giving the council that discretion, negatived any such intention on his part. Therefore, I should have thought that that gift having failed to take effect, there was a resulting trust for the donor.

The case is not unlike that of Re University of London Medical Sciences Institute Fund (1), although that case is not in any sense a decision on this matter. In that case the testator bequeathed a legacy of £25,000 to the Institute of Medical Sciences Fund of the University of London. That scheme was abandoned, and the question was whether on the true construction of the will there was a general charitable intention. JOYCE, J., in giving judgment said ([1909] 2 Ch. 4):

"As to the return of subscriptions or donations no serious question was or could be raised. But with reference to the legacy given by Mr. Beit's will it has been suggested on behalf of the Attorney-General that the money had been definitely devoted to a charitable purpose, and ought, therefore, to be applied cy-près, the object to which it was originally devoted having failed. I cannot accede to that suggestion. There is not one word in the will upon which to found the theory of the testator having any general charitable intent, or any intention to contribute to any general or other purpose of charity save only the particular scheme of the projected institute."

Speaking for myself, as a matter of construction of these documents I should come to the clear conclusion that there was a resulting trust to the donors, but it is said that there are two authorities binding on me, which compel me to come to a different conclusion. The first of those authorities is Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (2). The headnote is as follows:

"On the outbreak of the war a hospital was erected at Netley, and equipped and run during the war, for the benefit of sick and wounded Welsh soldiers by means of large voluntary subscriptions raised in Wales. In 1919 the hospital was closed, the staff disbanded, and the property sold to the War Office, and after winding-up the affairs of the hospital there was a surplus of some £9,000:—Held, on the evidence, that there was not a resulting trust of the surplus for the subscribers to the hospital, but a general charitable intention for sick and wounded Welshmen which enabled the court to apply the fund cy-près. Re British Red Cross Balkan Fund (3) [1914] 2 Ch. 419 distinguished."

P. O. LAWRENCE, J., in his judgment set out the terms of the appeal, for in that case, as in the next case to which I must refer, the question was one of construction of the appeal, because it was only in relation to the appeal that the intention of the donors could be ascertained. The learned judge said ([1921] 1 Ch. 660):

"The fund was created by contributions from various sources and in varying amounts, partly by donations from private individuals of more or less substantial amounts, and partly by the proceeds resulting from concerts and other entertainments given and from collections in streets and at churches made in most of the towns and villages of Wales. So far as regards the contributors to entertainments, street collections, etc., I have no hesitation in holding that they must be taken to have parted with their money out and out. It is inconceivable that any person paying for a concert ticket or placing a coin in a collecting box presented to him in the street should have intended that any part of the money so contributed should be returned to him when the immediate object for which the concert was given or the collection made had come to an end. To draw such an inference would be absurd on the face of it. So far as regards individual subscribers of substantial amounts, the proper inference to be drawn is not quite so plain. In my opinion, however, these subscribers must be taken to have known that they were contributing to a general fund which was being raised in the manner I have described, and that their contributions would be aggregated with the proceeds of entertainments, street collections, etc., and would not in any way be ear-marked. They must, I think, also be taken to have known that the total funds collected from every source would be applied for the purpose of the charity without discriminating between the moneys derived from any particular source. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the true inference to be drawn is that these subscribers intended to part with their contributions out and out, and that they did not intend that the surplus, if any, of their contributions should be returned to them when the immediate object of the charity should have come to an end. In the result I hold that although all the contributions were in the first instance made for the particular purpose of building, equipping and maintaining the Welsh hospital at Netley, the main underlying object of the contributors was to provide money for the comfort of sick and wounded Welshmen, and that all the subscribers intended to devote their contributions not only to the particular object, but generally to the benefit of their sick and wounded countrymen."

A Before dealing with that case it will, I think, be convenient to refer to the second authority, the very recent case of Re North Devon & West Somerset Relief Fund Trusts (4). In that case floods due to torrential rain in north Devon and west Somerset caused loss of life and great damage to property in the area. A relief fund was opened by an appeal in the following terms:

B "We invite not only the people of the west country, but everyone who has known and loved Lynmouth and the quiet villages of north Devon and west Somerset, which have suffered so grievously in this disaster, to contribute to a fund for the relief of all who have suffered . . . Many holiday-makers . . . have suffered grievously. These need help every bit as much as our own people, and for that reason we do ask the whole country to support this fund . . ."

C A large sum was collected, and it was expected that a considerable surplus would remain after all proper claims under the appeal had been met. WYNN-PARRY, J., held, first, that the trusts of the fund were valid charitable trusts; and, secondly, that the appeal disclosed a general charitable intention and that the surplus assets could be applied cy-près. I am concerned in this case only with the second point that was decided by WYNN-PARRY, J. After referring to the well-known judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (5), he said (ante, p. 1036):

E "It is to be observed that in that case the court had to construe a will, the instrument by which a single donor had made the disposition which gave rise to the question. A number of authorities were cited to me, and most of them, I think it is true to say, arose substantially in that way. I have to deal with a very different type of case, a case in which I have to discover the intention of many hundreds—it may be thousands—of donors, and the only document that I have to assist me is not a document brought into existence by any one of those donors, but by those who invited them to become donors."

F He then referred to Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (2), quoted the passage which I have already read, and said (ante, p. 1038):

G "It appears to me, on careful consideration, that it is impossible to draw a distinction of any substance between the facts of that case and the facts of the present case. It appears to me not in the least decisive that there is a reference in the appeal to persons other than local residents who suffered distress by the disaster. The main underlying object of that appeal was to benefit the people of the district in question. The appeal proceeds in this case, as it did in the case of the Welsh hospital, by emphasising what in the Welsh case was called the immediate object, but which might quite easily in either case have been treated, on a strict construction of the appeal, as the only object. In Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (2) P. O. LAWRENCE, J., found no difficulty in drawing the conclusion, for the reasons which he gives, that there was a more extended object than might be said at first sight to appear on the face of the appeal; and when I apply his reasoning to the appeal in question in this case, I feel driven to exactly the same conclusion, namely, that there was a general charitable intent. All the reasons which militated in the mind of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., to the conclusion to which he came are present in this case. I, therefore, find it impossible to distinguish that case from this case. In those circumstances, it appears to me to be unnecessary to travel through the rest of the authorities. I need only say that I find nothing in the judgment of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., which is in any way inconsistent with the passage from the judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (5) which I have read. It is true that the latter case was not apparently cited to P. O. LAWRENCE, J., but, no doubt, that learned judge was well aware of its existence. Indeed, the judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (5) did no more than state the effect of the authorities as it then existed; nor do I find anything in the later cases which carries the matter further. So far as I am aware, no adverse comment has ever been passed on the decision or judgment of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., in Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (2). I regard it as authority binding on me and as covering this case."

If I thought that the Netley case (2) or the North Devon case (4) covered this case I would loyally follow them, but, in my judgment, they do not. The problem that I have to consider is very different from that before P. O. LAWRENCE and WYNN-PARRY, JJ. They had to consider the true construction of broadly phrased appeals and they were able to come to the conclusion that on the true construction of the documents that were respectively before them it was right to find that there was a general charitable intention which would take effect when the primary object had been fulfilled. In coming to that conclusion, P. O. LAWRENCE, J., felt that he had some assistance from a consideration of the fact that contributors must have known that in carrying out the object their moneys would become mingled with moneys from other sources which had been given out and out by contributors. That fact assisted the learned judge in coming to the conclusion that, on the true construction of the appeal before him, the real or the main underlying object of the contributors was to provide money for the comfort of sick and wounded Welshmen.

As I have said, I have a very different problem to consider. I have not in documents 1 and 2 appeals by the appeal committee or council, although I must, of course, read documents 1 and 2 in the light of the appeal in response to which those documents were executed. The primary question is what is the intention of each donor? That is to be ascertained from the document which each has signed. For the reasons that I have already given, I can find no general charitable intention in the document. Therefore, I do not derive assistance from the two cases to which I have just referred where altogether different documents were being considered. There is another matter which appears to me to distinguish this case from the cases that I have just mentioned. In this case there has been an initial failure of the charitable trusts because it has now proved to be impracticable to build a voluntary hospital at Slough. The cases before P. O. LAWRENCE and WYNN-PARRY, JJ., were cases where the primary object had been fully carried out. In the one case, Re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund (2), apparently, a profit was made on the sale of property, and in the other case, Re North Devon & West Somerset Relief Fund Trusts (4), the response to the subscriptions was such that the committee which was administering the fund had more money than they could properly dispose of. Those seem to me to be very different from the present case. I can well understand, following the reasoning of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., the position that would arise if a donor were asked at the time of making his gift: "Supposing that the charitable purpose is fully carried out and supposing that unexpectedly there is a surplus when that primary purpose has been achieved, what do you want done with your money? You must remember that it will be mixed with other donations the donors of which we cannot trace." It may be proper, in such circumstances, as a matter of law to impute to the donor an intention that the surplus should be devoted to other charitable purposes, or, at all events, the inevitable mixture of donations may assist in coming to a conclusion on the construction of the appeals that that is what the donor must have intended when dealing with a surplus after the charitable purpose for which he sent his contribution has been wholly achieved. But, supposing that a donor is asked at the time of making his gift: "What do you want done if this charitable purpose cannot be carried into effect at all?" In my judgment, it becomes quite impossible to assume that the answer, having regard to the terms of documents 1 and 2, must be: "Give the money for some other charitable purpose." It appears to me to be an irrelevant consideration to tell him at the time: "Remember that some of the other contributions that we shall receive will come from donors whom we cannot trace because they will come through collecting boxes, dances, whist drives, and so on." The trustees have in their hands, unapplied to the charitable purpose—for that charitable purpose has never come into effect—all the sums originally subscribed or investments representing the same. Therefore, the conclusion that I reach is that, on the true construction of documents 1 and 2, there is in the events which have happened a resulting trust for the donors.

That leaves two further classes which I must briefly mention. Some contributors may have contributed not on the terms of documents 1 and 2, but by letter. It is, of course, a question depending on each letter or document which came from a donor whether the donor was giving his donation for a specific purpose or whether he indicated a general charitable intention. I do not think that I can deal in greater detail with that class for none of the letters is before me. There remains the class of donations raised through whist drives and the like where it is impossible to trace the donors. With regard to that class I respectfully agree with the observations of P. O. LAWRENCE, J. ([1921] 1 Ch. 660), that it is inconceivable that any person paying for a concert ticket, or placing a coin in a collecting box that was presented to him, should have intended that any part of the money so contributed should be returned to him when the immediate object for which the concert was given, or the collection was made, had been achieved and shown a surplus. That must, I think, be so even where the original object was never achieved for the simple reason that the circumstances in which the money was given negatived the idea that the donor ever intended that he should receive any of that money back. That, however, in my judgment, does not conclude the matter. The donor has no further interest in the money because he has given it out and out, but where there is an initial failure of the charitable purpose it seems to me to be an open matter whether you can infer a general charitable intention or the property is bona vacantia. That question has not been argued before me and, indeed, the Crown has not been joined with regard to it. It may be that the Crown will not desire to argue the point, but I do not desire to pre-judge that question in any way. All that I can do is to declare that the original donors of that class no longer have any interest in the money subscribed or contributed by them and the investments now representing the same.

Declarations accordingly.

Solicitors: Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker (for the plaintiffs); Treasury Solicitor; Official Solicitor.

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

Re WHICHELOW (deceased). BRADSHAW AND OTHERS v.
ORPEN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), November 24, 1953.]

Trust and Trustee—Shares in limited company—Control by beneficiaries—Exercise of voting rights—All beneficiaries not before court—Absence of presumption that females past child-bearing age.

By her will, a testatrix, inter alia, bequeathed on trust for each of her three daughters for life, a block of ordinary shares in a limited company with remainder to the children respectively of those three daughters. At the date of the present proceedings, the three daughters were aged sixty-one, fifty-eight and fifty-two years respectively and their children had all attained the age of twenty-one. Certain resolutions had been proposed for the annual general meeting of the company and the daughters and their children claiming that they were the only persons entitled to a beneficial interest in the shares directed the trustees as to the manner in which they should vote in respect of the resolutions. The trustees refused to accept the direction. On a motion for an order that the trustees be directed to vote in accordance with the directions of the daughters and their children and for an injunction restraining them from voting otherwise,

HELD: it could not be said that all the beneficiaries were before the court or that the trustees had received a direction from all the persons beneficially entitled to the shares, because, until an order was obtained giving leave to presume that the three daughters were past the age of child-bearing, there was, in law, a possibility of their having further children; and, therefore, the relief sought was refused.

Re Thornhill ([1904] W.N. 112), distinguished.

Principle stated by ROMER, L.J., in Re Butt ([1952] 1 All E.R. 172), not applied.

AS TO TRUSTEES' DISCRETION AS TO EXERCISE OF POWER, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 33, p. 245, para. 433; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 43, pp. 875-881, Nos. 3193-3239.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Butt, [1952] 1 All E.R. 167; [1952] Ch. 197; 3rd Digest Supp.
- (2) Re Thornhill, [1904] W.N. 112; 43 Digest 813, 2565.
- (3) Re Smith, [1928] 1 Ch. 915; 97 L.J.Ch. 441; 43 Digest 593, 428.
- (4) Re Brockbank, [1948] 1 All E.R. 287; [1948] Ch. 206; [1948] L.J.R. 952; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Re Higginbottom, [1892] 3 Ch. 132; 62 L.J.Ch. 74; 67 L.T. 190; 43 Digest 681, 1109.
- (6) Tempest v. Camoys (Lord), (1882), 21 Ch.D. 571; 51 L.J.Ch. 785; 48 L.T. 13; 43 Digest 674, 1040.

MOTION for (1) an order that the defendants, the trustees of the will of Annie Matilda Whichelow dated July 31, 1922, should either (i) appoint and cause one of themselves to attend at the annual general meeting of George Whichelow, Ltd., and should vote thereat (in exercise of the voting rights in respect of the shares of the company comprised in the legacies bequeathed by the testatrix on trust for her three daughters, the first three plaintiffs, and their respective children) in favour of five resolutions of which notice had been given to the secretary of the company, or, alternatively, (ii) appoint the first plaintiff, Gladys Marjorie Bradshaw (or such other person as the first plaintiff wished) to be proxy of the defendants so to vote; and (2) an injunction restraining the defendants from voting either in person or by proxy (in exercise of the voting rights in respect of the said shares) at the said meeting in any manner in which they should have been unanimously directed by the plaintiffs not to vote.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and K. J. T. Elphinstone for the plaintiffs, the daughters of the testatrix, and their children.

Elverston for the defendants, the trustees of the will.

UPJOHN, J.: This is a motion by the plaintiffs asking for an order that the defendants, who are shareholders in a company known as George Whichelow, Ltd., do either appoint the first plaintiff a proxy in respect of their shares, or themselves vote in respect of that shareholding in a certain manner at a meeting of the company to be held on Nov. 26, 1953. The defendants hold the shares as trustees of the will of Annie Matilda Whichelow, dated July 31, 1922.

I am informed that the trusts of that will are complicated, but it is agreed (and I assume for the purposes of this motion) that the trusts can be simply stated in these terms, viz., that the testatrix left three blocks of shares on trust for each of her three daughters, the first three plaintiffs, for life with remainder to the children respectively of those daughters. The fourth to the sixth plaintiffs are the children of Mrs. Bradshaw, the first plaintiff; the seventh to the ninth plaintiffs are the children of Mrs. Dale, the second plaintiff; and the tenth and eleventh plaintiffs are the daughters of Mrs. Stott, the third plaintiff. Some 10,093 ordinary shares in the company are held on trust for Mrs. Bradshaw for life with remainder to her children who attain the age of twenty-one years; 8,646 ordinary shares are held on similar trusts for Mrs. Dale and her children; and 8,043 are held on similar trusts for Mrs. Stott and her children. All the plaintiffs have attained the age of twenty-one, and the ages of the first three plaintiffs are respectively sixty-one, fifty-eight and fifty-two. These trust shares, which aggregate 26,782, are part of the ordinary shares of the company. The capital structure of that company is as follows. There are sixty thousand 10s. seven per cent. cumulative preference shares which have been issued and there are sixty-seven thousand ordinary shares of £1 each, but each share, whether preference or ordinary, is entitled to one vote per share at general meetings of the company, so that the total voting power in the company is one hundred and twenty-seven thousand votes. The defendants as trustees of the holding, therefore, hold voting rights of 26,782 votes. That is a substantial, but by no means a controlling, voting power in this company.

A brother of the first three plaintiffs, a Mr. Joseph Whichelow, was managing director of the company until July 17, 1953. He was a joint managing director with Mr. Philip Preston, the latter also being chairman of the company. The other directors were a Mr. George Preston, a Mr. Lyons and Mr. Orpen, the first defendant. On July 17 Mr. Whichelow was dismissed from his position as managing director in circumstances which I need not describe in detail. It is sufficient to say that he was indebted to the company in respect of sums which he had drawn from the company to expend, not on the company's business, but on his own. It is also fair to say that those sums were repaid to the company on July 24 or 25. As a result of that, however, disputes and difficulties arose between the directors of the company and the plaintiffs. It is undesirable that I should mention those matters in detail because they will be discussed fully at the general meeting which will be held on Nov. 26. At that general meeting, certain resolutions will be proposed, and the question is how the voting power of the trust shares should be exercised. The relevant resolutions are set out in a notice convening the meeting which was given on Oct. 30. Notice to propose the first five was given by Mr. Whichelow, that Mr. George Preston be removed from the office of director, that Mr. Orpen be removed from the office of director, that Mr. Philip Preston be removed from the office of director, that the first plaintiff be appointed a director, and a Mr. Stockall also be appointed a director. The next resolution, notice of which was given by Mr. Lyons, is that Mr. Whichelow be removed from the office of director. The plaintiffs and the defendants cannot agree on the manner in which the voting power of the trust shares should be exercised on those six resolutions. On that state of affairs, all the plaintiffs have sent a notice to the defendant trustees requesting them either to appoint Mrs. Bradshaw a proxy, or directing them how to vote on those six resolutions. The trustees are not prepared, unless they are so ordered by this court, to vote in that manner. They have indicated in the evidence the manner in which they, if unfettered by any order, would exercise their voting power.

The question I have to determine is one of law. The plaintiffs say: "We are all the persons entitled to the beneficial interest in these trust shares. We are, therefore, entitled to direct the trustees how they are to vote at the forthcoming meeting of the company"; and they rely on a passage in the judgment of ROMER, L.J., who delivered the first judgment of the Court of Appeal in Re Butt (1). The learned lord justice said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 172):

"I think the true way of looking at the matter is that which was presented to this court by counsel for the defendants—that the beneficiaries are entitled to be treated as though they were the registered shareholders in respect of trust shares with the advantages and disadvantages (e.g., restrictions imposed by the articles) which would be involved in that position and that they could compel the trustee directors, if necessary, to use their votes as the beneficiaries—or as the court, if the beneficiaries themselves are not in agreement—should think proper, even to the extent of altering the articles of association if the trust shares carry votes sufficient for that purpose."

The plaintiffs further say that they are all the persons entitled to these shares, because although there is the theoretical possibility of further issue being born, that, they say, is plainly impossible in the case of the first two plaintiffs, who are aged sixty-one and fifty-eight respectively, and with regard to the third plaintiff, who is fifty-two, her last-born daughter was born over twenty-one years ago. She is divorced from her husband, and they say, with some force, that the circumstances are indistinguishable from those before the Court of Appeal in Re Thornhill (2). In that case, the Court of Appeal, in very similar circumstances, gave leave for money to be paid out of court, on the assumption that the mother was past the age of child-bearing. Further, they say that in Re Smith (3), where all the persons entitled as objects of a discretion directed the trustees how to pay the income, the mother was treated as past the age of child-bearing and the court made an order on the footing that they were all the persons absolutely entitled. Therefore, they say they are entitled to give these directions to the trustees, who must carry out those directions.

On the other hand, counsel for the trustees says that the trust is still plainly subsisting—that, indeed, is obvious; there are three life tenants and a number of remaindermen—and the trustees do not desire to surrender their discretion to the court. They are anxious to exercise that discretion themselves, and he submits that, in those circumstances, the court cannot control the bona fide exercise of the trustees' discretion. Pausing there, let me say at once that on the evidence which I have read it seems to me perfectly clear that the trustees are acting in a manner which is entirely bona fide, in circumstances which they find extremely difficult, and I have no doubt that they have given their very best attention to the difficult question of how best to vote in the circumstances which have arisen. Counsel for the trustees relies on a passage in UNDERHILL'S LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES, 10th ed., p. 427, where the author says:

"Even where it is not absolutely certain that no more beneficiaries can come into existence, but it is morally so (e.g., where the ultimate remainder is in trust for the children of a woman who is past the age of child-bearing), the court will, on summons, give the trustees liberty to act according to the directions of the beneficiaries in esse so long as the contingent rights of living persons are not prejudiced, although it is understood that the court will not in such cases imperatively order the trustees to do so."

Counsel cited Re Brockbank (4), Re Higginbottom (5) and Tempest v. Lord Camoys (6), where SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., lays down the general principle in these terms (21 Ch.D. 578):

“It is very important that the law of the court on this subject should be understood. It is settled law that when a testator has given a pure discretion to trustees as to the exercise of a power, the court does not enforce the exercise of the power against the wish of the trustees, but it does prevent them from exercising it improperly.”

That, he said, is the principle to be applied in this case.

I think Re Butt (1) is difficult to reconcile with those cases, and I am not prepared to grant any relief upon interlocutory motion. Furthermore, in my judgment, the right way of looking at the position is that here are trustees, against whom nothing can be said, who are anxious to exercise their discretion. They have not had a direction from all persons beneficially entitled, because it cannot be said in law that the persons concerned are past the age of child-bearing. Re Thornhill (2) was, in my judgment, a different case, for there, exercising a well known, but entirely different, jurisdiction, the court gave leave to pay money out of court on the footing that the mother was past the age of child-bearing.

The matter before me must, I think, be dealt with as one of strict law, and in law one cannot say that all the beneficiaries are before the court. For this reason also I must refuse the injunction.

Motion dismissed.

Solicitors: Stilgoes (for the plaintiffs); Bischoff & Co., agents for FitzHugh, Woolley & Burnand, Brighton (for the defendants).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

F Assizes—Settlement of action—After entry for trial and before coming in day's list—Party under disability.

The Practice Direction, dated Apr. 21, 1947, set out in the ANNUAL PRACTICE as a note to R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 22B, dealing with the settlement of actions before they come into the day's list at assizes applies to cases in which either party is under a disability provided that a master or registrar has approved the settlement.

GODDARD, C.J.

3rd December, 1953.

Ex parte HOW.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Barry, JJ.), December 4, 1953.]

Justices—Clerk—Presence in retiring room while justices consider decision—Merits of case not affected—Complaint to Lord Chancellor.

The Divisional Court will not, merely because justices have disregarded the procedure laid down in PRACTICE DIRECTION dated Nov. 16, 1953, (ante, p. 1306) with regard to the presence of their clerk in their retiring room while they consider their decision, quash a conviction, if the disregard did not affect the merits of the case. The proper remedy for such misconduct of justices is a complaint to the Lord Chancellor.

R. v. Barry (Glamorgan) JJ. Ex p. Kashim (ante, p. 1005), distinguished.

AS TO GROUNDS FOR CERTIORARI TO QUASH, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 880-889, paras. 1484-1493; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 16, pp. 417-431, Nos. 2763-2918.

Case referred to:

(1) R. v. Barry (Glamorgan) JJ. Ex p. Kashim, ante, p. 1005; 117 J.P. 546.

APPLICATION for leave to apply for an order of certiorari.

On Sept. 18, 1953, the applicant, Alfred James How, a trolley-bus driver, was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Dartford, Kent, of driving a motor vehicle on a road without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road, contrary to s. 12 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and was fined £2 and ordered to pay £4 4s. 11d. costs. He applied for leave to move for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the conviction on the ground that justice did not seem to be done. In his affidavit the applicant stated that before the justices he pleaded Not Guilty; that after the evidence had been heard the chairman of the justices said to his clerk "Dismissed", and the clerk thereupon spoke to the chairman words which were inaudible to the applicant; that the justices then retired with their clerk and the shorthand writer; that the clerk remained at all times with the justices during their retirement, which was for a period of at least five minutes, although he was not called to retire with them and no question of law was raised; and that, when listening to the cases which were taken before his own, the applicant formed the opinion that the clerk controlled the chairman's decision.

G. V. Owen for the applicant.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: It should not be thought that every defendant who has been convicted when the clerk has retired with the justices can obtain from this court a quashing of the conviction. The disregard by justices of the direction given by us in R. v. Barry (Glamorgan) JJ. Ex p. Kashim (1)* would not necessarily affect the merits of the conviction, though it would be a ground of complaint to the Lord Chancellor against the justices. We do not think that the justices in the present case departed from the practice which doubtless they followed until the decision in R. v. Barry (Glamorgan) JJ. Ex p. Kashim (1), and leave to apply for an order of certiorari will be refused.

SELLERS, J.: I agree.

BARRY, J.: I agree.

Solicitors: Geoffrey B. Gush & Co. (for the applicant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

* See also Practice Direction, ante, p. 1306.

OAKES v. NEW SOUTH WALES COMMISSIONER OF STAMP DUTIES.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Porter, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker and Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), October 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, 13, December 3, 1953.]

A Privy Council—New South Wales—Estate duty—Incidence—Trust for benefit of deceased and his children as tenants in common in equal shares—Benefit to deceased—Deceased remunerated for management of trust property—Children's shares applied for maintenance and education—New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, s. 102 (2) (d).

B By s. 102 of the New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940: "For the purposes of the assessment and payment of death duty . . . the estate of a deceased person shall be deemed to include and consist of the following classes of property . . . (2) (d) Any property comprised in any gift made by the deceased at any time, whether before or after the passing of this Act, of which bona fide possession and enjoyment has not been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforth retained to the entire exclusion of the deceased, or of any benefit to him of whatsoever kind or in any way whatsoever whether enforceable at law or in equity or not and whenever the deceased died." In 1924 F., by a deed of trust, declared that he held certain lands therein described, which were held and used by him as grazing property, on trust for himself and his four children as tenants in common in equal shares. A number of powers and discretions were conferred on the trustee, including wide powers of management. In addition to reimbursing himself all expenses incurred in the administration of the trust, the trustee was to be entitled to remuneration for all work done by him in connection with the trust as if he were not a trustee. F. acted as trustee until his death in 1947. During the time he acted as trustee he received varying sums as remuneration under the trust, and, after deducting these sums and other outgoings and expenses, he divided the profits received from the trust properties into five equal shares, crediting one share to himself and one share to each of his children. He applied the amounts credited to each of the children to their maintenance and education until they came of age, after which they were paid to the children. After F.'s death the Commissioner of Stamp Duties assessed the death duty payable in respect of his estate on the basis that the final balance of the estate included the whole value of the trust property. The appellant, the executor of F.'s will, appealed against this assessment, contending that only one-fifth of the value of the trust property should have been included in the final balance.

F
G
H HELD: to bring a case within the scope of s. 102 (2) (d) it was not sufficient to take the case as a whole and to find that the settlor had continued to enjoy substantial advantages having some relation to the settled property, but it was necessary to consider the nature and source of each such advantage, and to determine whether or not it was a benefit of such a kind as to come within the scope of the section; the use by F. of the income which accrued to his children for their maintenance and education was not such as to bring the case within the section since it was in their best interests and any advantage which F. obtained thereby was not at their expense, nor did it impair or diminish the value of the gift to them or their enjoyment of it and any such advantage was not a benefit within s. 102 (2) (d); but the taking by F. of remuneration under the trust, even though he was authorised so to do, was a benefit to him within s. 102 (2) (d), since it must have come out of the trust property and must, therefore, have diminished the amount available for division among the tenants in common for their enjoyment, and, under the trust, the whole beneficial interest in the property passed to F. and his children in equal shares; accordingly, the case came within s. 102 (2) (d), and the appeal must be dismissed.

EDITORIAL NOTE. Section 102 (2) (d) of the New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, is in similar terms to s. 43 (2) (a) of the Finance Act, 1940, for which, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, p. 470.

Cases referred to:

- (1) St. Aubyn (L.M.) v. A.-G. (No. 2), [1951] 2 All E.R. 473; [1952] A.C. 15; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) A.-G. v. Worrall, [1895] 1 Q.B. 99; 64 L.J.Q.B. 141; 71 L.T. 807; 59 J.P. 467; 21 Digest 12, 54.
- (3) New South Wales Stamp Duties Comr. v. Perpetual Trustee Co., Ltd., [1943] 1 All E.R. 525; [1943] A.C. 425; 112 L.J.P.C. 55; 168 L.T. 414; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Grey (Earl) v. A.-G., [1900] A.C. 124; 69 L.J.Q.B. 308; 82 L.T. 62; 21 Digest 12, 51.

APPEAL by an executor from a judgment of the High Court of Australia dated May 8, 1952, affirming by a majority a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales dated Sept. 13, 1951, on a Case Stated dated Mar. 20, 1950, by the Commissioner of Stamp Duties of the State of New South Wales.

The facts appear in the judgment.

Sir Garfield Barwick, Q.C. (of the Australian Bar), and R. O. Wilberforce for the appellant.

G. Wallace, Q.C. (of the Australian Bar), Sir Frank Soskice, Q.C., and E. B. Stamp for the respondent.

Dec. 3. LORD REID: This is an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Australia dated May 8, 1952, affirming by a majority (DIXON, C.J., WILLIAMS and FULLAGAR, JJ.; WEBB and KITTO, JJ., dissenting) a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of Sept. 13, 1951. The appellant is the executor under the will of the deceased, Leslie William Friend, who died in 1947, and the question at issue arises on a Case Stated under the New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, and relates to the incidence of death duty on the property held by the deceased as trustee under a trust deed made by him on Sept. 1, 1924.

In 1924 the deceased owned a grazing property in New South Wales known as "Ellerston" and carried on the business of grazier there. At that time he had four children, all of whom were under twenty-one years of age. By deed-poll dated Sept. 1, 1924, he declared that, as from July 1, 1924, he had held, and thenceforth would hold, the property and the rents, issues and profits thereof

"upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions hereinafter expressed concerning the same that is to say:"

The first two clauses following thereupon were as follows:

"1.—Upon trust that I or other the trustee or trustees for the time being of these presents (hereinafter called the trustee) shall either retain and use the said lands or at the trustee's absolute discretion at any time or from time to time sell and convert into money the same or any part thereof and invest the proceeds of such sale and conversion upon such securities real or personal and whether authorised by law for the investment of trust funds or not (and with liberty from time to time to vary and transpose the investments) as the trustee shall in his uncontrolled discretion think fit. The said lands and proceeds of sale thereof and the securities upon which the same may from time to time be invested are hereinafter called 'the trust fund.' 2.—That the capital and income of the trust fund shall be held by the trustee upon trust for the said Leslie William Friend and his children

Henry James Friend, Donald Stuart Friend, Terence Maxwell Friend, and Gwynneth Ailsa Friend as tenants in common in equal shares; and if and so often as any such child shall die under the age of twenty-five years and without leaving a child or children him or her surviving then as well as to the original share of the child so dying as to any share or shares which shall have accrued to him or her by virtue of his present limitation upon trust for the others of such children and the said Leslie William Friend as tenants in common in equal shares."

Thereafter the deed of trust sets out a number of powers and discretions conferred on the trustee, including wide powers of management, and, in particular, powers

"4.— . . (h) To appropriate and partition any real or personal property forming part of the trust fund to or towards the share of any person or persons therein under the trusts hereinbefore contained and for that purpose to fix the value of such real or personal property so appropriated as the trustee shall think fit and to charge any share with such sums by way of equality of partition as he may think fit and every such appropriation valuation and partition shall be binding upon all persons interested in the trust fund provided always that as regards any share of the said trust fund not absolutely vested any such appropriation shall be without prejudice to the exercise of any powers hereby expressly or impliedly given to the trustee . . . (j) In addition to reimbursing himself all expenses incurred by the trustee in the administration of the trust the trustee shall be entitled to remuneration for all work done by him in managing and controlling any property forming part of the trust fund or carrying on the business of a grazier or pastoralist or other business in the course of his administration of the said fund in the same manner and as fully in all respects as if he were not a trustee hereof. (k) To purchase notwithstanding that he is a trustee hereof all or any property comprising the trust fund or any part thereof by public auction or by private contract provided in the latter case that the sale shall be conducted by Goldbrough Mort and Co., Ltd. or be made at a price and upon terms and conditions approved by that company or by a valuer or other nominee appointed by the said company . . . (o) To convey appropriate or dedicate any part or parts of the property comprising the trust fund for public or charitable purposes either gratuitously or for such consideration as the trustee may think proper to accept."

In 1928 the deceased, as trustee, sold "Ellerston" and invested the proceeds in another grazing property known as "Glendon" and in certain mortgages, and he continued to manage this trust property until his death. He fixed from time to time amounts to be received by himself as remuneration under cl. 4 (j) quoted above. He received for each of the first six years £3,000 and thereafter smaller sums; for the last three years before his death he only received £100 per annum. After deducting these and other outgoings and expenses, he divided the profits from the trust properties into five equal shares, crediting one share to himself and one share to each of his children. As stated by the commissioner in the Case Stated,

"The amounts credited to each such child were paid or applied by the testator for or towards the maintenance and education of such child or were paid to the mother of such child for or towards his or her maintenance and education or were paid to such child after he or she had come of age."

Before his death all his children had come of age and all but one had attained the age of twenty-five.

The value of the trust properties at the date of the deceased's death was £71,900 9s. 7d. The Commissioner of Stamp Duties assessed the death duty payable in respect of this estate on the basis that the final balance of the deceased's estate included the whole value of the trust property. The appellant contended that there should have been included only one-fifth of the value of the trust property and required the commissioner to state a Case for the opinion of the Supreme Court of New South Wales. A Case was duly stated and set out as the question for the determination of the court:

"(1) Should the whole of the property which was at the date of the death of the testator subject to the trusts of the said deed be included in his estate for the purposes of the assessment and payment of death duty?"

The Supreme Court answered "Yes" to this question and on appeal this decision was affirmed by the High Court of Australia.

The question at issue in this appeal depends entirely on the applicability to the facts of this case of the provisions of s. 102 (2) (d) of the Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940. Those provisions, so far as material to this case, are as follows:

"For the purposes of the assessment and payment of death duty . . . the estate of a deceased person shall be deemed to include and consist of the following classes of property . . . (2) (d) Any property comprised in any gift made by the deceased at any time, whether before or after the passing of this Act, of which bona fide possession and enjoyment has not been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforth retained to the entire exclusion of the deceased, or of any benefit to him of whatsoever kind or in any way whatsoever whether enforceable at law or in equity or not and whenever the deceased died."

The appellant admits that the value of one-fifth share of the whole trust property was properly included in the final balance of the deceased's estate, but contends that the value of four-fifths of that property, being the value of the shares of the four children, ought to be excluded from the final balance as being property comprised in a gift made by the deceased, of which bona fide possession and enjoyment was immediately assumed by the children and thenceforth retained by them to the entire exclusion of the deceased or of any benefit to him. The respondent contends that there was not entire exclusion from the children's shares of the deceased, or of benefit to him, and the respondent founds on several advantages to the deceased as being benefits within the meaning of the above section. He founds on the application of the children's income from the trust for the maintenance and education of the children as being of advantage to the deceased, in that he was thereby relieved, at least in part, from his obligation to maintain his children. Then he founds on the deceased having had power to take, and having taken, remuneration as trustee in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed. He also founds on the provisions of cl. 4 (h) and (k) as conferring benefits on the deceased. And, finally, he founds on the deceased having resided with his family on the trust property as a further benefit. The Case Stated makes no reference to this residence, but it appears that this matter was raised in argument in the Supreme Court and it was admitted before their Lordships that the deceased had resided on the property in his capacity as trustee and manager. It appears to their Lordships that it may well be that the property could not have been properly managed unless the manager resided there, and that there is nothing to show whether this residence was, in itself, an advantage to the deceased; moreover, it is not clear whether this residence went beyond the rights of the deceased as co-owner of the property. Their Lordships are, therefore, not prepared to regard this residence as being, in itself, a benefit to the deceased in any relevant sense.

In all but one respect s. 102 (2) (d) corresponds with s. 43 (2) (a) of the United Kingdom Finance Act, 1940. The only substantial difference between them is that s. 102 brings in "any benefit to him of whatsoever kind or in any way whatsoever whether enforceable at law or in equity or not";

whereas s. 43 only brings in "any benefit to him by contract or otherwise". But that difference was not founded on in argument and is not material in this case. These sections have given rise to much litigation, and British authorities have frequently been cited in Australian cases and vice versa. In St. Aubyn (L.M.) v. A.-G. (No. 2) (1), the earlier cases, including the Australian cases, were fully considered. In their Lordships' judgment, it is now clear that it is not sufficient, to bring a case within the scope of these sections, to take the situation as a whole and find that the settlor has continued to enjoy substantial advantages which have some relation to the settled property: it is necessary to consider the nature and source of each of these advantages and determine whether or not it is a benefit of such a kind as to come within the scope of the section.

Their Lordships will first consider whether the use of the income which accrued to the settlor's children from the settled estate was such as to bring the case within the section. If property comprised in a gift is to be excluded from the estate of the deceased donor, the statute requires that bona fide possession and enjoyment of the property shall have been assumed and retained by the donee to the entire exclusion of the donor. If property is held in trust for the donee, then the trustee's possession is the donee's possession for this purpose, and it matters not that the trustee is the donor himself. The donor is entirely excluded if he only holds the property in a fiduciary capacity and deals with it in accordance with his fiduciary duty. But the statute requires not only exclusion of the donor but also exclusion of any benefit to him, and it was on that matter that the argument turned. It appears from the case that, after the children came of age, they received payment of their shares of the income: it is not said that that involved any benefit to the deceased. But before they came of age their shares of income were used to pay for their maintenance and education, and it was said that this afforded some relief to the deceased who would otherwise have had to pay out of his own money. Two arguments were submitted. In the first place, it was said that spending the children's money in this way was improper, or at least disadvantageous to them, and that this combination of advantage to the donor with disadvantage to the donee brought the case within the statute. Their Lordships do not find any sufficient basis in fact for this argument. There is nothing in the case from which it can be inferred that the deceased acted at all improperly in this matter. At least after 1925 this money could properly be spent on the children's maintenance under statutory powers if that was in the best interests of the children. In the absence of anything to indicate the contrary it must be taken that the deceased acted properly in so applying his children's income, that this was in the best interest of the children, and, therefore, the children must be held to have had full benefit and enjoyment of their money. The case might have been very different if it had appeared that the deceased had so spent his children's shares of the income from the trust, not entirely in their interest, but wholly or partly for his own benefit in order to relieve himself from the expense of maintaining his children.

Before their Lordships for the first time a further argument of this nature was submitted. It was said that there was no statutory power to spend this money on the children's maintenance until December, 1925, that it appeared from the Case that the deceased had so spent his children's money before that date and that, therefore, at least to this extent, the deceased had acted improperly and it could not be said that the children's money had been applied for their benefit. This argument fails because there is nothing in the Case to show that any of the children's money was spent before December, 1925. No doubt there was ultimately spent income which accrued in respect of the period before that date; but the trust only operated as from July 1, 1924, and thereafter income had to be earned, accounts had to be made up, the children's shares had to be credited to them, and after that some time may have elapsed before the money was spent. Their Lordships are not prepared to assume that the money was spent before the date which is crucial for this argument.

Then it was said that even if the income which accrued to the children was properly spent for their maintenance and they are to be held to have had full benefit and enjoyment of it, yet there was also a benefit to the deceased, because if it had not been available he would have had to spend more of his own money. The findings in the Case are not very specific, but their Lordships will assume that there was some advantage to the deceased. That advantage, however, was not at the expense of the children and did not impair or diminish the value of the gift to them or their enjoyment of it. It is possible for a donee, in the full and unrestrained enjoyment of his gift, to use or spend it in a way that happens to produce some advantage to the donor without there being any loss or disadvantage to the donee. But, in their Lordships' judgment, any such advantage is not a benefit within the meaning of the section. The point is not strictly covered by authority, but the contrary view would be difficult to reconcile with what was said in the House of Lords in St. Aubyn's case (1). The facts in that case were complicated and it may be sufficient for present purposes to state that, as the result of settlements, the formation of a company and certain transactions, the settled property at the relevant date consisted of fifty thousand ordinary shares of the company, and sums of £750,000 payable by instalments, and £100,000 immediately payable, by the company. By virtue of an overriding general power of appointment Lord St. Levan, who had a life interest, vested in himself absolutely the sums payable by the company and surrendered his life interest in the shares so that bona fide possession and enjoyment of them was immediately assumed by the persons next entitled. But it was argued that there was not entire exclusion of Lord St. Levan or of any benefit to him by contract, or otherwise, mainly because of the rights which he retained to receive money from the company. The Crown relied largely on A.-G. v. Worrall (2), and it is in the passages dealing with that case that their Lordships find most help on the question now under consideration. LORD RADCLIFFE explained the case thus ([1951] 2 All E.R. 495):

"A father had made a present to his son of a sum of about £24,000 secured on mortgage, and the son had bought in the equity of redemption for a small sum. In return for his father's gift the son had covenanted to pay him an annuity of £735 per annum during his life. In effect, the son was returning to the father the income on the property given during the remainder of the father's life. It seems to me reasonable enough for a court to hold in those circumstances that the son had not obtained the enjoyment of what was given free from a contractual benefit to the father which encumbered the enjoyment of the very thing that was given. To hold otherwise would have been to stop at the mere form of the transaction."

Then he added (ibid.):

"But I think it a very mistaken form of reasoning to deduce from a decision that a benefit, to be within the mischief of the section, need not necessarily be by way of reservation out of the subject-matter of a gift the general proposition that all benefits are within the mischief of the section, whether they are by way of reservation out of the subject-matter of the gift or not."

And LORD SIMONDS said (ibid., 481):

"Whatever the words, which have appeared in a series of Acts, might have meant to your Lordships if the matter were res integra, it cannot in face of the decision in A.-G. v. Worrall (2) be denied that it is possible for possession and enjoyment of property not to be retained by the donee to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, though the donor himself no longer has any sort of interest in it. But the words, and particularly the word 'exclusion', are singularly inapt to cover a benefit which does not arise by way of reservation out of that which is given, and I am not disposed to travel further than I am constrained by authority along a line of interpretation which appears to me difficult to justify."

On the view of the facts of the present case which their Lordships have felt bound to adopt, this alleged benefit neither encumbered the enjoyment of the gift, nor arose by way of reservation out of that which was given, and their Lordships can find no good reason for holding that it brings this case within the statute.

For similar reasons their Lordships are not able to accept the ground of the judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales to the effect that the linking together of the one-fifth beneficial interests of the donor and the donees resulted in a benefit or advantage to each share and that this advantage to the donor brought the case within the section. Even if this linkage was of advantage to the deceased (of which there is no evidence), that advantage did not in any way impair the enjoyment of the gift by the donees or trench on their rights.

The next advantage to the deceased was of quite a different character. The deceased, under the power which he reserved to himself under cl. (4) (j) of the deed of trust, took considerable sums as remuneration for his services in managing the trust property. Their Lordships will assume that those sums were reasonable and no more than would have been appropriate remuneration for any other manager. But receiving those sums was clearly an advantage or benefit to the deceased, and the question is whether it was a benefit of such a kind as to come within the section. If a donor reserves to himself a beneficial interest in property and only gives to the donees such beneficial interests as remain after his own reserved interest has been satisfied, it is now well established that such reservation of a beneficial interest does not involve any benefit to the donor within the meaning of the section. In New South Wales Stamp Duties Comr. v. Perpetual Trustee Co., Ltd. (3), LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, having dealt with the earlier cases and in particular Earl Grey v. A.-G. (4), said in a passage cited with approval in St. Aubyn's case (1) ([1943] 1 All E.R. 533):

"There is nothing laid down as law in that case which conflicts with the view that the entire exclusion of the donor from possession and enjoyment which is contemplated by s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1889 [the forerunner of s. 43 of the Finance Act, 1940] is entire exclusion from possession and enjoyment of the beneficial interest in property which has been given by the gift, and that possession and enjoyment by the donor of some beneficial interest therein which he has not included in the gift is not inconsistent with the entire exclusion from possession and enjoyment which the subsection requires."

It follows that if the right to take remuneration could be regarded as a beneficial interest in the property reserved by the deceased when making the deed of trust, then his remuneration would not be a benefit within the scope of the section. But their Lordships cannot regard a right to take remuneration for managing property as a beneficial interest in the property. A trustee is not permitted to take remuneration for services performed by him unless he is authorised to do so: in this case, the trustee was authorised to do so because the deceased provided in the deed of trust that he, as trustee, or the trustee for the time being, should be entitled to remuneration as if he were not a trustee. If the deceased had resigned office and another trustee had taken his place it could hardly have been contended that this provision gave to the new trustee a beneficial interest in the trust property, and in their Lordships' judgment the deceased did not reserve to himself a beneficial interest in the property by inserting this provision in the deed of trust. Indeed, the terms of the deed of trust make it clear that the whole beneficial interest in the property passed to the deceased and his children in equal shares, so that the subject-matter of the gift to each child was one-fifth of the whole beneficial interest in the property. Clause 2 declared that the capital and interest of the trust fund should be held on trust for the deceased and his first-named children as tenants in common in equal shares, and neither the right of the trustee to take remuneration, nor any other right, power or discretion conferred on the trustee affected the position of the deceased or his children as tenants in common of the whole beneficial interest in the trust property. Any remuneration taken by the deceased, or any other trustee, must come out of the trust property and must, therefore, diminish the amount available for division among the tenants in common for their enjoyment.

But the appellant argued that the children had had all the possession and enjoyment to which they were entitled under the deed of trust: they could only possess through the trustee and, subject to his rights and powers and, therefore, the exercise of his rights by the trustee, could not trench on or impair that possession. The appellant founded on another passage in the judgment of LORD RUSSELL in the Perpetual Trustee Co. case (3), when he referred to the donee being (ibid., 530)

“ . . . put in such bona fide beneficial possession and enjoyment of the property comprised in the gift as the nature of the gift and the circumstances permitted.”

It was said that in the present case the nature of the gift to the children and the circumstances never permitted the children to have any greater possession or enjoyment than in fact they had. But to understand what LORD RUSSELL meant by these words it is necessary to quote the preceding passage (ibid.):

“ In their opinion the property comprised in the gift was the equitable interest in the eight hundred and fifty shares, which was given by the settlor to his son. The disposition of that interest was effected by the creation of a trust, i.e., by transferring the legal ownership of the shares to trustees and declaring such trusts in favour of the son as were co-extensive with the gift which the settlor desired to give. The donee was the recipient of the gift; whether the son alone was the donee (as their Lordships think) or whether the son and the body of trustees together constituted the donee seems immaterial. The trustees alone were not the donee. They were in no sense the object of the settlor's bounty. Did the donee assume bona fide possession and enjoyment immediately upon the gift? The linking of possession with enjoyment as a composite object which has to be assumed by the donee indicates that the possession and enjoyment contemplated is beneficial possession and enjoyment by the object of the donor's bounty. This question, therefore, must be answered in the affirmative, because the son was (through the medium of the trustees) immediately put in such bona fide beneficial possession and enjoyment of the property comprised in the gift as the nature of the gift and the circumstances permitted.”

LORD RUSSELL was there explaining in general terms how the section is to be interpreted when the subject-matter of the gift is an equitable interest. He was not dealing with a case like the present where the donor received money which, if he had not taken it, would have gone to the donee under the terms of the gift. In the Perpetual Trustee Co. case (3), the settlor derived no actual benefit from the shares or their dividends. He might have exercised voting powers in respect of the shares but did not do so; and he was one of several trustees and they might have used trust money for the maintenance of the son but did not do so. With the exception of some insurance premiums, the whole income was accumulated and the trust fund was paid to the son on his majority. Their Lordships do not read the words on which the appellant founds as modifying, or intended to modify, the later passage in LORD RUSSELL's judgment which has been quoted above and in which he only refers to reservation by the donor of a beneficial interest in the property.

But, even if there is no authority to support it, the appellant's case requires:

further examination. The argument is clearly and forcibly stated in the dissenting judgment of KITTO, J., in the High Court of Australia where he says:

A "If the property comprised in the gift had consisted of four one-fifths of the fee simple of the trust property (whether legal and equitable or only equitable), and the donees, pursuant to a collateral agreement or otherwise, had allowed the deceased to have the benefits which in fact he enjoyed, the case would have fallen clearly enough within s. 102 (2) (d). But it seems to me that, in order to hold that four-fifths of the fee simple was the property comprised in the gift, one would have to construe the deed, not as a whole, but as if it were divided into two sections, effecting two quite distinct transactions, the first transaction being a disposition in equity of aliquot parts of the fee simple, and the second transaction consisting of a set of provisions operating to exact from the donees a power for the donor to derogate from the possession and enjoyment which an undivided share of the equitable fee simple enables the owner of it to have and keep to himself. I cannot construe the deed in that way. It was a deed poll, and the benefits which the deceased derived in accordance with its provisions were benefits which the donees neither permitted him to derive nor had any power to deny him. They were in this position of impotence, not by their own choice, but because the deceased, in exercise of his right to give exactly what interests he liked and withhold exactly what he liked, had chosen to give them interests so hedged about as not to enable them to exclude him from those benefits. It was for him, when framing his deed, to delimit the interests he was parting with; and he did delimit them, not by any one part of the deed considered by itself, but by the entirety of its provisions. The donees had no voice in deciding to what extent their interests should be subject to rights, powers or privileges retained by the deceased. They got interests which were limited ab initio, by the terms of their creation; and the limits were such that the interests were inherently insusceptible of being so possessed and enjoyed as to preclude the deceased from deriving those benefits which in fact he derived."

E

It is true that the deceased did not exact from his children his power to take benefits, and that the benefits which he took were benefits which they neither permitted him to derive nor had any power to deny him. But, in their Lordships' judgment, the question is not whether the donees permitted the donor to take benefits. It is whether the donor took benefit out of that which was given.

F If a benefit arises by way of reservation out of interests which were given, then, no doubt, the donees' interests are inherently insusceptible of being so possessed and enjoyed as to preclude the donor from taking that benefit, but the section applies because there is not entire exclusion of the donor or of benefit to him from the interests comprised in the gift. The contrast is between reserving a beneficial interest and only giving such interests as remain, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, reserving power to take benefit out of, or at the expense of, interests which are given, and for reasons already stated their Lordships are of opinion that the present case is within the latter class.

G

Two other powers reserved by the deceased were also founded on as benefits—power to appropriate and partition the trust property under cl. 4 (h) and power to purchase it under cl. 4 (k). It may be that the deceased could legitimately have used those powers to his own advantage, but, in fact, he made no use of them at all. So, at most, there were here potential benefits. As their Lordships have already decided that taking remuneration was a benefit within the scope of the section, they find it unnecessary to deal with these other matters.

H

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal ought to be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Stephenson, Harwood & Tatham (for the appellant): Light & Fulton (for the respondent). [Reported by G. A. KIDNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

DUNSTER v. ABBOTT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), November 12, 13, 1953.]

Licensee—Canvasser—Injury suffered on premises of potential customer—Liability of occupier.

The defendant was the owner and occupier of premises bordered by an unlighted country road. The only means of access to the dwelling-house from the road was a concrete bridge over a ditch and a drive leading to the house. The plaintiff entered the premises after dark with the intention of selling advertising space to the defendant who refused to do business with him. As he left the premises, the plaintiff tripped and fell into the ditch and thereby suffered injuries. He complained that the defendant had turned off a light too soon. In an action for damages for personal injuries,

HELD: on the facts, the bridge over the ditch did not amount to an unusual or a concealed danger by day or night, and there was no breach of duty on the part of the defendant in regard to it; the defendant was not negligent with regard to the light; and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages.

Per curiam: The plaintiff was a licensee and not an invitee because he was on the defendant's premises on his own business and not on any matter in which he and the defendant had a common interest.

Per DENNING, L.J.: A canvasser who comes on your premises without your consent is a trespasser. Once he has your consent he is a licensee. Not until you do business with him is he an invitee.

AS TO DUTY OF OCCUPIER TO INVITEES AND LICENSEES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 600-612, paras. 851-863; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 35-49, Nos. 208-306.

Cases referred to:

(1) Pearson v. Lambeth Borough Council, [1950] 1 All E.R. 682; [1950] 2 K.B. 353; 114 J.P. 214; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Latham v. Johnson (R.) & Nephew, Ltd., [1913] 1 K.B. 398; 82 L.J.K.B. 258; 108 L.T. 4; 77 J.P. 137; 36 Digest 38, 223.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of ORMEROD, J., dated May 12, 1953.

The plaintiff was employed by the Bristol Printing and Publishing Co. as a canvasser to sell advertising space in certain publications. The defendant was the owner and occupier of premises known as "Broadlands" near Canterbury, which comprised a dwelling-house and a builder's yard where the defendant carried on his business as a builder. The only means of access to the premises from the road, which was unlighted during the hours of darkness, was a concrete bridge across a ditch and a drive leading to the dwelling-house, both bridge and drive being bordered on either side by a low concrete wall. There were no railings between the defendant's hedge and that side of the ditch nearest the dwelling-house. On Nov. 29, 1950, the plaintiff, wishing to sell to the defendant advertising space on the covers of certain telephone directories, visited the defendant's house and was asked by the defendant's wife to call later in the day. The plaintiff entered the premises after dark to keep the appointment, his way up the drive being partly illuminated by a light placed at the corner of the garage which adjoined the house. Having seen the defendant, who did not wish to do business with him, the plaintiff left the house. The light at the corner of the garage was still on, but before the plaintiff had reached the roadway and as he was approaching the bridge over the ditch, the defendant switched off the light, and the plaintiff tripped and fell into the ditch, thereby suffering injuries.

In an action by the plaintiff for damages for personal injuries the learned judge came to the conclusion, although he did not regard it as material to his decision, that the plaintiff was an invitee. He regarded the bridge over the ditch as an unusual danger, and held that the defendant was negligent in that he failed to leave the light on for a length of time sufficient to prevent the plaintiff falling into danger. He awarded the plaintiff £469 damages, and judgment was entered accordingly.

Gardiner, Q.C., and Sabin for the plaintiff.

Berryman, Q.C., and Jukes for the defendant.

- SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: There was a debate below and before us whether the plaintiff was an invitee or a licensee. The learned judge, I think, did not consider that that question was very material, but, as the point was argued on both sides, I will say a word or two about it. The learned judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was an invitee. Counsel for the plaintiff says with force that one ought not to distinguish between the house and the business premises as they were connected. Although we did not hear counsel for the defendant in reply, I will assume for my present purpose, without deciding it, that that distinction in the circumstances of this case does not avail the defendant. On that basis counsel for the plaintiff submitted that anyone who comes to business premises with the hope that business in which he is interested will result should be regarded as an invitee. I think that is defining the character much too widely. In Pearson v. Lambeth Borough Council (1), ASQUITH, L.J., said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 688):

"It is more exact to say that an invitee is a person who comes on the occupier's premises with his consent on business in which the occupier and he have a common interest . . ."

- I do not think when the plaintiff came on the defendant's premises that he and the defendant had a common interest. He no doubt hoped, wrongly as it transpired, that a common interest might result, but they had not at that time a common interest. It is said that there is very little authority on this point, and, in particular, there are no cases dealing with commercial travellers. It may be that, if a case arose concerning commercial travellers, evidence might be given as to the practice and custom in the particular trade which might or might not bring them within the words of ASQUITH, L.J. But I am dealing with this particular case.

Here was a man who was hoping that he might find the defendant to be interested in this advertisement and I think that he was a licensee. If he were a licensee, taking words from a judgment of HAMILTON, L.J., in Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (2) ([1913] 1 K.B. 411):

- "The rule as to licensees, too, is that they must take the premises as they find them apart from concealed sources of danger; where dangers are obvious they run the risk of them. In darkness where they cannot see whether there is danger or not, if they will walk they walk at their peril."

I do not think this case raises what may be a difficult question as to the effect of darkness on unusual dangers because I do not think this was an unusual danger.

- I think that this was an ordinary means of access to a house over a ditch which is an extremely common feature of roads in the country and that there was no unusual or concealed source of danger in respect of which the occupier was under any duty to give warning. Indeed counsel for the plaintiff, having developed his proposition that the plaintiff was an invitee, to my mind, rather withdrew it because he based his main argument on the proposition that, the plaintiff having come with the defendant's knowledge and without objection on to his premises, the defendant was guilty of ordinary negligence in a failure to take reasonable care in relation to his exit from those premises. On that basis I do not think it would matter whether he was an invitee or a licensee.

The learned judge holding that the plaintiff was an invitee and regarding the bridge as a dangerous situation of unusual danger—that, with respect, is where I differ from him—also said:

"He [the defendant] did not in the circumstances take reasonable care, by leaving the light on for a sufficiently long time, to prevent the plaintiff from falling into danger."

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence of both sides as to the light, concluded that the defendant was not negligent in switching it off when he thought that the plaintiff had reached the road, and continued:] The plaintiff is a man of sixty-one and, apart from the shock, he suffered considerable injury, but it does seem to me that this was an accident which he brought entirely on himself. He said that he never took a torch with him. I should have thought that in these days anyone who went about on a dark unlighted road in a country district without a torch was asking for trouble, or, at any rate, if he found himself in that position, I should have thought he must proceed with very great care. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: A canvasser who comes on your premises without your consent is a trespasser. Once he has your consent, he is a licensee. Not until you do business with him is he an invitee. Even when you have done business with him, it seems rather strange that your duty towards him should be different when he comes up to your door from what it is when he goes away. Does he change his colour in the middle of the conversation? What is the position when you discuss business with him and it comes to nothing? No confident answer can be given to these questions. Such is the morass into which the law has floundered in trying to distinguish between licensees and invitees.

In the present case the canvasser, the plaintiff, came to the door; the householder, the defendant, asked him in; the plaintiff stated his business; the defendant was not interested; and the plaintiff left. On those facts I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiff was not an invitee, but only a licensee, because he was there on his own business and not on any matter in which the defendant had an interest. We all know that a guest whom a householder invites to dinner is only a licensee, even though the householder has an ulterior business motive in asking him. It would be strange if a householder owed a higher duty to a canvasser who comes unasked than he does to a guest who comes on his express invitation.

In this case, however, it does not matter whether the plaintiff was an invitee or a licensee. That distinction is only material in regard to the static condition of the premises. It is concerned with dangers which have been present for some time in the physical structure of the premises. It has no relevance in regard to current operations, that is, to things being done on the premises, to dangers which are brought about by the contemporaneous activities of the occupier or his servants or of anyone else. The instance was put by SOMERVELL, L.J., in argument of the driving of a vehicle, but many others can be imagined. In regard to current operations, the duty of the occupier—or of the person conducting the operations—is simply to use reasonable care in all the circumstances. This duty is owed alike to all persons lawfully on the premises who may be affected by his activities, and it is the same whether the person injured is an invitee or a licensee, a volunteer or a guest. Negligence causing damage gives a cause of action, and it is not proper nowadays in this regard to draw any distinction between negligent acts of commission and negligent omissions. Bearing this in mind, it is tolerably plain that the static condition of these premises was not a danger to anyone who used reasonable care for his own safety. The bridge over the ditch was not an unusual danger, nor was it a concealed danger, either by day or night. No matter whether the plaintiff was an invitee or licensee, the defendant was in no breach of duty in regard to it. The case for the plaintiff depends, therefore, entirely on the action of the defendant in putting out the light. That was a contemporaneous activity, a current operation, on his part in respect of which his duty to the plaintiff was simply to use reasonable care. The judge seems to have thought that the householder was negligent in turning the light off too soon, but I cannot agree with this view. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence as to the light and held that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant.] I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J., considered the question of the light, held that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, and continued: On the question whether the plaintiff was a licensee or an invitee I agree that he was a licensee on the grounds which my brethren have expressed. He is not within the definition of an invitee which ASQUITH, L.J., laid down in Pearson v. Lambeth Borough Council (1) because the business on which the plaintiff called was not a business in which he and the defendant had a common interest. I, accordingly, agree that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

B Solicitors: Betty Harris (for the plaintiff); Hair & Co. (for the defendant).

[Reported by MISS PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

C

WARMAN v. BARCLAYS BANK, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 30, 1953.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Disallowance—Advice on evidence before delivery of defence—

D Attendance of country solicitor at consultation in London—Conference to advise plaintiff to agree to settlement—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), sched. III, para. 4 (1).

In an action against the executors of a will and the sole beneficiary under the will, the plaintiff, who had been granted a certificate of civil aid under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, claimed inter alia specific performance of an oral agreement, made between her and the deceased in 1932, whereby they agreed, inter alia, to make, and not to revoke, mutual wills in each other's favour in regard to the disposition of a dwelling-house at Cardiff which they had purchased together and in which they had lived together until the death of the deceased in 1950. The case was a very complicated one, the facts relied on by the plaintiff in support of her claim being based on the relationship between her and the deceased over a long period. The legal aid area committee authorised the plaintiff's solicitors at Cardiff to engage leading counsel, and the instructing solicitor who had detailed information on all the facts went from Cardiff to London to attend a consultation between leading and junior counsel. Without putting in a defence, the beneficiary under the will offered to settle the case by making a payment to the plaintiff. As the plaintiff was unwilling to accept the offer, a conference with junior counsel was arranged so that he could satisfy her that it would be in her interest to accept, which she then did. An order was made in the action for the taxation of the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client under sched. III, para. 4 (1), to the Act of 1949. On taxation the taxing master disallowed, inter alia, the following items: (a) a fee of £3 5s. 6d. to junior counsel to advise on evidence; (b) fees for the consultation in London; (c) the fee for the country solicitor's attendance at the consultation and his travelling charges; and (d) the fees in connection with the conference with junior counsel before the settlement was accepted.

H

HELD: until a defence was delivered it was impossible to tell what the issues at the trial would be, and, therefore, it was premature at that stage to ask counsel to advise on evidence, and, as fees had been allowed to junior counsel for settling the statement of claim and for advising generally, item (a) could not be allowed; as the case was a difficult one which depended on a number of small facts, the consultation with leading counsel before he wrote his opinion was justified, particularly in view of the fact that he advised certain amendments to the statement of claim, and, in the circumstances, the exceptional course of the country solicitor going to London to attend the consultation was also justified, and the proper fees and charges should be allowed in respect of items (b) and (c); in regard to (d), it was desirable to satisfy the plaintiff, if possible, that it was in her interest at that stage to settle the litigation and it was proper that she should see counsel for that purpose, and, therefore, counsel's fee for the conference and the solicitor's charge for attending should be allowed.

FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, sched. III, para. 4 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, p. 566.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by the plaintiff for a review of the taxation of her costs.

The plaintiff, who had been granted a certificate of civil aid under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, brought the action against Barclays Bank, Ltd., as executors of Maud Mary Brown, deceased, and Mrs. Sonia Christie, the sole beneficiary under the will of the deceased, for specific performance of an agreement made in or about 1932 between the plaintiff and the deceased relating to a dwelling-house in Cardiff and to the testamentary dispositions concerning the house to be made, respectively, by the plaintiff and the deceased, and, alternatively, for damages for breach of the agreement. She further claimed in respect of goods and services supplied by her to the deceased prior to her death on July 16, 1950, and/or for breach of the promise to pay for the same. By her statement of claim the plaintiff alleged, inter alia, that, by an oral agreement made in or about 1932, she and the deceased had agreed to purchase the house and to live together therein, sharing the costs of the purchase and the maintenance and outgoings thereof, that they had further agreed that, in the event of the death of either, the house was to belong absolutely to the survivor, and that, in pursuance of this agreement, they had orally agreed, in 1933, to execute in each other's favour, and not to revoke, mutual wills so that each by her will should give her interest in the house to the other. The statement of claim went on to allege, inter alia, that pursuant to the agreement, in August, 1933, the plaintiff and the deceased each made a will in the other's favour, and that on June 29, 1950, the deceased, in breach of the agreement, made a new will, revoking her earlier will, and giving all her property to the second defendant absolutely.

Before any defence was delivered, the case was settled in consideration of the payment of a sum of money to the plaintiff by the second defendant, and an order was made in the action for the taxation of the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client in accordance with sched. III to the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. On taxation the taxing master disallowed, inter alia, (a) a fee for the country solicitor's attendance at a consultation in London with leading and junior counsel and his disbursements on travelling, and (b) the fees in connection with a conference with junior counsel after the settlement had been offered and before it was accepted. The reasons for the objections were, in regard to (a), that the attendance was necessary to give leading counsel the background and history of the case and any detailed information which he might require, and that only the instructing solicitors had all the necessary knowledge of details; and, in regard to (b):

"This conference was held so that counsel could explain clearly to the plaintiff the desirability of considering seriously the offer put forward by the defendants. Plaintiff was naturally anxious not to accept a settlement which could possibly be improved upon as she felt this one might, and it is respectfully submitted that she was entitled to hear direct from counsel his views on the difficulties facing her in establishing her case so that she could correct him if he was under any misapprehension as to some of the facts within her own knowledge. Only in this way could the plaintiff come to a decision on the offer made which she would not later regret."

- A The taxing master's answers were, in regard to (a), that the matter could have been dealt with adequately by written instructions to counsel to advise, and, in regard to (b), that the cost was incurred through over-caution and was neither necessary nor proper.

R. J. S. Harvey for the plaintiff.

- B HARMAN, J.: This is a summons to review a taxation under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. The taxation under sched. III, para. 4 (1), to that Act, is, subject to certain matters which do not concern us for this purpose, in these words:

- C "... costs shall be taxed for the purposes of this schedule according to the ordinary rules applicable on a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are to be paid out of a common fund in which the client and others are interested: Provided that no question shall be raised as to the propriety of any act for which prior approval was obtained as required by regulations."

- D Therefore, it is an ordinary solicitor and client taxation for my purpose.

- The plaintiff, who had been granted a civil aid certificate, objected to the taxing master's disallowance of certain items in her bill of costs. It appears that instructions were sent to junior counsel to advise and to settle the statement of claim, and, practically contemporaneously, instructions to advise on evidence. The taxing master has allowed counsel's fee for settling the statement of claim at £3 5s. 6d. He has allowed £5 10s. for advising generally on the case, and he has disallowed the fee of £3 5s. 6d. for advising on evidence, and to this objection is brought in. It seems to me that the taxing master was wholly right in that case. It is premature to ask counsel to advise on evidence before the issues in the action are pleaded. He could not know what might be admitted by the second defendant if and when she put in a defence, which, incidentally, she never did.
- F It was impossible to tell what would be the issues at the trial, and, therefore, advice on evidence, though it might help the solicitor in that he could make early inquiries, is not a matter which, on a solicitor and client taxation, should be allowed at this stage of the proceedings before the pleadings were closed. What counsel said in his general advice about the evidence necessary is, I think, properly covered by the fee of £5 10s. allowed for his general advice, and I
- G uphold the master's view on that matter.

- Next comes a group of matters of this kind. After the statement of claim was drawn and delivered, the country solicitors were minded to take the advice of leading counsel. They applied to the legal aid area committee for leave, which they obtained, and, therefore, having regard to the proviso to para. 4 (1) of sched. III to the Act, the master must start with the view that it was a case
- H appropriate for leading counsel, and no question of the propriety of instructing him arises. The master, looking at the matter broadly, started by allowing £5 10s. for leading counsel's opinion—he was practising in London—and he disallowed all other fees at that stage to the leader. The charges in the bill were (i) a fee for a consultation in London between the leader and the junior; (ii) the country solicitor's attendance at that consultation; (iii) as a disbursement, the travelling fees of the country solicitor coming up from Cardiff; and (iv) £11 for the opinion which leading counsel wrote as a result of the consultation.

The taxing master relented to the extent of £5 10s., and allowed £11 for leading counsel's opinion, but he still would not allow the consultation, nor the country solicitor's attendance. Having regard to the sort of case this was, and having looked at the statement of claim, which depended on a number of small facts, I think that this was a case which justified the exceptional course of the country solicitor coming up to London to attend a consultation between leading and junior counsel, and, certainly, in my view, it justified having the consultation before leading counsel wrote his opinion, because he would want—and, I think, would probably insist on it—to see junior counsel who had drawn the statement of claim and who had already advised. As it turned out, leading counsel advised certain amendments to the statement of claim, and no leader would do that without having his junior there, as a mere matter of ordinary courtesy. Therefore, I think it would be right to allow a proper fee for the leader and junior for that consultation, and to allow a proper fee for the country solicitor's attendance and for his disbursements on travelling. Whether they come to as much as he has charged, viz., £8 3s. 2d., is for the taxing master to determine and not for me. In regard to the fee for leading counsel's opinion, I do not think, on the whole, that £11 was an unjustified fee for him to charge.

An offer was made by the second defendant to settle the case for a money payment, not a very handsome one, and plaintiffs never like it when they are offered a sum which is less than they hope to get. But lawyers know the difficulties which they face when they are put to proof in cases of this kind, where the claim is based on mutual wills and so forth, and it was desirable to satisfy the plaintiff, if possible, that it was in her true interest to settle the litigation at that stage, and that she should see counsel for that purpose is, in my view, altogether proper. I propose to allow counsel's fee of £2 7s. for a conference and whatever sum the solicitor may properly charge for attending that conference.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Wrentmore & Son, agents for H. Morgan Lloyd & Evans, Cardiff (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re MALDONADO (deceased). STATE OF SPAIN v.
TREASURY SOLICITOR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.),
November 26, 27, 30, 1953.]

*Conflict of Laws—Succession to estate of intestate—Foreign domicil of intestate—
A Personal property in England—Claim by foreign State as sole and universal heir.*

On Oct. 11, 1924, the deceased, a Spanish citizen domiciled in Spain died there a widow and intestate, leaving movable property in England. On June 4, 1930, the State of Spain obtained in Spain a declaration of heirship on failure of heirs on intestacy, and now claimed a grant of letters of administration of the English property. On the evidence, the State of Spain was "a true heir just as any individual heir according to Spanish law", but it was contended by the Crown that the maxim "mobilia sequuntur personam" stopped short of recognition of a State as successor.

HELD: assuming that there was a valid distinction between the case where a foreign State claimed property in England of a person dying intestate and domiciled in the territory of the foreign State on the footing that it was ownerless and bona vacantia and the case where the foreign State claimed to be the successor by virtue of its own laws, in the latter case there was no rule of English law which confined such succession to individuals having a particular quality or characteristic or had the effect of excluding a State from entertaining the capacity of an heir, and, therefore, the State of Spain, as true heir was entitled to a grant.

Decision of BARNARD, J. (ante, p. 300), affirmed.

AS TO INTESTATE SUCCESSION TO MOVABLES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, p. 245, para. 299; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 11, pp. 397, 398, Nos. 525-550.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Barnett's Trusts, [1902] 1 Ch. 847; 71 L.J.Ch. 408; 86 L.T. 346; 11 Digest, Replacement, 398, 548.
(2) In the Estate of Musurus, [1936] 2 All E.R. 1666; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendant, the Treasury Solicitor, from a decision of BARNARD, J., dated May 22, 1953, and reported ante, p. 300.

Eloisa Hernandez Maldonado, a Spanish subject domiciled in Spain, died there on Oct. 11, 1924, a widow and intestate, with no ascendant, descendant or collateral relative entitled to succeed to her estate on her death under the law of Spain. She left movable property in England valued at the time of her death at the sum of £31,515 5s. 4d. but now said to be worth some £27,000. Article 956 of the Spanish Civil Code, as translated for the purposes of this case, and in the form in which it stood at the death of the intestate, was in these terms:

"In default of persons having the right to inherit in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing sections [which is the present case] the State shall inherit, the assets being devoted to institutions of charity and free instruction in the following order: (i) municipal charitable establishments and free schools of the place of residence of the deceased, (ii) establishments of both classes of the province to which the deceased belonged, (iii) charitable establishments and educational establishments of a general character."

On June 4, 1930, the State of Spain obtained in Spain a declaration of heirship in accordance with art. 958 of the Spanish Civil Code "to enable the State to take physical possession of the estate". The State of Spain brought proceedings in this country claiming that letters of administration to the estate of the intestate in this country should issue to the duly constituted attorney of the Spanish State as the sole and universal heir to her estate by Spanish law. The defendant in the action was the Treasury Solicitor, who claimed that a grant should issue for the benefit of the Crown on the ground that the property of the intestate in this country passed to the Crown as bona vacantia. On May 22, 1953, BARNARD, J., held that on the evidence before him the State of Spain was a true heir just as any individual heir according to Spanish law; that there was nothing contrary to English policy or repugnant to English law in a foreign State being permitted to take possession of the movables of one of its citizens in this country, and that, therefore, the State of Spain was entitled to a grant of letters of administration of the English estate. The Treasury Solicitor appealed.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and Victor Russell for the Treasury Solicitor.
Russell, Q.C., and Lindner, Q.C., for the State of Spain.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., stated the facts and continued: It was agreed in the court below, and it has been conceded in this court, that the question is, as between the plaintiff, the State of Spain, and the defendant, the Treasury Solicitor: Who is entitled to the property?—since it is conceded that the right to the grant depends on the right to the property. The claim of the State of Spain is that by the law of Spain the State is entitled, in the circumstances of the case, as “successor” to inherit all the property of the intestate, and, accordingly, that the English courts will apply the principle mobilia sequuntur personam and accept the State of Spain as entitled to the property in question. On the other side, the Treasury Solicitor argues that the claim of the State of Spain is in truth not by way of a succession, but by the exercise of a paramount right of a sovereign State to take property of its nationals which has become ownerless on their deaths, and that the corresponding right of the English Crown to ownerless property is the only right that the English courts will recognise, having regard to the fact that the property in question is in England.

BARNARD, J., had first to determine what was the relevant Spanish law. The material article of the Spanish Civil Code which was in force on Oct. 11, 1924 (the date of the death) is art. 956. On this article there was a sharp conflict of expert testimony. Two witnesses called for the State of Spain said that the effect of the article was, as is stated by its terms, that the intestate having left no issue, parents or grandparents, surviving spouse, or collaterals within the sixth degree (for the purpose of art. 955 as in force in October, 1924), the State of Spain was entitled as ultimus heres. On the other side, Dr. Colas, for the Treasury Solicitor said that, notwithstanding the language of the article, the State of Spain was not a true heir or successor but had become entitled to this property as bona vacantia. Between these two views the learned judge decided clearly in favour of the witnesses for the State of Spain. He said (ante, p. 305):

“I am satisfied on the evidence before me that the State of Spain is a true heir just as any individual heir according to Spanish law.”

That finding has not been challenged in this court.

The Crown’s argument before us may fairly be stated in the form of four propositions. (i) Prima facie, movable property situate within the limits and jurisdiction of any State is subject to the laws of that State, and if such property be found to be ownerless it will pass to and become the property of that State. This, at least, is the law of England, and in the case supposed the property in England is assumed by the Crown as bona vacantia. (ii) To the above general rule there is an exception, being a rule of private international law generally accepted by and forming part of the law of civilised States, including England. The exception is expressed by the formula mobilia sequuntur personam. Thus in the case of movables belonging, for example, to a deceased national of another country who died domiciled in that other country (as in the present case), the courts of this country will treat as entitled to the movables the person or persons who are by the law of that other country entitled to succeed thereto either under a testamentary disposition valid by the law of that other country or on an intestacy, as the case may be. But, (iii) the extent and scope of the exception expressed by the formula mobilia sequuntur personam is a matter in the case of each State for its own municipal law. And, (iv) in the case of a national of another State dying domiciled in the other State, and dying, according to its laws, intestate (as in the present case) the English courts will not recognise as having a title in this country to the movables of the intestate any persons who are not "successors" in accordance with some generally recognised nexus of personal relationship with the intestate, or, at least, will not recognise as a successor the foreign State itself which has made itself such by its own laws; for, notwithstanding the language used in those laws, the truth is that the State is exercising the equivalent of our jus regale as regards ownerless property. In further support of his fourth proposition counsel for the Crown has argued that since the rules of private international law apply to the relations inter se of individuals or, at least, of subjects of States and not to the relations inter se of States themselves, the scope of the exception necessarily and logically stops short of recognition of a State as successor.

Counsel for the State of Spain has not, at any rate for the purposes of this appeal, been concerned to contest the first three of the propositions submitted by the Crown. His challenge has been directed to the fourth and last. According to this argument the successors of the foreign intestate are those persons, whether natural persons or personae fictae (including the foreign State itself) who, by the laws of the foreign State, are constituted successors. There can, according to counsel, be no justification for a requirement by our courts that the successors should have a particular quality, for example, that they should be blood relations of the deceased in some degree. Thus, to take the example used during the course of argument, if the Spanish law decreed that, in default of any relations of the degrees stated in the Code, the Archbishop of Toledo should be the next successor, the English courts must recognise the title of the archbishop to the movables here of a Spanish intestate. It follows thence that no line can be drawn to exclude a persona ficta, whether a corporation, a municipality, or the State itself, so long as, by the Spanish law, such personae are in truth made successors and do not claim their title otherwise, for example, by a right of appropriation of the property as bona vacantia.

In confining his argument to this single question, counsel accepted as good law the decision of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Barnett's Trusts (1), followed by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in In the Estate of Musurus (2). In Re Barnett's Trusts (1) the English Crown claimed as bona vacantia movables belonging to a former Austrian citizen. But there was joined as a party for the purpose of the argument a representative of the then Austrian government who also claimed the property. The relevant art. 760 of the General Civil Code of Austria, unlike the article with which we are concerned of the Spanish Code, used this language:

"If the spouse is no longer alive, the succession is confiscated as heirless property either by the fiscus or by those persons who according to the political ordinances are justified in confiscating heirless estates"; and, having regard to the terms of that article, KEKEWICH, J., held that the claim of the Austrian government or its representative did not depend on his being in the guise or clothing of a successor, his claim was a claim to ownerless property, and, as between similar claims on the part of the British Crown and on the part of the Austrian government, that of the former must prevail. The argument for the Crown is set out at length ([1902] 1 Ch. 849), and it was observed pertinently by counsel for the State of Spain that there was no argument put forward on the part of the English Crown that no claim to "ownerless" movables by a foreign State as a successor, or in any other capacity, could, in any event, be successfully put forward in these courts. The argument of the representatives of the Crown was based on the terms of the article which I have read, and was to the effect that the right asserted by the Austrian government rested on a confiscation in the terms of art. 760 of the property as heirless (that is, ownerless) property. At the end of the argument it was said ([1902] 1 Ch. 852):

"If in one of the countries a different principle prevailed [that is, if the State took not as on confiscation of heirless property, but as being a successor], a more difficult question might arise, because international law depends on reciprocity. But as in this country, so in Austria the State takes, not as 'ultimus heres' but 'jure regali'. It being clear that goods of this kind are taken by the Crown in both countries as bona vacantia, the law of England must apply to the English goods as the law of Austria would to goods in Austria."

The representatives of the Crown cited BAR'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, Gillespie's translation, 2nd ed., p. 843, para. 387, which reads:

"The question to which State property is to fall where there is no heir, whether to that in which it is situated, or to that to which the last possessor belonged, is dependent upon whether the right of the State to succeed is to be considered to be a right of occupation or a right of consolidation belonging to the feudal superior, or as a true right of succession. In either the first or second case, the property will go to the State where the property is situated; in the last case it will fall to that of the domicile of the deceased, in so far as both States hold the theory of an universal succession, or as the estate is made up of movables. The theory which is in conformity with modern ideas of law, which is more deserving of our respect, and which undoubtedly now prevails as the theory of the law in Germany, is that, if there is no one nearer in blood to be called to the succession, a man's fellow-countrymen must be regarded as his heirs. This view is supported by the fact that it is the State to which a man belongs that fixes the circle of those who are entitled to succeed to him as heirs, drawing it more or less wide, as it pleases; while, on the other hand, it has more or less of the air of robbery for a State to seize on the movable estate of a deceased person, who was by mere accident resident there at the moment of his death. Thus the State whose subject and citizen the deceased was, will be entitled to succeed him. But, beyond Germany, the other rule still prevails, and each State seizes the movables which happen to be within its borders."

In the course of his judgment BARNARD, J., also referred to a passage in WOLFF ON PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 2nd ed., p. 579, which is as follows:

"In default of next of kin, the universal rule is that the property goes to the State or the Crown or a township or some other public body—in Germany, Italy, and Switzerland as ultimate 'heir', in England, Austria, and Turkey by virtue of a jus regale over bona vacantia. In the latter case the conflict rule on succession is not applicable because there is no 'succession' (inheritance) . . . the right to 'heirless' property is governed by the lex situs."

Other examples of a recognition of the distinction in the character in which a sovereign State may take is to be found in other text-books to which we were also referred during the course of the argument. For example, in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., the statement of r. 178 (p. 817):

"The succession to the movables of an intestate is governed by the law of his domicile at the time of his death . . ."

is followed by this passage (ibid., p. 818):

"Where a person dies, e.g., intestate and a bastard, and under the law

A of the country where he is domiciled there is no succession to his movables, but they are bona vacantia, and leaves movables situate in a country, e.g., England, in which he is not domiciled, the title to such movables is governed by the lex situs, i.e., under English law the movables being situate in England, the Crown is entitled thereto. In such a case the foreign Treasury claims not by way of succession but because there is no succession. It does not follow that the decision would be the same if the law of the domicile was such that the foreign Treasury claimed as ultimatus heres. That would be a true case of succession and would, it is submitted, be governed by the law of the domicile."

B As will be observed in that work, the distinction, or the result, in the case of a foreign State claiming by way of succession is put as a submission. It is stated more positively in CHESHIRE'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 4th ed., p. 59. But assuming that there is a valid distinction between the case where a Sovereign State claims the property on the footing that it is ownerless and bona vacantia, and the case where the State claims as being the successor by virtue of its own laws, there is, at any rate, no statement, in any of the cases or the text-books, that I have been able to find, or to which our attention was C drawn, that there is in England a rule which confines successors to individuals having a particular quality or characteristic, or which has the effect of excluding a State from ever entertaining the capacity.

D In my judgment, the real question is: What is the right or title by virtue of which the Spanish State now makes its claim? And, in my judgment, this point has been decided adversely to the Crown. That decision, the validity of which has not been challenged, I regard as conclusive against the appeal. I am unable to accept that, notwithstanding the finding of the learned judge, who said (ante, p. 305):

"I am satisfied on the evidence before me that the State of Spain is a true heir just as any individual heir according to Spanish law",

E these courts will reject the result on an a priori view of the necessary qualifications for succession. If by the law of Spain it is possible to limit or define the individuals who can claim to be successors, that is, individuals having some connection by blood or marriage with the deceased, I can see no reason why the law of Spain should not nominate or constitute as heir, in default of such individual, any person or corporation, including the State itself. The idea of succession no F doubt imports some notion of continuity of, for example, title. But I see no reason why this conception is inapplicable to the State which is constituted successor by the laws of the State. It is, indeed, as I understand it, conceded that if under a valid will property of the deceased were given to the State of Spain, the State of Spain would be then treated as being a successor, although in that case as the result of the testamentary disposition. Nor does the Latin G word "heres" from which the word "inherit" is derived necessarily involve any notion of some blood connection. To quote a sentence from CICERO, me nemo nisi amicus heredem fecit. I add that, in my judgment, there is no question of the law of Spain amounting to such a confiscation as would be regarded as repugnant to our own laws, and, therefore, not enforceable in these courts. Finally, I refer again to the passage at the end of the reported argument in Re Barnett's Trusts H where the matter is put ([1902] 1 Ch. 852):

"If in one of the countries a different principle prevailed, a more difficult question might arise, because international law depends on reciprocity."

There is before us no evidence of what the law of Spain would be in the converse case of an English national dying domiciled in England intestate without next of kin under the English law and leaving movables in Spain. I am, however, not able to reject the argument of counsel for the State of Spain on the ground that there is no evidence that the law, as I think it should be held in this country, might not be reciprocal in Spain. I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J., stated the facts as set out above and continued: The general rule to be applied in a case such as this is summed up in the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam, and is thus stated in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 814:

"Rule 177. The distribution of the distributable residue of the movables of the deceased is (in general) governed by the law of the deceased's domicile (lex domicilii) at the time of his death."

Thus, in the present case the personalty in question should, prima facie, devolve in accordance with Spanish law, and therefore go to the State of Spain for application in accordance with the provisions of art. 956. There is, however, an admitted exception to the general rule to the effect that if, according to the law of the foreign State in which the deceased is domiciled, there is no one entitled to succeed to the movable property of the deceased owing, for example, to the bastardy of the deceased, or to the failure of kin near enough in degree to qualify for succession under the law of the domicile, and, by the law of the foreign State, the State itself is, in such circumstances, entitled to appropriate the property of the deceased as ownerless property, by virtue of some ius regale corresponding to our own law of bona vacantia, English law will not recognise the claim of the foreign State as part of the law of succession of the domicile, but will treat it merely as the assertion by the foreign State of a prerogative right which has no extra-territorial validity and must yield to the corresponding prerogative right of the Crown. That appears from DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 818, to which SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., has already referred:

"Where a person dies, e.g., intestate and a bastard, and under the law of the country where he is domiciled there is no succession to his movables, but they are bona vacantia, and leaves movables situate in a country, e.g., England, in which he is not domiciled, the title to such movables is governed by the lex situs, i.e., under English law the movables being situate in England, the Crown is entitled thereto. In such a case the foreign Treasury claims not by way of succession but because there is no succession."

But the law of the relevant foreign State may be such as to constitute the State itself the successor to the deceased in the absence of any individual with a prior right of succession under that law, and the question then arises whether the claim of the foreign State should be recognised under the general rule as the claim of a person entitled to succeed according to the law of the domicile, or should be treated as falling within the exception on the ground that the claim of the foreign State as self-constituted successor does not differ in substance or in principle from a claim by a foreign State by virtue of its paramount right to ownerless property within its dominions as bona vacantia or the equivalent.

Accordingly, two questions were debated in the court below: First, whether under the Spanish Civil Code the State takes as a true heir or successor in the eye of Spanish law, or takes by virtue of a ius regale; and, secondly, if it takes in the former capacity, whether English law will recognise the State of Spain as a true heir or successor for the purpose of the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam. BARNARD, J., having heard evidence on both sides in regard to the Spanish law, answered the first question in the former sense, and the second question in the affirmative, holding in effect that the answer to the second followed from the answer to the first. The decision of BARNARD, J., on the first question has not been challenged by the Crown in this court. The sole issue before us, therefore, is whether or not the State of Spain, being admittedly according to its own law the true heir of, or successor to, the intestate, should be recognised as such by English law in its application of the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam.

This question has not been the subject of any direct decision, but the distinction between a sovereign State claiming "jura regalia" and as true heir or successor was recognised in Re Barnett's Trusts (1) and In the Estate of Musurus (2). Inasmuch as the foreign law in each of those cases was held to give the foreign State concerned a jus regale as distinct from a true right of succession, there was no actual decision on the present question, but, as I have said, the distinction was recognised. Indeed, as SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has pointed out, both those cases would have been susceptible of a short and simple answer if the view then taken of the law had been that in no circumstances could a foreign State claim the assets situated in this country of a deceased intestate, whether the claim was founded on jus regale or on a true right of succession. The question has also been discussed in various text-books on this branch of the law. For example, in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 818, the passage which I have quoted continues:

"It does not follow that the decision would be the same if the law of the domicile was such that the foreign Treasury claimed as ultimus heres. That would be a true case of succession and would, it is submitted, be governed by the law of the domicile."

There are also the passages referred to by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in WOLFF ON PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 2nd ed., p. 579, in BAR'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW (Gillespie's Translation), 2nd ed., p. 843, para. 387, and CHESHIRE'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 4th ed., p. 59, all of which I treat as incorporated in this judgment.

The conclusion of BARNARD, J., therefore, has the support of no inconsiderable weight of learned opinion, and although, for my part, I find it difficult to embrace with enthusiasm either side of this highly technical question, his conclusion also commends itself to me on the ground of consistency. In cases such as the present, English law professes to apply the law of the domicile to the devolution of the intestate's movables situated in this country. If the law of the domicile is that of a foreign State under whose law of intestacy the State itself is the successor, why should English law not give effect to that provision as part of the law of succession which it professes to apply?

The reasons why, it is claimed, English law does not do so are expressed in a variety of ways. First, the distinction between succession by a sovereign State and the appropriation of bona vacantia by a foreign State is said to be a mere matter of words. This argument is not without persuasive force, but I do not think the question can truly be said to be one of distinction without difference. The foreign State can only succeed under its own law of succession where the succession is governed by that law. On the other hand, where the case is not one of succession but of appropriation of ownerless property, the right applies to any ownerless property which may be reached by the law of the foreign State concerned, irrespective of the law by which its devolution is governed, provided only that by the relevant law it is in fact ownerless. Then it is said that the foreign State, being omnipotent so far as its own law of succession is concerned, can constitute itself successor in circumstances in which it could equally well rely on a claim based on jus regale. But in accepting the foreign State's law of succession, English law recognises the foreign State as arbiter of what the succession is to be. The foreign State could, for instance, enact that older relatives should be preferred to younger, or that male relatives should be preferred to female, or vice versa, or even that fair-haired relatives should be preferred to dark-haired. And to such distinctions, unreasonable as they might seem, English law would, as I understand the matter, have no objection. Why, then, should English law stop short of recognising the foreign State itself as the successor where, according to its own law, it is indeed such? The answer that English law recognises it to be the function of the relevant foreign law to regulate succession as between individual subjects or citizens, but declines to recognise rights conferred by the foreign State on itself in exercise of that function does not commend itself to me. It involves distinctions at least as arbitrary and artificial as those discerned by the Crown in the distinction between jus regale and true inheritance by the State. For example, it was, I think, conceded in argument that if the Spanish law of succession provided that in circumstances such as those of the present case the estate of the intestate was to go to some person, or body, or corporation, other than the State itself, for application to charitable purposes such as those stated in art. 956 of the Spanish Civil Code, there would be no reason why the English courts, in applying the general rule to the inheritance, should not recognise and allow effect to be given to that provision. Why, then, should not the same result ensue where, as in the present case, the estate goes by Spanish law to the Spanish State itself for application to those same charitable purposes ?

Then it is said that private international law is concerned only with the rights of individuals and not with the competing rights of sovereign States. That may well be so. But it is clear that English law recognises the legitimate proprietary rights of foreign sovereign States, and I see no reason why a right of succession to an intestate's estate should not be held to answer that description. Then it is said that English law should not recognise as "heir" or "successor" any person not bound by some personal nexus with the deceased. I cannot follow this. The heir or successor is surely the person, whether related to the deceased or not, who under the relevant law is entitled to inherit or to succeed. Then it is said that there is no reciprocity, because Spanish law would not give effect to a claim by the Crown in respect of bona vacantia. But non constat that Spanish law would not recognise a right to succession belonging to the Crown if any such right existed, and it could easily be made to exist by Act of Parliament if that were thought expedient.

There might be a case where a so-called right of succession claimed by a foreign State could be shown to be in truth no more than a claim to bona vacantia. If so, then, no doubt, it would be right to apply the recognised exception to the general rule, but this has not been shown to be such a case. On the contrary, it has been found (and the Crown has accepted the finding) that the State of Spain is, in the eye of Spanish law, the true heir, and I would add that, to my mind, notwithstanding what was said ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1667) by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in In the Estate of Musurus (2), the conclusion that this is a case of genuine succession is reinforced by the circumstance that the State of Spain is by art. 956 of the Spanish Civil Code enjoined to apply the property of the intestate to the charitable purposes therein mentioned. Accordingly, for the reasons given by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., and for such additional reasons as I have been able to offer, I agree that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: It is, I think, well settled that where a person dies domiciled in a foreign country our courts will follow and apply the law of that country when dealing with the succession, using that word in a strict sense, to the ownership of movables in this country. The property will go to the persons who become heirs to it according to the law of the domicile. One result is that the English court will, as a rule, make a grant of administration to the person who is constituted the personal representative of the deceased in the country where he was domiciled at his death. It is unnecessary to consider the basis of the recognised principle ; it has been said to imply a fiction which deems movables to exist in the place of the domicile of the deceased. Re Barnett's Trusts (1) was a case where, according to the General Civil Code of Austria, there was no one to whom distribution of the property could be made, so that it became liable under the Code to be confiscated as ownerless. The provision to this effect was held by KEKEWICH, J., to be precisely on the lines of the English law as to bona vacantia. As KEKEWICH, J., said ([1902] 1 Ch. 859):

"When there is no heir, some paramount authority steps in and claims it, not as against any one, but because there is no one to claim it at all."

As the ownerless property was in England he held that the paramount authority was the English Crown.

A The State of Spain has not found it necessary to challenge the decision in Re Barnett's Trusts (1) which has stood since 1902. It has in its favour the finding of BARNARD, J., not assailed in this court, that the State of Spain is a true heir just as any individual heir according to Spanish law. Counsel for the Crown, while acknowledging that he must accept that this is the position under Spanish law, submits that the substance of the matter is that the Spanish State is to take in default of there being kindred of the deceased, and he submits that our adoption of the law of the deceased's domicile need not go beyond the stage when it legislates to distribute among those with some personal nexus with the deceased, and, in any event, can stop short of any stage at which the State is decreed to take. Though this submission is reasonable and clearly formulated, I can see no warrant for acceding to, nor authority to support, it. It invites the court to lay down new doctrine in one of two alternative forms. It requires partial non-acceptance of the law of succession of the domicile, and the existence of the alternative submissions points to the fact that the court is really being asked to fix in arbitrary manner some limit to the extent of the adoption of the law of the domicile relating to succession. No question arises for consideration whether there might be provisions in a foreign law of such a nature that, either on grounds of public policy or of repugnance to English principles, our courts would not recognise rights to succession given by the foreign law.

D I can see no reason why either this or another country should not by law provide that on intestacy the Crown or the State should in certain circumstances inherit. The line in such a case between becoming owner as heir or inheritor by a law dealing with inheritance on intestacy and acquiring movables because there is no one who is made their owner as heir or inheritor may be a fine one, but it is, I think, a real one. If in regard to the foreign law dealing with succession as such, partial non-acceptance is embarked on, the line of such non-acceptance must be arbitrarily drawn. I can see no warrant for differentiating between a provision of the foreign law which on intestacy might, for example, give to remote relatives and a provision which, for example, might give to some public body whose activities might be generally welcome. As it is established and not in this court challenged, that the State of Spain is under Spanish law the heir of the deceased, and is as truly the heir as any individual heir would be, I can see no reason why the English courts should decline to recognise this particular heir. The substance of the matter, as it seems to me, is that by the law to which reference is made, the property in England is not left ownerless, but is to pass to an heir, that heir being the State of Spain. I think that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Vernor Miles & Clark (for the plaintiff); Treasury Solicitor.

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

SMEATON HANSCOMB & CO., LTD. v. SASSOON I. SETTY, SON & CO. (No. 2).

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), November 30, December 1, 1953.]

Arbitration—Costs—Discretion of arbitrator—Judicial exercise—Special Case stated by arbitrator—Costs awarded to buyers however questions of law answered—Decision in favour of sellers—Arbitration Act, 1950 (c. 27), s. 18 (1).

A

In a Special Case stated by an arbitrator for the consideration of the court, one paragraph of the award ran: "However the court answers the three questions [of law] or any of them, I award and direct that . . . the sellers shall pay the costs of this my award which I assess at £75 17s." On considering the questions of law, the court decided that the buyers were not entitled to maintain any claim against the sellers. On a motion by the sellers to set aside the award as to the costs of the award,

B

HELD: the discretion as to the award of costs given to the arbitrator by the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 18 (1), must be exercised judicially; the phraseology of the award as to costs showed that the arbitrator was not directing his mind judicially to one of the most important elements affecting his discretion, i.e., the result of the case; and, consequently, that part of the award must be set aside.

C

Lloyd Del Pacifico v. Board of Trade (1930) (46 T.L.R. 476), and Stotesbury v. Turner ([1943] K.B. 370), applied.

Per curiam: If an arbitrator has made an award in the form of a Special Case and has departed from the usual order that costs follow the event, it is desirable that the grounds which have caused him to depart from the usual order should be set out.

D

FOR THE ARBITRATION ACT, 1950, s. 18, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 104.

Cases referred to:

E

(1) Foster v. Great Western Ry. Co., (1882), 8 Q.B.D. 515; 51 L.J.Q.B. 233; 46 L.T. 74; 38 Digest 371, 736.

(2) Gray v. Ashburton (Lord), [1917] A.C. 26; 86 L.J.K.B. 224; 115 L.T. 729; 81 J.P. 17; 2 Digest 47, 259.

(3) Lloyd Del Pacifico v. Board of Trade, (1930), 46 T.L.R. 476; Digest Supp.

(4) Stotesbury v. Turner, [1943] K.B. 370; 112 L.J.K.B. 365; 168 L.T. 355; 2nd Digest Supp.

F

MOTION to set aside an arbitrator's award as to costs.

A dispute (reported ante, p. 1471) between the buyers and the sellers relating to the quality of logs sold and delivered was referred to arbitration pursuant to the provisions of the contract. The arbitrator made his award in the form of a Special Case stated for the consideration of the court on three points of law, the first of which was whether the buyers were entitled to maintain any claim against the sellers. DEVLIN, J. having answered that question in the negative the other two questions did not arise. One paragraph of the award read:

G

"However the court answers the three questions or any of them, I award and direct that each party shall bear their own costs of the arbitration and that the sellers shall pay the costs of this my award which I assess at £75 17s."

H

It was contended on behalf of the sellers that the arbitrator had no jurisdiction to make such an order as to the costs of the award, or, alternatively, that in making such an order he could not have exercised his discretion judicially.

Adrian Hamilton for the sellers.

Widgery for the buyers.

DEVLIN, J.: In this case I have given judgment determining a question of law that was set out in an award in the form of a Special Case. The Case sets out three questions of law, the first of them being whether the buyers were entitled to maintain any claim against the sellers. I answered that question in the negative by saying that the buyers were not entitled to maintain any claim against the sellers, and accordingly the other two questions did not arise. The matter now before the court is a motion that a part of the award which deals with costs should be set aside. The paragraph that is complained of is in the following terms:

"However the court answers the three questions or any of them, I award and direct that each party shall bear their own costs of the arbitration and that the sellers shall pay the costs of this my award which I assess at £75 17s."

The motion does not attack that part of the paragraph which requires each party to bear its own costs of the arbitration, but attacks the second part of the paragraph which requires the sellers, who have, on my determination of the question of law, been successful, to pay the costs of the award amounting to £75 17s. That part of the award is attacked on two grounds set out in the motion, the first being that the arbitrator did not in law have any jurisdiction to make such an order, and the second (and alternative) being that the arbitrator cannot have exercised his discretion as to the costs of the award judicially in making such an order.

The arbitrator's power to deal with costs is now governed by the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 18, which by sub-s. (1) provides:

"Unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, every arbitration agreement shall be deemed to include a provision that the costs of the reference and award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator or umpire . . ."

There is a contrary provision in the submission providing for the expenses of the arbitration to be equally divided between buyers and sellers, but, by virtue of s. 18 (3), that provision is to be deemed to be void. The result, therefore, is that there is no contrary intention expressed in the submission, and so the matter is one for the arbitrator's discretion under s. 18 (1). It seems at first sight, therefore, a little odd to find one of the grounds of the motion being a complaint that the arbitrator had no jurisdiction, since the Act appears in terms to confer discretion on him. The basis of that submission is to be found in Foster v. Great Western Ry. Co. (1). The Court of Appeal was there dealing with a section of a different Act, but one which was in similar terms to s. 18, and the reasoning of the Court of Appeal (if I may seek to paraphrase it) was this. A section of this sort, which leaves costs to the discretion of the arbitrator, must be considered as giving the arbitrator no more than the sort of discretion that is enjoyed by a judge of the High Court, i.e., a discretion which has to be exercised on judicial principles. If, therefore, the arbitrator exercises a wider discretion and gives costs on grounds which could not be supported on principle, then he is exceeding his jurisdiction. On the true construction of the section, it is not to be given its wide apparent meaning, but a limited meaning in relation to the practice of the High Court.

The principle that was thus laid down in Foster v. Great Western Ry. Co. (1) was very strongly criticised by all their Lordships in Gray v. Lord Ashburton (2). If I may respectfully say so I feel, quite apart from the authority of what was said in their Lordships' House, that there is very great force in the criticisms that were there made. However, the decision in Foster v. Great Western Ry. Co. (1) is a decision of the Court of Appeal, and WRIGHT, J., in Lloyd Del Pacifico v. Board of Trade (3) felt that on the whole he was not justified in treating Foster v. Great Western Ry. Co. (1) as having been overruled. In view of that dictum, it would be difficult for me to treat the case as having been overruled, but I cannot feel that any decision that is based on it would be a very satisfactory one. I prefer, therefore, to proceed on the second ground that is alleged in the motion.

In Lloyd Del Pacifico v. Board of Trade (3), WRIGHT, J., laid it down as a principle that an arbitrator's discretion as to costs must be exercised judicially, and he set aside the part of the award in that case which dealt with costs on the ground that the umpire had not exercised his discretion judicially. That principle was followed by ATKINSON, J., in Stotesbury v. Turner (4). In RUSSELL ON ARBITRATION, 15th ed., p. 233, the principle is stated in the following terms:

" . . . the discretion must be exercised judicially, and it will be reviewed by the court to the same extent as a judge's order as to costs will be reviewed upon an appeal."

Counsel for the buyers has not disputed that principle, but he does dispute its application in this case and on two grounds. The first of them is that he distinguishes between the costs of the arbitration or the reference and the costs of the award. He concedes that if a successful defendant is made to pay a part of the unsuccessful plaintiff's costs of the reference it is not, prima facie (unless there are, of course, some exceptional grounds), a judicial exercise of his discretion. But he says that that principle does not apply to the costs of the award which stand on a different footing. I do not feel able to draw any distinction in principle between the costs of the award and the costs of the reference. It is a mere matter of convenience, I think, that the costs of the award are kept separate. They are usually kept separate because the parties have to pay the arbitrator directly, and the practice is now universal that the award is not handed over except to a party who takes it up and tenders the necessary payment of the arbitrator's costs. It is, therefore, convenient that the costs of the award shall be set out separately and mentioned in the award; but in principle I think they are just as much costs in the arbitration as the court fees are costs in the action. I see, therefore, no ground for drawing any distinction there.

The second ground is that there is not to be found in the case anything which shows that the arbitrator has proceeded on a wrong principle in the exercise of his discretion. In the two cases to which I have referred, the decisions of WRIGHT, J., and ATKINSON, J., there were grounds given by the arbitrator for the course which he had taken, grounds which the two learned judges thought to be inadequate. Here, counsel for the buyers argues that there is no reason given and, therefore, there is no material on which this court can interfere with the way in which the arbitrator exercised his discretion. I have come to the conclusion on the whole that there is such material, and that that material does show that the arbitrator did not exercise his discretion judicially. The phraseology of his award as to costs is this:

"However the court answers the three questions or any of them, I award and direct that each party shall bear their own costs and the sellers shall pay the costs of this my award."

That appears to me to show that the arbitrator is not directing his mind to one of the most important elements, if not the most important element, which ought to affect his discretion, i.e., the result of the case. Prima facie, a successful party is entitled to his costs. To deprive him of his costs or to require him to pay a part of the costs of the other side is an exceptional measure, and if an arbitrator says: "No matter what the result is going to be I make this, that or the other order as to costs," that shows sufficiently, I think, that he is excluding from his mind in arriving at his order what ought to be the most important consideration affecting it. The fact also, as counsel for the sellers points out, that he has ordered that each side should pay its own costs of the reference shows that he has not anything in mind which would cause him to feel that one party had committed some act of misconduct, or anything of that sort, which ought to affect the usual practice that costs follow the event. Even if the buyers had wholly succeeded they would still have had to bear their own costs of the reference. These considerations seem to me to be sufficient to show that the arbitrator has not applied his mind judiciously to the question of costs.

A I hope that it will not be thought that in saying that I mean to make the least reflection on the conduct of this arbitration or of the arbitrator. It is very difficult for a lay arbitrator, unless he is informed on them (and I do not know whether this lay arbitrator was or was not), to know exactly what the principles as to costs are that he ought to apply. The only thing, I think, that a lay arbitrator ought to bear in mind is that there are certain principles as to costs which have been worked out by the court. If for any reason he thinks it desirable to depart from the usual order that costs follow the event, and if he knows that there are such principles, he may invoke the assistance of those who appear before him, their counsel or solicitors, as to what the principles are, and in the light of them make up his mind what he is going to do. I think, also, that it would be very proper and convenient that any arbitrator who is making an award in the form of a Special Case and who is departing from the usual order that costs follow the event should set out in the Case the grounds which have caused him to depart from the usual order. That will enable the court which is reviewing his decision to be fully informed as to what has influenced him, and it will not have to speculate from the nature of the Case itself. It is plainly a very exceptional jurisdiction that the court, on the decision of WRIGHT, J., has taken on itself. Normally the court is not concerned with the arbitrator's discretion at all or how he exercises it, but only with questions of law. This is an exceptional jurisdiction whereby the court reviews the arbitrator's discretion as to costs, and it calls, therefore, I think for the exceptional measure of the arbitrator stating in the Case the reasons which have led him to his conclusion as to costs. That is what a judge would normally do, and as the jurisdiction of this court is the same over an arbitrator as that of a Court of Appeal over a judge in the matter of costs, it is convenient that this court should be informed in the same way as the Court of Appeal would normally be.

E Difficulties, I think, might also arise as to what are the consequences of the conclusion at which I have arrived. There is no doubt that on the authority of the cases the proper course is to set aside that part of the award which is successfully complained of, and that I do in response to the motion which is before me. What the results of that will be in the ordinary case I do not know, but the parties here very sensibly agreed (as it is not a very large sum involved) that rather than spend a great deal more in going back to the arbitrator, and possibly coming back to this court again, I should put myself in the position of a tribunal which has power to deal with costs and that I should deal with them accordingly. Therefore, I deal with them by determining that the buyers shall pay the costs of the award. I think that there are no grounds shown in the Case (and that is, of course, the only material I have, and it is agreed that I may act on that material) for departing from the usual rule, and, indeed, I think that the buyers can consider themselves fortunate that they have not got to pay the sellers' costs of the arbitration.

H Accordingly, the order that I make on the motion is that the part of the award which is complained of shall be set aside, and that the buyers shall pay to the sellers the sum of £75 17s. The position is that the buyers originally took up the award and paid the arbitrator his fees, but the sellers desired to set it down and they were able to get it from the buyers only on paying to the buyers the amount of the fees. The result, therefore, at the moment is that the sellers are out of pocket, and accordingly the order should go for payment in the way I have made it.

Judgment for the sellers.

Solicitors: Parker, Garrett & Co. (for the sellers); William A. Crump & Son (for the buyers). [Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. UNIVERSAL GRINDING WHEEL CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), November 26, 27, 1953.]

Profits Tax—Distribution—Exclusion of “sum applied . . . in reducing share capital”—Company’s redemption of preference shares—Price equal to nominal amount of share plus a premium—Finance Act, 1947 (c. 35), s. 36 (1).

By s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, “. . . no sum applied . . . in reducing the share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business shall be treated as a distribution” for the purpose of determining the “net relevant distributions” to proprietors on which profits tax was chargeable at twenty-five per cent. compared with fifteen per cent. chargeable on the excess of the profits over such distributions, under s. 30 (1) and s. 30 (2) of the Act as amended by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, s. 7. A company redeemed four hundred thousand cumulative participating preference shares of a nominal value of £1 each, paying the shareholders 27s. for each share, as required by its articles of association, and providing 20s. of that sum by an issue of new capital and the premium of 7s. out of profits as required by s. 46 (1) (d) of the Companies Act, 1929.

HELD (HODSON, L.J., dissentiente): as the company was bound by its articles to pay 27s. for every £1 value thereof in order to redeem the preference shares, the full 27s. was “applied” in reducing its share capital within the meaning of the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Act of 1947, and no part of it represented a distribution under the Act.

Decision of UPJOHN, J. (ante, p. 133), affirmed.

FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1947, s. 36 (1), see HALSBURY’S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, p. 780.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Serpell & Co., Ltd., [1944] Ch. 233; 113 L.J.Ch. 165; 170 L.T. 335; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Trevor v. Whitworth, (1887), 12 App. Cas. 409; 57 L.J.Ch. 28; 57 L.T. 457; 9 Digest 98, 411.

APPEAL by the Crown against an order of UPJOHN, J., dated May 7, 1953, and reported ante, p. 133.

In December, 1947, a company redeemed four hundred thousand £1 preference shares at a redemption price of 27s. per share under a power contained in its articles of association (as provided for in the Companies Act, 1929, s. 46), which required the redemption price to be the nominal amount of the shares plus a premium of 7s. per share. Of the 27s. per share, 20s. was provided by an issue of new preference shares and 7s. out of profits. The company was assessed to profits tax for the twelve months to Sept. 30, 1948, on the basis that only 20s. of the 27s. was “applied . . . in reducing the share capital” of the company within the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, and that, therefore, the 7s. represented a distribution of profits for profits tax purposes under s. 30 (1) and s. 30 (2) of the Act, as amended by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, s. 7. The Special Commissioners allowed the company’s appeal against the assessment and UPJOHN, J., dismissed the Crown’s appeal against that decision. The Crown appealed to the Court of Appeal.

C. Montgomery White, Q.C., J. H. Stamp and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown. Borneman, Q.C., and G. W. H. Richardson for the company.

SINGLETON L.J.: The Universal Grinding Wheel Co., Ltd., was incorporated on Mar. 8, 1935, with a nominal capital of £600,000, divided into four hundred thousand five per cent. cumulative participating preference shares of £1 each and four hundred thousand ordinary shares of 10s. each. The capital at the material time was fully paid. The preference shares, under cl. 7 (B) of the articles, were entitled to participate to the extent that they might receive a dividend of eight per cent. In or before 1947 it was decided by those responsible for the government of the company that it would be good policy to redeem the preference shares. That involved consideration of the articles of association, and in particular cl. 8, which deals with the redemption of the five per cent. cumulative participating preference shares, and also s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929, which enabled a company to issue preference shares redeemable at the option of the company. Sub-section (1) (d) provided that:

- A “where any such shares are redeemed out of the proceeds of a fresh issue, the premium, if any, payable on redemption, must have been provided for out of the profits of the company before the shares are redeemed.”

B In order to redeem the preference shares the company made a fresh issue of the like nominal amount, and it follows from what I have said that any premium, which had to be paid, had to be paid out of the profits of the company.

Clause 8 of the articles provided:

- C “The five per cent. cumulative participating preference shares when fully paid up shall be liable to redemption at the option of the company in accordance with the following provisions . . . (D) The redemption price of a redeemable preference share shall be the nominal amount of the share plus a premium of 7s. per share and a sum equal to all (if any) arrears or deficiency of the fixed cumulative dividend (less tax) and the current fixed cumulative dividend (less tax) calculated down to the date of repayment of capital . . .”

- D The five per cent. cumulative participating preference shares thus could be redeemed by the company on payment of 27s. a share. In the result the holders of five per cent. cumulative participating preference shares were paid the sum of 27s. in respect of each £1 preference share, and of that sum 20s. was provided by the new issue and 7s. was found from the profits of the company in accordance with the provisions of s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929.

- E The Finance Act, 1947, by Part IV, brought into operation the profits tax. The relevant provisions are to be found in ss. 30-36 of the Act. The tax was a tax on the profits of the trade or business, but if the net relevant distributions to the proprietors were less than the profits the amount chargeable by way of profits tax was to be reduced by $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—see s. 30 (2). Sections 35 and 36 deal with distribution to proprietors. Putting it quite generally, s. 35 (1) provides that the gross relevant distributions to the proprietors are the total distributions to the members of the company, being either

- G “(a) dividends declared not later than six months after the end of [the relevant chargeable accounting period] . . . or (b) distributions (other than dividends which, under para. (a) of this sub-section, are to be treated as part of the gross relevant distributions to proprietors for any previous chargeable accounting period) made in the period.”

I shall refer to para. (c) of s. 35 (1) later. This appeal depends on s. 36 (1), which reads:

- H “Subject to the provisions of the next succeeding sub-section, wherever—
(a) any amount is distributed directly or indirectly by way of dividend or cash bonus to any person; or (b) assets are distributed in kind to any person . . . there shall be deemed for the purposes of the last preceding section to be a distribution to that person of that amount or, as the case may be, of an amount equal to the value of those assets: Provided that no sum applied in repaying a loan or in reducing the share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business shall be treated as a distribution.”

The case for the Crown is that the 7s. a share was a distribution under s. 36 (1) (a) or (b), and that it is a matter for assessment to profits tax under the Act. The case for the company is that the proviso to s. 36 (1) clearly takes the payment out of that category; in other words, it was a sum applied in reducing the share capital of the company. UPJOHN, J., decided in favour of the company.

The company wished to reduce its capital by eliminating its five per cent. cumulative participating preference shares. It could only do that by the application of cl. 8. If there had been an application to the court to reduce the capital by redeeming the preference shares, the answer would have been: "You need not come here; you have agreed as to the terms on which you can do it." Thus it was necessary for the company to pay each £1 preference shareholder 27s., and the company did that. The redemption of preference capital is equivalent to a reduction of capital: see per UTHWATT, J., in Re Serpell & Co., Ltd. (1). It is claimed for the company that the sum so paid was a sum applied in reducing the share capital of the company and so within the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947. It is agreed on both sides that the question for the court is: "What amount did the company 'apply' to reduce its capital?"

The contention put forward by counsel for the Crown is that the amount applied to reduce the capital of the company was only £1 a share, and that the 7s. was in the nature of a conditional payment which came out of profits and was not a sum (or part of a sum) applied in reducing the share capital. In the course of the argument I suggested that the proviso might have had words added to make it read: "Provided that no sum applied in reducing the share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business shall be treated as a distribution, except in so far as the sum so applied exceeds the nominal amount of the share capital repaid". In the absence of any such words I find difficulty in agreeing with the submission made on behalf of the Crown, especially in view of the reference to the nominal amount of the capital in s. 35 (1). We are concerned solely with a question of construction. It seems to me that the word "applied" in the proviso to s. 36 (1) has the same meaning as "paid". The company could not redeem the preference shares unless it paid 27s. a share to the holders of those shares. In paying that amount it was applying it to redeem the preference shares and in reducing the share capital of the company. Thus the sum which it paid was applied in reducing the capital of the company, and does not fall to be treated as a distribution.

The view which I have formed is, I think, supported by reference to the last part of s. 35 (1) of the Act, where there is reference to the "nominal amount of the paid-up share capital" of the company. I refer, too, to s. 71 of the Companies Act, 1947, which received the Royal Assent a week after the Finance Act. I need not read those sections, for I have formed the view that this appeal depends on the construction of the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947. I agree with the judgment of UPJOHN, J., and I am in favour of dismissing the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: The question in this appeal was not susceptible of any prolonged argument, both learned counsel coming back time after time to the construction of the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947. No cases were directly in point, and the matter had never been the subject of any judicial decision. The proviso appears in a section in Part IV of the Act, relating to profits tax, but one must be careful not to seek to find the intention of the legislature in these sections and then to make the construction of the proviso accord with that presumed intention. One must consider the relation of the words in s. 35 (1):

"... (c) in the case of the last chargeable accounting period in which the trade or business is carried on, so much of any distribution made after the end of that period (not being a distribution to which para. (a) of this sub-section applies) as is not a distribution of capital, and, for the purposes of para. (c) of this sub-section, the distributions which are to be treated as distributions of capital shall not, in the case of distributions made by a body corporate with a share capital, exceed an amount equal to the total nominal amount of the paid-up share capital thereof together, where the body corporate has issued shares at a premium for cash, with the aggregate of the amounts of the premiums."

A It was suggested in argument that the case for the Crown required the addition of some words to the proviso which are not there at the moment. Counsel disclaimed any such intention, and relied on the plain meaning of the words. I think, therefore, that, without cases to guide us, the case turns on the construction of this proviso.

B The company redeemed its redeemable preference shares under art. 8 of the articles of association, para. (D) of which reads:

"The redemption price of a redeemable preference share shall be the nominal amount of the share plus a premium of 7s."

C On the redemption, therefore, the company's obligation was to pay 27s. per share. It is true that it is possible to divide the 27s., and, indeed, it must be divided because 20s. of the 27s. could properly be paid by means of a new issue, but no more, and the 7s. by s. 46 (1) of the Companies Act, 1929, had to come from profits. Section 46 (1) provided:

D "(a) no [redeemable preference] shares shall be redeemed except out of profits of the company which would otherwise be available . . . (d) where any such shares are redeemed out of the proceeds of a fresh issue, the premium, if any, payable on redemption, must have been provided for out of the profits of the company before the shares are redeemed."

E Notwithstanding the need to divide this 27s. in this way, it was in fact 27s. in all, and in my view the division does not matter for the purposes of this case. The argument for the Crown was: "In fact you have only applied, in the meaning of this proviso, 20s. in the reduction of capital, because your capital was £400,000, and when you have paid 20s. for each share you reach your £400,000. Therefore, anything else which you paid above and beyond the 20s. was not applied in reduction of capital." It was suggested that the 7s. was paid or applied for something else, e.g., as an inducement to the preference shareholders to consent to the redemption. But the articles show clearly that the company already had such permission. It was said nevertheless: "Whether that is right or not, the 7s. clearly was not applied in reduction of capital; it was over and above the amount required for the repayment of the £400,000".

F The company, on the other hand, said: "The only way open to us here to get rid of the £400,000 redeemable preference shares was to repay on the terms laid down in the articles; and the preference shareholders, who had subscribed for the shares on the faith of the statement that if redeemed they would be redeemed at 27s., were entitled to 27s." Nobody disputes that. The company also said it made no difference that it had to pay the 27s. in the manner outlined because of the provisions of the Companies Act. The essential fact for this appeal is that it had to pay 27s. And, in regard to the proviso to s. 36 (1):

H "Provided that no sum applied in . . . reducing the share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business shall be treated as a distribution," (much emphasis was laid on the word "in"), it said: "It makes no difference whatever that one is able to split up this sum of 27s.; that was the sum we paid and the sum we applied". If there is any distinction between the word "paid" and the word "applied" in this section, it must be that one applied 20s. and paid the extra 7s. But if one pays the sum of 27s. to rid oneself of a 20s. share I should have thought that one "applied" the 27s. for that purpose. The company, therefore, say: "It is not a question here of what is the nominal capital which we have reduced. Nobody doubts it is £400,000, but, in order that we could reduce that sum of £400,000, we had to pay, and we did pay, 27s. for every 20s. share, and, therefore, we applied the sum of 27s.”

The mere recital of the amount of the nominal capital does not lead us anywhere, because this particular proviso says nothing about nominal capital. My Lord has pointed out the distinction between s. 35 and s. 36. The latter says nothing about nominal capital. It is in the plainest terms, and provides that no sum applied in reducing the share capital shall count as a distribution. The first question is: Is this figure a sum? There is no question about that. The second question is: Was it applied? I think it is clear beyond contradiction that it was applied. The third and vital question, is: Was it applied in reducing the share capital? I cannot see any particular virtue in the word “in”. Even supposing the wording had been, “in order to reduce the capital” or “for the purpose of reducing the capital”, I cannot see any clear or vital distinction between that and “in reducing the capital”. It would be different if it could be contended that the word “in” impliedly meant nominal capital, but I do not think it does. The company is entitled to ask: “In reducing this block of four hundred thousand £1 redeemable preference shares, what has it cost the company to do it?”. The plain answer to that question is 27s. for every 20s. share. That is what it cost. If it is put in this way: “What has the company paid in order to reduce that capital?” the answer clearly is that it has paid 27s. for every 20s. share. If the question is: “What sum has the company applied in reducing the four hundred thousand £1 redeemable preference shares?” the answer again is 27s. for every 20s. share. I appreciate the Crown’s argument that what is being done by this operation is not really an operation to reduce the capital; it is an operation properly described as redeeming the redeemable preference shares. In my opinion, no such distinction can properly be made. The two are inextricably intertwined, and are really indivisible. For by the very act of redeeming one’s preference shares one is in fact reducing the capital.

Without entering into any question of what the intention of the legislature might have been, but applying the plain words of the proviso to the admitted facts of this case, I come to the same conclusion as UPJOHN, J., and as the Special Commissioners. This was the way of reducing the capital by redeeming the preference shares. It could only be done by paying 27s. for every 20s. share, and that was a sum “applied” in the reduction of the capital of the company. I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: I have the misfortune to differ both from my Lords and also from the learned judge from whom this appeal is brought. In December, 1947, the company redeemed four hundred thousand preference shares of £1 each at the price of 27s. per share. This was done pursuant to the articles of association of the company, in accordance with the powers given by s. 46 (1) of the Companies Act, 1929, for the redemption of preference shares. The redemption was carried out in part by an issue of new capital and in part out of profits available for dividend. In particular the premium of 7s. per share was paid out of profits as required by s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929, and by the articles of association of the company.

Prima facie the distribution of 27s. a share is a distribution for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1947. The company contends that the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Act takes it out of the definition contained in the section. The proviso reads:

“Provided that no sum applied in repaying a loan or in reducing the share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business shall be treated as a distribution.”

The sum of 20s. per share was clearly applied in reducing the share capital, and the sole question is whether or not, having regard to the language of the proviso, the extra sum of 7s. is to be treated as a distribution. The company said that the

27s. had in fact been applied in reducing the capital, and in no other way. It was said that this is the plain effect of the wording of the proviso, and that the force of the language cannot be resisted in the absence of a proviso to the proviso on these lines: "Except in so far as the sum applied exceeds the nominal amount of the share capital repaid". In support of the argument, the company contended that the redemption of preference shares was equivalent to the reduction of capital, or, alternatively, the redemption of shares was a way of reducing capital.

- A I am unable to accept these contentions of the company. I would emphasise—because I think it is important—that, as the Crown pointed out in argument, the words of the proviso are "in reducing", not "for the purpose of reducing", nor "in connection with reducing", nor "on reducing". As a matter of arithmetic, the maximum sum which can be applied in reduction of the capital is the amount of the capital itself, namely, £1 per share. The additional sum of 7s. per share is a sum which the company was pledged to pay to the shareholders because of the redemption provision contained in the articles, and cannot in my opinion be regarded as a sum applied in reduction of capital. It is not in itself a reduction, whether it be regarded as a term or condition on which a reduction can be effected or an inducement to shareholders to persuade them to submit to a reduction of capital. The word "reduction" is not synonymous with "redemption", although it is true that the result of redemption is to reduce the capital of the company.

The company was constrained to argue that, in construing the words "no sum applied in reducing the capital," the question to be posed was: "What is the cost of redemption?". The answer being 27s. per share, it was said that this was the sum applied. I cannot read the word "sum" as equivalent to "the cost of redemption". The sum which is under consideration is the sum to be applied in reduction of the capital. This sum cannot exceed the amount of the capital, whereas the cost of redemption would include sums which are not applied in reduction of capital, e.g., not only the premium in question, but the costs of stockbrokers and solicitors incurred in connection with the redemption.

- D The matter may, I think, be conveniently explained by reference to the company's balance sheet. In so far as the company's capital is reduced from its nominal value to zero this can be done by reducing the capital figure on the left side of the balance sheet, but in so far as a sum is to be applied in excess of the nominal value of the capital it is necessary to draw on the balance of profit and loss item. The additional sum is not reduction of capital but a reduction of the reserve of profits or the profits carried forward.

- F Some reliance was placed on the difference between the terms of s. 35 (1) (e) and those of the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947. Section 35 (1) is concerned with the distribution to shareholders on the liquidation of a company, provides for the return of capital to shareholders, and excludes from relief any excess over capital. The material words are:

- G "for the purposes of para. (c) of this sub-section, the distributions which are to be treated as distributions of capital shall not, in the case of distributions made by a body corporate with a share capital, exceed an amount equal to the total nominal amount of the paid-up share capital thereof together, where the body corporate has issued shares at a premium for cash, with the aggregate of the amounts of the premiums."

- H Reliance is placed on the adjective "nominal" before the word "amount", contrasted with the absence of this adjective before the words "share capital" in the proviso under consideration. I cannot see that this argument reinforces the contention of the company. In the first place s. 35 (1) is dealing with a company winding-up and distributing its assets, whereas s. 36 (1) is dealing with the balance sheet position of a company which is in being as an operating concern. Moreover, if the word "nominal" had been included before the words "share capital" in the proviso to s. 36 (1), the same arguments would have been open to the company as have been addressed to the court in this case on the wording as it stands. The language of s. 35 (1) does not, in my view, support the argument for the company. On the other hand, it lays the foundation for the comment that, in dealing with the return of capital on a winding-up, shares issued at a premium for cash are specifically mentioned as a legitimate addition to the capital of the company for the purpose of arriving at the excess distribution. Logically one would expect to find the same position in considering sums applied in reduction of capital under the proviso to s. 36 (1).

A further supporting argument was sought to be derived from the proposition that a redemption of shares was equivalent to the purchase of shares by the company, and that a company which purchased its own shares thereby reduced its capital. Reliance was placed on passages from the speeches in Trevor v. Whitworth (2). That case was decided in 1887, before redeemable preference shares were authorised by the Companies Act, 1929, and the actual decision was that a company had no power under the then Companies Acts to purchase its own shares and that the purchase was, therefore, ultra vires. It was said, therefore, that the company had had to apply 27s. per share in the purchase of its shares, and had thereby reduced its capital. I confess I derive no assistance from this argument, which leaves the question to be answered exactly as it was, i.e.: "Can any sum in excess of £1, the full nominal value of the shares, be accurately described as having been applied in reducing the capital?" In my judgment, the answer is in the negative. The amount of the reduction of the capital is limited by the amount of the capital itself, and any sum in excess of £1 applied is applied not in reduction of the capital but as the price of redemption. This, in my judgment, is the plain meaning of the proviso as it stands, and this result is reached without the aid of any proviso to the proviso which it has been suggested must be implied in order to reach this end. I, for my part, therefore, would have allowed the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown); Linklaters & Paines (for the company).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NOTE.

BIRTWISTLE v. TWEEDALE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), December 15, 1953.]

Practice—Citation of cases—Report by person not member of the Bar.

In the course of the argument counsel for the appellant drew the court's attention to a report contained in the ESTATES GAZETTE.

SOMERVELL, L.J., said that he did not wish to be cited cases that were reported by persons who were not members of the Bar since such reports might mislead rather than assist the court.

DENNING and ROMER, L.JJ., agreed and DENNING, L.J., said that there were sufficient cases that could be cited apart from those in the ESTATES GAZETTE.

P.P.

LEWIS v. HAVERFORDWEST RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), December 2, 1953.]

Arbitration—Costs—Discretion of arbitrator—Judicial exercise—Successful party deprived of costs—Each party ordered to pay own costs—No serious effort to settle claim—Arbitration Act, 1950 (c. 27), s. 18 (1).

A In 1949 a local authority laid a sewer under the applicant's land. In 1953, after unsuccessful negotiations, the applicant's claim for compensation under the Public Health Act, 1936, was referred to arbitration and he was awarded £156 2s. 6d. The arbitrator ordered that both parties should pay their own costs on the ground that no serious effort had been made by either party to settle the matter. On a motion to set aside the award as to costs,

B HELD: the discretion of an arbitrator as to the award of costs (under the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 18 (1)) must be exercised judicially; in the absence of special circumstances, a successful party should receive his costs; the reason given by the arbitrator did not constitute special circumstances; and, therefore, the award as to costs must be set aside.

C FOR THE ARBITRATION ACT, 1950, s. 18 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 104.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Smeaton Hanscomb & Co., Ltd. v. Sassoon I. Setty, Son & Co. (No. 2), ante, p. 1588.
- (2) Campbell (Donald) & Co. v. Pollak, [1927] A.C. 732; 96 L.J.K.B. 1132; 137 L.T. 656; 43 Digest 335, 1570.

D MOTION to set aside an arbitration award as to costs.

E The applicant, the tenant of a smallholding at St. David's, Haverfordwest, claimed under the Public Health Act, 1936, against the Haverfordwest Rural District Council, compensation for damage caused by the laying of a sewer across his land by the council. The work was completed in 1949 or 1950, and, although there were negotiations between the parties, proceedings were not brought by the applicant until 1953. The arbitrator awarded the applicant £156 2s. 6d. and ordered that both parties should pay their own costs. The applicant thereupon moved the court to set aside the award as to costs on the ground that the arbitrator had misdirected himself as to that part of the award.

J. D. May for the applicant.

F J. C. Rogers for the respondents.

G LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: It is a curious circumstance that lay arbitrators always seem to think parties should pay their own costs. Perhaps this case and that which has recently been before DEVLIN, J., Smeaton Hanscomb & Co., Ltd. v. Sassoon T. Setty, Son & Co. (No. 2) (1), may be of some use in emphasising to lay arbitrators that it has been laid down in the House of Lords, re-affirming the Court of Appeal, in Donald Campbell & Co. v. Pollak (2), that there is a settled practice of the courts that, in the absence of special circumstances, a successful litigant should receive his costs, and that it is necessary to show some grounds for refusing an order which would give them to him. The discretion to refuse that order must be judicially exercised. Those words

H "judicially exercised" are somewhat difficult to apply, but they mean that the arbitrator must not act capriciously and must, if he exercises his discretion to refuse the usual order, show a reason connected with the case which the court can see is proper.

In this case the arbitrator was asked why he made this order as to costs, and he answered:

"I had several reasons for awarding that each party should bear its own costs, and one of those was that I had no evidence that during the long time between the event and the date of the arbitration any serious effort had been made by either party to settle the question."

The question had to be settled at some time, and why should the respondents' failure to take steps to settle or to make the tender place them in a better position than they might otherwise have been? They made no effort to settle, and the applicant did not bring his proceedings, but he has brought his proceedings now, and he is entitled to recover the compensation which the Public Health Act, 1936, gives him and which the respondents had apparently made no effort to pay. I do not think it is a judicial exercise of discretion to say that because neither party did anything, the successful party will not be awarded the costs. That seems to me to be contrary to what was said in Donald Campbell & Co. v. Pollak (2), that it is the settled practice of the court that in the absence of special circumstances a successful litigant should receive his costs. I cannot find that the reason mentioned by the arbitrator is a special circumstance, and, therefore, I think that the arbitrator was wrong in not awarding the successful applicant his costs. He recovered £156 2s. 6d., and I can see no reason why he should not have been paid the costs of the arbitration.

The respondents had the opportunity, if they so wished, of making an offer to him. In a matter of this sort, making an offer would be regarded in the same way as a payment into court. If they had made an offer to pay a sum approximating to the amount which the applicant recovered, that would have been an excellent reason for refusing costs to the applicant. It might even be a reason for ordering the applicant to pay the respondents' costs, but I do not think there is any reason in this case for depriving him of his costs.

The parties have sensibly agreed that I should deal with the costs. Therefore I make an order setting aside that part of the award which deals with costs and, by consent, I order that the applicant's costs of the arbitration be taxed and paid by the respondents and that the applicant must have the costs of this motion.

Award as to costs set aside.

Solicitors: John L. Rendall (for the applicant); Denton, Hall & Burgin, agents for Philipps Williams, Haverfordwest (for the respondents).

[Reported by MICHAEL MALONEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

END OF VOLUME TWO.

FUL 3 1 MAR 1978

